TO HIS

GRACE

DUKE of ORMOND,

Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, &c.

My LORD,

THE reaſonable Hopes that the Engliſh Hiſtory could not be unacceptable to a Perſon and Family, that muſt make ſo noble a Figure in it, have encourag'd me to be thus bold in my Approaches: And real Gratitude to your Grace, for putting me upon this Work, and giving Life and Being to it, has excited me to lay it at your Grace's Feet; as a glorious Patron of Learning, and a generous Patriot of your Country, whoſe very Name will give both Luſtre, and Protection to it. And this I have preſum'd to offer, not ſo much with the Proſpect of celebrating your Heroick Virtues, as acknowledging this unmerited Favour.

For to enter into so spacious a Field, and to describe all the great Actions of your Self, and your Renowned Ancestors, is more properly the Work of an History, than a Dedication. And it would require an Historian of the most exalted Genius to record the several Excellencies of a Family, so truly Illustrious, and so gloriously Conspicuous, as your own. Such a Writer ought to do Justice to your Character in Particular; to display your inherent Magnanimity and Gallantry, your intrepid Courage and Bravery, and, which give Beauty and Brightness to these, your condescending Affability, and your unbounded Beneficence to Others. These, with that Greatness of Mind that soars above all private Interest, and the Faction of all Parties, are proper Subjects to be transmitted to Posterity, by such as have sufficient Abilities. Therefore I shall only presume to glance upon such Particulars, as will easily show what Praises are due from the Gratitude of One Kingdom, and the Justice of Another.

When England labour'd under all the Difficulties of a threatning War abroad, and powerful Disturbers at home; when her active Monarch was struggling with perpetual Oppositions, and wanted the Aids of the best and bravest of his Nobility; in those discouraging Times your Grace was pleas'd generously to offer your Service, to hazard your Person, and expend your Fortune, both in Ireland, and in Flanders. In the Latter, in one Battel your ardent Courage transported you beyond the Assistance of your Friends, to the reaping of the most dangerous Laurels; where your Wounds added Lustre to your Actions, and your Captivity prov'd your Triumph, by giving you Opportunities of displaying your Generosity, as you had done your Valour, and of teaching Humanity and Civility to one of the most polite Nations in the World.

When afterwards the Monarch of France became more formidable than ever, by a new Accession of large Kingdoms and Dominions, your Grace then shew'd us that

He

He was not invulnerable; and by your glorious Expedition at Vigo, gave us a happy Omen of future Succeſſes in thoſe Parts. This was the firſt publick Triumph in this wonderful Reign; which gave Joy to the whole Nation, and rais'd an Emulation between the Affections of the People, and the Love of the Soldiers.

As all Men became ſenſible of your Grace's Merits, ſo none more juſtly than thoſe of your Native Country; who, upon your Entrance into the Government there, receiv'd you with the utmoſt Tranſports of Zeal and Joy. The Nobility, and Repreſentatives of that Kingdom, unanimouſly expreſs'd their mighty Satisfaction: The Former could not but aſſure your Grace, That they admir'd Her Majeſty's Wiſdom, in appointing your Grace to repreſent Her Royal Perſon upon this Occaſion, ſince only your Grace could in this Juncture of Difficulty and Diſtreſs compoſe the Minds of Her People, and raiſe their Hopes that ſome Relief was intended them: And I think I may ſay in the Words of the Latter, That your unſhaken Fidelity to the Crown, Zeal for the Proteſtant Religion and Intereſt, Conduct and diſtinguiſhing Bravery on all Occaſions in the Publick Service, are ſo many Honours done to your Native Country. To the ſame Effect they ſhortly after declar'd as much in their Addreſs to Her Majeſty, who had conferr'd this deſir'd Honour upon them.

Theſe were the grateful Marks of the Nation's Satisfaction, in the Beginning of the Parliament; in the Concluſion of which, their Experience excited a more large and particular Acknowledgment of your Grace's Noble Services, as your indefatigable Application, as well in the framing, as in obtaining, the Return of the many good Bills from Her Majeſty, eſpecially the Bill to prevent the Growth of Popery. And it was upon this happy Occaſion, that the Commons thus expreſs'd the Senſe of their Nation: When we recollect the Honourable Part your moſt Noble Grandfather had in the Settlement of the Proteſtant Intereſt in this Kingdom, we cannot but Congratulate your Grace's greater Glory and Felicity, in being the Inſtrument, ment, under Her Majeſty, of giving a more laſting Security to the Proteſtant Religion, than ever it had ſince the Reformation.

I have mention'd theſe Particulars with the Plainneſs and Fidelity of an Hiſtorian, in Hopes to render them more agreeable to your Grace; and that ſuch undeniable Truths will not only remove all Imputations of Flattery, but alſo procure a Pardon for that which would otherwiſe be an inexcuſable Preſumption in

Your Grace's moſt humble,

Moſt oblig'd, and

Devoted Servant,

Laurence Echard.

THE PREFACE.

NOtwithſtanding the common Pretence among many Authors, That their Books were written at the Inſtance of Friends and others, I am oblig'd to do my ſelf the Juſtice to declare, That ſeveral conſiderable Perſons adviſ'd and urg'd me to undertake this Work, long before I had Time and Leiſure to begin it. The chief Reaſons alledg'd were, Firſt, The great Benefit and general Uſefulneſs of the Engliſh Hiſtory to all the Nobility, Gentry, and great Numbers of others in the Nation. Next, The unpleaſing Difficulties in attaining to that Knowledge, and the Length of Time requir'd to maſter the Subject; which had diſcourag'd many, and incapacitated more from arriving at any reaſonable Perfection in it. So that as the Caſe then ſtood, an Engliſhman, who deſir'd to know his own Country's Story, was oblig'd to read over a Library, rather than a ſingle Hiſtory, if he expected any anſwerable Succeſs. Now the Peruſal of all the Monkiſh Writers, with the Others neceſſary on this Occaſion, is a Labour highly diſagreeable to the Taſte and Genius of this refin'd Age; which cannot bear with the Meanneſſes and Sterilities of ſome of them, no more than the Prolixities and Impertinencies of others. Even Hollingſhed and Speed, the two beſt and moſt compleat Writers of their Times, have been condemn'd chiefly for their being ſo very tedious and voluminous; and for that Reaſon, are now much neglected, and almoſt laid aſide.

Theſe were ſufficient Inducements to me to undertake this Work, which, as far as the Subject and Materials would afford, was deſign'd ſo as to partake of the Advantages both of an Original Hiſtory and an Abridgement; ſo as to preſerve the Eſſentials and Beauties of the Former, and the Eaſineſs and Conveniences of the Latter. In order to ſurmount ſo great a Difficulty, I had a nice Conſultation with ſeveral Friends; when the Examples of Milton and Daniel ſoon convinc'd us, that Abridgements might be uſeful and acceptable to the Nation; but upon a careful Examination of thoſe two conſiderable Writers, we found them really too ſhort and confin'd to anſwer our Ends and Deſigns; therefore it was determin'd to make this Hiſtory in Proportion almoſt as long again as theirs. The Size and Method being thus fix'd and determin'd, I proceeded in the Work with all Care and Diligence, hoping in a reaſonable Time to bring it into the World: But in the Performance, I was unhappily diſturb'd with a thouſand various Interruptions, and many real Indiſpoſitions; ſo that it was hinder'd and protracted at leaſt one Year longer than was expected, and might have been preſum'd; for which I am to beg the Excuſe of ſeveral, who by that Means were deceiv'd as to the Time of the Publication.

The PREFACE.

Now it is finiſh'd and publiſh'd, perhaps the Reader will expect ſome fur-Account than I have already given of it; in which I ſhall very briefly endvour to ſatisfie him, tho' I cannot pretend to obviate all the Objections th may be rais'd againſt it. As Truth and Fidelity were my principal Aims, a Qualifications moſt neceſſary; ſo were likewiſe Perſpicuity and Elevation
Diverſion and Inſtruction, as Properties no leſs uſeful. For the Buſineſs of an Hiſtorian is not barely to tell his Reader a true and faithful Story, which is the Office of a Gazetteer and Journaliſt; but he ought withal inſenſibly to inſtruct him, as alſo ſenſibly to divert him: He is not ſo much to fill his Head, as to inlarge his Mind; not ſo much to load his Memory, as to inrich his Underſtanding, to elevate his Thoughts, and even to captivate his Affections. In ſhort, the Qualifications of a compleat Hiſtorian are ſo conſiderable, as well as numerous, that a perfect Work of that Nature has been juſtly rank'd with the greateſt of all Human Undertakings; as may be ſeen from Rapin, Le Moyne, and others, who have given us excellent Rules for that Purpoſe, taken from the Nature of the Thing, as well as the Examples of the moſt celebrated Hiſtorians in all Ages. To enumerate and particularize thoſe Rules and Qualifications, would too much diſcover my own Defects and Imperfections; therefore I ſhall only inform my Reader, that all along I had them in my View, and endeavour'd to follow them as much as a real Abridgement, broken Materials, and an unequal Subject would permit; all which were great Diſadvantages.

I have all the Way conſider'd my Reader as a Traveller through a vaſt Country, wherein he muſt have Occaſion for many Reſting-Places; ſome for greater Refreſhments, and others for leſs. Accordingly, in every Reign I have prepar'd ſuch a convenient Number of Stages, as I could judge beſt for that Purpoſe, by fixing the great Sections at ſuch proper Periods of Time, and ſuch natural Diſtinctions of Matter, as ſhould be moſt advantageous for the Eaſe and Pleaſure of the Reader, as well as for his apprehending and retaining the whole Subject. The Want of ſuch periodical Diſtinctions, and ſuch convenient Separations of the main Parts, have been a great Diſadvantage to many of the beſt Hiſtorians. From hence oftentimes there appears a Cloudineſs, when there is none in Reality, ſometimes a Light too much confus'd, and for the moſt Part the Reader is reduc'd to an unneceſſary Labour, by being oblig'd to digeſt and ſeparate what the Author ought to have done for him. Perhaps I ſhould offend, if I nam'd a late Writer, and one of the beſt in the Engliſh Tongue, who ſeems to have been too defective in this Caſe; and his excellent Hiſtory has been thought by ſome to be too tedious and perplex'd, when a nice Method, a clear Diviſion, and more Chronological Diſtinction of the Parts, would in a great meaſure have prevented that Objection.

As to the Materials, and the Authors from whence this Work was collected, for the moſt Part the Reader may ſee their Names in the inward Margin of the Book, which for above Half Way conſiſts chiefly of the Roman, Saxon and Engliſh Monkiſh Hiſtorians, with ſome Foreigners. Theſe are put in a ſmall Print, and a little Compaſs, that they might not too much withdraw the Eyes of the Reader, who in Hiſtory ought to meet with no Impediments nor Interruptions. Beſides theſe Writers, I have made uſe of all thoſe of a more modern Date, and more regular Design, such as Hall, Grafton, Polydore Virgil, Hollingshed, Stow, Speed, Baker, Daniel, Biondi, &c. But of the Moderns none more have been of greater use to me than the laborious Works of Dr. Howel, Dr. Brady and Mr. Tyrrell, besides the Celebrated History of the Reformation; by which I have been eas'd of much Trouble. I have also made use of Mr. Barns's Reign of King Edward III. Sir Robert Howard's Reign of Edward and Richard II. and Mr. Goodwin's Reign of Henry V. besides several other Writers of particular Lives and Reigns, such as Camden, Bacon, Herbert, Habington, Temple, &c. From all these several Writers, and many others, I have collected and formed this present History; always taking the Liberty either to copy or to imitate any Parts of them, if I found them really conducing to the Usefulness, or the Ornament of my Work. And from all these, I have compil'd an History as full, comprehensive and compleat, as I could bring into the Compass of the propos'd Size and Bigness. And that nothing might be wanting, I have all the way inrich'd it with the best and wisest Sayings of Great Men, that I could find in larger Volumes, and likewise with such short Moral Reflections, and such proper Characters of Men, as might give Life, as well as add Instruction to the History.

Notwithstanding all my Care and Caution, it cannot be expected, that a Work compos'd from such Variety of Materials, should be absolutely free from Errors, nor a History, so Comprehensive, from Omissions. As to this, I can only say, that I us'd my best Endeavours to follow the strict Rules of Sincerity and Judgment, the two superior Guides to an Historian. As to the Former, which includes or implies Impartiality, I may insist upon that without the Breach of Modesty, and declare that I am not conscious to my self of any Deviation from Truth, and real Fact; and if any such be found, I desire it may be charg'd upon the Latter, or upon Ignorance, or Inadvertency. I am sensible of the mighty Difficulties of discovering Truth in some Cases, and of knowing it when it is discover'd, therefore beg that some candid Allowances may be made: And a strict Impartiality is so rare a Quality in most Writers of History, that many are ready to think, that an impartial Historian is a Man not to be found in the World; and some carry it farther, and say, that considering Human Infirmities, it is impossible to be really impartial. I grant there are strong Propensities in all Mankind to join and adhere to one Side more than another, and that in the most trivial Cases; but while there are such things in the World, as Truth and Honesty, undoubtedly there may be an impartial Historian as well as an impartial Judge in a Court, who can certainly give Sentence according to his Conscience and Judgment, tho' contrary to his Desires and Inclinations. An Historian ought never to be of a Party but in one Respect; that is, he ought always to be of the same Side with Truth, and incline to the Cause that is most just and rightful, tho' it chance to be highly offensive to some, whose Thoughts are working a contrary way. Such a Writer I presume to declare my self; and I have carefully endeavour'd neither to exasperate, nor flatter any one Party of Men in the Nation, industriously avoiding all Expressions that had a Tendency either way. And if some Passages shall still displease, I must declare, that it was contrary to my Design and Intention. I have indeed taken more liberty as to Matters of unquestionable Morality and Justice, and have occasionally stigma-tiz'd the flagrant Vices and Impieties of great Men; especially where I found a restless Ambition, treacherous and villanous Practices, and an insatiable Thirst after the Blood of others. Such Crimes as these ought not to be spar'd or palliated by an Historian of any Religion, and they seldom fail of signal Punishments in this World; which I have the more expos'd, by shewing the Hand of a just and retaliating Providence from above. And this, as well as other Histories, will afford us many Examples of the greatest Men, who have been arrested by the Vengeance of Heaven, after they have been able to break through all the Powers of Human Laws, and common Judicature.

As to any real Faults or Imperfections that may be found in this Book, while they are not contrary to the Fidelity of an Historian, I shall not shew much Concern, but leave them to the Judgment and Candour of the Reader. I shall only beg of him not to judge of the Work by a single Chapter or Reign, but consider the Nature and Series of the whole, before he passes Sentence. If it be found, that the Form of it is irregular and disproportionate; that the general Method is intricate and confus'd; that the Colourings are weak and unaffecting, and that the Stile is mean, flat and insipid; I must then submit with Patience and Silence. But if there be no great Failures as to these Essentials, I hope the rest of my Defects may more deserve a private Admonition, than a publick Animadversion.

Before I conclude this Preface, I am to inform the Reader, that this Volume was first design'd to have ended at the Death of Queen Elizabeth, as the most proper Period of Time: But afterwards the Importunities of several so far prevail'd upon me, that I added the Reign of King James I. to it: Of which, as I found the worst Writers, and met with the most Dificulties, so I am afraid I shall need the greatest Excuses. Notwithstanding which, I have a full Design of carrying this Work further, hoping I shall meet with due Assistance and Encouragement.

To come at last to the Errors of the Press, there are few but what the Reader may easily correct, and those are Names of Persons or Places, which I believe proceeded from the hasty writing of the Copy. But because there are two or three which may seem to be more the Fault of the Author, than the Printer, I shall just mention them.

ERRATA.

IN all the Places of the Page and Margin, Page 59 and 60, instead of Osa, read Offa. In the inward Margin of p. 139, 140, 142, and several others, where-ever is the Word Vitales, read Vitalis. In the inward Margin of p. 439, 440, 443, and several others, where-ever is the Word Ursius, read Ursini. In p. 959, in the inward Margin, for Clerendus read Clarendon.

History of England.

THE INTRODUCTION.

Containing a ſhort Account of Ancient BRITAIN, and its Firſt INHABITANTS.

I. THE principal Deſign in this following Hiſtory, is to give a full and regular Account of the Tranſactions of that Part of Britain, now call'd England and Wales, for the Space of about ſixteen Centuries; that is from the firſt Entrance of Julius Cæſar and the Romans, 'till the Kingdom of Scotland was added to the Crown of England. And tho' there is frequent occaſion to treat of the Affairs of Scotland, Ireland, and other Countries, yet the Reader is not to expect any more than what have a neceſſary, or natural Dependance upon thoſe of England. For nine or ten Centuries, which include the greateſt Variety of Matters, our Accounts are very imperfect and defective, ſometimes diſjointed, broken and full of Chaſmes, and other times confus'd, obſcure and uncertain. So that the Reading of this Hiſtory will, in a great meaſure, be like a Man's travelling firſt by Twi-light, and then in the Night, 'till the Morning Sun at length gives him a new and clear Light. But that the Account may be as perſpicuous and as regular as the Materials will permit, we ſhall take ſome ſhort Notice of Britain and its Inhabitants, as they were before the Arrival of Cæſar; firſt the Country, and next the People.

The Country, before the Entrance of the Romans, had two different Names, Albion, and Britain; concerning which there have been more Variety of Opinions. It was call'd Albion, either from a ſuppos'd Giant of that Name, the Son of Neptune, mention'd by many ancient Writers, it being proper that the greateſt Iſland in the Ocean ſhould receive its Name from a Son of the greateſt Sea-God; or elſe from the old Word Ἀλφὼν, which among the Greeks ſignifies White, by reaſon of the white chalky Cliffs, ſeen by the Mariners afar off, as they ſail'd theſe Seas. Some think it comes from the Hebrew Word Alben, which alſo ſignifies White, and others from the Phœnician Word Alp, which ALBION.

BRITAIN. signifies High; but of these there is but little Certainty. Nor is there much greater concerning the Name of Britain, which some former Writers confidently derive from Brutus, the third by Descent from the Trojan Æneas; and others from the British Word Pryd Cain, that is Forma Candida, a white Form. Mr. Camden more probably derives it from Brith, which in the English Tongue signifies Painted, and the Greek Word Τανία, signifying a Nation; agreeable to the Custom of the ancient Britains, who were wont to discolour and paint their naked Bodies; so that according to him, Britain is a Nation of painted Men, such as the Romans call'd Picts in succeeding Times. Mr. Somner, another great Antiquary, dislikes this Etymology, and proposes another plausible Conjecture, namely, that it comes from the Word Brydio, which in the British Tongue implies Heat and Fury; pointing out the hot and violent Motion of the Seas that surround this Isle, which have been particularly observ'd by many ancient Authors. Others think the Opinion of Mon. Bochart most probable, who derives it from the Phœnicians, who in their Language call'd this Island, and some others near it, Barat-Anac, or more contractedly Bratanac, that is a Land of Tin; which in Time might be mollify'd by the Greeks into Βρεταvία. And they conclude it to be the more satisfactory, because the Greecians gave these Islands the Name of Cassiterides, which signifies the same with Barat-Anac, the Land or Country of Tin. Of these several Opinions, we must leave the Reader to chuse for himself; and therefore not to dwell upon these uncertain Subjects, we immediately proceed to some more material Account of the Country.

A general Description of the Country. This Country, in its utmost Extent, was by the Ancients accounted the largest Island in the World; and notwithstanding the later Discoveries of Madagascar and Japan, which are brought in competition with it, we are not yet certain of the contrary. However all agree that it is far the most considerable of all others; especially if the sole Regard be had to that Part to which we are principally confin'd in this History. That Part has been celebrated by Writers in all Ages for the profuse Bounties of Nature, both in the excellent Temperature of the Air, and the valuable Products of the Soil. The Air, tho' thick and moist, is far more mild and temperate than any Part of the Continent under the same Climate, so that there is no need of Stoves in Winter, nor Grotto's in Summer; nor is it so frequently disturb'd with Tempests and Hurricanes, nor so infected with pestilential Distempers; nor is the Land so generally punish'd with Earthquakes and Famines, as many other Countries are. Tho' in its Products it may be said to be defective in some few Blessings, as Wine and Oil, yet in general it abounds and triumphs; and no Country exceeds it in the three main Necessaries of Human Life, Flesh and Corn for Food, Wool and other Conveniencies for Raiment, and Timber and Stone for Building; to which we may add Wood and Coals for Firing, and the most useful Metals for all Occasions. For Profit it has a double Advantage from its Situation in the Ocean, the Conveniency of a foreign Trade, and the Security from foreign Invasion; and for Pleasure and Beauty all Strangers take particular Notice of its excellent Verdure, in which it generally exceeds the most fruitful Parts of Europe. The happy Fertility and Pleasantness of Britain, gave occasion to some of the Ancients to imagine that these were the Fortunate Islands, and those Seats of the Blessed, where the Poets tell us, That the whole Face of Nature always smil'd with one perpetual Spring. For Plenty Britain was the Granary and Magazine of the Western Empire, from whence the Romans were wont every Year in eight hundred Vessels to transport vast Quantities of Corn, for their Armies upon the Frontiers of Germany. In short the Excellency of this Country is apparent from those transcendent Eulogies bestow'd both by ancient and modern Writers, who pronounce her 'happy above all other Countries, whom Nature 'has enrich'd with all the Blessings of Heaven and Earth, in whom nothing is 'hurtful, nor nothing desirable is wanting; a Master-Piece of Nature, per-

'form'd

'form'd when she was in the best and gayest Humour, which she plac'd as a lit'tle World by it self, upon the Side of the greater, merely for the Delight of 'Mankind; the most accurate Model which she propos'd to her self to beautifie
'the other Parts of the Universe; whose Vallies are like Eden, whose Hills
'are as Lebanon, whose Springs are as Pisga, whose Rivers are as Jordan, 'whose Walls is the Ocean, and whose Defence is the Lord Jehovah.

The ancient Inhabitants of it.

II. A Country so enrich'd and beautify'd by Nature, could not long want Inhabitants, after the Dispersion of the Sons of Noah. The first of which are most probably believ'd to have proceeded from Gomer, the eldest Son of Japhet, whose immediate Posterity settl'd in Gaul, and other neighbouring Countries. So that Britain seems to have been inhabited Two Thousand Years before the Romans made any Conquest in it. But as to the Actions of the Inhabitants during that Space of Time, we have no other certain Knowledge, than that they had some Commerce and Intercourse both with the Phœnicians and Grecians, before they were known to the Romans. What these Britains were at the Time of the Romans Arrival, and for some considerable time after, we have some Account from several ancient Writers, as Cæsar, Diodorus Siculus, Strabo, Mela, Tacitus, Dion, Herodian, Solinus, and some others; from all whom we shall describe their Persons, Manners, Customs, Government and Divisions.

Their Tempers and Dispositions.

The ancient Britains were a numerous and powerful People, and like the greatest Part of the World at that Time, barbarous and idolatrous: Yet they wanted not natural Generosity and Bravery, being fierce and couragious, courting all dangerous Enterprizes, passionate Opposers of Slavery, and exquisitely sensible of the Charms of Liberty. They in most Things resembled their Neighbours the Gauls, but were generally more rude and plain, as well as more warm and vigorous; yet Tacitus preferr'd their Wits and Ingenuities before them, and Diodorus their Honesty and Integrity much before those of the Romans. As to their Bodies, they were generally very tall, and their Constitution so strong, that several of them, according to Plutarch, would live a Hundred and twenty Years; the natural Heat of the Body, as he conceives, being preserv'd by the Coolness of the Country. They were frequently yellow-hair'd, and the Women fair and beautiful, and remarkable for their excellent Features.

Their Painting of their Bodies.

All the Britains, says Cæsar, dy'd their Bodies with Woad, which render'd them of a Sky Colour, and thereupon the more terrible in Battel; and they wore their Hair long upon their Head and upper Lip, but close and bare in all other Parts of the Body. Herodian tells us that they knew not the Use of Cloaths; but about their Necks and Wastes they wore Iron, accounting it an Ornament and a Sign of Riches, as other Nations did Gold: That they painted their Bodies with divers Colours, and with all Kinds of Animals there represented, wherefore they wore no Cloaths lest those beautiful Figures should be hid. In which Painting Pliny agrees, and describes the Herb Woad to be like the Plantine in Gaul, naming it Glastum, with the Juice of which, adds he, the Women of Britain, as well Wives as Virgins, anointed and dy'd their Bodies, resembling the Æthiopians by that Tincture, in which Manner they us'd at solemn Feasts and Scacrifices to go all naked. Dion says that it was the Custom of the Nation to abide in Tents, all naked, and without Shooes; tho' Cæsar in another Place says, that they were clad with Skins, which probably is meant of the civiller Sort of them, and in Time of Battel. Solinus tells us that they painted themselves with the Shapes of several Beasts, artificially cut out in their Bodies in their Youth, so that these Prints in their Flesh might increase according to the Growth of their Bodies. Nor was any Thing reckon'd a greater Sign of Patience among these barbarous Nations, than to make such deep Scars in their Limbs, as might drink in great Quantities of Paint and Colour. These Scars are by Tertullian term'd Britannorum Stigmata, the Britains Marks.

The usual Diet. To proceed to their Diet and domeſtick Concerns, it was accounted a Crime to eat either Hen, Hare or Gooſe, which notwithſtanding, as Cæſar obſerves, they bred for their Pleaſures; nor did they live ſumptuouſly at full and rich Tables, as Diodorus affirms, but rather in Neceſſity could feed upon Barks and Roots of Trees, and upon a Quantity of Meat no larger than a Bean, after which for a conſiderable Time they were neither hungry nor thirſty, as Dion aſſures us. He likewiſe tells us, that they till'd no Ground, nor eat any Fiſh, tho' their Rivers were plentifully ſtored with them, but liv'd upon Prey, Veniſon and Fruits, to which Cæſar adds Milk, of which, ſays Strabo, they had not then Skill to make Cheeſe. According to Solinus their uſual Drink was made of Barley; and for Tillage Pliny ſeems to contradict Dion, affirming that they manur'd their Ground with Marl inſtead of Dung, which argu'd no ſuch Simplicity in Gardning and Husbandry as Strabo charg'd upon them. Their Buildings and Houſes were as mean as their Diet and Cloaths, for they gave the Name of Towns to certain cumberſome Woods, which having fortify'd with Rampiers and Ditches, they uſually retreated to them, to avoid the Incurſions of their Enemies, as Cæſar informs us. Strabo adds, that Woods among them were inſtead of Cities; for having cut down Trees, and enclos'd a large round Plat of Ground with them, they there built Huts to live in, and made Folds for their Cattle, which were not of any long Continuance. Their Houſes were often thatch'd with Reed, poorly built, and diſpers'd all over the Country without Obſervance of Order or Diſtance, by which Villages were compos'd: For the Britains were plac'd as every Man lik'd, at ſmaller or greater Diſtances, as they were invited by the Fertility of the Soil, or the Convenience of Wood or Water.

The Buildings and Towns.

Their Trade and Commodities. Their beſt Towns were moſt upon their Coaſts, and founded for the Advantage of Havens, and Recourſe of Strangers from the Continent, to buy and ſell, or exchange Wares with thoſe of the Iſland. Theſe Inhabitants were much more civiliz'd than thoſe of the Inland Country, by the Commerce and Intercourſe of other Nations, eſpecially the Gauls, who long before had been civiliz'd by the Roman Colonies. The Commodities exported out of this Iſle were chiefly Hides and Tin, with many inferior Things, ſuch as Ivory Boxes, Sheers, Bits and Bridles, Wreathes and Chains, with ſome Trifles made of Amber and Glaſs. They had ſome Metals, and alſo Pearl, tho' of no great Value; and as their Traffick was mean and inconſiderable, ſo was their Mony and their Shipping. The former was only Braſs and Iron Rings, which being made to a certain Weight, ſerv'd for their current Coin: The latter were ſmall Veſſels, where Keels and Ribs were made of light Wood, and were cover'd over with Skins and Leather; and as long as they were ſailing, ſo long they abſtain'd from Meat; which ſhews that they were never us'd to long and dangerous Voyages. As they had a frequent Correſpondence with the Gauls, ſo their Language, Cuſtoms and Religion were generally the ſame with theirs. Yet there was one Cuſtom among the Britains which ſeems peculiar to themſelves, and not found in the Hiſtories of any other Nation, which was a Society of Wives among certain Numbers, and by common Conſent. Cæſar tells us that they had ten or twelve of them Wives together in common, eſpecially Brothers with each other, and Parents with their Children; but then if any of the Women brought forth, the Child was accounted only his, who firſt marry'd her. Dion confirms it, and adds, that the Children thus begotten were brought up in common amongſt them; and Euſebius afterwards ſays that many Britains together kept one Wife in common to them all. This unuſual Cuſtom was much taken notice of at Rome, and Severus's Empreſs Julia greatly reproach'd a Britiſh Lady with it at Court, as a Cuſtom infamous in the Women, as well as barbarous in the Men. To whom the Lady, having accidentally made ſome Diſcoveries among the Romans, briskly reply'd, We do that openly with the beſt of our Men, which you do privately with the worſt of yours.

Their peculiar Marriages.

As

As to the Religion of the Britains, it was as black and superstitious as any in those Times, and they proceeded so far as to the inhuman Offering of Mens Flesh in their Sacrifices. And besides their ancient Idols, such as Dis, Jupiter, Apollo, Diana, and the like, they worshipp'd Andates for their Goddess of Victory, unto whom they perform'd no small Adorations and Honours, erecting Temples whose Walls continu'd a considerable Space; upon which several of their prophane Portraitures with deform'd Lineaments were seen by the mournful Gildas, who describes their grim and stern Visages, pronouncing them infernal in their Nature, and in Number almost exceeding those of Ægypt. Tacitus notes them for being extreamly addicted to inspecting the Entrails of Beasts, and of Men also; and that they honour'd the Altars of their Gods with the Sacrifice and Blood of such as they took Captive in Wars. And Pliny writing of Magick, declar'd that Britain honour'd it with so much Pomp and Ceremony, that a Man would imagine the Persians themselves had been taught it by them. In all Religious Matters they had their Priests and Instructers, the chief of which were call'd Druids, a sort of Men much celebrated in those Times, who, as Cæsar informs us, had the Management of all Sacrifices, were Interpreters of all Mysteries, and had the Education of the better Sort. By means of their seeming Learning, the Innocence and Simplicity of their Living, and long Custom, the People had them in such Veneration, that they were not only Priests, but the Judges too throughout the Nation. For generally they approv'd of all Laws, determin'd all Controversies, and appointed Rewards and Punishments at Discretion; the People believing that none were oblig'd to submit to any Punishment, unless inflicted by a Divine Authority. If any refus'd to obey their Decree, they were forbidden the Sacrifices, which was accounted the most grievous Punishment; and those thus Excommunicated were reckon'd the most profligate of Mankind, all Persons avoided their Conversation as the Pest of the Nation, they were excluded the Benefit of the Law, and were render'd uncapable of all Honours and Dignities. Among these Druids there was one Primate, who had supream Authority over the rest; upon whose Death, the most celebrated Person succeeded; but if several of equal Merit appear'd, the whole Body proceeded to an Election, tho' sometimes the Sword it self decided the Matter. These Druids once a Year had a general Assembly in the midst of all Gaul, at a certain Place consecrated to that purpose; to which Persons who had any Controversies depending resorted from all Parts. This sort of Religious Profession is thought to have been first in Britain, and from thence carry'd over into Gaul; and in Cæsar's Time those who desir'd to be throughly instructed in their Mysteries, for the most part travell'd into Britain. The same Author adds, That the Druids were exempted from all sorts of Military Duties, Taxes and Imposts; which great Privileges caus'd many to become their Disciples, and others to send their Sons and Relations to be admitted into their Order. These Disciples were taught a great Number of Verses by heart, continuing under this Discipline for several Years, not being allow'd to commit their Learning to Writing; both because they would not have the Vulgar acquainted with their mysterious Learning, and because their Scholars might the better exercise their Memories and other Faculties. One of the Principal Doctrines they taught was the Immortality and Transmigration of Souls; which removing the Fear of Death, they look'd upon as proper to excite their Courages. They also made Discourses to their Scholars concerning the Stars and their Motions, the Magnitude of the Heaven and Earth, the Nature of Things, and the Power and Majesty of the Immortal Gods. Among the Religious of the Britains, besides these Druids, they had also a sort of People call'd Bards, whose Office it was to sing to the Harp those Songs they had made upon the great Exploits of Famous Men; which sort of Men were known many Ages in this Island.

and Bards.

As the Britains were a fierce and warlike People, so they had frequent Encounters among themselves; and, as Tacitus observes, nothing contributed so much much to the Romans Advantage over them as their want of Union, and concerting their common Intereſt. Cæſar and others deſcribe their Manner of Fighting, which was very much in Chariots, as the ancient Heroes of Greece are ſaid to have done in the Trojan Wars; which with ſhort Scythes faſten'd to the ends of the Axle-trees, gave cruel Wounds, great Terror, and made fierce Charges upon the Ranks of their Enemies. In the Beginning of a Battel, they generally ſcour'd the Plains with their Chariots, flung their Darts, and frequently diſorder'd their Enemy's Ranks by the Terror of their Horſes, and the furious Ratlings of their Chariot Wheels. Having wound themſelves in among the Horſe, they left their Chariots, and fought on Foot; their Charioteers in the mean time retiring, and placing themſelves ſo that their Maſters might readily find them, to mount again, if they were overpower'd by Numbers. Thus they maintain'd both the Speed of the Horſe, and the Steadineſs of the Foot in Battel; and by continual Practice were ſo expert, that upon the Side of a ſteep Hill, they could ſtop their Horſe at full Speed, turn them in a ſhort Compaſs, run along upon the Beam, reſt upon the Yoke, and from thence in an Inſtant recover themſelves in their Chariots. They often purpoſely gave ground and retreated, and being at a little Diſtance from their Enemies, diſmounted from their Chariots, to fight them at Diſadvantage. The Method of their Cavalry was ſuch, that it prov'd equally dangerous to purſue, or to be purſu'd by them; and they never came to cloſe Fights, but kept at conſiderable Diſtances, having others poſted in ſuch Order as they might ſuccour one another, and the wearied be reliev'd by freſh Supplies; which argu'd no ſmall Experience in Arms. Dion ſays, that their Horſes were ſmall and ſwift, and that they themſelves ran at an extraordinary rate; and further, that when they ſtood an Ingagement, they were firm and immoveable. Their common Arms were ſmall Shields, without Helmets, but very large Swords; which expreſs'd a more eager Deſire of wounding their Enemies, than defending themſelves. They had alſo ſhort Daggers, and their Spears were ſhort, having at the lower end of each a Piece of Braſs like an Apple, by ſhaking of which they endeavour'd to terrifie their Enemies. They could endure Hunger, Cold and all kinds of Labour, with admirable Patience; for in Bogs up to their Chins they would continue many Days without Food; and in Woods liv'd upon Barks of Trees and Roots. In ſhort, they were a hardy, bold and ſtrong People, 'till their Bodies came to be ſoften'd, and their Courage debas'd by the Luxury as well as Servitude which the Romans afterwards introduc'd among them.

Their civil Government. To come at laſt to the civil Government of the Britains, we find that it was like that of the ancient Gauls, of ſeveral ſmall Nations under as many petty Princes; of which Cæſar mentions Four in the ſmall Compaſs of Kent. Whether theſe ſmall Britiſh Principalities deſcended by Succeſſion, or were elected by the Advantages of Age, Wiſdom, or Valour in the Families of the Prince, is not recorded. But upon all great and imminent Dangers, the chief Commander of all their Forces was uſually choſen by common Conſent in general Aſſemblies; as Caſſibelanus was againſt Cæſar's Invaſion. The ſame was done upon the Britains Revolt againſt the Roman Colonies under Caractacus and Boadicea; for among them Women were admitted to their Principalities and general Commands, either by the Right of Succeſſion, Nobility of Birth, or eminent Qualifications. In common Caſes every Province or Principality, only ow'd Service and Allegiance to their own particular Prince. And as their Governments were confin'd to certain Bounds and Limits, ſo were the Inhabitants divided and diſtinguiſh'd by ſeveral Denominations; of which we find the Names of Seventeen in that Part of Britain which now goes by the Name of England and Wales, which are as follows. 1. The Cantii, Inhabitants of the preſent County of Kent. 2. The Regni, Inhabitants of Suſſex and Surrey. 3. The Durotriges, Inhabitants of Dorſetſhire. 4. The Danmonii, Inhabitants of Devonſhire and Cornwall. 5. The Belgæ, Inhabitants of Somerſetſhire, Wilt-

The Ordovices, Inhabitants of Five Counties in Wales, viz. Montgomeryſhire, Merionethſhire, Caernarvonſhire, Flintſhire and Denbighſhire. 17. The Dimetæ, Inhabitants of the reſt of Wales, viz. Caermarthenſhire, Pembrookſhire and Cardiganſhire.

This was the State of Britain, at the Time when the Romans firſt invaded it; and this is the real Subſtance of what we certainly know of the ancient Britains before Cæſar's Arrival. As to the formal Hiſtory of Brute, and his long Race of ſucceeding Kings down to Caſibelanus, it is too groſs and improbable to be credited; and it has been of late ſo fairly detected, that we need not inſiſt any longer upon it. Therefore, as the learned Mr. Camden well obſerves, here it is that the Engliſh Hiſtorian ought to begin his Hiſtory, and no higher; that is, at the firſt Entrance of Julius Cæſar and the Romans. And at this Period of Time we ſhall begin ours, and ſhall endeavour to carry it on in a continu'd Series, with as much Regularity and Perſpicuity as the Story it ſelf, and the Materials will permit.

From the First Invasion of Britain by the Romans, to their First quitting their Jurisdiction of the Isle.

I. WHEN Valour and Fortune had so conspir'd, or rather Providence had decreed, that the Romans should be Soveraigns of the Western World, the renown'd Julius Cæsar, having conquer'd the powerful Gauls, cast his Eyes towards the Ocean, as if the Roman Empire was not yet wide enough for his Ambition; so that subduing all, both by Sea and Land, he might join those Countries by Conquest, which had been separated by Nature. Accordingly being fir'd with a Prospect of new Glories, or provok'd by the Supplies sent from Britain into Gaul during his late Wars, in the 54th Year before Christ, he resolv'd upon an Expedition into this Isle; tho' Suetonius writes, that he was excited by the Hopes of the British Pearls, the Weight and Largeneſs of which he often try'd in his Hands; an improbable Inducement, and more proper for common Soldiers than an Hero. The Places, Ports and Havens of Britain being not well known to Cæſar, he firſt ſent C. Voluſenus, a Tribune of his Army, with a Gally to make all convenient Diſcoveries upon the Coaſts, who after five Days careful Search, return'd to him into Gaul. During which Time the Britains by the Merchants receiv'd ſecret Intelligence of Cæſar's deſign'd Expedition, and many of the private States ſent Ambaſſadors into Gaul, offering Hoſtages, and promiſing Obedience to the Romans. Cæſar having exhorted them to perſiſt in that Reſolution, civilly diſmiſs'd them, together with Comius Atrebatenſis, who had great Authority in thoſe Parts, that he might perſuade them to continue firm and faithful to the Romans, and to let them underſtand that he was coming over in Perſon: But Comius upon his firſt landing, was cherouſly impriſon'd by the Britains. Cæſar.

In the mean Time the victorious Cæſar, having drawn together about eighty Tranſport Ships for two Legions of Soldiers, and about eighteen more for his Horſe, ſet Sail from the Country of the Morini, now the Province of Picardy, in France, at three in the Morning, and about four the Day following arriv'd on the Coaſts of Britain, at a Place inconvenient for Landing, which was near Dover, for the Bay was narrow, and ſo pent in by the Mountains, that the Enemy could eaſily caſt their Darts from thence to the Shore. Having therefore got a favourable Wind and Tide, he ſail'd about eight Miles Northwards, where in a plain and open Shore, near Deal, he rod at Anchor. The Britains perceiving his Deſign, immediately diſpatch'd their Horſe and Chariots, to prevent his Landing. And here the Romans ſuſtain'd great Difficulties, for their large Veſſels could not ride cloſe enough to the Shore in this ſhallow Sea, ſo that the Soldiers were oblig'd to leap down from their high Ships in unknown Places, under heavy Armour, and at once contend both with the Waves and Enemy. On the other ſide, the Britains, who knew the Nature of the Ground, were free and uncumber'd, and fought either on dry Land, or upon the Edges of the Water; ſo that the Romans were much diſhearten'd, and exerted not their uſual Spirit and Bravery. Whereupon Cæſar commanded the Tranſport Ships to be remov'd, and the Gallies to be row'd up juſt over againſt the Britains, and from thence to employ their Slings, Engines, and Arrows againſt them; which Veſſels and Engines being ſtrange and unuſual to them, they ſoon gave Ground. But the Romans ſtill delaying, the Standard-Bearer of the tenth Legion, firſt invoking the Gods, That this Action might prove ſucceſsful and glorious, cry'd out, Leap down, my brave Soldiers! unleſs you would betray the Roman Eagle to the Enemy; for I am reſolv'd to perform my Duty to the Publick, and to the General. Upon theſe Words he couragiouſly threw himſelf into the Sea, and boldly advancing with his Eagle towards the Enemy, he was follow'd by the reſt of the Soldiers to the Shore. Eutropius from Suetonius tells us, that Scæva, a valiant Soldier with four others were the firſt that landed, who being deſerted by his Companions, defended himſelf to a Miracle againſt a whole Multitude, 'till being wearied and wounded, he ſwam back to the Fleet, begg'd pardon of Cæſar for his Raſhneſs, and was rewarded with the Honour of a Centurion. The Landing of the Soldiers occaſion'd an obſtinate Fight on both Sides; but the Romans being cumber'd with Arms, toſs'd with the Waves, and wanting ſure footing, were put into Diſorder and Confuſion; 'till Cæſar with great Dexterity caus'd the Pinnaces and Ship-Boats to ply about with Recruits to ſuccour them. At length they gradually got on dry Land, and ſo vigorouſly charg'd the Britains, that they ſoon put them to Flight; but could not purſue them, for want of their Horſe, which were not yet arriv'd. The Britains, upon this Defeat, immediately ſent Ambaſſadors, and with them Comius, whom they had impriſon'd, to beg a Peace, charging all Misbehaviour upon the Mul- Cæſar, &c.

titude, and their own Imprudence. Cæſar, whoſe Mercy was equal to his Valour, ſoon pardon'd them, receiv'd ſome Hoſtages at preſent, with a Promiſe of more; ſo a Peace was concluded on the fourth Day after his landing in Britain.

Shortly after the Roman Affairs began to be in a declining Condition; for their eighteen Ships which tranſported the Horſe, being come within View of Britain, were by a ſudden Storm driven to the Weſtward, and found great Difficulty in recovering the Continent of Gaul. And what added to this Misfortune, the ſame Night, at the Full of the Moon, the Gallies which were drawn a-ſhore, were fill'd with Water by the Tide, and the Ships of Burden, which lay at Anchor, were ſo ſhatter'd by the Tempeſts, that they were render'd wholly unfit for Service. This Loſs was ſo conſiderable, that Suetonius accounted it the firſt of the three great Misfortunes that ever befel Cæſar in all his Proceedings: And the Britains were ſo ſenſible of the Romans want of Horſe, Ships and Proviſions, that they immediately reſolv'd upon a Revolt, and in a publick Council condemn'd all ſuch as Impious as refus'd to join with the Heavens, whoſe Elements had thus far declar'd for their Liberties, aſſuring themſelves, that if they ſucceeded this Time, they ſhould be freed from all future Invaſions. But Cæſar ſoon perceiv'd their Intentions, by their Carriage and ſlow Performance of Covenants; therefore took particular Care to bring in Corn daily, and with uncommon Diligence repair'd his Fleet with the Timber of thoſe twelve which were moſt ſhatter'd. While Affairs ſtood in this Poſture, the Seventh Legion, being ſent out to Forage, and ſuſpecting no Reſiſtance, were ſuddenly ſet upon by the Britains Forces, and ſurrounded by their Horſe and Chariots. Their Way of Fighting and their Numbers ſoon brought the Romans to the extreameſt Difficulties, and almoſt to Deſpair; 'till Cæſar himſelf coming fortunately into their Relief, they reaſſum'd their Courage, and the Britains being aſtoniſh'd deſiſted, without any further Ingagement. But being ſtill in hopes of freeing themſelves for ever, by reaſon of the ſmall Numbers of the Romans, and the Scarcity of Proviſions amongſt them, they afterwards aſſembled in greater Numbers, and march'd up to the Roman Camp; where Cæſar engag'd them, put them to flight with a great Slaughter, and burnt all their Country for many Miles together. Being thus vanquiſh'd, the Britains ſent a third Embaſſy to Cæſar, begging Peace, and promiſing Subjection; to which Cæſar conſented, after he had ſeverely reprov'd their Behaviour, and impos'd double Hoſtages upon them. And ſhortly after, the Seaſon being far advanc'd, he ſet Sail from Britain, and ſafely arriv'd with his whole Fleet on the Continent of Gaul; whither only two Cities in Britain ſent their Hoſtages, the reſt neglecting it. Upon Cæſar's Letters and Account to the Senate of this Action, a famous Proceſſion of twenty Days was decreed him, accompany'd with great Pomp and Ceremony; tho' he had gain'd nothing of Conſequence, either to himſelf or Rome, beſides the Glory of having made an uncommon Expedition.

Cæſar. The Winter following, Cæſar according to his Cuſtom went into Italy; but upon his Return, finding that the Britains had neglected to ſend their promis'd Hoſtages, he reſolv'd to make a new Deſcent upon them, and with a much more powerful Fleet and Army than before. Accordingly with extraordinary Diligence he got together 800 Veſſels, moſt of them new built, low and broad, both for the Conveniency of Landing, and of tranſporting Horſes and Baggage. With theſe, and an Army conſiſting of Five Legions, and 2000 Horſe, he ſet ſail about Sun-ſet from Portus Itius, at or near Buloign in France, and landed his Army the next Day in the ſame Part of the Iſland as he had done the foregoing Summer; in which Action the Diligence of the Soldiers was particularly applauded, who by an unwearied Labour in Rowing, caus'd the heavier Ships to keep way with the long Boats and Gallies. At their Landing, no Enemy appear'd; for tho' the Britains had been there in great Numbers, bers, yet being terrify'd with theſe mighty Preparations, and the Approach of ſo powerful a Navy, they were retir'd into the Midland Country. Here Cæſar encamp'd his Army as conveniently as he could, leaving ten Cohorts, and 300 Horſe under the Command of Q. Atrius, to guard the Ships: And in the Night, he march'd himſelf twelve Miles up into the Country, diſcover'd the Britains, who had retreated as far as the River Stoner in Kent, and giving them Battel there, they were ſoon repuls'd by the Roman Cavalry, which oblig'd them to betake themſelves to the Woods, which were ſtrongly fortify'd both by Art and Nature. But the Romans reſolving to purſue their Advantage, ſome lock'd their Shields together like a Roof over their Heads, and others raiſing a Mount, ſoon took the Place, and drove them from the Woods; but Cæſar forbad any long Purſuit, not well knowing the Country, and having his Camp to fortifie that Night.

The following Day, Cæſar, having divided his Army into three Parts in order to purſue the Britains, was hinder'd by the melancholy News he receiv'd from his Fleet, which being driven a-ſhore by a violent Storm, moſt of the Veſſels were ſhatter'd, the Cables broken, and the Anchors loſt. Upon which he haſten'd back with his Troops to the Sea ſide, where he was entertain'd with a ſad and ruinous Proſpect; forty of his Ships were deſtroy'd, and the reſt ſo damag'd, as not to be refitted without extraordinary Labour. But being indefatigable in his Attempts, he immediately found Means to repair the greateſt Part of his Navy by the Ruins of the reſt, and wrot to his Lieutenant in Gaul for further Supplies; and having twice felt the Dangers of theſe Seas, he reſolv'd upon a Prodigious Undertaking, which was to draw his whole Fleet to the Land, into the midſt of the Fortifications of his Camp. This ſtupendious Work was compleated in ten Days, by the admirable Toil of his Soldiers, working Night and Day. Which Being finiſh'd, Cæſar return'd with his Army to the Wood where he had laſt defeated the Britains; where he found their Numbers encreas'd by a Confluence from many Parts, and that they had now by common Conſent choſen Caſibelanus for their General, who by Uſurpation had made himſelf Head of the Trinobantes, and had made frequent Wars with his Neighbours; but being a Time of common Danger, they all made him a Commander in Chief. Caſibelanus, with his Horſe and Chariots, briskly encounter'd the Romans in their March, which occaſion'd great Bloodſhed on both Sides; and after ſome Ceſſation, as the Romans were fortifying their Camp, the Britains ſet upon the Centries with great Fierceneſs, and charg'd back again through two of Cæſar's beſt Cohorts, which he had ſent to their Aſſiſtance, and retreated without the Loſs of a Man. Cæſar himſelf could not but acknowledge that they had great Advantage over the Romans, by their ſwift Way of Fighting without Armour, and accordingly provided againſt them; ſo that the next Day, when they ſet upon three Legions that were foraging, they were repuls'd and purſu'd with great Slaughter. Upon which Overthrow moſt of the Auxiliaries fell off, and return'd to their own Countries; ſo that the Britains never after encounter'd the Romans with their full Power.

Upon theſe Misfortunes, Caſibelanus withdrew into his own Territories, retaining to himſelf not above 4000 Chariots; and fearing the Romans farther Progreſs, fortify'd that Part of the River Thames which was fordable with ſharp Stakes bound about with Lead, and driven ſo deep into the Bottom, that Beda and Aſſer report them to have remain'd in their Times; which was near Coway-Stakes in Middleſex. Notwithſtanding this the Romans boldly preſs'd forwards, paſs'd the River up to the Chin in Water, repuls'd the Britains, and march'd further up the Country. In their Progreſs, they were met with Ambaſſadors from the chiefeſt City of the Trinobantes, who diſhonourably join'd with the Conqueror, and offer'd Subjection; at the ſame time petitioning, that Mandubrace, one of Cæſar's Followers, whoſe Father Caſibelanus had depos'd and ſlain, might be Governor of their City. Cæſar readily agreed to their Petition, and demanded Forty Hoſtages of them, and ſufficient Proviſion for his Army, which they perform'd with all Expedition; preferring the poor Satisfaction of indulging their own Diſcontents, before the common Cauſe of their Native Country. From their Example many other inferior States yielded to Cæſar's Arms; and likewiſe treacherouſly diſcover'd to him the Power and Place of Caſibelanus's Abode, who by this time was retreated to his own City Verulam, now St. Albans; a Place then well fortify'd with Woods and Moraſſes. Cæſar with all Expedition ſat down before the City, and ſtorming it on two ſides, ſoon became Maſter of it, with the Slaughter of many of the miſerable Defendents, and the taking of a rich Booty of Cattle. Upon this Loſs, Caſibelanus, as his laſt Refuge, procur'd four petty Kings of Kent, Cingetorix, Carvilius, Taximagulus, and Segonax, with their utmoſt Forces to ſet upon the Roman Camp that guarded their Ships; which Enterprize was accordingly attempted, but with ſuch bad Succeſs, that the Britains were on each ſide repuls'd, and Cingetorix taken Priſoner. Caſibelanus, at length, ſeeing his Country waſted, his chief Deſigns blaſted, and himſelf abandon'd by the traiterous Revolt of many Cities and States, ſent Comius of Arras to mediate a Peace; which, upon the account of his own Valour, and the Lateneſs of the Seaſon, was readily granted him. In the Conditions of the Treaty Cæſar impos'd a certain yearly Tribute upon the Britains, which ſome ſay amounted to three thouſand Pounds, and moreover included the Security of Mandubrace with his Trinobantes, who were taken into Friendſhip with the Romans; and that theſe Conditions ſhould be faithfully obſerv'd, he commanded a ſufficient Number of Hoſtages to be immediately deliver'd. And here began the Fate of Britain, to make Way for foreign Conqueſts by their unhappy Diviſions at home. Theſe Things being adjuſted, and the Seaſon far advanc'd, Cæſar embark'd with his whole Army, and ſoon arriv'd in Gaul; having rather ſhown Britain to the Romans, than given them Poſſeſſion of it, as Tacitus obſerves, ſuppoſing it Glory ſufficient to have attempted a thing ſo rare and difficult; and at his Return to Rome to have preſented the Britiſh Captives, whoſe uncommon Attire and Behaviour fill'd the Peoples Eyes with Delight and Admiration. At the ſame Time he offer'd to Venus, the Patroneſs of his Family, a Breaſt-Plate embroider'd with Britiſh Pearls, as a Trophy and Spoil of the Ocean. He leaves Iſle.

This Account we have from Cæſar's own Writings of his two famous Expeditions into Britain, which rather encreas'd the Glory, than the Dominion of Rome, and gave this Country the Honour of being the laſt Triumph of that mighty Republick, which had before ſubdu'd ſo many Kingdoms and Commonwealths in Europe, Aſia, and Africa. Tho' Cæſar's Writings are as much to be admir'd, as his Valour and Conduct, yet it is very obſervable from others, that his Conqueſts in this Country were not ſo uninterrupted, nor the Britains Liberties ſo eaſily given up, as they ſeem from his own Account. For ſeveral ancient Writers have ſpoken more doubtfully of his Victories in Britain, and that in plain Terms he was driven away, as it appears from a noted Verſe in Lucan, and divers Paſſages in Tacitus. Oroſius, who took his Account as high as Suetonius, tells us, that Cæſar in his firſt Expedition, being entertain'd by a ſharp Fight, loſt no ſmall Number of his Foot, and by a Tempeſt near all his Horſe. Dion affirms that once in his ſecond Expedition all his Foot were routed, and another time all his Horſe; and further, that his Conqueſt was ſo inconſiderable, that for twenty Years after Cæſar's Departure, the Britains retain'd their own Kings, and their own Laws.

Tacitus. Dion.

II. After the Departure of Julius Cæſar, we have but a very ſmall Account of the Affairs of Britain, for near a Hundred Years together; only that the Inhabitants, tho' they became more and more known to the Romans, yet they continu'd in a great meaſure free from their Power. For Julius's Succeſſor, Auguſtus, ſeems out of Wiſdom to have neglected this Iſland, as a Country where AUGUSTUS.

where Amity or Enmity was of no Moment to the Romans; or out of a State Maxim was resolv'd to set Bounds to the Empire in his Reign, to keep it from being too vast and unweildy. Yet, about twenty Years after his Uncle Julius's Departure, Augustus advanc'd as far as Gaul in order to reduce Britain to his Obedience; but was diverted by a Revolt in Pannonia. About seven Years after that he enter'd Gaul with the same Resolution; but was then stopp'd in his Progress by the unsettled State of that Province, and the Arrival of some Ambassadors from Britain to beg a Peace. The following Year he reassum'd the same Design, but still was prevented by Commotions in other Parts; so that of three design'd Expeditions none came to any Effect. Nevertheless some of the British Potentates omitted not to seek his Friendship by Presents offer'd in the Capitol, and other obsequious Addresses; insomuch that the Island in that Reign became well known to the Romans, tho' it paid no Tribute to them, except what easie Customs were levy'd on the slight Commodities with which they traded into Gaul. His Successor Tiberius seems to have follow'd his Example, and being no ways ambitious of extending the Bounds of the Empire, never sought the Britains; and they as careful not to provoke him, courteously sent home the Soldiers of Germanicus, who by Shipwreck had been cast upon the British Shores.

TIBERIUS.

CALIGULA. But Caligula, his Successor, a wild and dissolute Tyrant, having pass'd the Alps to rob and pillage the Empire, and being excited by Adminius the Son of Cynobelinus a British King, who being banish'd by his Father fled to him with a small Party, he made a Shew of invading Britain; but being come to the Ocean, and shewing the utmost Marks of Extravagancy and Folly, he return'd the same Way: Yet he sent before him such boasting Letters to the Senate, as if he had made an entire Conquest of the whole Island.

A. D. 43. CLAUDIUS. Thus, for about ninety five Years, under the Reigns of four Emperors, the Britains continu'd free from the Roman Yoke; but from the Reign of Claudius, and thence forwards, the inner Parts of the Isle, broken by Civil Wars and Factions, more than the Power of the Romans, by many Steps fell under the Subjection of that Empire. For while particular States singly oppos'd the common Enemy, they were soon conquer'd; the rest being so violently set upon each others Destruction, that 'till all were subdu'd, they were insensible of an universal Danger. Nay so powerful was the Ambition and Resentments of some, that they were thereby corrupted and drawn over to the Enemy's side, and made sollicitous for the Roman Interest to the Ruin of their own Country. The principal of these was Bericus, who by many Arguments engag'd the Emperor Claudius to make a Descent upon Britain, which none had really attempted since Julius Cæsar. Claudius was easily perswaded, and in the Second Year of his Reign order'd A. Plautius the Prætor to pass over from Gaul; who making Preparation for this great Expedition, his mutinous Soldiers refus'd to march, declaring, That they would not make War out of the Compass of the World; for so they judg'd Britain to lye. But by means of Narcissus, the Emperor's Favourite, he prevail'd with them; and set Sail from three Ports, lest their Landing in one Place should prove inconvenient; but meeting with contrary Winds, they were driven back and dishearten'd; 'till in the Night a strange Meteor shooting Flames from the East, and as they imagin'd, directing their Course, they renew'd their Courage, put to Sea again, and landed in Britain without Opposition. For the Inhabitants having heard of their Backwardness, had been negligent in providing against them; and therefore retir'd to the Woods and Morasses, designing rather to weary out the Romans by Delays, than to encounter them in the Field. Plautius after much Difficulty discover'd them, and engaging first with Caractacus, then with Togodumnus, overthrew them, and reduc'd Part of the Dobuni to his Power, who were subject to the Catieuchlani. Leaving a Garrison, he march'd towards a River, where the Britains thought themselves secure, imagining the Romans could not pass without a Bridge; but Plautius sending over the German Soldiers, who could swim the strongest ſtrongeſt Current in their Arms, he commanded them to ſtrike directly at the Horſes, by which means the Chariots, wherein conſiſted their chief Excellency, became unſerviceable. To ſupport them, he ſent the famous Veſpaſian with his Brother Sabinus, who did great Service and Execution; but the Britains, not yet diſcourag'd, engag'd them ſo reſolutely the next Day, that it continu'd doubtful which way the Victory enclin'd; 'till Sidius Geta, after he had been near taken Priſoner, gave them ſuch an Overthrow, that the Honour of a Triumph was granted him at Rome, tho' he had never been Conſul. Upon this the Britains retir'd to the Mouth of the Thames, and being acquainted with thoſe Places, croſs'd over, where the Romans following them through Bogs and dangerous Flats, were in perpetual Hazard. Yet the Germans by ſwimming, and others by a Bridge above got over, and falling in with the Britains, kill'd great Numbers; but in the Heat of their Purſuit they fell among new Bogs and Meres, and loſt many of their own Men.

His Succeſſes.

Dion. Sueton. This Succeſs not anſwering Expectation, Plautius began to conſider his own Security; and finding the Britains ſo far from being diſcourag'd at the Death of Togodumnus, that they were making new Preparations to revenge it, he according to Order ſent to the Emperor for Aſſiſtance. Claudius, ambitious of the Occaſion, made extraordinary Preparations, and beſides the Flower of the Nobility, like an Eaſtern Monarch with armed Elephants, march'd through Gaul, and in a ſhort Time croſs'd the Seas, and join'd Plautius. The Britains, who had the Courage, but not the Conduct of old Caſibelanus, laying aſide all Stratagem, in open Field ventur'd to meet almoſt the whole Power of the Roman Empire; but they were ſoon overthrown, with the Loſs of Camalodunum, now Maldon in Eſſex, the Royal Seat of Cynobelinus, and many Priſoners were taken. Upon this Claudius, contrary to the Roman Cuſtom, was ſeveral times ſaluted Imperator; Camalodunum was made a Military Colony, and Part of the Iſle reduc'd to the Form of a Province; tho' Suetonius tells us, that what he obtain'd was without Battel or Bloodſhed, which ſeems not very probable. His Stay in Britain was not above Sixteen Days; and in that Time he remitted to the Britiſh Nobility the Confiſcation of their Goods, for which Favour they frequented his Temple, and ador'd him as a God. Having diſarm'd the Britains, and committed the Government of theſe, as likewiſe the War with the others not ſubdu'd to Plautius, he haſten'd to Rome in the Sixth Month, ſending his Sons-in-Law Pompey and Silanus before him, with the News of his Victories. At Rome it was eſteem'd ſo great an Action to conquer but a ſmall Part of Britain, that Anniverſary Games, Triumphal Arches both at Rome and Geſſoriacum in Gaul, and laſtly a Glorious Triumph, was decreed by the Senate in Honour of Claudius. And that the Spectacle might be more Magnificent by the Confluence of People, he not only gave Leave to the Governors of Provinces to be preſent, but permitted ſeveral Exiles to return home, on purpoſe to behold it. The Chief Officers were munificently rewarded, the Provinces contributed Golden Crowns, and upon the Top of the Emperor's Palace was fix'd a Naval Crown, to imply the Emperor's Conqueſt and Sovereignty of the Britiſh Sea; and for the ſame Reaſon, he order'd that his Son Germanicus, ſhould hereafter be call'd Britannicus, which Name he had obtain'd himſelf not long before. In the mean time Plautius carry'd on the War in Britain, with that Succeſs, that Claudius decreed him an Ovation, and when he enter'd Rome he himſelf met him, honouring him with the Ceremony of the Right Hand. And now Veſpaſian began to appear in the World, who partly under Claudius, and partly under Plautius, fought thirty Battels with the Britains, according to Suetonius; he alſo ſubdu'd two mighty Nations, and above twenty Towns, together with the Iſle of Vectis or Wight. For which Exploits he obtain'd Triumphal Ornaments, two Sacerdotal Dignities, with the Conſulſhip. Under him ſerv'd his Son Titus in quality of a Tribune, whoſe extraordinary Valour and Modeſty, gain'd him great Reputation, as appears from the Number

A. D. 50. Oſtorius ſent into Britain.

Some few Years after, Plautius was ſucceeded in Britain by P. Oſtorius, in Quality of Prætor, who found Affairs in great Diſorder by the Inroads of the Britains; and the more, becauſe they did not expect that a new General would take the Field in Winter to oppoſe them. But Oſtorius well knowing that the firſt Action would either encourage or intimidate, vigorouſly attack'd ſuch as were in Arms, and diſpers'd them, proceeding to diſarm all whom he had reaſon to ſuſpect. And to prevent further Incurſions, he plac'd ſeveral Garriſons upon the two Rivers Severn and Avon; which reduc'd all the Southern Parts of the Iſle into the Form of a Province. For a farther Security and Convenience, Camalodunum or Maldon was made a Military Colony; and London, according to the Opinion of B. Stillingfleet and ſome others, was about that time founded by the Romans, and made a trading Colony. Several Cities were given to Cogidunus, a Britiſh King, to engage him to the Roman Intereſt; an ancient Policy which they us'd, to make Kings the Servile Agents to enſlave others. Theſe Proceedings were highly reſented by the Iceni, the Inhabitants of Norfolk, Suffolk, Cambridge and Huntington, a powerful People, not yet weaken'd by War, who refuſing all Submiſſion, gain'd many others over to their Party, and encamping upon commodious Ground, engag'd with the Romans. After a brave Diſpute, they were overthrown, but with the greater Bloodſhed, by Reaſon of their Deſpair of Pardon. By the Overthrow of the Iceni, many others before undetermin'd, were reduc'd to Obedience, and Oſtorius led his Army againſt the Cangi, a People about the Iriſh Sea; and waſting their Territories, he had paſs'd almoſt to the Ocean, when he was recall'd by the Inſurrections of the Brigantes, a People on the North of England; who would not be reduc'd, 'till they had loſt their principal Revolter, and then the Commotion was ſoon extinguiſh'd. But the Silures, the Inhabitants of South-Wales, would by no Method be allur'd or diſcourag'd from proſecuting the War againſt the Romans, relying upon their own Courages, and the Valour and Bravery of their Commander Caractacus, who having waded through innumerable Deaths and Difficulties, had gain'd ſuch a Reputation, that he was juſtly preferr'd before all the Britiſh Generals. This Man by his Policy and Conduct ſoon remov'd the Seat of the War into the Territories of the Ordovices, the Inhabitants of North-Wales, as more convenient for his Deſigns, by reaſon of the craggy Rocks, and high Mountains. Here being ſtrongly intrench'd, at the near Approach of the Romans, Caractacus in a Speech to his Soldiers declar'd, That that Battel ſhould either eſtabliſh their glorious Liberty, or confirm their perpetual Servitude; and that they ought to remember the Honour of their Anceſtors, who had driven Julius Cæſar from the Iſle; by whoſe Valour they were happily deliver'd from Axes and Tributes, and to whom they ow'd the Enjoyment of their unviolated Wives and Children. The Soldiers fir'd by this Speech, bound themſelves by the moſt religious Vows, crying out, That neither Wounds nor Weapons ſhould make them yield. Their reſolute Behaviour, and the Difficulties that the Romans were to conquer, by means of Mountains, Rocks and Rampiers, at firſt was a great Diſcouragement to Oſtorius. But as nothing could withſtand the Power of the Roman Legions, the Britains, tho' they had great Advantages in the Beginning of the Battel, by Reaſon of their Encampment, were after an obſtinate Fight intirely routed, and the Wife and Daughter of Caractacus taken Priſoners, his Brothers ſurrendering themſelves ſhortly after. Caractacus himſelf flying to Cartiſmandua, Queen of the Brigantes, was treacherouſly bound and deliver'd up to the Conqueror, after nine Years brave Reſiſtance of the Romans, by which he had gain'd great Fame and Renown.

Roman Forces; inſomuch that even in Rome, his Name was held in Veneration; and the Emperor while he extoll'd his own, made the Captive's Glory there the brighter. The People of Rome were ſummon'd as to the ſight of ſome publick Games and Spectacles; the Emperor's Guards were plac'd in Order, and he himſelf ſeated on his Tribunal; the Captive Prince's Vaſſals and Retinue going firſt, the Capariſons and other Spoils of War follow'd after; then his Brothers, his Wife and Daughter; and laſt of all he himſelf was brought before the People in a very peculiar Habit. The Prayers which the reſt made to the Emperor were mean and ſervile; but Caractacus, neither craving Mercy, nor caſting down his Eyes, with a noble Bravery ſpoke thus before the Tribunal. If my Moderation in Proſperity had been anſwerable to my Nobility and Fortune, I had come rather as a Friend into this City, than a Captive; nor would you have diſdain'd to have receiv'd me with Articles of Alliance, being a Prince deſcended from illuſtrious Progenitors, and a Soveraign of many Nations. My preſent Fortune is to me low and diſhonourable, but to you glorious and triumphant. I once had Horſes, Men, Arms and Riches at my Command; what wonder is it that I ſhould ſtruggle hard before I loſt them? But if Fate has allotted univerſal Empire to your Part, Subjection muſt be ours. If I had yielded without Oppoſition, neither my Fortune would have been remarkable, nor your Glory memorable; and Oblivion would have follow'd my Puniſhment. But if you ſpare my Life now, I ſhall be a perpetual Example of your Clemency. Claudius mov'd at ſo ſad a Spectacle of Fortune, and his generous Behaviour, freely pardon'd him, his Wife and Relations; and being all unbound, they made their Addreſſes both to him, and his Empreſs Agrippina. After this the Senate was aſſembled, where the Fathers made many pompous Speeches concerning their Priſoner Caractacus; declaring, That it was no leſs honourable than when the great Scipio expos'd Syphax, and Paulus brought Perſius in Triumph.

He is brought to Rome, and pardon'd.

Tacitus. Oſtorius, tho' in Britain, was decreed the Honour of a Triumph; but now his Fortune began to change, either becauſe Caractacus, the Object of his Valour was remov'd, or becauſe the Enemy in Compaſſion to ſo great a Prince were more animated with Revenge. For they fell furiouſly upon the Legionary Cohorts, left to ſettle Garriſons among the Silures, cut off the Commander, eight Captains, with many brave Soldiers; and had not ſpeedy Relief come from the neighbouring Forts, they had put all to the Sword. Shortly after they defeated the Roman Foragers, and the Troops ſent to their Aſſiſtance; and Oſtorius by his freſh Supplies could not ſtop their Flight, 'till the Legionary Soldiers came in, who reſtor'd the Battel, and brought the Advantage on their Side; but the Britains eſcap'd with little Loſs, becauſe the Day was ſpent. Next they proceeded to Skirmiſhes and ſmaller Actions, 'till the Silures, being exaſperated with the General's Threatning to extinguiſh their Name and Nation, found means to intercept his Auxiliary Cohorts, who were ſent out raſhly by ſome greedy Officers to pillage; and they by diſtributing the Spoil and Priſoners drew other Nations to revolt. In this Poſture of Affairs, Oſtorius waſted with Fatigue and Trouble dy'd; the Britains rejoicing, that tho' no Battel had remov'd him, yet an adverſe War had worn out ſo great a Commander. He was ſucceeded in his Place by A. Didius, who found all things in great Diſorder, partly by the Inrodes of the Silures, and partly by Valens's encountering the Britains with ill Succeſs. But civil Conteſts in a ſhort Time gave the Romans new Advantages, which were occaſion'd by Cartiſmandua, Queen of the Brigantes, who after ſhe had agrandiz'd her ſelf by delivering Caractacus, rejected her Husband Venutius, marry'd his Servant Vellocatus, and made him King. This caus'd a War, which at firſt ſeem'd private among themſelves, 'till Cartiſmandua had by a Stratagem taken Venutius's Brother, and ſome other of his Relations; who by the Aſſiſtance of his Neighbours, and the Defection of the Brigantes, now abhorring the Queen's Actions, ſoon reduc'd her to great Extremities. But imploring Aid of the Romans, with much Difficulty, and a ſevere Conflict, ſhe eſcap'd the Puniſhment ſhe expected. Venutius thus debarr'd of his Rights, juſtly turn'd his Anger againſt the Romans themſelves, retain'd his Kingdom againſt their utmoſt Oppoſition, and made them perceive that he was no deſpicable Soldier, firſt in a ſharp Battel of uncertain Event, and then againſt the Legion of Cæſius Naſica. Inſomuch that Didius growing old, and fitter to direct than execute, us'd the Miniſtry of other Men, thinking it ſufficient to keep what his Predeceſſors had gain'd, and only built ſome Caſtles and Places of Strength within the Land.

NERO. This was the State of Affairs in Britain when the Emperor Claudius dy'd, being ſucceeded by his adopted Son Nero, who had ſo little Hopes and Inclinations to proceed, that, had not Shame reſtrain'd him, he would have recall'd all his Forces from the Iſle. Therefore, by the Advice of his Governors, he ſent Veranmius to ſucceed Didius, a Perſon ambitious and ſevere, but not able to perform any great Action before his Death. Under this Man's Government, or ſhortly after, it ſeems moſt probable that the Chriſtian Religion was firſt planted in Britain; but by whom it was effected, and with what Succeſs, is uncertain. The next Governor was P. Suetonius, a Perſon of celebrated Valour, who after two Years ſucceſsful Eſtabliſhment of what was gain'd by the Romans, proceeded to new Conqueſts, particularly the Iſle of Mona, now Angleſey, which was peopled with ſtout Inhabitants, and was the uſual Receptacle of all Fugitives. Upon his Landing there with flat-bottom'd Veſſels, he was receiv'd by numerous Multitudes on the Shore, the Women running in diſmal Habits, with their Hair diſhevell'd, and Fire-Brands in their Hands like Infernal Furies; whilſt the Druids, whoſe ancient Seats were in this Iſle, lifted their Hands up to Heav'n, rending the Air with the moſt dreadful Execrations. The Horror of this Spectacle aſtoniſh'd the Romans, and made them ſtand like Men helpleſs and inchanted; but being animated by their General, and aſham'd to fear a confus'd Herd of Women and Franticks, they ſoon broke through this furious Company, kill'd many, and beat others down, ſcorch'd and rowling in their own Fires. After this they cut down all their ſuperſtitious and magical Woods and Groves, plac'd Garriſons, and made an eaſie Conqueſt of the Iſland.

A. D. 61. While Suetonius was thus ſucceſsful in outward Parts of the Nation, almoſt the whole Body of the Britains made a violent and famous Struggle to regain their Liberties, and expel the Romans, being excited by many Provocations at once, which are enumerated by Tacitus and Dion. Praſutagus, King of the Iceni, famous for his Treaſure, had made Nero Coheir with his two Daughters, hoping thereby to preſerve his Kingdom and Family from Injury; inſtead of which, his Kingdom was ſeiz'd by the Roman Captains, his Houſe pillag'd by Under-Officers, his Wife Boadicea was ſcourg'd, and his Daughters raviſh'd, the chief of the Iceni depriv'd of their Eſtates, and the Blood-Royal treated as Slaves: Seneca, one of Nero's Counſellors, having oblig'd many of the Britains to take large Sums of Mony at Intereſt, did now ſuddenly recall the Payment of it with horrible Extortion: Calus, the Procurator, renew'd the Confiſcation of thoſe Goods which Claudius had before remitted: The Colony at Camalodunum thruſt the ancient Inhabitants out of their Poſſeſſions, terming them Vaſſals and Slaves: The Temple alſo erected to Claudius was a great Burden to them, while the Prieſts that attended there, under pretence of Religious Dues, ſeiz'd each Man's Goods. Upon theſe Inſults, and to prevent more, the People began more to conſider the Miſeries of Slavery, to confer Injuries with one another, and to make ſuch Declarations as theſe: That their Patience had no other Effect than to cauſe one Injury to produce another: That formerly every State had its own King, but now they were ſubject both to a Lieutenant and a Procurator; *the one preying upon their Blood, and the other upon their Eſtates. Affronts; ſo that they could be ſecure of nothing, that either Luſt or Covetouſneſs could recommend to the Romans. That tho' in War the Spoil ought to fall to the moſt Couragious, yet they were depriv'd of their Houſes, and of their Children, by ignoble Cowards, and preſs'd for Foreign Service; as if the Britains *were allow'd to fight for any Country but their own. Tacitus. Dion. Being animated with theſe Motives, the Iceni unanimouſly took Arms, under the Conduct of injur'd Boadicea; drawing the Trinobantes to revolt with them, and ſuch others as were not yet broken by the Weight of the Roman Yoke; who had all ſecretly conſpir'd to free themſelves, with the utmoſt Revenge againſt the Veterans. About the ſame Time divers Prodigies were obſerv'd to portend the Subverſion of the Roman Colony, namely, the Image of Victory falling down revers'd at Camalodunum; unuſual Noiſes heard in the Air; ſtrange Apparitions ſeen on the Sea; the Ocean in ſhew bloody, and the Print of Mens Bodies upon the Sands, and certain Women in Extacy foretold a Deſtruction. Theſe Things as they terrify'd the Romans, ſo they added Courage to the Britains; and becauſe Suetonius was far abſent, the Colony requir'd Aid of Decianus the Procurator, but he ſent them no more than two hundred Men, and thoſe ill armed. So that the Soldiers, who before had rely'd upon the Protection of their Temple, and had made no Preparations againſt a Siege, were ſoon defeated, and the whole Colony was deſtroy'd by Fire and Sword. The Britains being Conquerors, from hence march'd with great Fury againſt the ninth Legion, under the Command of Petilius Cerealis, and cut all the Infantry in Pieces, ſo that only the Horſe eſcap'd with their Commander; which Misfortune caus'd Catus, the Intendant, whoſe Rapines had partly occaſion'd this Inſurrection, to fly into Gaul. The News of theſe Revolts rous'd Suetonius in the Weſt; and he with admirable Conſtancy and Reſolution march'd through the Midſt of the Enemy's Country to London, which tho' not honour'd with the Title of a Colony, was then famous for Concourſe of Merchants and Proviſions. He debated for ſome time whether he ſhou'd expect the Enemy here; but reflecting upon the Weakneſs of his Forces, and the Raſhneſs of Petilius, he reſolv'd to quit the Place, without regarding the Cries of the Inhabitants who implor'd his Protection, preferring the Loſs of one Town to ſave a Province. Thoſe who wou'd follow him were receiv'd into his Troops; but the reſt, whom Age or the Pleaſantneſs of the Place had detain'd behind, were miſerably deſtroy'd by the Britains. The Town of Verulum met with the ſame ſevere Fate, for paſſing by the Forts and Garriſons, they attack'd the moſt opulent and defenceleſs Places, loading themſelves with the Spoils of their Enemies, whom they hang'd, burnt and crucify'd, with all the Cruelty and inhuman Outrage, that a barbarous Multitude, elevated with Succeſs, cou'd imagine. They took no Priſoners, either to preſerve them for Exchange or Ranſom, according to the Law of Arms, but cut in pieces both Romans, and their Allies, to the Number of eighty thouſand, as Dion aſſures us. The Roman Wives and Virgins were hung up naked, and had their Breaſts cut off and ſewn to their Mouths, that even dead they might ſeem to eat their own Fleſh; whilſt the Britains feaſted in the Temple of Andate, their Goddeſs of Victory.

Their Succeſſes, and Cruelties.

Suetonius marches against them,

Suetonius having gather'd together a ſmall Army of ten thouſand well Diſciplin'd Men, reſolv'd to hazard a Battel with all Expedition; and for that End he choſe an advantagious Poſt, a Place with a narrow Entrance, and a thick Wood for Defence behind him, and before him a large Plain. Here the Britains came down in a confus'd Manner, ſhouting and ſwarming in ſuch vaſt Numbers as never were before ſeen, ſo fierce and confident of Victory, that their Wives were brought along with them, and plac'd in Carts in the utmoſt Part of the Plain, to ſee the Battel. Queen Boadicea, commanding in chief, mounted her Chariot with her two Daughters, and riding about us'd many Arguments to raiſe the Courage of her Army, which conſiſted of no leſs than two hundred and thirty thouſand rude and undiſciplin'd People. She told them, That it had been uſual before for the Britains to fight under the Conduct of Women, but ſhe was now in different Capacity than her Anceſtors, being not to fight for a Kingdom, but as one of the inferior Sort to revenge her loſt Liberty, her own diſhonourable Stripes, and the violated Chaſtity of her Daughters. That the Luſts of the Romans were now become ſo exorbitant, that they left no Virgin undefil'd. Therefore ſhe her ſelf was reſolv'd to obtain Victory or Death, as ſhe was a Woman; but the Men, if they pleas'd, might chuſe Life and Slavery. Dion places her upon a Heap of Turf, with a Spear in her Hand, and a Hare in her Boſom, which after a long Oration ſhe let looſe, as a Signification of a good Omen to her Army. On the other ſide Suetonius was not ſilent in ſo great a Danger, exhorting his Soldiers not to be terrify'd at the Enemy's Numbers, but to march on boldly, and continue a cloſe Fight, which he judg'd could not be long after they had broken their Front, the reſt being only a confus'd Multitude. The Legions kept the narrow Paſſage, as a Place of Defence, 'till the Britains had ſpent their Darts, and then advanc'd into the Plain, where the Auxiliaries and Cavalry making way, they as an irreſiſtible Wedge, broke and diſpers'd whatever oppos'd them; the reſt fled, but could not eaſily eſcape, by reaſon of their own Carriages, which were plac'd round the Plain. The Soldiers gave no Quarter, not ſo much as to the Women, which with the Horſes that were ſlain, encreas'd the Heaps of Carcaſſes along the Field. This Victory was very ſignal, and was obtain'd with the Deſtruction of eighty Thouſand Britains, and only the Loſs of four hundred Romans, and not many more wounded. Boadicea reſolving not to ſurvive this fatal Defeat, poiſon'd her ſelf, according to Tacitus, tho' others ſay ſhe dy'd of Grief and Sickneſs.

Suetonius drawing together his Army, kept the Field in order to finiſh the War, and was ſhortly after reinforc'd with two thouſand Legionary Soldiers from Germany, eight Cohorts of Auxiliaries, and a thouſand Horſe, who being diſpos'd into new Winter Quarters, they waſted with Fire and Sword all thoſe Countries that were either Enemies or Neuters. But Famine was ſtill the greateſt Affliction to the Britains, who in Hopes of the Enemy's Proviſions, had neglected all their Tillage. Nevertheleſs the unconquer'd Nations were averſe to a Treaty, upon Notice of a Difference between Suetonius and the new Procurator Claſſicianus, who had ſpread a Report, That a new Lieutenant was expected, who without the Severity and Haughtineſs of a Conqueror, like Suetonius, would treat ſuch as yielded with Favour and Clemency. He wrote alſo to Rome, That there could be no End of the War while Suetonius continu'd Governor, whoſe bad Succeſs was owing to his ill Conduct, and his good only to the Fortune of the Common-wealth. To compoſe this Difference, the Emperor ſent his Freed-man Polycletus, in hopes of appeaſing the Minds of the exaſperated Britains. He appear'd in Britain with great State and Grandure, and was receiv'd by the Soldiers with Fear and Reverence; but it appear'd ridiculous in the Eyes of the Britains, That ſuch a General and a victorious Army ſhould be accountable to a Slave. All Things were repreſented favourably to the Emperor, and Suetonius kept his Command; but not long after he was oblig'd to reſign all into the Hands of Petronius Turpilianus; which Governor without moleſting inoleſting the Enemy, or being moleſted by them, gave the ſpecious Name of Peace to his ſlothful unactive Life. And without performing any Thing memorable, he deliver'd his Province to Trebellius Maximus, a Perſon more lazy and negligent than himſelf; and as he wanted both Experience and Valour, ſo he was contemn'd and hated by his Army for his Avarice and Sordidneſs. This Diſſatisfaction was continually fomented by Cælius, Commander of the twentieth Legion, who charg'd him with defrauding and impoveriſhing the Legions, as he did him with Sedition and Want of Diſcipline. At length the Diſorder grew ſo great, that Trebellius being deſerted by the Wings of his Army, who went over to Cælius, and laſtly affronted by the Auxiliaries, he was forc'd to fly to Vitellius in Germany.

Tacitus. In the mean Time the Emperor Nero put an End to his own Life, and during the ſhort Reigns of Galba and Otho, Britain continu'd quiet and peaceable, tho' without a Conſular Lieutenant; being govern'd by the Commanders of the particular Legions, all of equal Authority; only Cælius by his daring Boldneſs ſeem'd to have gain'd the greateſt Command. When ſhortly after Vitellius came to the Empire, he ſent Vettius Bolanus to ſucceed Trebellius, a Perſon as little troubleſome to the Enemy as his Predeceſſor, and as careleſs of his Army; yet being of an innocent and obliging Temper, he gain'd the Affection of his Soldiers, tho' he wanted the Authority of a General. But when Veſpaſian had ſucceeded Vitellius, and with the reſt of the World had gain'd Britain alſo, he ſent thither brave Commanders and great Armies, which quite defeated the Hopes of their Enemies. He firſt ſent Petilius Cerealis to be Governor, who boldly enter'd the Country of the Brigantes, the moſt northern and numerous People of the Roman Province; to whom he gave many and ſingular Overthrows, and either ravag'd or conquer'd the greateſt Part of their Territories. So that Cerealis ſeem'd to have eclips'd the Fame and Conduct of any that could come after him; when Julius Frontinus, a great Man, and as eminent as cou'd be expected after ſuch a Predeceſſor, ſucceeded by Veſpaſian's Order in the ſame Charge, with no leſs Glory. For he ſubdu'd the ſtrong and warlike Nation of the Silures; where he had not only a potent Enemy to encounter, but likewiſe almoſt inſuperable Difficulties from the Nature and Situation of the Country. In the latter End of Veſpaſian's Reign, Frontinus was ſucceeded by Julius Agricola, a Commander of the greateſt Fame both for Valour and Conduct, who enter'd upon the moſt memorable Expedition that had ever been known in Britain, continuing ſeven or eight Years with great Reputation and Renown. Of this great Man's Actions in this Country, we have an excellent Account from his Son-in-Law Tacitus.

Not long before the Arrival of Agricola, the Ordovices, the Inhabitants of North-Wales, had almoſt entirely deſtroy'd a Wing of the Roman Legions; by which means the reſt of the conquer'd Nations were all ready for a Revolt, either out of Deſire of Liberty, or to diſcover the Ability of the new Lieutenant. Agricola, tho' the Seaſon was far advanc'd, with great Expedition gather'd together his diſpers'd Troops and Auxiliaries, and march'd towards theſe formidable People, who kept themſelves in Places of Advantage, and durſt not deſcend into indifferent Ground. He therefore with uncommon Bravery, placing himſelf foremoſt, advanc'd towards them with his Army, and being ſeconded with the Skill and Courage of his Veteran Soldiers, put them all to Flight and Sword, ſo that the whole Nation was almoſt extirpated. Finding that all Things were like to ſucceed according to the Event of his firſt Actions, he immediately determin'd to make himſelf Maſter of the Iſle of Angleſey, from whence Suetonius had been formerly recall'd; but this Deſign being ſuddenly laid, Ships were wanting for the Expedition, which Defect was notwithſtanding ſupply'd by the great Policy and Reſolution of the General. He commanded a choice Body of Auxiliaries, who were well acquainted with the Shallows of the Water, ſuddenly to paſs over, and invade the Iſland; and theſe, by the Cuſtom of their native native Country, being able in ſwimming to govern themſelves, their Horſes and Arms, perform'd it ſo effectually, that the Enemy, who at firſt expected a Fleet, were extreamly ſurpriz'd and confounded, as ſuppoſing that nothing could be invincible to Men that begun a War with ſuch Reſolution. Whereupon they immediately deſir'd Peace, and ſurrender'd the Iſle to the Command of Agricola, who now became great and famous, as having upon his Entrance, a Time uſually ſpent in Ceremony and Oſtentation, encounter'd ſo much Toil and Hazard. In theſe proſperous Proceedings of his Fortunes, he ſought not with any glorious Relations or Letters to magnifie his Honour; but rather in ſeeking to ſuppreſs the Fame of his Actions, he render'd them more conſpicuous and ſplendent. And now knowing the Diſpoſition of his Province, and being taught by others Experience, that Affairs would never be ſettled by Fighting, while Wrongs continu'd unredreſs'd, he reſolv'd in the next Place to cut off all juſt Occaſions of War and Revolts. Thereupon he began to regulate many Abuſes, and reform many Corruptions, in his Family, in his Camp, and in the whole Province; eſpecially ſuch as afflicted the poorer ſort, as Exactions, Encreaſe of Tributes, and Payments of Corn, which had been very burdenſome to the Britains; all which he under-rated and levy'd in ſuch Manner, as they became eaſie to the Inhabitants. By which Means Agricola brought the Nation to a more general Inclination to Peace, which partly by the Negligence, and partly by the Avarice of former Governors, had been no leſs odious than War it ſelf.

and reforms many Abuſes.

About this Time the Emperor Veſpaſian dy'd, and was ſucceeded by his Son Titus, who continu'd Agricola in his Government; who drawing his Army together the next Summer, obſerv'd excellent Methods, and exact Diſcipline. He choſe the Places for Encamping, and in Perſon try'd the Bogs and Woods; he gave the Enemy no Reſt, and when he had ſufficiently terrify'd them, he uſually with-held his Hand, and forbore Acts of Hoſtility, to allure them to the Pleaſures of Peace. Theſe Methods of Proceeding ſo wrought upon many Cities, that laying aſide Animoſities, they voluntarily ſubmitted, gave Hoſtages, and permitted Forts and Garriſons amongſt them; all which were effected with that Care and Prudence, that they were the only new Forts in Britain that never were attack'd afterwards. All Perſons begin now to entertain an honourable Opinion of their new Governor; and as he was ſufficiently careful in Summer, ſo he ſpent the next Winter in a wiſe Project. Whereas the Britains, hitherto harraſs'd with Oppreſſions and Wars, had ſmall Leiſure or Inclination to apply themſelves to the Ornaments of Peace and ſettled Societies; therefore they were ready for Revolts and Inſurrections upon every ſlight Occaſion. The better to induce them by Pleaſures to Reſt and Quietneſs, he exhorted them in private, and aſſiſted them in publick to build Temples, Places of Reſort, and ſtately Houſes; and likewiſe provided, that the Sons of the Nobility ſhould be carefully inſtructed in the liberal Arts and Sciences, applauding their Pains and Induſtry, and preferring their Parts and Ingenuities before thoſe of the Gauls; ſo that they who but lately deſpis'd the Roman Language, did now affect and ſtudy the Graces of it. From that Time alſo the Roman Modes and Dreſſes became in requeſt, and the Gown was commonly worn; and from thence they gradually proceeded to all their Softneſs and Incentives to Luxury, as beautiful Portico's, pleaſant Baths, and exquiſite Banquets, which by the Ignorant were term'd Civility and Politeneſs, when in Reality, as Tacitus tells us, they were but the Trappings of their Yoke and Bondage. In the third Summer Agricola diſcover'd new Countries and Parts of Britain yet untouch'd, or at leaſt not fully ſubdu'd; and being ambitious of extending the Bounds of the Roman Empire, he march'd Northwards up to the very Frith of Tans or Tweed, waſting all as he paſs'd, and without Reſiſtance fortify'd the Paſſages with Caſtles and Fortreſſes, which he ſtor'd with ſufficient Proviſions. By which Means every wintering Garriſon ſecur'd and guarded it ſelf, and with the Summer Service ever repair'd the Winter's Miſcarriages; which continually diſappointed the Enemy, Enemy, ſo that Agricola had all the Succeſs he could deſire. The fourth Summer was ſpent in ordering and ſettling what he had over-ran; and with ſuch Succeſs, that if his Armies, and the Glory of the Roman Empire would have permitted it, they needed not to have ſought any other Boundary in Britain. For the Friths of Glota and Bodotria, Dunbrittaen and Edenburgh, two Arms of two oppoſite Seas, ſhooting far into the Land, were only parted by a narrow Neck of Land, which Agricola had ſecur'd by Forts and Garriſons; ſo that the Romans were entire Maſters of all the South Side, and had pent up the Country as it were within another Iſland. His fourth Year's Expedition.

For theſe great Succeſſes and Exploits in Britain, Agricola not only purchas'd much Fame, but the Emperor Titus alſo receiv'd great Honours upon his Account, particularly to be ſaluted Imperator the fifteenth Time. But dying ſhortly after, he was ſucceeded by his Brother Domitian, who ſtill kept Agricola in this Country, and ſtill with new Succeſs. For in the fifth Year of his Lieutenancy, he took Shipping, and ſail'd over to certain Nations unknown to the Romans, probably the Orcades and other Northern Iſles, which after many proſperous Encounters he ſubdu'd; and then plac'd Garriſons in thoſe Parts of Britain which lye towards Ireland, having ſome Thoughts of attempting that Iſland. After this, ſuſpecting a general Inſurrection of the Caledonians, thoſe fierce Northern Nations beyond Bodotria, in the following Year he mann'd out a Fleet to diſcover the Creeks and Harbours of that ample Region, and with his Army march'd for the North. Thus Agricola was the firſt who ſeconded his Land-Forces by a Navy, and brought War upon the Britains by Sea and Land at once. The Britains were extreamly amaz'd and confounded at this Sight, conſidering that if once their Seas were diſcover'd, all Hopes of retreating wou'd be loſt. Nevertheleſs the Caledonians arming with great Power, hop'd to diſcourage the Romans by being Aggreſſors; which had ſo much Effect, that ſeveral adviſ'd Agricola not to proceed, but to retreat with Honour, rather than be repell'd with Shame. But he harken'd not to theſe Perſuaſions, and underſtanding that the Enemy would make their Irruptions in ſeveral Bodies, to prevent being ſurrounded by their Numbers, he march'd in three Diviſions; which being known to the Caledonians, they chang'd their Reſolution, and with united Forces ſet upon the ninth Legion in the Night, and broke into the Camp with great Slaughter; but Agricola having Intelligence of their March, follow'd them, and commanded his lighteſt Horſe and Foot to charge them in the Rear, and the reſt to make a loud Shout. The Day dawning, the Glittering of the Roman Enſigns dazled the Eyes of the Britains, who after a ſharp Fight at the Gates of the Camp, drew off to the Woods and Bogs, which ſecur'd them; otherwiſe the War had then been finiſh'd by a compleat Victory. Upon this Succeſs the Roman Soldiers, preſuming there was nothing able to withſtand their Arms, cry'd out to be led into Caledonia, that with a continual Courſe of Conqueſt they might find out the utmoſt Bounds of Britain. They were further encou-

Britain firſt diſcover'd to be an Iſland.

Notwithſtanding theſe Succeſſes, the Britains, attributing all to the good Fortune and Conduct of the General, and not to any Valour in his Soldiers, were not dejected, but proceeded to arm their Youth, to convey their Wives and Children into ſafe Places, and by Aſſemblies and Religious Rites to eſtabliſh a Confederacy among themſelves. And being intent upon nothing but Revenge or Slavery, the following Year by Leagues and Treaties they muſter'd up their whole Power; being now ſenſible, tho' too late, that a common Danger muſt be repuls'd by Confederacy and Union. Theſe, as their laſt Effort, had gather'd together together about thirty thouſand armed Men, beſides great Numbers of Youth, and vigorous old Men, who formerly had been excellent Soldiers, and ſtill retain'd the Scars and Badges of their Bravery. On the other ſide, Agricola having ſent his Fleet before, follow'd in Perſon ſhortly after with his whole Army, to which he had added ſome of the moſt valiant Britains, ſuch as after the Teſt of a long Peace he had found faithful, and march'd to the Hill Grampius, now Grantzbain in Scotland, where the Enemy had poſted themſelves. Upon the Approaches of both Armies, all Perſons with great Eagerneſs and Impatience attended the Succeſs of this deciding Battel; and Galgacus, both by Birth and Merit Commander of the Britains, with a furious Warmth and elevated Courage is ſaid to have ſpoken after this Manner to his Soldiers. When I conſider the Cauſe of this War, and our preſent Urgency, I have reaſon to preſume, that the future Happineſs and Freedom of the whole Iſland will date their Birth from this important Day. For we are the moſt valiant Remains of the Britains, ſeated in the remoteſt Regions, beyond the Ken of thoſe Nations enſlav'd by the Enemy; ſo that our Eyes are yet unpolluted, and free from the Contagion of Foreign Tyranny; and this ſecret Receſs, unknown to Fame, has hitherto preſerv'd us in all the Bleſſings of Liberty. Beyond us is no Nation, nothing but Waves and Rocks; on that Side nothing but Bondage and Slavery, which is to be expected from the Romans; a People unſatiable in their Luſts, and unbounded in their Ambition. Thoſe Robbers of the World, and Ravagers of the Univerſe, now the exhauſted Land can no more furniſh their Rapines, endeavour to rifle the wide Seas and Ocean. When they meet with opulent Enemies, their Cruelty proceeds from Avarice; when with Poor, it ariſes from Ambition. The Eaſt and Weſt, vaſt as they are, cannot ſatiate their voracious Minds; they, and they alone, with equal Greedineſs graſp at the Riches and Poverty of all Nations. Devaſtations, Murders and Extirpations, paſs with them under the falſe Names of Empire and Government; and they boaſt of eſtabliſhing Peace in thoſe Provinces they have render'd deſolate. Our Goods are their Tribute, our Corn their Proviſions, our Bodies their Tools for all Kinds of Drudgery; and if the Modeſty of our Wives and Daughters has preſerv'd them from open Violence, when they were Enemies, it cannot ſecure them from their laſcivious Friendſhip, now they are Gueſts. Other Slaves, whom Nature and Fortune have deſtin'd to Servitude, are nouriſh'd by their Maſters; but the Britains alone purchace their own Bondage, and maintain and ſupport their Oppreſſors. Were our Enemies Courage in War, equal to their Debaucheries in Peace, we might juſtly dread their Arms; but their Glory is all owing to our Diſſentions: Our Union will diſſipate their Forces which are gather'd out of many Nations; ſo that one Miſcarriage of theirs will diſſolve their whole Power. In ſumm, there you ſee Tributes and Slavery, here Death or Liberty; therefore let us conſider the Glory of our Anceſtors, and the Fate of our Poſterity.

This Speech being deliver'd with the Fierceneſs of Lions and Tigers, and darting upon the Soldiers like Flaſhes of Lightning, was immediately ſeconded with the barbarous, and confus'd Acclamations of the whole Army. Agricola on the other ſide encourag'd his Men with all the Force and Charms of the Roman Eloquence; and fearing to be flank'd by reaſon of the Enemy's Numbers, he drew out his Front to the utmoſt Length, and advanc'd himſelf at the Head of his Foot. The Battel began at ſome Diſtance from the main Body, wherein the Britains ſhow'd great Art and Courage, by means of their broad Swords, and ſhort Bucklers, with which they bore off the Darts of their Enemies, and pour'd in upon them with Showers of their own. To prevent which Inconveniency, Agricola order'd the Batavian and Tungrian Cohorts to advance againſt them with their ſharp-pointed Bucklers, which render'd their pointleſs Swords unſerviceable, and ſo mangled their Faces, that they were oblig'd to retire with the greateſt Precipitation. This Advantage being ſeconded by the Emulation of the

the other Cohorts, who furiouſly bore down all before them; and being many Ways back'd and ſupported by the great Skill of their General, the Britains were at laſt diſpers'd: Whilſt many unarm'd ran deſperately upon their Enemies Swords, others tho' arm'd betook themſelves to Flight, leaving a Field diſmally ſtrew'd with Heaps of Arms, Carcaſſes, mangled Limbs and Blood, and many expiring Perſons, who ſtill retain'd their Courage and Fierceneſs. Night and Wearineſs put an end to the Chace, and Victory made it pleaſant to the Conquerors; but the unfortunate Britains, both Men and Women, wandering in a deplorable Manner, ſpent the Night in calling their loſt Friends, carrying off the Wounded, in burning their Houſes out of Deſpair, and ſhifting from one Corner to another. Sometimes they conſulted with each other, and conceiv'd ſome Hopes; then again they were broken with Pity and Compaſſion, and oftner with Rage and Madneſs at the Sight of their Wives and Children, ſeveral of whom they diſpatch'd with their own, rather than they ſhould ſuffer by their Enemies Swords. This ſignal Victory put a Stop to all future Reſiſtance, and Agricola ſending out his Fleet along the Coaſts, they alſo diſcover'd Britain to be an Iſland, and ſubdu'd the Orcades, which had not been heard of 'till that Time. Thus after forty two Years Struggle of an unciviliz'd and diſunited People, againſt the moſt powerful Nation in the Univerſe, the greateſt Part of Britain was conquer'd and reduc'd into an intire and civiliz'd Province of the Roman Empire, the further Part being left to the Barbarians, as neither pleaſant nor fruitful; the Government of which was ever annex'd and appropriated to the Emperors themſelves, and no ways at the Diſpoſal of the Senate, as ſeveral other Provinces were. This was compleated in the fourth Year of Domitian's Reign, about 138 Years after the firſt Entrance of Julius Cæſar, in the latter End of the Year 84, or the Beginning of 85, when Agricola was recall'd out of Britain.

and Britain reduc'd to a Roman Province.

III. From this Time forwards, for above 320 Years, the greateſt and richeſt Part of Britain became ſubject to the Romans, who made great Advantages of the Country, and laid heavy Tributes upon the Inhabitants. Yet with their grievous Yoke they bore down Barbariſm, and introduc'd Humanity and Civility, which daily made way and fitted Men for Chriſtianity; and they wanted not the Arts of obliging a conquer'd People, allowing ſome Kings amongſt them of their own Nation, which were commonly us'd for Inſtruments of enſlaving their Neighbours, and bearing off the Odium from the Conquerors. Partly by ſuch Arts, and partly through Neceſſity, the Britains began to love as well as fear their Maſters the Romans, and follow'd their Modes, Dreſſes and Cuſtoms to as great an Exceſs as any Nation; and their Buildings and other Works were ſo very ſtately, that we cannot now look upon their Remains without Admiration, and the ordinary People think them to be of more than human Structure. But of the Tranſactions of Britain after Agricola's Departure, we have only ſhort and broken Accounts, which are gather'd from ſeveral Parts of the Roman Hiſtorians. We are not certain who was Agricola's Succeſſor, unleſs it be Saluſtius Lucullus, whom Domitian in a ſhort time ſacrific'd to his own ſuſpicious Humour. At which Time flouriſh'd King Arviragus in this Iſland, according to Juvenal; and alſo at Rome a Britiſh Lady nam'd Claudia Rufina, celebrated by Martial for her extraordinary Beauty and Learning, whom many believe to have been a Chriſtian, and the ſame mention'd by St. Paul in his ſecond Epiſtle to Timothy, c. 4. v. 21. Domitian was ſucceeded by Nerva, in whoſe Time we have little concerning Britain, only that in his Reign, as alſo in that of Trajan his Succeſſor, there were great Commotions in this Iſland, but they were ſoon ſuppreſs'd and ended. But Hadrian the next Emperor being proclaim'd, he receiv'd Intelligence, that the Northern Britains made Incurſions into the Roman Part; whereupon he ſent Julius Severus, who being ſuddenly recall'd upon the Account of other Inſurrections, the Emperor himſelf

The Emperor Hadrian was ſucceeded by Antoninus Pius, whoſe Lieutenant Lollius Urbicus defeated the Brigantes; and having driven back, and remov'd the barbarous Northern People, he built another Wall of Earth and Piles beyond the former, between Edinburgh and Dunbritton Friths. For theſe two Expeditions, Antoninus obtain'd the Title of Britannicus, tho' he never ſaw Britain himſelf. After him Antoninus Philoſophus poſſeſs'd the Empire, who ſent Calphurnius Agricola to be his Lieutenant in Britain, a Perſon who partly by his Prudence, and partly by Force, appeas'd the Northern Tumults, and ſettled the Minds of thoſe People who were moſt uneaſie under the Roman Authority. In the latter End of this Emperor's Reign, we are inform'd by Beda, That Lucius, one of the Kings allow'd by the Romans in Britain, having an Inclination for Chriſtianity, which had been formerly planted, but not well water'd in this Nation, ſent to Eleutherus Biſhop of Rome, to ſignifie his pious Intentions, and to deſire his Aſſiſtance. Eleutherus ſent Fugatius and Damianus, two eminent Men, to this Iſland; at which Time, not only Lucius himſelf receiv'd the Faith, but by his Example, and the Diligence of the firſt Preachers, it ſpread in a ſhort Time through a great Part of the Nation, and Chriſtianity continu'd unmoleſted 'till the Reign of Diocletian. So that Lucius is ſuppos'd to be the firſt Chriſtian King in the World, and Britain the firſt Province that embrac'd the Goſpel by publick Authority. This Story has receiv'd ſo many Additions and Corruptions by later Writers, that it has occaſion'd many to disbelieve the whole, and to doubt whether there ever was ſuch a King as Lucius in Britain; for which the Reader may pleaſe to conſult B. Stillingfleet's eleborate Work, The Antiquities of the Britiſh Churches.

COMMODUS. In the Reign of Commodus, the next Emperor, the Northern Britains became more troubleſome than ever; for having paſs'd the great Wall, they cut off the Roman General, and moſt of his Army, and then made terrible Devaſtations in the Country. The Emperor affrighted at their Progreſs, immediately ſent Ulpius Marcellus againſt them, a wiſe and magnanimous Governor, who ſoon put an end to this War that appear'd ſo formidable, ſeverely chaſtis'd the Britains for their Revolt, and reviv'd the loſt Diſcipline among the Roman Soldiers; for which Services, and his Virtues, the wicked Emperor deſign'd to have taken his Life, but upon ſecond Reflexions only diſcharg'd him of his Office. After his Departure, the Roman Army began to mutiny, and to diſown Commodus for their Emperor; which Diſorders, Pereunes his great Favourite undertook to redreſs, by Threats, Removing of Officers, and placing inferior Perſons in their Room; which had no better Effect than to bring the whole Storm upon himſelf. For the Soldiers, accuſing him of Treaſon againſt his Soveraign, gain'd ſo much Credit, as to cauſe him to be executed. Upon his Death Pertinax, afterwards Emperor, undertook the Charge of Britain; and he, after he had ſuppreſs'd the Seditions with the utmoſt Hazard of his Life, got leave to be diſmiſs'd. After him, by the Command of Commodus, Albinus had the Government of this Province aſſign'd to him, and might have been honour'd with the Title of Cæſar, but he declin'd it: But afterwards, in a Speech to his Soldiers, upon a falſe Report of the Emperor's Death, declaring for the Senatorian againſt the the Imperial Power, he was diſcharg'd, and Junius Severus was ſent in his Place. Commodus not long after being ſlain, and the Reigns of Pertinax and Julian being ſhort, Albinus was found again at the Head of his Army in Britain, in the Beginning of the Reign of Severus, which he afterwards tranſported againſt him into Gaul; where, near Lyons, he was encounter'd by Severus, his Forces defeated, and himſelf ſlain. Severus being ſettled in the Empire, divided Britain into two Governments or Prefectures; the South Part was committed to Heraclitus, and the North, which was the moſt difficult to manage, to Virius Lupus, in Quality of Pro-prætor, where the Caledonians and others ſo infeſted him, that he was oblig'd to purchace a Truce with Mony. This new Diviſion was made in the fourth Year of Severus's Reign, A. D. 197.

Dion. Spart. Herod. In the fifteenth Year of this Prince's Reign, he receiv'd Advice that the Northern Britains were up in Arms, and had been ſo ſucceſsful, that the ſtanding Legions and the Province were in great Danger; which gave much Uneaſineſs to an Emperor who before had conquer'd the moſt powerful Enemies. But that the Empire ſhould not be diminiſh'd in his Reign by the Loſs of an Iſland of ſuch great Importance, he reſolv'd to come in Perſon, tho' very gouty and above ſixty Years of Age; taking with him his two Sons Caracalla and Geta. The Britains underſtanding the Emperor's Approach, offer'd him an honourable Peace; but he had ſuch an inſatiable Deſire to add the glorious Name of Britannicus to his former Titles, that he refus'd their Propoſals. Upon his Entrance, he left his Son Geta in the Southern Parts of the Province, which had continu'd in Obedience; and march'd with his Son Caracalla againſt the Northern Britains and Caledonians; where with the cutting down of Woods, making of Bridges, draining of Bogs and Meers, the Enemies Ambuſcades, and Sickneſs, he loſt no leſs than fifty thouſand Men, according to Dion. The aged Emperor encounter'd theſe Miſeries and Difficulties with a noble Bravery, and proſecuted his Attempts with ſuch a vigorous Reſolution, that he forc'd them to a Submiſſion, with the Delivery of a conſiderable Part of their Country, and all their Arms. And for the better Security of the Province of Britain, he built, or rather repair'd that famous Wall begun by the Emperor Hadrian; which he made anſwerable to the Power and Grandure of the Roman Empire. For this, and his ſeveral Victories, he took upon him the Title of Britannicus Maximus, cauſing that Inſcription to be ſtamp'd upon his own, and his Sons Coins. The Emperor after this retir'd to Eboricum or York, leaving the Work to be finiſh'd by his Son Caracalla, who by his Popularity to the Soldiers, and his exceſſive Looſneſs, gave an Occaſion to the Caledonians to break their Articles, and revolt; which ſo inrag'd this old diſtemper'd Prince, that he gave Commands to make a general Maſſacre without Diſtinction, which was executed with great Severity. Having been nigh two Years in Britain, at Eboricum he grew weak, partly with Age and Travel, and partly with Grief for the ill Life of his eldeſt Son; and finding himſelf declining, he cry'd out, I have been all that a Man can be, but it is of no Service to me now. But at his Death ſhortly after, he ſeem'd to comfort himſelf by declaring, That he had found the Empire diſorder'd in all its Parts, but now had left it in Peace, even among the Britains. His Son Caracalla having made Peace with the Britains, and receiv'd Hoſtages from them, return'd to Rome with his Brother Geta.

For about ſixty Years, and the Reigns of twelve ſucceeding Emperors after Caracalla, namely Macrinus, Elagabalus, Alexander, Maximinus, Pupienus, Gordian, Philip, Decius, Gallus, Valerian, Gallienus and Claudius, we have no Account of the Affairs of Britain; only in the Reign of Gallienus, ſome of the thirty Tyrants, as Lollianus, Victorinus, Poſthumus, the Tetrici, and Marius, are ſuppos'd to have uſurp'd the Government here, ſince their Coins are found in ſuch great Quantities in this Nation. gether with Proculus, endeavour'd to make himſelf Emperor, claiming all Britain, Spain and Part of Gaul, in the Time both of Aurelian and his Succeſſor Tacitus; but being at laſt defeated by the next Emperor Probus, after a ſharp Engagement, he hang'd himſelf, and gave the Occaſion of the Jeſt, That there hung a Bottle, not a Man. After that, Probus prevented a new Rebellion in Britain, by the ſevere Loyalty of Victorinus, at whoſe Recommendation he had plac'd a Lieutenant here, who had ſet up for Emperor; for upbraiding Victorinus with the Diſloyalty of the Perſon he had recommended, he undertook to rectifie the Miſtake, by paſſing ſuddenly over into Britain, where by a Stratagem he found means to ſlay the Traitor, and ſave the Province. Eutropius alſo relates, that Probus was the firſt Emperor who gave leave to the Spaniards, Gauls and Britains to plant Vines, and to make Wine. This Emperor alſo having ſubdu'd the Vandals and Burgundians in a great Battel, he ſent great Numbers of them to inhabit Britain, where being well ſettled, they prov'd very ſerviceable to the Empire upon any Commotions or Inſurrections. Moſt ſuppoſe them to have had their Camp upon thoſe Hills near Cambridge, commonly call'd Gogmagog-Hills, where on the Top of one of them may be ſeen to this Day a Plain, ſurrounded with large double Trenches of a great Circumference. After Probus, Carus ſucceeded in the Empire, who put this Iſland with the Weſtern Provinces into the Hands of his Son Carenus; but he in two Years Time was ſlain by Diocletian, who ſucceeded in the Empire, A.D. 284.

A. D. 287. Carauſius in Britain claims the Empire.

In the Reign of this noted Emperor, Carauſius, a Man of mean Extract but great Courage, was employ'd to ſecure the Belgick and Armorican Coaſts, then infeſted by the Franks and Saxons; and daily inriching himſelf with the Spoils of others, he became juſtly ſuſpected by the Emperor, who order'd his Partner Maximian to procure his Death. Carauſius finding his Crimes too great to hope for Safety, aſſum'd the Title of Emperor, and took Poſſeſſion of Britain; whither he brought his Fleet, built more Ships after the Roman Manner, was join'd by the Roman Legions, kept out foreign Forces, preſs'd the Gallick Merchants to his Service, garriſon'd Bononia in Gaul, and converted the Revenues of Britain and Batavia to his own Uſe. Moreover, by the Hopes of Booty in the Provinces, he drew no ſmall Forces of the Barbarians to his Alliance, particularly the Franks, whom he had train'd to Sea-Service, and infeſted all the Sea-Coaſts about him. Maximian with a brave Army march'd againſt him; being advanc'd to the Sea-Coaſt, the Want of Sea-Men, and the Danger of the Britiſh Seas, occaſion'd him to make an Hault, and to come to a Treaty, in which it was concluded, That Carauſius ſhou'd enjoy the Government of Britain, as the propereſt Perſon to defend the Inhabitants againſt all Invaſions; and this he held with great Authority and in perfect Peace for ſeven Years together. But when Conſtantius was made Cæſar by Maximian, and took the Town of Bononia, Carauſius was treacherouſly ſlain by Allectus, his boſom Friend and prime Miniſter; who thereupon uſurp'd the Government to himſelf, and retain'd it three Years longer. At length Conſtantius mann'd ſeveral diſtinct Fleets, ſo that Allectus not knowing what Courſe to take, or where to expect him, grew ſenſible that the Ocean was not ſo much his Defence, as his Priſon. The Roman Fleet ſetting out in bad Weather, had the Fortune by reaſon of a Miſt to eſcape the Britiſh Navy, which lay out by the Iſle of Wight to obſerve its Motions; and as ſoon as the Soldiers were landed, Conſtantius ſet fire to all the Ships, that they might confide in nothing but their own Valour. Allectus perceiving this retir'd, and in his Flight was accidentally met and attack'd by Aſclepiadotus, Captain of his Life-Guard; but his Confuſion was ſuch, that he ran deſperately to his own Ruin; for without drawing up his Army, after he had thrown off his Robes, he with his barbarous Mercenaries ruſh'd on upon the Enemy, and in a tumultuary Skirmiſh was kill'd without Diſtinction. The Franks and other ſurviving Barbarians, upon this determin'd to plunder the City of London, and eſcape by Sea with the Booty; but a Party of the Romans, that that were ſeparated from the Fleet in foggy Weather, came fortunately into the Aſſiſtance of the City, ſet upon them, and purſu'd them through the Streets with great Slaughter, not only to the Safety, but alſo to the Pleaſure of the Citizens, who were Eye-witneſſes of their Deliverance. By this Victory the Province of Britain was recover'd to the Romans, after it had been ten Years under the Governments of Carauſius and Allectus. Not long after, a dreadful Perſecution breaking out under Diocletian, ſeveral are believ'd to have ſuffer'd in Britain, as St. Alba, Julius, Aaron, &c. but the Narratives of their Chriſtian Zeal and Courage, are ſo obſcur'd by the fictitious Fancies of after Ages, that we can ſcarce diſcover what Perſons ſuffer'd, nor the Time, Place or Manner of their Martyrdoms.

A. D. 303. A Perſecution in Britain.

Diocletian having reſign'd the Empire, the Weſtern Provinces with Britain fell to the Share of Conſtantius, who gave Liberty to the Chriſtians, and came over into this Iſle himſelf; where reinforcing the Garriſons towards the Borders, and eſtabliſhing a general Peace, at York he fell ſick of a languiſhing Diſeaſe, and dy'd. He was ſucceeded by his renowned Son Conſtantine, who was proclaim'd Emperor in Britain, and is by moſt Authors believ'd to have been a Native of this Country, tho' it is doubted by ſome others. This great Prince was the firſt who by Law eſtabliſh'd Chriſtianity in the Roman Empire; and in a few Years with great Fame he became Maſter of the whole, againſt the Power of all Uſurpers and Oppoſers. But afterwards removing his Imperial Seat from Rome to Conſtantinople, and drawing many Forces from Gaul, Germany and Britain, towards the Eaſtern Parts, he open'd a Way for Invaſions and Incurſions into the Weſtern Provinces, and laid the Foundation not only of the Loſs of Britain, but alſo of the Ruin of the Empire. Yet for the better Security and Government of the Empire, he new modell'd the whole, dividing it into fourteen diſtinct Provinces call'd Dioceſes, and thoſe ſubject to four Prætorian Præfects. Britain was one of the fourteen, which was made ſubject to the Prætorian Præfect of Gaul, and inſtead of the two Diviſions made by the Emperor Severus, he divided it into three Provinces, namely Britannia Prima, containing all the Southern Parts of Britain, the Metropolis of which was London; Britannia Secunda, containg that Part now call'd Wales, the Metropolis of which was Iſca, now Caer-leon; and Maxima Cæſarienſis, containing all the Northern Parts of Britain, the Metropolis of which was Eboricum, now York, which ſome ſay was the chief of the whole. This laſt Province was afterwards divided into two, viz. Maxima Cæſarienſis, and Flavia Cæſarienſis; but whether by Conſtantine, or ſome ſucceeding Emperor, is uncertain. In the Reign of Conſtantine, or not long after, there were twenty eight Cities in Britain, as we are aſſur'd from Gildas and Beda; all which are reaſonably believ'd to have been Biſhopricks. But tho' we are not certain of the Number of the Biſhopricks, yet we find the Britiſh Church was become ſo conſiderable in the Time of Conſtantine, that in the ninth Year of his Reign, A. D. 314, it ſent three Biſhops of the thirty three that compos'd the Council of Arles, namely Eborius Biſhop of York, Reſtitutus Biſhop of London, and Adelphius Biſhop of Colcheſter, or perhaps Caer-Leon. And tho' in the famous Council of Nice, eleven Years after, we have not the Names of the Britiſh Biſhops there, becauſe the Subſcriptions to that Council are loſt; yet there are many convincing Circumſtances to prove that they were there, and join'd in the Decrees of the Council.

IV. After the Reign of Conſtantine the Great, the Weſt being more naked and expos'd than formerly, the Affairs of Britain were in a declining Poſture; yet the Romans held Poſſeſſion of the Iſle for near a hundred Years after, and took as great Care of it as their Circumſtances would permit. Conſtantine dying, divided the Empire among his three Sons, Conſtantinus, Conſtans and Conſtantius; and to the Eldeſt he gave Britain and the Weſt, who not ſatisfy'd with with his Diviſion, invaded that of his Brother Conſtans, and was ſlain after three Years Reign. Conſtans, ſeizing on the Weſt, after eight or nine Years Poſſeſſion, was ſlain by the Treaſon of Magnentius, born of Britiſh Parents, who held thoſe Parts three Years againſt all the Power of the ſurviving Brother Conſtantius, and then ſlaying himſelf, left the whole to his Government. Conſtantius being poſſeſs'd of Britain, ſent over a Notary call'd Paulus, who coming into the Iſle, under a Pretence of ſearching for the Friends and Aſſiſtants of Magnentius, committed horrible Extortions and Cruelties, and like a Torrent bore away the Eſtates and Fortunes of many innocent Perſons, to the perpetual Infamy of his Maſter Conſtantius, who ſupported him in all his Outrages. Martinus was then Governor of the Province, who commiſerating the Fates of ſuch as he knew guiltleſs, interceded with Paulus, perſuading him to withdraw his Hand, or otherwiſe he would depart the Iſle; but he dreading the Effects of ſuch a Reſolution, accus'd the Governor himſelf as a Perſon guilty, and urg'd that he might be ſeiz'd, and carry'd bound to the Emperor. Martinus, provok'd at ſuch an Injury, drew out his Sword, and ſtruck at his Accuſer; but failing in his Aim, he turn'd the Point againſt his own Breaſt, and ſlew himſelf; which ſtill added to the Miſeries and Puniſhments of thoſe whom Paulus thought fit to pronounce guilty. Conſtantius in the latter End of his Reign committed the Government of Britain and the Weſt to Julian, afterwards call'd The Apoſtate; who, reſiding then at Paris, upon the News of the Incurſions and Ravages of the Scots from Ireland, and the Picts from Caledonia into the Roman Part of Britain, ſent Lupicinus to repel them, and eſtabliſh the Peace of the Iſland. Lupicinus paſs'd over with a conſiderable Army into Kent; and marching to London in order to manage the War, he was ſhortly after recall'd by the ſame Commander. About the ſame Time, the Arian Hereſie, which had infected Chriſtendom, gave this Iſland no ſmall Diſturbance; a Land, ſays Gildas, greedy of every Thing new, ſtedfaſt in nothing. In favour of which Doctrine, the Emperor Conſtantius conven'd a Council of four hundred Biſhops at Arimi-num, allowing them all neceſſary Proviſions. But all choſe to live at their own Charges; only three out of Britain, by reaſon of their Poverty, accepted of the Emperor's Allowance, rather than be burdenſom to their Brethren.

JULIAN. JOVIAN. VALENTINIAN. Britain invaded by Barbarians.

In the ſhort Reigns of Julian the Apoſtate, and Jovian, we find nothing concerning Britain; after whom Valentinian ſucceeded in the Weſtern Empire, who in his Paſſage through Gaul, receiv'd a ſad and aſtoniſhing Account, That the Scots from Ireland, and the Picts and Attacots from the North, together with the Saxons and Francs from the Eaſt and South, had harraſs'd and ruin'd almoſt all Britain; That they had kill'd Nectaridius Governor of the Sea-Coaſts, and ſurpriz'd Buchobaudes General of the Land Forces by a Stratagem. After Valentinian had with ſmall Succeſs ſent Severus, and then Jovinus, to ſuppreſs their Fury, he at length deputed Theodoſius, Father to the firſt Emperor of that Name, a Perſon of celebrated Valour and Conduct, who gathering together an Army of ſelect young Men, with the Herulian, Batavian and other Troops, march'd directly to London. There dividing his Forces into ſeveral Parties, he ſucceſsfully encounter'd the roving pillaging Enemy, laden with Spoils; from whom he recover'd the Priſoners and Plunder they had carry'd away; and having reſtor'd all to their reſpective Owners, except ſome ſmall Portion beſtow'd on the weary Soldiers, he enter'd London in a triumphant Manner, and reſtor'd it to its former Splendor. Having diſpers'd the whole Force, he proclaim'd Impunity to ſuch as wou'd immediately return to Obedience; but the Enemy being numerous, of many Nations, and in divers Parties, to finiſh all, he found it neceſſary to call in the Aſſiſtance of Civiles and Dulcitius, the former eminent for his Wiſdom and Honeſty, and the latter for his Military Abilities.

the Foundations of a laſting Peace, one Valentinus a Pannonian, a Perſon of a haughty Spirit, who for ſome notorious Crime was baniſh'd into Britain, with other Exiles and Soldiers, conſpir'd againſt him, as the only Obſtacle to his Deſign of gaining the Government of the Iſle. This Man being diſcover'd, he with ſome of his principal Accomplices were deliver'd over to Dulcitius, and receiv'd their juſt Rewards; but Theodoſius permitted others to eſcape, not making too ſevere an Inquiſition into a Conſpiracy where many were engag'd, leſt ſuch Methods of Proceeding might encreaſe the Danger. After which he proceeded to reform many Irregularities and Diſorders with great Succeſs, recover'd many Cities and Garriſons, and fortify'd the Borders with conſtant Watches and Guards, which had been formerly given up to the Enemy; ſo that the Northern Province being reſtor'd to its former Condition, he appointed a new Governor over it, and order'd it to be call'd Valentia for the future, in Honour of his Maſter Valentinian, and the City of London to be call'd Auguſta. And now the Roman Part of Britain conſiſted of five diſtinct Provinces, viz. Britannia Prima in the South, Britannia Secunda in the Weſt, Flavia Cæſarienſis in the Eaſt and middle Parts, Maxima Cæſarienſis towards the North, and Valentia beyond Severus's Wall to Edenburgh and Dunbritton Friths. All Things being happily executed, when Theodoſius was recall'd, he left the Iſland in Peace, and being attended with the general Applauſe of all Men to the Sea Side, he paſs'd over to wait upon the Emperor, who receiv'd him with the higheſt Commendations.

and divides it into five Provinces.

Zoſimus. Gildas. But the Quiet and good Fortune of the Britains did not laſt long; for not many Years after, when Valentinian was ſucceeded in the Empire by his two Sons Gratian and Valentinian, and the latter had made Theodoſius the Younger his Partner, one Maximus a Britiſh Commander, out of Hatred to Gratian, and Envy to Theodoſius, aſſum'd the Purple, and was ſaluted Emperor; which prov'd the firſt great Step to the Ruin of Britain. The firſt Eſſays of his uſurped Power were indeed employ'd to the Good and Preſervation of this Iſland, driving back the Scots into Ireland, and the Picts beyond the Walls: But proceeding in his Ambition againſt the legal Emperors, he not only quitted the Iſle, but drew over moſt of the Roman Forces from thence, and the beſt of the Britiſh Youth to his Aſſiſtance. Theſe never return'd to Britain again, for moſt of them periſh'd with their Commander not long after, or elſe ſettled themſelves in that Part of Gaul call'd Armorica, which afterwards from them and other Britains had the Name of Britain, now Bretaigne. The Departure of ſo many Soldiers ſo extreamly weaken'd the Nation, that the Scots and Picts now found it an eaſie Prey, and made freſh Ravages and Devaſtations. For the Reduction of theſe, Chryſanthus, the Son of Marcian Biſhop of Conſtantinople, was made Governor, who diſcharg'd his Office with great Reputation; but whether he fully ſubdu'd theſe Northern Enemies, or whether Stilico, Governor to the young Emperor Honorius, or ſome other ſent by him, as Claudian ſeems to affirm, reduc'd them, it no where appears. Not long after, the Empire being in great Diſtreſs, the Legion ſent for this purpoſe into Britain was recall'd, and the Vandals, Sweves and Alans having over-run many Countries, became formidable to the Forces in Britain, who fearing to be imacled, in a Sedition elected one Marcus to be their Emperor, a Man of great Power in this Iſland; but not anſwering their Expectations, they ſoon diſpatch'd him, and ſet up one Gratian, who after four Months Reign, was alſo depriv'd of his Life and Empire. After this they proceeded to chuſe Conſtantine, a Common Soldier, thinking his Name fortunate, and ſufficient to preſerve the Empire; who taking with him the Remainder of the Britiſh Forces and Strength that Maximus had left, paſs'd over into Gaul, and never return'd again, but loſt his Life and his Army four Years after.

At the ſame Time the miſerable Britains, now deſtitute of the Roman Legions, and their beſt and nobleſt Inhabitants, became more expos'd than ever to the mercileſs Rage of the barbarous Picts and Scots, and other Northern People. And now they began to implore the Aſſiſtance of their old Maſters the Romans, ſuing to thoſe People as Patrons and Protectors, whom they anciently look'd upon as Tyrants and Uſurpers. Accordingly they ſent ſeveral Meſſages and Petitions to the Emperor Honorius, but he being in great Diſtreſs himſelf, and not able to defend Rome againſt Alarick, advis'd them by Letters to uſe their own Ways and Methods for their Safety, and freely acquitted them of all the Roman Juriſdiction. They being thus diſcharg'd and abandon'd, and having all the Right of Government in their own Hands, thence forward betook themſelves to live after their own Laws and Inſtitutions, and the Armoricans, who now obtain'd the Name of the Britains in Gaul, follow'd their Example. Thus fell the vaſt Empire of the Romans, firſt in Britain, and ſoon after in Italy; and with it all that was Roman, as Learning, Valour, Eloquence, Hiſtory, Civility, and even Language it ſelf, all equally diminiſhing and decaying. The firſt Diſcharge of the Britains from their Allegiance was about the Year 410, which was 463 Years after the firſt Entrance of Julius Cæſar into this Iſland, 367 after the Romans firſt got Poſſeſſion under the Emperor Claudius, and 326 after the full Conqueſt of it by Agricola, under Domitian.

The Roman State of Britain

And here it will not be improper, before we finiſh this Chapter, to give ſome little Account of the Roman Government and Eſtabliſhment in Britain, whether Civil or Military; which we have from the Notitia of the Empire, ſuppos'd to have been publiſh'd about the Year 410. Britain being one of the Dioceſes belonging to the Diſtrict of the Præfectus Prætorio of Gaul, it had a Governor of its own call'd a Vicar; whoſe Enſigns were a Book of Mandates, ſhut, cover'd with green, and mark'd on the Back, together with five Caſtles repreſenting ſo many Provinces, with their ſeveral Names inſcrib'd. According to the five Provinces, he had ſo many Magiſtrates under his Command, namely two Conſulars, and three Preſidents, the former of Valentia, and Maxima Cæſarienſis, and the other of Britannia Prima, Britannia Secunda, and Flavia Cæſarienſis, who were to determine all Cauſes whether Criminal or Civil. By the Vicar, and theſe five Magiſtrates, with a great Number of inferior Officers, was the whole Civil Government of Britain adminiſter'd. The Military Government was executed by three great Officers under the Magiſtri Militum of the Weſt, namely the Comes Britanniarum, the Comes Littoris Saxonici, and the Dux Britanniarum; the firſt of theſe having his Command in the inward and middle Parts of the Iſle, and the two latter in the Eaſtern and Northern Coaſts. The Comes or Count of Britain, was the Chief of the three, who had many Officers under him; but governing in the middle Parts of the Iſle, we do not find any particular Garriſons belonging to him, only that the Forces which ſerv'd immediately under him were 3000 Foot, and 600 Horſe. The Comes or Count of the Saxon Shore, is ſuppos'd to be an Admiral to prevent the Ravages of the Saxons, then very powerful, who had alſo nine maritime Garriſons under his Command, and in theſe 2200 Foot, and 200 Horſe. The Dux or Duke of Britain commanded in the North, and had fourteen Garriſons under him, conſiſting of 6000 Foot and 300 Horſe, beſides twenty three Stations for Soldiers upon and about the Northern Walls, in which were 8000 Foot and 600 Horſe. So that according to Panicrolls Account the whole Roman Force in Britain, after the Time of Conſtantine the Great, conſiſted of 19200 Foot, and 1700 Horſe. But as for the Number of the Romans who were fixt in the Colonies, and in other Parts of the Nation, who mixt with the Britains in Marriage, and became in a manner Natives of the Land, we can make no Computation.

It

It was an uſual Cuſtom among the Romans to place their Garriſons and their Soldiers Quarters towards the outward Bounds of their Provinces, and fix their Colonies in the more inward Parts of their Conqueſts, as well to cultivate the People, as to keep them in Subjection, for they were all Places of Strength, tho' leſs exercis'd in War than thoſe on the Frontiers; ſo we find it in Britain, where the Guards and Garriſons were chiefly on the Borders of Caledonia, and Sea-Coaſts; not but that they had alſo their fix'd and ſtanding Camps in the Fields and middle Parts of the Nation, ſuch as Gogmagog Hills in Cambridgeſhire, and ſeveral others. The Romans alſo, for the greater Conveniency of Paſſage from Garriſon to Garriſon, Station to Station, Colony to Colony, and from one Municipium or Corporation to another, had their publick High-ways, call'd the Conſulary, Prætorian, Regal and Military Ways, &c. by Beda, and by the Moderns Strates, or Streets. In Britain there were many, but four were of principal Note, namely, Via Vetelingiana, ſince call'd Watling-Street, Via Icenorum, or Ikenild-Street, Erming-Street, and the Foſs-Way; two whereof extended croſs the Breadth of the Nation, and the other through the Length of it. Theſe and other magnificent Works were perform'd by the Soldiers and People, as well to prevent the Miſchiefs ariſing from Idleneſs, as for the Conveniency of the Romans, but not without the hard Labour of the Provincials, as the Britains grievouſly complain'd, That their Bodies were worn out and conſum'd in clearing of Woods, and making Ways over Fens and Bogs; the Labour and Charge of which Ways may be conceiv'd from the Carriage of Gravel, Sand and Stones many Miles, where the Soil it ſelf afforded no ſuch Materials. And that there were more than theſe four fam'd High-Ways, that Part of the Itinerary which relates to Britain, is a ſufficient Proof, where there are deſcrib'd ſixteen ſeveral Journeys in ſeveral Traverſes and Windings in the Country, out of theſe Ways; yet it is not improbable, that whereſoever theſe Ways have appear'd, or however they have been deſcribed, they might be Branches, and terminate in the great Ways. Theſe Ways had ſeveral Immunities and Privileges, where Strangers were protected from Arreſts and other Troubles; and they had many Manſions where Travellers might reſt themſelves, Inns for Reception and Entertainment, and Mutations where they chang'd their Poſt-Horſes, Waggons, and Chariots. Theſe and other Works of the Romans were ſo ſtupendious, that in theſe latter Ages, they almoſt exceed the Belief of Human Performance, and have been thought impoſſible to have been done by Men. As for Edifices and Fortifications, Beda from Gildas tells us that there were in theſe Times twenty eight moſt noble Cities in Britain, beſides innumerable Caſtles furniſh'd and fortify'd with mighty Walls, Towers, Gates and Locks. But the Nation being now abandon'd by the Romans, enervated with Luxury, and exhauſted of its braveſt Youth, ſoon became a Prey to its Barbarian Neighbours, as ſhall be ſhown in the following Hiſtory.

CHAP. II.

From the Romans first quitting their Juriſdiction of the Iſland, to the Deſtruction of Britain, or the forcing up of the Inhabitants into the Mountainous Places by the Picts, Scots and Saxons.

Containing the Space of about 186 Years.

A. D. 410. I. THE Britains for three or four hundred Years had been in a State of Subjection, but with a Mixture of many Conveniencies and Advantages; but being now acquitted of their Allegiance, and left to their own Laws and Government, they ſoon fell into greater Inconveniencies and Miſeries than ever they found from the Romans. At firſt they proceeded in their Adminiſtration with ſome Vigour and Reſolution; but as People more fond of the Name of Liberty, than apprehenſive of the Difficulties of well governing, they grew heady and violent in what they underſtood not; none were more brave and daring in Council, and none ſo fearful and relenting in Action; all underſtanding the Scheme, yet all declining the Performance. Thus in a ſhort time, when the Heat of Liberty was ſpent, and the Enemy daily encreas'd, they ſoon found their own Temper returning upon them, a Slothfulneſs of Body, and a Slaviſhneſs of Mind; and then they perceiv'd that it was not a vehement Love of Freedom could protect them, but ſuch Diligence, Wiſdom and Bravery as they wanted, ſo that they ſhrunk more wretchedly under the Burden of their own Liberty, than before under a Foreign Yoak. For being no longer able to ſupport themſelves againſt the Incurſions of the barbarous Picts and Scots, they a ſecond Time ſent mournful Letters to the Emperor Honorius, humbly imploring his Protection, and vowing perpetual Obedience to Rome, if their Enemies were once remov'd. Honorius being now more at Liberty than before, out of Compaſſion rather than Ambition, ſent them a Legion, who coming ſuddenly over made great Slaughter of the Picts, ſoon drove them beyond the Borders, and having clear'd the Frontiers, caus'd a Wall or Rampier to be built croſs the Iſland, from Sea to Sea, where Agricola and Antoninus Pius had formerly made theirs, namely between the Friths of Edenborough and Dunbritton, which might be a Terror to the Enemies, and a Defence to the Natives. But this Wall being caſt up with Turf only, and not very ſtrong, as ſoon as the Romans were departed in Triumph, the barbarous People broke it down and over-ran it, and pouring in upon the Province like a Torrent, made terrible Devaſtations, killing, burning and deſtroying whereſoever they came. The Scots, on the other ſide, out of their Carroughs, or Leather Veſſels, wherein they us'd to paſs the Iriſh Seas, landed in prodigious Swarms, and with no leſs Fury, Outrage and Cruelty, waſted all before them. So that the poor Britains were miſerably bandied between two inſolent and mercileſs Enemies, ſtriving which ſhould exceed the other in Spoil and Rapine.

Their Miſeries encreaſe.

After many Miſeries and Calamities, the Britains a third Time ſent Ambaſſadors to Rome, after the humbleſt Manner, with their Garments rent, and Duſt on their Heads, begging, That the Emperor would not permit ſo ancient a Province, and ſerviceable to the Roman State, to become a Prey and Scorn to Barbarians. Valentinian the Third then reigning, pity'd their Misfortunes, and and ſent new Forces to their Relief, which coming unexpectedly upon theſe greedy Ravagers, whoſe Minds were intent upon Spoil and Plunder, made a vaſt Slaughter among them, reſcu'd the diſtreſſed Britains, and clear'd the whole Province. Then partly at the publick Charges of the State, and partly by the Contributions of private Men, they built another Wall, not of Turf as the former, but of ſolid Stone, twelve Foot high, and eight in Breadth, with many Towers, croſſing the Iſle in a direct Line from East to Weſt, where Adrian and Severus had built theirs, from Eden to Tine, eighty Miles in Length, of which there are famous Remains to this Day, vulgarly call'd by the Name of the Picts Wall. That Part of Britain call'd Valentia was left wholly to the Enemy, and in ſeveral Parts of the Sea-Coaſts were built Towers, Forts and Block-Houſes at convenient Diſtances, to prevent all future Incurſions. Having thus ſecur'd the Nation, the Romans who came not to govern, but charitably to aſſiſt, let them underſtand, That they were not to expect that they ſhould weary themſelves with any more of ſuch laborious Expeditions for their Security; exhorting them, for the future to ſtand up in their own Defence, and couragiouſly to maintain their Country and Liberties againſt rude and barbarous People, not more powerful than themſelves, if their own Fears had not made them ſo. To which purpoſe they inſtructed them in the Arts of War, and left Patterns of their Arms and Weapons behind them, and after many encouraging Exhortations, and Lectures of Valour, to a diſpirited Auditory, gave them a final Farewel, with Intention never to return again. This laſt friendly Expedition of the Romans, which was different from thoſe in ancient Times, was under the Conduct of Gallio of Ravenna; not long before which, the Romans in the Iſle, finding all Things declining, bury'd a great Part of their Treaſure in the Earth, whereof much has been found, and more ſought for. They took their laſt leave of Britain about the Year 435, which was 488 after the firſt Entrance of Julius Cæſar; leaving a Province which was accounted the faireſt Flower in their Triumphant Garlands, and which ſome of the Emperors thought worthy of the Reſidence of the Imperial Throne.

and build the laſt Wall.

The Romans intirely abandon the Iſland.

Bede. Gildas.

II. The Romans having utterly abandon'd the Iſle, the Scots and Picts with greater Confidence than ever, like Flies and Vermin in the Heat of Summer, in prodigious Swarms iſſu'd out of their narrow Holes and Caves, and immediately ſeiz'd on all the Country as far as the Wall, and without Reſiſtance took Poſſeſſion of it. In the mean Time, the Guards on the Wall, like idle Spectators with cowardly Hearts ſtood trembling upon the Battlements, as tho' they were plac'd there rather to view their Loſſes than revenge them. Thus ſtanding Day and Night with Weapons in their Hands, they tamely ſuffer'd the half-naked Picts from below with their Engines and long Hooks to pluck them down headlong, and daſh them againſt the Ground. So that in a ſhort Time, the Wall and Frontier Towns being deſerted, the Inhabitants betook themſelves to Flight, which yet could not long ſecure them, for the Barbarians purſuing them, a freſh Slaughter immediately follow'd more bloody than the former; and what ſtill added to their Misfortunes, being tormented with Famine, to get Subſiſtance they were conſtrain'd to rob and pillage each other; for thoſe who had fled from the Enemy in the North, being unable to pay for their Quarters in the Southern Parts, ſeiz'd on what they could find. From whence aroſe new Miſchiefs and Diſcords among themſelves, and thence Civil Wars; for this Nation, as Gildas obſerves, tho' feeble in repelling foreign Enemies, yet in Domeſtick Conteſts were very hardy and obſtinate. And now whilſt they wore themſelves out with continual Acts of Hoſtility, the Famine became general, and rag'd to that degree, that thoſe half-ſtarv'd People that remain'd were forced to maintain their Lives by Hunting, and ſuch like Prey as the wild Foreſts would afford. In the Time of theſe great Troubles and Calamities in the State, there happen'd new Diviſions in the Church, by means of Agricola, Diſciple to

The Nation in great Diſtreſs.

The Church disturbed with Pelagianism.

Pelagius a Monk, ſometime of Bangor in Flintſhire, who propagated his Hereſie here to the great Diſturbance of the weak Chriſtians, who not being able to withſtand his Errors, call'd in to their Aſſiſtance Germanus Biſhop of Auxerre, and Lupus Biſhop of Tryes in Gaul. Theſe two coming into Britain, by aſſiduous Preaching in Churches, Fields and Streets, and as ſome write by working of Miracles, confirm'd many in the Faith, regain'd many more, and laſtly in publick Diſputation at Verulam confuted the Chief of the Hereticks.

A. D. 446. And now the miſerable Remains of the Britains being harraſs'd by their Enemies, and afflicted with all ſorts of Calamities, addreſs'd themſelves by doleful Letters to the renown'd Ætius, the Roman Lieutenant in Gaul, who had by ſeveral famous Succeſſes, for a Time, repell'd the Violence of the Gothick Arms. They began in theſe Words, To Ætius, thrice Conſul; The Groans of the Britains. After which, they thus complain'd: The Barbarians drive us to the Sea, and the Sea drives us back to the Barbarians; between which we have only the Choice of theſe two Deaths, either to be ſlaughter'd by one, or drown'd by the other. And the more to move Compaſſion they further urg'd, We the poor Remnant of the Britains, and your Vaſſals, beſides the Enemy, are puniſh'd by Famine and Mortality, which at this time violently rage in our Land. Withal they us'd ſeveral Arguments to engage him to come over, particularly, That it was the Romans Occaſions, not their own, that had reduc'd them to theſe Extremities; ſince the Strength of the Britiſh Youth had been exhauſted in their Service, and the Land left defenceleſs to ſupport the Grandure of the Empire. And beſides the Loſs of their Men, their Wealth had been conſum'd in maintaining ſo many Legions in foreign Service, and their Corn ſpent in ſupplying the Roman Provinces abroad. They receiv'd no Anſwer to theſe urgent Petitions, for the Empire being grievouſly infeſted with Huns, Goths and Vandals, was not in any Condition to afford them Relief; inſomuch that weary'd out with continual Complaints, and the Famine daily encreaſing amongſt them, like Men in a deſperate Condition, to get Suſtenance, ſome yielded themſelves to the Diſpoſal of the Enemy, whilſt others more hardy and reſolute, ſupported themſelves with what the Woods and Foreſts would afford, and oftentimes as their Neceſſities urg'd, or Advantage united them, would make Sallies upon their Enemies, and that with good Succeſs; led on, as may be conceiv'd, by ſome worthy Commander, who adviſ'd them not to confide in their own Power, but in the Divine Aſſiſtance.

Their Miſeries encreaſe.

Their Enemies give them ſome Eaſe.

The Scots and Picts finding ſuch ſtout Reſiſtance where they leaſt expected it, for a while retir'd home, the former into Ireland, and the latter to their new Habitations about the Wall, and excepting a few Inroads about the Borders, were not very burdenſom; ſo that the Britains, eas'd from their cruel Enemies, began again to cultivate the Land, which after a long Diſcontinuance, yielded ſuch a vaſt Increaſe, as in no Age had been remember'd. But the Miſchiefs of Famine being cured, others more virulent broke out, as Riot, Luxury and Wantonneſs, the uſual Attendants of Plenty and Opulence, and with them all the Vices incident to human Nature. But what Gildas ſays principally conduc'd to the Corrupting of Affairs, and the Subverſion of all Piety in the Land, was the Hatred of Truth, and the Maintainers of it, the Love of Lies, and the Forgers of them. Evil was call'd good, and Good evil; to be lewd was honourable, to be virtuous diſgraceful; being blind themſelves, they became Haters of the Light; and the Meaſures of their Actions were what was moſt pleaſing to themſelves. All Things were tranſacted directly contrary to the publick Welfare and Safety, not only of the Laity, but alſo the Clergy; and thoſe who ſhould have been Examples of Virtue, often prov'd the Ring-leaders of Vice. Many of them were Lovers of Wine and Drunkenneſs, wallowing in which Sea they became ſtupid and inſenſible; others ſwell'd with Pride became envious and litigious, indiſcreet and incompetent Judges of what in the common Practice of Life was good or evil, lawful or unlawful. Thus wretchedly qua-lify'd both Prieſts and People, they reſolv'd to chuſe ſeveral Kings of their own; but, as Gildas proceeds in his mournful Story, Kings were anointed not according to Divine Approbation, but by the Voices and Suffrages of ſuch as were more cruel than others, and again as ſuddenly depos'd and murder'd by their Electors, in order to ſet up others more fierce and tyrannical: But if any of their Princes appear'd milder, and more inclinable to good Counſel, the Hatred of all Men was levell'd againſt him, as the Subverter of his Country.

They chuſe ſeveral Kings.

Beda. Gildas. Thus Affairs proceeded in the State, and no leſs Commotions enſu'd in the Church; for Pelagianiſm ſpreading again in the Country, the Britiſh Clergy, unable to withſtand it, a ſecond Time begg'd the Aſſiſtance of Germanus out of Gaul. He with Severus, a Diſciple of his former Aſſociate Lupus, coming into the Iſland, and finding that the Generality was not infected with the Hereſie, would not ſtand to diſpute as formerly, but finding the Heads and Teachers of this new Doctrine, adjudg'd them to Exile; who being by the ſecular Power deliver'd over to him, were convey'd beyond Sea, where he diſpos'd of them in ſuch Places as they could neither infeſt others, nor conſult with their Teachers to confirm themſelves. This Germanus is ſaid to have ſucceſsfully aſſiſted the Britains againſt their Enemies, and to have obtain'd an extraordinary Victory. But however, ſoon after his Departure, the Britains receiv'd News that the Scots and Picts were returning with greater Preparations than ever, that they threaten'd the Deſtruction of the whole Land, deſigning to plant themſelves from one End to the other. But before their Arrival, as if the Inſtruments of Divine Vengeance were contending which ſhould firſt deſtroy a wicked Nation, the Reſidue that had been left by the Sword and Famine, were now almoſt ſwept away by a dreadful Peſtilence, inſomuch that the Living were ſcarce ſufficient to bury the Dead. But for the preſent, as one Evil drives off another, the deſtroying Plague preſerv'd the Land from the more barbarous Invaders, who dreading the Contagion durſt not engage too far in the Inland Countries; but as ſoon as the Infection ceas'd, the Enemy ſoon advanc'd with mercileſs Fury, and enter'd as far as Stamford in Lincolnſhire.

Pelagianiſm extirpated from the Iſland

The Picts and Scots afreſh invade the Land.

Ibid. Vortigern was then chief King of the Britains, a haughty and inſolent Prince, neither wiſe in Counſel, nor experienc'd in War, yet doted on by the People, for his Vices ſo agreeable to their own; heedleſs of the common Danger, and eſteeming the publick Treaſury as a Fund only to ſatisfie his Luſts and Extravagancies. But being awaken'd with the Clamours of the People, he ſummon'd a grand Council, to provide againſt the frequent Incurſions of the Enemy; where all being in a manner infatuated, they agreed upon ſuch a Defence as afterwards prov'd the Deſtruction of their Country, which was that the Heathen Saxons, then hateful to God and Man, whom abſent they dreaded like Death it ſelf, ſhould be ſent for to repel the Northern Nations; which ſeems to have been ordain'd by Divine Providence, to take a full Vengeance on an impious Nation. At preſent the Expedient ſeem'd ſpecious, to moſt Men, becauſe the Saxons were then a powerful Nation, and terrible to all others; and Ambaſſadors were immediately diſpatcht into Germany, repreſenting the Britains Requeſts to the Saxons, and promiſing them very advantagious Conditions, if they would come over to their Aſſiſtance. The Saxons were highly pleas'd with the Propoſal, and their Country being then over-charg'd with People, they immediately yielded to their Requeſt; and being as is ſaid choſen out by Lot, were put on board three long Ships or Veſſels, call'd in their Language Chiules, under the Conduct of Hengiſt and Horſa, two Brothers, deſcended from that ancient Woden, from whom all the Royal Family of the Saxons derive their Pedigree. Theſe Leaders, with about fifteen hundred Followers, arriving in Britain, were welcom'd with great Applauſes both from the Prince and People, and had the Iſle of Thanet, where they landed, allow'd them for their Habitation; and a League was immediately made with them, where the one Part ſtipulated to defend the Britains Country, the other that beſides their Place of Abode, they ſhould receive ſufficient Pay and Rewards for their Services done them. By this means a new and great Change happen'd in Britain, which now began in the Year 449, and twenty fourth of Pharamond the firſt King of France, which was 39 Years after the Romans firſt quitted the Britains, and 14 after they had totally abandon'd the Iſle.

A. D. 449. III. And now a new Race of People began to inhabit this Iſland, call'd Saxons, a fierce and barbarous Nation, one Branch of thoſe Gothick Multitudes, which ſwarming from the Northern Hive, had under the Conduct of Woden poſſeſs'd themſelves of all thoſe vaſt Tracts that ſurround the Baltick Sea. Theſe inhabited, or rather committed Piracies from all the Sea-Coaſts of Germany, between the Rivers Rhine and Elbe, and alſo upon the Coaſts of the Cimbrian Cherſoneſe, ſince call'd Denmark, and had the Name of Saxons from the Gothick or Punick Word Seax, which ſignifies a Falchion, or ſhort hook'd Sword, or long Knife, which they wore as their uſual Weapons. At firſt they came over in ſmall Numbers under Hengiſt and Horſa, and joining with the Britains, prov'd very ſerviceable to them, in overthrowing the Forces of the Picts and Scots, that had made an Irruption into the Nation as far as Stamford. But in a ſhort Time, finding the Iſland to be rich and fruitful, and the Inhabitants enervated with Vice and Luxury, they ſent home to invite greater Numbers to be Sharers of their future Succeſs and Expectations. Thoſe glad of the Opportunity, readily comply'd with the Invitation, and in ſeventeen freſh Veſſels, there came great Numbers of People of three Nations in Germany, namely Saxons, Jutes and Angles, which with thoſe who were here before, made up a compleat Army. Theſe two latter People are ſuppos'd to be Branches of the Saxons, both inhabiting the Cimbrian Cherſoneſe, from whom we have ſtill the Names of Juteland and Anglen; the former being call'd Jutes from the Word Goth, and the latter Angles from the Word Angulus a Corner, as ſome conjecture, tho' of the laſt there is not much Probability.

Bede, &c.

More Saxons come over with Jutes and Angles.

Theſe laſt Supplies, according to Nennius, brought over with them Rowena, Daughter of Hengiſt, a Lady of admirable Beauty, who ſerving Vortigern with Wine at a ſplendid Entertainment Hengiſt had made for him, the Britiſh King was ſo captivated by her Charms, that he immediately offer'd to make her his Wife. Hengiſt with a ſubtle Modeſty declin'd what he moſt deſir'd, alledging it was too great an Honour; but finding the King urgent, and that he was willing to reward him with a conſiderable Share of his Dominions, after a private Conſultation, he gave him his Daughter, and receiv'd all Kent for a Gratuity, which before had been well govern'd by one Gorvagus. Vortigern was ſo enamour'd with his new Bride, that he not only divorc'd his former Wife, by whom he had ſeveral worthy Sons, but alſo ſuffer'd himſelf to be ſo prevail'd upon by his Father-in-Law, as to ſend for more Saxons into the Northern Parts, under Octa and Ebuſa, Son and Nephew to Hengiſt, upon the ſpecious Notion of ſecuring thoſe Parts, as Hengiſt did the Southern. Accordingly with forty Veſſels they coaſted about Britain, and arriving at the Orcades, ſuppreſs'd both the Picts and Scots, and in that Part of the Iſland afterwards call'd Northumberland, ſeated themſelves, tho' without any Title or Name of Regality 'till near a hundred Years after, when Ida erected the Kingdom of Northumberland. Hengiſt ſtill made the beſt uſe of the King's Imprudence, and by degrees ſent for more Men and Ships, 'till at length the Countries from whence they came were almoſt left without Inhabitants; and now being ſufficienly encreas'd in Number and Power, they wholly planted the Country of Kent with Jutes, as alſo they did ſome others with Saxons and Angles.

and the Northern Parts to Octa and Ebuſa.

The Confluence of ſuch numerous Troops into the Iſle ſoon became a Terror to thoſe who invited them over, and now began to find Occaſions of Quarrels with their Entertainers; and firſt they demanded larger Allowances of Corn and Proviſions, declaring, if they were not ſupply'd, they would break the League,

League, and waſte the whole Country. The Britains civilly refuſing their Demands, deſir'd them to return home, ſince their Numbers were encreas'd beyond what they were able to maintain. Whereupon the Saxon Commanders, reſolving to proceed to the Extremity, ſecretly made a Peace with the Picts, and ſuddenly turn'd their Arms againſt their Allies, waſting the Country with Fire and Sword, from the Eaſtern to the Weſtern Sea, after a barbarous and unheard of Manner: The Stately Buildings, as well publick as private, were demoliſhed; the Chriſtian Prieſts were commonly ſlain at the very Altars, and the Biſhops maſſacred without Reſpect, together with great Numbers of People, ſo that the Living were ſcarce ſufficient to bury the Dead. Whilſt ſome of the miſerable Remains of the Britains, being taken among the Mountains, were ſlain in Heaps; others pinch'd by the Extremity of Famine, yielded themſelves to their Enemies, exchanging their Liberties for their Subſiſtance; others were conſtrain'd to ſeek for Refuge among foreign Nations, particularly among their Country-men in Armorica; but ſuch as remain'd at home, living in perpetual Fears, led a moſt hard and miſerable Life among the Woods and Mountains.

The Saxons turn againſt the Britains, and make a miſerable Deſtruction of them.

Nennius, &c. In the midſt of theſe Times of Confuſion and Deſolation, the Britiſh Writers tell us that Vortimer, the Son of Vortigern, a brave and valiant Youth, undertook to fight for his diſtreſſed Country, and that with great Succeſs. He thrice ſtraiten'd and beſieg'd the Saxons in the Iſle of Thanet; and when by reaſon of freſh Supplies from Saxony, they broke through and eſcap'd the Danger, he fought with them four other Battels, whereof three are ſpecify'd by Place and Circumſtance: The firſt on the River Darwent in Kent, the ſecond at Epiſford, wherein Horſa the Brother of Hengiſt, fell together with Katigern, the other Son of Vortigern. The third was in a Field by Stonar, now Folkſtone in Kent; where the Britains beat the Saxons into their Ships with ſuch Execution and Conſternation, that they ventur'd no more to land for the full ſpace of five Years. This might ſeem wholly incredible, but that Gildas tells us how, after ſuch vaſt Miſchiefs and Devaſtations, the Saxons retir'd, and as ſome ſuppoſe return'd home, notwithſtanding the ſeeming Eaſineſs of the Conqueſt. After five Years Abſence, they will have Vortimer to have dy'd, who deſir'd the People, that he might be bury'd in the Port of Stonar, being perſuaded that the ſecret Virtue of his Bones would keep off the Saxons from Landing near that Place; but they neglecting his Commands, bury'd him at Lincoln. The Tranſactions of theſe dark Times are uncertainly and variouſly related; but moſt agree that after the Death of Vortimer, in the Year 457, Hengiſt and his Son Eſk fought againſt the Britains in a Place call'd Crecanford; and overthrowing them with the Loſs of four thouſand Men, the Britains deſerted Kent, and fled to London in a great Conſternation. From which Victory, they generally date the Beginning of the Kingdom of Kent under Hengiſt, who began it about eight Years after his firſt Arrival in the Iſle, and reign'd thirty one Years after. But Vortigern ſtill maintaining the War againſt the Saxons, they took Counſel how they might intrap him and his Army, and accordingly ſent Ambaſſadors to him to offer a Peace, and to deſire that their former Amity might be renew'd. Vortigern too raſhly conſented to have an Enterview without Arms, and to meet as at an Entertainment. But the treacherous Hengiſt commanded all his Followers to have their Daggers or Seaxes in readineſs under their Garments, and that when he gave the Word Pull out your Seaxes, they ſhould then ſet upon the Britains and kill them, only they ſhould ſpare the King, and make him a Priſoner. And thus having met according to Agreement at a publick Feaſt, at firſt they convers'd after a friendly manner, 'till being heated with Wine, they proceeded to harder Expreſſions; when Hengiſt ſuddenly giving the Word, the Saxons roſe up and immediately diſpatch'd three hundred of the Britiſh Nobility. Vortigern alone being taken alive, and put in Chains, was conſtrain'd for his Ranſom to ſurrender to the Saxons all thoſe Countries which afterwards were call'd Eſſex, Middleſex and Suſſex; which ſtrengthen'd Hengiſt giſt and confirm'd him in his new Kingdom of Kent, and gave the Saxons ſuch Footing in the Iſle, that they never after could be repell'd by the Britains.

A. D. 457. IV. From this Time forwards, there never wanted a Saxon Monarch in this Iſle for many ſucceeding Centuries; yet the Britains, tho' weaken'd by all Kinds of Calamities, had ſeveral noble Struggles, and memorable Conteſts, before they were utterly driven from their Habitations. Having loſt the Flower of their Nation by this laſt and other Misfortunes, they began to reflect upon their vicious Courſes, and to betake themſelves to the Divine Aſſiſtance. And they were further encourag'd by ſome Retreat of the Saxons, and by the great Hopes conceiv'd of Aurelius Ambroſius, who being deſcended of Roman Anceſtors, and ſuch as had born Regal Dignity in the Iſland, had with great Applauſe ſucceeded Vortigern; firſt as General, and afterwards as King. Under the Conduct of this eminent Man, the Britains in a ſhort Time obtain'd a great Victory over the Saxons, as Gildas aſſures us, tho' he names not the Place. After this Victory, as others report, Ambroſius call'd the Princes and Nobility together at York, and gave Order for the repairing the Churches, which the Saxons had deſtroy'd; and that after due Care taken in other Places, he march'd to London, and then to Wincheſter and Salisbury, in all Places endeavouring to reſtore the declining State of the Church and Kingdom. He fill'd up the vacant Metropolitan Sees of York and Caer-leon, with two worthy Biſhops call'd Samptſon and Dubricius; and is ſuppos'd by ſome to have erected thoſe famous Piles of Stones in Salisbury Plain call'd Stonehenge, in honour of thoſe three hundred Noblemen maſſacred by Hengiſt. But of this, and many other Actions of Ambroſius, there is great Difference and Uncertainty.

Aurelius Ambroſius relieves the Britains.

Gild. &c.

A. D. 465. After the Britains had ſome little Reſpite from their Enemies, they fell into Civil Diſſentions among themſelves; and we are told that one of Vortigern's Sons nam'd Paſcentius, rais'd a Rebellion in the North againſt Ambroſius, but was overcome by him, and put to flight; but what happen'd to the Father is uncertain, nor can the Britiſh Writers agree either about the Time or the Manner of his Death. After eight Years Intermiſſion, we find that Hengiſt and his Son Esk again engag'd the Britains in Battel, worſted them, and took a great Booty; which Succeſs gave Occaſion to new Bodies of Saxons to come over under the Conduct of Ella and his three Sons, Cymen, Wlencing and Ciſſa. Theſe arriving in three Ships, landed at a Place call'd Cymen-ſhore in Suſſex, whereupon the Inhabitants in a great Conſternation, gather'd together in vaſt Multitudes to oppoſe them. The Saxons being tall of Stature, ſtrong and vigorous, receiv'd them ſharply who came tumultuouſly upon them; and notwithſtanding their great Numbers, put them to flight with ſuch a Slaughter as might be expected from ſo unequal an Ingagement, and drove them into a Wood, which the Saxon Chronicle calls Andredes Leage. They ſeiz'd upon all the Maritime Parts of Suſſex, and ſtill enlarg'd their Territories 'till the ninth Year after their Arrival, when the Britains found themſelves ſo nearly concern'd, that they united their Forces and bravely engag'd them near a Place call'd Mearcredes or Burnamſtede. This Victory remain'd doubtful, both Parties drawing off with great Loſs, which caus'd Ella to ſend for freſh Supplies out of his own Country, according to H. of Huntington. Not long after, Hengiſt King of Kent dy'd, in the Year 488, and was ſucceeded by his Son Esk, who reign'd twenty four Years, without endeavouring to enlarge his Dominions. In the mean Time Ella having encreas'd his Forces, proceeded with Succeſs againſt the Britains, and at length having laid Siege to a little City call'd Andredes Ceaſter, he took it, and us'd his Conqueſt with ſuch Severity that not one Perſon eſcap'd the Sword. Thus Ella, three Years after the Death of Hengiſt, began the ſecond Kingdom in the Iſle, call'd the Kingdom of the South-Saxons; peopling it with new Inhabitants, from the Country which was then old Saxony, now Holſtein in Denmark, and beſides had at his Command all thoſe Provinces, which which the Saxons had won on this ſide the River Humber. This Kingdom conſiſted of thoſe Parts of the Iſle afterwards call'd Suſſex and Surrey, and was began in the Year 491, about 34 Years after the Beginning of the Kingdom of Kent.

Sax. An. &c. Britain being now the Field of Fortune, new Adventurers came daily from Germany; particularly Count Cerdick, the tenth in Lineage from Woden, an experienc'd Soldier, who with his Son Cenrick, and ſo many Men as he could tranſport in five Veſſels, landed at a Place which from him was call'd Cerdick's Shore. Upon the firſt Appearance of their Veſſels, the Inhabitants ſtood upon their Guard, and vigorouſly oppos'd their Landing; but the Saxons ſtill advanced, and maintain'd their Ground, 'till at length, the Britains in vain reſiſting, Cerdick and his Son got Poſſeſſion of all thoſe Countries upon the Sea-Coaſts, tho' not without divers Battels. About ſix Years after, one Porta, with his two Sons Bleda and Magla, with two Veſſels arriv'd at a Place which from him is ſtill call'd Portſmouth; and without much Difficulty repelling ſuch as unadviſedly oppos'd them, and having ſlain a young Britiſh Prince, carved for himſelf and his Followers another Share out of the Country. Yet ſtill the Succeſſes of Cerdick made the Britains moſt apprehenſive, therefore ſeven Years after the Arrival of Porta, they united their Forces under the Conduct of Nazaleod, one of the greateſt of the Britiſh Kings, who is ſuppos'd to have ſucceeded Ambroſius, and to be the ſame with Uther Pendragon. Cerdick being ſenſible of his great Power, was oblig'd to ſend for Aſſiſtance to Esk King of Kent, Ella King of the South-Saxons, and to Porta and his Sons; which done, he divided his Army into two Bodies or Wings, whereof he led the Right himſelf, and committed the Left to the Conduct of his Son Cenrick. King Nazaleod, perceiving the Right to be the ſtronger of the two, turn'd his whole Strength againſt it with ſo much Fury and Execution, that after a great Slaughter he put Cerdick to flight; but purſuing with more Heat than Caution, the Left Wing commanded by Cenrick took the Advantage, and falling on his Rear renew'd the Battel with ſo much Vigour, that he recover'd all, ſlew Nazaleod on the Spot, with five thouſand of his Soldiers. From which Time, the Saxons remain'd unmoleſted for a conſiderable Space.

His Death.

After an Interregnum of about ſix Years Nazaleod or Uther was ſucceeded by the famous Arthur, ſuppos'd to be his Son, and reported to have been the moſt renowned Champion of the Britiſh Nation. So many fabulous and Romantick Things have been related of this Prince, that ſeveral have doubted whether there ever was ſuch a Perſon. But yet the Generality of Writers agree that there was ſuch a Man, and that he made a powerful Reſiſtance againſt the Pagan Saxons; but whether he was King of the Britains in General, or only King of Cornwall, is uncertain. Nennius, who liv'd about three hundred Years after him, aſſures us that he overthrew the Saxons in no leſs than twelve Battels: The firſt was fought near the Mouth of a certain River call'd Glenn; the ſecond, third, fourth and fifth, near another River call'd Dug or Duc; the ſixth at a River's ſide call'd Baſſus; the ſeventh in the Wood of Chelidon, which in Britiſh had the Name of Cattoit Celidon; the eighth near the Caſtle of Suinnion; the ninth in the City of Lergis, in Britiſh call'd Caer-leon; the the tenth near a River call'd Arderick; the eleventh upon the Hill Brenoin; and the twelfth on the Hill of Baden, near Bath. The reſt of the Acts of King Arthur are ſo improbable, that they are not worth the mentioning; nor are we certain how far the others are true. However we are told from Higden with great Probability, That King Cerdick fighting often with Arthur, tho' he was overcome, yet ſtill he came on again with new Forces; 'till Arthur being wearied out, at length gave him up Hampſhire and Somerſetſhire, which Countries he then call'd Weſt-Sexa. Whatever Oppoſition was made by Arthur, Cerdick at length prevail'd, and having got the Aſſiſtance of his Nephews Stufe and Withgar, who came over with three Ships, he gain'd ſeveral Advantages over the Britains, and after he had been twenty four Years in the Isle, he took upon him the Title of King, and founded the third Kingdom in the Nation, call'd the Kingdom of the West-Saxons. This Kingdom contain'd all the Countries of Devonshire, Dorsetshire, Somersetshire, Wiltshire, Hampshire and Barkshire, to which afterwards was added Cornwall. It was founded in the Year 519, about sixty one Years after the Saxons first Arrival in the Nation; and the Time of this Kingdom's Beginning is more observable, because at last it conquer'd all the other Saxon Kingdoms, and so obtain'd the sole Command of all England.

A. D. 519.

V. The Britains were now reduc'd to a smaller Compass of Land, yet still they wanted not Courage to oppose the common Enemy; and in the Year after Cerdick was made King, they fought a memorable Battel at Badon Hill, or Banesdown near Bath, where the Saxons were hemm'd in and entirely routed. This Battel is mention'd by Gildas, and is suppos'd to be the last of the twelve fought by King Arthur; which gave the Saxons such a Blow, that the Britains enjoy'd a long Peace after it. Yet still the Saxons daily encreasing in Numbers, continu'd to make new Incroachments, and in seven Years time founded a fourth Kingdom in Britain, call'd the Kingdom of the East-Saxons, consisting of the two Counties of Essex and Middlesex, with Part of Hartfordshire. It was begun in the Year 527, by Erchenwin the Son of Osfa, who seems to have been the only Prince who is deriv'd from one Saxnat, and not from Woden; tho' of this Prince they tell us nothing, except his Name and Pedigree, relating neither the Number of his Forces, the Place of his Landing, nor so much as the least Encounter he had with the Britains. This Kingdom being at first tributary to that of Kent, and afterwards to that of the Mercians, never came to be very considerable, tho' it had London, the Metropolis of England, under its Dominions. Nor did the Kingdom of the South-Saxons bear any great Sway after the Death of its first King Ella; but grew weaker and weaker 'till it became subject to other Kingdoms.

Gildas. Sax. An.

The fourth Saxon Kingdom in Britain. EAST-SAXONS.

The Britains had now Peace with their incroaching Neighbours; and we hear but little concerning them, but only about fifteen Years after the founding of the East-Saxon Kingdom, in the Year 542, the great King Arthur dy'd, and is suppos'd to have been succeeded by Constantine. About five Years after which, Ida the Saxon, sprung also from Woden in the tenth Descent, founded the fifth Kingdom in this Isle, call'd the Kingdom of Northumberland, as consisting of that Part of the British Province that was North of the River Humber. The Saxons had been fix'd in those Parts about ninety Years before, under Octa and Ebusa, upon a Pretence of warring against the Picts; and tho' they were so far distant from Kent, and not without sufficient Power, yet they kept themselves within Moderation, and as inferior Governors, they and their Progeny paid Obedience to the Kings of Kent, as to the elder Family: 'Till at length, following the Example of the Age, when no less than Kingdoms were the Prize of every fortunate Commander, they resolv'd to assume the Regal Title. Of whom Ida was the first, a Man who had a numerous Issue, and whose Virtues render'd him no less noble than his Birth; in War invincible, and in Peace continually tempering the Awe of Majesty, with his natural Affability. This prov'd a powerful Kingdom, and consisted of all Yorkshire, Lancashire, Durham, Cumberland, Westmorland, and Northumberland, with Part of Scotland as far as Edinburgh Frith. Within twelve Years Time, this Kingdom was divided into two Parts, one call'd Bernicia, and the other Deira.

The first Civil Wars among the Saxons.

Shortly after this Division, Ethelbert began to reign in Kent, who was the fifth King of that Country, and the first who rais'd Civil Wars and Disturbances among the Saxons themselves. At his first Entrance he was young and ambitious, and claim'd from the Priority of Time in which Hengist erected his Kingdom, a Kind of a Right over the later Kingdoms; and thereupon gave great Disturbances ſturbances to his neighbouring Princes. But he was twice defeated by them, ſo that he who at firſt was formidable, in a ſhort time became in a manner deſpicable; and Keaulin King of the Weſt-Saxons purſu'd him into his own Territories, and at Wibbandum flew Oſlac and Cnebba, two of his chief Commanders.

Gildas. By means of theſe Civil Conteſts, but chiefly by the laſt Victory at Badon-Hill, the Britains for the Space of fifty Years receiv'd no conſiderable Annoyance from the Saxons; but this long Peace they enjoy'd, by the Abuſe of Heaven's Favours, prov'd more deſtructive to them than War. For being ſuddenly rais'd from a miſerable State of Slavery, by two ſignal Succeſſes under Ambroſius and Arthur, they were taught by the Experience of either Fortune, to live in a reaſonable Decency and Order: But when the next Age, forgetting paſt Misfortunes, and only ſenſible of preſent Eaſe, ſucceeded, immediately there follow'd an apparent Subverſion of all Truth and Juſtice in the Minds of moſt Men; which in a ſhort Space became not only manifeſt, but odious to all the neighbouring Nations. Scarce the leaſt Footſtep or Impreſſion of Goodneſs was left remaining among all the Ranks and Degrees in the Land; except in ſo ſmall a Number, as to be hardly viſible in a general Corruption. Their Kings and Magiſtrates were guilty of all Kinds of tyrannous and oppreſſive Actions, and the Clergy had ſtain'd themſelves by all manner of Vices and Corruptions, being rather more ſcandalous than when firſt the Saxons enter'd. This in a Word was the State of Government and Religion among the Britains, in that long Calm of Peace which Badon-Hill had produc'd; by which means the Fruits of that Victory were of no Advantage; Cities and Towns were not inhabited as formerly, but lay in a State of Ruin and Deſolation; nor was it long before Civil Wars breaking out, brought all Things into the moſt miſerable Condition. For Britain, as at other Times, had then ſeveral Kings; five of whom, Gildas then in Armorica, boldly reproves by Name. Firſt Conſtantine, who reign'd in Cornwall and Devonſhire, a tyrannical and bloody Prince, polluted alſo with many Adulteries. In another Part, but not mention'd where, Aurelius Conanus was King, whom he charges with Adulteries and Parricide, and Cruelties worſe than the former. The third reigning in Demetia or South-Wales, was Vortipore, a Man old not only in Years, but in Adulteries, and in Governing full of Falſhood and barbarous Actions. The fourth was Cuneglas, ſuppos'd to be King of the Northern or Cimbrian Britains, a great Enemy to the Clergy, high minded, and truſting wholly to his Riches. The laſt but greateſt of all in Power was Maglocune, and greateſt alſo in Impiety, who had expell'd or ſlain many other Kings or Tyrants, and was call'd the Iſland Dragon, perhaps having his Seat in Angleſey; a profuſe Giver, a great Warrior, and of a remarkable Stature. This is the Subſtance of what we can learn of all that paſs'd among the Britains from the Time of their uſeleſs Victory at Badon, to the Time that Gildas wrot his Account, namely from the Year 520, to 571.

The horrid Corruptions of the Britains, and of their Kings.

Sax. An. &c. Not long after began the ſixth Kingdom in this Iſle, call'd the Kingdom of the Eaſt-Angles, conſiſting of thoſe Parts, ſince call'd Norfolk, Suffolk, Cambridgeſhire, with the Iſle of Ely. It was founded by Uſfa, the eighth from Woden, tho' it ſeems there were before him divers other petty Princes in Norfolk and Suffolk; but Uſfa in Strength and Policy over-pow'ring thoſe Princes, made himſelf ſole King, and govern'd with that Reputation, that H. Huntington tells us, the Kings deſcended from him were call'd Uſfings; and the Subjects of this Kingdom are the more remarkable, becauſe they afterwards gave Name to the whole Kingdom of England. And now the Saxons, who for a long Space had been out of Action, unleſs among themſelves, began afreſh to aſſault the Britains, and in a few Years Time drove them out of all they yet held on this Side of Wales. For Cuthwulf, the Brother of Keaulin, King of the Weſt-Saxons, by a Victory obtain'd at Bedanford or Bedford, took from them them four good Towns, Liganburgh, now Leighton in Bedfordſhire, Egleſburgh, now Ailesbury in Bucks, with Bennington and Igueſham, now Benſon and Eveſham in Oxfordſhire. And after ſix Years more, Keaulin and his Son Cuthwin gave them a great Overthrow at Deorham in Gloceſterſhire, ſlew three of their Kings, Comail, Condidan and Farinmaile, and took three of their chief Cities, Gloceſter, Cirenceſter and Badenceſter, or Bath. The Britains notwithſtanding, after ſome Space of Time, thinking to have outgrown their Loſſes, gather'd together and engag'd Keaulin and his Son Cutha, at Fethamleage, in which Battel Cutha was ſlain, and the Saxons oblig'd to retire; but Keaulin renewing the Fight, at length routed the Britains, and purſuing his Advantage, took many Towns, and return'd richly laden with Booty.

A. D. 585. The ſeventh Saxon Kingdom in Britain. MERCIA.

The laſt of thoſe Saxons who rais'd their own Atchievments to a Monarchy was Crida, who about this Time founded the ſeventh Kingdom in this Iſle, call'd the Kingdom of Mercia; which tho' it was laſt erected, yet was one of the largeſt of the Engliſh-Saxon Kingdoms, and alſo one of the laſt that was conquer'd by the Weſt-Saxons. It conſiſted of all the middle Parts of the Nation, which now compoſe ſeventeen Counties, namely, Gloceſterſhire, Herefordſhire, Worceſterſhire, Warwickſhire, Leiceſterſhire, Rutland, Northamptonſhire, Lincolnſhire, Huntingtonſoire, Bedfordſhire, Buckinghamſhire, Oxfordſhire, Staffordſhire, Shropſhire, Nottinghamſhire, Darbyſhire and Cheſhire, beſides Part of Hartfordſhire. And now the Britains were more preſs'd and confin'd than ever; yet before they quitted all on this Side of the Mountains, they ſhew'd ſome Remainders of their ancient Valour: For meeting with Keaulin at a Place call'd Woden's Mount in Wiltſhire, whether it were by their own Forces, or aſſiſted by ſome of the Angles, whoſe Hatred Keaulin had incurr'd, they deſtroy'd his Army, and chas'd him out of his Kingdom, who flying from thence, dy'd the next Year in great Poverty, tho' but lately he had been moſt potent and indeed ſole Monarch of all the Saxons on this ſide the River Humber. This Victory prov'd of little Advantage to the Britains; for in a very few Years, the miſerable Inhabitants, partly by the Picts and Scots, but principally by the Saxons, were gradually forc'd out of their ancient Seats, and ſuch as fled not beyond the Seas were driven to the craggy and mountainous Places in the Weſt of the Iſland, now call'd Wales, naturally fenc'd with Hills, and the Inlets of the Sea, whither their ravenous Enemies could not eaſily follow them. Some were driven into that Part call'd Cornwall, and others fled to their Countrymen in Armorica; the poor Remains that were ſcatter'd among the Saxons, were in effect made Slaves by them, and kept to the moſt ſervile Offices; from whom began Villenage in England, which laſted to the Reign of Henry the Seventh.

Sax. Ann. &c.

Thus, omitting fabulous and improbable Relations, we have repreſented the main View of what was tranſacted in Britain, ſince the Romans abandon'd it. Wherein may be obſerv'd the Miſeries and Deſolations brought by Divine Providence on a vile and degenerate Nation; driven, when nothing elſe could reform them, out of a fair and rich Country, into a mountainous and barren Corner, by Strangers and Pagans. So much more tollerable is downright Infidelity in the Eye of Heav'n, than the diſhonouring the Chriſtian Faith by ſuch Unchriſtian Works.

CHAP. III.

From the Deſtruction of Britain by the Saxons and other Nations, to the new Eſtabliſhment made by King Egbert, who became the firſt ſupreme Monarch of England.

Containing the Space of about 232 Years.

I. THE unfortunate Britains being driven out of their beſt and faireſt Habitations, Foreigners gain'd a full and entire Poſſeſſion of them, under the Names of Saxons, Jutes and Angles; tho' the moſt general Name was that of Saxons, which occaſion'd the whole Nation to be called by ſome New-Saxony. The proper Saxons had for their Share moſt of the Southern Parts of the Nation, with a little of the Eaſtern, after this diſtinguiſhed by the Names of Weſt-Sex, South-Sex, and Eaſt-Sex; the Jutes had the South-Eaſtern Parts, namely Kent, the Iſle of Wight, and Part of Hampſhire; and the Angles had the greateſt Share, viz. all the Midland and Northern Parts, with Part of the Eaſtern, diſtinguiſh'd by the Names of Eaſt-Angles, Mercian-Angles and Northumbrian-Angles. Theſe were not only ſufficient to conquer and waſte the whole Province, but even to plant and people it in a ſhort Time with numerous and new Inhabitants. So that we are now to begin with a new Body of People, and with a new State and Government of the Land; which introduc'd a general Change of Names, of Language, of Cuſtoms, of Laws, of Arms, of Diſcipline, of Poſſeſſions, of Titles, of Religion, and even of the whole Face of Nature, throughout the Nation. Upon which account we may juſtly date the Original of all theſe among us, as well as our Nation it ſelf, from theſe our Saxon Anceſtors: Britain, which was before a Roman Province, was now a Saxon Nation: The Language, which was either Latin or Britiſh, was now grown wholly Saxon or Engliſh: The Habits in Peace, and Arms in War, the Titles of Officers, and Proprietors of Lands, came to be all according to the Saxon Forms and Uſage: The Laws of this Country, which before were Roman, were chang'd now into old Saxon Cuſtoms or Conſtitutions: The Religion, which before was Chriſtian, became now Pagan, introducing the Worſhip of ſeveral Gods, particularly Woden, Thor, and Frea, whoſe Memory are ſtill preſerv'd by the common Names of three Days in the Week: And laſtly the Land it ſelf, which before had been divided into Roman Provinces, was now divided into ſeven Saxon Kingdoms, govern'd by their own proper Kings. The Foundation of theſe Kingdoms have been already mention'd; but for the Reader's Eaſe, and the better clearing of the Story, it will be convenient to ſay ſomething of all in one Place, and to give a general Account of each 'till the Time of Egbert, the firſt ſupreme Monarch of this Nation. A. D. 596. The Diſtribution of the Saxons.

The firſt of the ſeven Kingdoms was that of KENT, which conſiſted of Jutes of the County of Kent, and probably ſome of Hampſhire, and had a Succeſſion of ſeventeen Kings, four Pagans, and thirteen Chriſtians, viz. Hengiſt, Eſk, Octa, Ermiric, Ethelbert, Eadbald, Ercombert, Egbert, Lothair, Edric, Withred, Edbert, Edilbert, Alric, Edilbert, Cuthred, and Baldred. This Kingdom was founded in the Year 457, and ended in 823, continuing 366 Years; its Royal Seat being Canterbury, and ſometimes Reculver, near the Sea- 1. KENT.

2. SOUTH-SAXONY. Sea-Shore. The second Kingdom was that of the SOUTH-SAXONS, which consisted of the two Counties of Sussex and Surry; and this being mostly under the Power of the Kings of Kent and the West-Saxons, we find but five Kings, two Pagans, and three Christians, viz. Ella, Cissa, Ethelwolf, Berthrum and Authum. This Kingdom was founded in the Year 491, and ended in 600, continuing 109 Years; its Royal Seat being Cissancester, now Chichester.

3. WEST-SAXONY. The third Kingdom was that of the WEST-SAXONS, consisting of six Counties, viz. Devonshire, Dorsetshire, Somersetshire, Wiltshire, Hampshire and Barkshire, besides Cornwall, which was afterwards added to it, and had a Succession of sixteen Kings before Egbert, five Pagans, and eleven Christians, viz. Cerdic, Kenric, Ceaulin, Ceolric, Ceolwulf, Cynegils cum Quincelm, Kenewalch cum Sexburge, Eskwine, Kentwine, Cedwalla, Ina, Ethelheard, Cuthred, Sigebert, Cynewulf, and Birthric. This Kingdom was founded in the Year 519, and continu'd 'till the Time of Egbert, 283 Years; its Royal Seat being Ventceaster, now Winchester.

4. EAST-SAXONY. The fourth Kingdom was that of the EAST-SAXONS, which consisted of the two Counties of Essex and Middlesex, with the South Part of Hartfordshire, being generally tributary to Kent and Mercia, and had a Succession of twelve Kings, two Pagans, and ten Christians, viz. Erchenwin, Sledda, Sexred cum Fratris Sigebert the little, Sigebert the good, Swithelm, Sigher cum Seba, Sigehard cum Swanfred, Osfa, Selred and Swithred. This Kingdom was founded in the Year 527, and ended in 747, continuing 220 Years; its Royal Seat being London.

5. NORTHUMBERLAND. The fifth Kingdom was that of NORTHUMBERLAND, which consisted of Angles, and of six Counties, viz. Torkshire, Lancashire, Durham, Cumberland, Westmorland and Northumberland, with Part of Scotland as far as Edinburgh Frith. For above a hundred Years this Kingdom was divided into two, namely Bernicia in the North, and Deira in the South, and had a Succession of twenty one Kings, besides five in Deira, four Pagans, and seventeen Christians, viz. Ida, Ella, Edelric, Edelfrid, Edwin, Oswald, Osmy, Egfrid, Alfrid, Osred, Kenred, Osric, Ceolwulf, Eadbert, Osulf, Ethelwald, Alured, Ethelred, Alfwold, Osred and Ethelred. This Kingdom was founded in the Year 547, and ended in 792, continuing 245 Years, besides an Interregnum of 33 Years after; its Royal Seat being the City of York.

6. EAST-ENGLAND. The sixth Kingdom was that of the EAST-ANGLES, which consisted of the three Counties of Cambridge, Norfolk and Suffolk, and had a Succession of fourteen Kings, four Pagans, and ten Christians, viz. Usfa, Titylus, Redwald, Eorpwald, Sigebert, Egric, Anna, Ethelherd, Ethelwald, Aldulf, Elfwald, Beorne, Ethelred and Ethelbert. This Kingdom was founded in the Year 575, and ended in 792, continuing 218 Years; its Royal Seat being Domoc or Dummoc, now Dunwich in Suffolk, and sometimes St. Edmund's Bury.

7. MERCIA. The seventh and last Kingdom was that of MERCIA, which consisted of Angles, and of sixteen Counties, viz. Glocestershire, Herefordshire, Worcestershire, Warwickshire, Leicestershire, Rutland, Northamptonshire, Lincolnshire, Huntingtonshire, Bedfordshire, Buckinghamshire, Oxfordshire, Staffordshire, Shropshire, Nottinghamshire, Darbyshire and Cheshire, besides Part of Hartfordshire, and had a Succession of fifteen Kings before the Reign of Egbert, and six after, four Pagans, and seventeen Christians, viz. Crida, Wibba, Ceorl, Penda, Peada, Wulfer, Ethelred, Kenred, Ceorlred, Ethelbald, Beornred, Osfa, Egfrid, Kenulf, Kenelm, Beornwulf, Ludecom, Withlaf, Bertulf, Burtred and Ceolwulf. This Kingdom was founded in the Year 585, and ended in 874, continuing 289 Years; its Royal Seat being Lincoln. The whole Number of the Saxon Kings before the Reign of Egbert, and a little after, was a hundred and eleven, of which twenty five were Pagans, and eighty six Christians. This Establishment of the seven Kingdoms is generally call'd by the Name of the HEPTARCHY.

As

As to the Lives and Actions of these several Monarchs, during the Heptarchy, they have been so exceeding lamely and confus'dly transmitted to us, that we can give but little Satisfaction to a curious Reader. We find a short and broken Account of many of them, and that after they had dispossess'd the miserable Britains, having leisure to survey each others Greatness, they fell into mutual Emulations and Wars among themselves; so that in the Consequence whosoever had most Power, was generally reputed and acknowledg'd King of most if not all the rest. Of these, Ethelbert King of Kent, in the Beginning of this Period, was the most considerable and powerful Monarch, who tho' he had been unsuccessful in his juvenile Attempts, had now by his Conduct and Policy reduc'd all the Kingdoms on the South Side the Humber to his Devotion. And tho' he was a Pagan, to advance his Grandure, he marry'd Bertha, the King of France's Daughter, with this Article, that she should have the free Exercise of the Christian Religion, under the Care and Instruction of Lethard a Bishop, who was sent by her Parents along with her. This prov'd one Step towards the displaying the Light of the Gospel to a rude and Heathen People; and about the same Time there happen'd a remarkable Transaction in Foreign Parts, which being pursu'd, by Degrees brought this great Work to the full Perfection. But before we mention this happy Change of Religion among the Saxons, it may not be amiss to observe, That there were yet remaining among the Britains in Wales, many Bishops, Abbots, Priests, Religious Persons and Monasteries; and at the Command of Oudoceus Bishop of Landaf, there were at that Place three Synods conven'd, in which three British Princes, Mouric, Moreant and Guidnirth, were excommunicated for Murders, and compell'd to expiate these Scandals by Alms, Prayers and Fastings.

1. ETHELBERT of Kent chief Monarch.

Beda. The first Beginning of Christianity among the Saxons, as we are inform'd from Beda, was occasion'd by this Accident: The Northumbrians had now a Custom among them of long Continuance of selling their Children and other Relations into foreign Lands; of which Number some beautiful Youths were expos'd to sale at Rome, whose fair and graceful Countenances invited Gregory Arch-Deacon of that City, among others, to demand who and what they were. Being inform'd that they were Angles of Deira, and Pagans by Education, pitying their Condition, he with a deep Sigh cry'd out What a deplorable Thing it was that the Father of Darkness should be Master of such Angelick Faces! and immediately obtaining Licence of Pope Benedict, he began his Journey towards Britain; but the Citizens of Rome, who could not suffer the Absence of so vigilant a Pastor, caus'd him to be recall'd. But Gregory not long after being advanc'd to the Papacy, in his fourth Year, being mov'd, as Beda tells us, by a divine Impulse, he sent Austin a Monk, whom he design'd for Bishop of the English Nation, with other zealous Monks along with him, to preach the Gospel in Britain. These being on their Journey, discourag'd by some Reports, or their own carnal Fears, dispatch'd Austin in the Name of all the rest, beseeching Gregory that they might return home, and not be sent on an Expedition so full of Hazard, to a fierce and infidel Nation, whose Language they understood not. But the Pope immediately sent back their Messenger with pious exhortary Letters to them, 'not to be discourag'd by vain Reports, but 'vigorously to pursue the great Work they had undertaken, since their Labours 'would be attended with perpetual Glory; and that they should obey Austin, 'whom he had appointed for their Abbot. Besides which Letters the Pope also wrote to Eutherius, Arch-Bishop of Arles, wherein he recommended them to his Care and Protection, and that he would furnish them with all Necessaries; also recommending to him Candidus a Presbiter, whom he had sent to receive and dispose of the Church's Revenues in France.

The Beginning of Christianity among the Saxons.

Austin the Monk sent into England.

Beda. Austin and his Companions being thus confirm'd by the Pope's Exhortations, proceeded in their Voyage, and landed at the Isle of Thanet near Kent, with about forty Persons, together with some Interpreters of the French Nation. At their first Arrival, Auſtin ſent a ſurpriſing Meſſage to King Ethelbert, informing him, That he came from Rome, and had brought the Promiſe of Eternal Felicity to all that would receive it; which when the King heard, he civilly order'd them to remain in the Place where they landed, and that they ſhould be plentifully ſupply'd with all Neceſſaries, 'till he had determin'd how to receive them. After a few Days, paſſing into the Iſland, the King choſe a Place to meet them under the open Sky, poſſeſs'd with an old Perſuaſion, that all Spells and Inchantments, if they ſhould uſe any, would be unavailable, if they were not within Doors. But Auſtin and his Companions, arm'd with the Divine Power, and bearing for his Banner a ſilver Croſs, with the painted Image of our Saviour, advanc'd ſlowly, ſinging their ſolemn Litanies, and praying for the Salvation of thoſe to whom they were ſent. Then ſitting down with the King, and preaching the Word of Life to him and his Nobles, the King with no ſmall Courteſie told them, That the Doctrines and Promiſes they brought were indeed ſpecious and inviting, but being new and uncertain, he could not ſuddenly conſent to quit the Religion of his Anceſtors; but becauſe they were Strangers, and came from far Countries purely to communicate ſuch Things as they believ'd to be moſt valuable, they ſhould receive all Protection and neceſſary Accommodations; nor would he prohibit them from gaining what Perſons they could, to the Belief of their Religion. And accordingly he allotted them their Reſidence in his Royal City of Daroverne or Canterbury, made proviſion for their Maintenance, and gave them free Liberty to preach their Doctrine where they pleas'd.

He is civilly receiv'd by Ethelbert.

Being ſettled in the Place provided for them, they began to imitate the Lives of the Primitive Chriſtians, applying themſelves to conſtant Prayers and Faſting, eſpecially to Preaching to all that would hear them, deſpiſing the Riches of this World, being content with the bare Neceſſaries of Life, and carefully living up to the Rules they taught others. The Succeſs of which was, That many believ'd, and were baptiz'd, admiring the Simplicity of their Lives, as well as the Purity of their Doctrine. They firſt held their Religious Aſſemblies at an old ruinous Church on Eaſt-ſide of the City, built in Honour of St. Martin, when the Romans inhabited Britain, in which the Queen uſually perform'd her Devotions; 'till the King himſelf, being convinc'd by the Purity of their Lives, and by their Miracles, as our Author aſſures us, they obtain'd a full Liberty of Preaching and Building of Churches. The Converſion and Baptiſm of this Prince caus'd great Numbers to repair from all Parts to hear the Goſpel, and leaving their Heatheniſm, join'd themſelves to the Church of Chriſt; ſo powerful a Motive is the Example of a Prince to his Subjects. The King ſhew'd a great Satisfaction at the Faith and Converſion of any of his Subjects, and cheriſh'd all ſuch as believ'd with a more tender Regard; yet nevertheleſs he would not compel any to receive Chriſtianity, being taught by the Authors of his Salvation, That the Service of Chriſt ought to be voluntary, and not conſtrain'd: Nor was it long before he granted his Teachers Places fitting for their Function, in his City of Canterbury, and conferr'd upon them large Immunities and Poſſeſſions.

A. D. 598. Auſtin made Arch-Biſhop of the Engliſh.

In the following Year, when Auſtin had converted the greateſt Part of the Kentiſh Nation, he paſs'd over into France, where according to the Commands of Pope Gregory, he was ordain'd Arch-Biſhop of the whole Engliſh Nation, by Eutherius Arch-Biſhop of Arles. Then returning to Kent, he ſent two of his Aſſociates nam'd Laurence and Peter to Rome, acquainting the Pope of his good Succeſs in this Iſle, and deſiring to be reſolv'd in certain Theological, or rather Levitical Queſtions, ſome of which were very peculiar, and the Anſwers no leſs. And now being exalted to Archiepiſcopal Authority he recover'd from the Ruins and other profane Uſes a Chriſtian Church in Canterbury, anciently built by the Romans; which he dedicated by the Name of Chriſt's Church, and appointed it as a See for himſelf and his Succeſſors. He likewiſe founded a Monaſtery

Bede.

Monaſtery towards the Eaſt, not far from the City, where alſo King Ethelbert by his Perſuaſion built and endow'd the Church of St. Peter and St. Paul; in which the Bodies of St. Auſtin himſelf, and all the ſucceeding Biſhops of Canterbury, as alſo of the Kings of Kent, ſhould be interr'd. Within a Year or two after, Auſtin informing the Pope that there was a Want of Preachers in this Iſle, Gregory ſent over ſeveral, particularly Mellitus, Juſtus, Paulinus and Ruſinian, and with them an Archiepiſcopal Pall, Altar Cloaths, Sacerdotal Veſtments, Holy Veſſels, divers Relicts, and a great many Books; and gave Auſtin Power to ordain twelve Suffragan Biſhops under him, and an Arch-Biſhop of York, when that City and Country adjoining ſhould receive Chriſtianity; ſo that he alſo ſhould be a Metropolitan, and have twelve Biſhops under him, to whom he ſhould likewiſe ſend a Pall, but ſo as to be under the Direction of Auſtin. With theſe alſo he ſent Letters both to Auſtin and to King Ethelbert, containing many pious Inſtructions; which ſhews that the primitive Chriſtian Temper had not yet left the Biſhops of Rome, tho' infected with ſome Superſtitions. As the Number of Chriſtians encreas'd, Auſtin ordain'd two of his Aſſiſtants for Biſhops, Mellitus and Juſtus, and ſent them both to diſtant Parts. The former by Preaching converted the Eaſt-Saxons, over whom Sebert the Son of Sleda, by Permiſſion of Ethelbert, being born of his Siſter Ricula, then reign'd. To congratulate whoſe Converſion, Ethelbert built them the great Church of St. Paul's in London to be their Biſhop's Cathedral; and Juſtus alſo had another built at Rocheſter, dedicated to St. Andrew, and endow'd by the ſame King with large Poſſeſſions.

The East-Saxons converted.

Beda, &c. II. Hitherto Auſtin had labour'd only to convert Pagans and Infidels; but now by vertue of his Archiepiſcopal, or rather Legatine Authority conferr'd on him by the Pope, he took upon him to make a general Viſitation of his Province: And coming near the Borders of Wales, and aſſiſted by the Power of King Ethelbert, he ſummon'd all the Britiſh Biſhops of the adjoining Province to a Synod, at a Place on the Borders of Worceſterſhire, in Beda's Time call'd Auſtin's Oak; and began to perſuade them by brotherly Admonitions to conform with the Romiſh Church in celebrating of Eaſter, and ſome other particular Points. But not prevailing with them either by Promiſes or Threats, he appeal'd to a Miracle, as Beda aſſures us, and reſtor'd a blind Man to Sight, to whom the Britains could give no Relief. Being ſomewhat mov'd at this, tho' not inclinable to recede from their ancient Uſages, without further Conſultation, they requeſted a ſecond Meeting; to which repair'd ſeven Britiſh Biſhops, with many other learned Men, eſpecially from the famous Monaſtery of Bangor, where Dinooth was Abbot, in which were ſaid to be ſo many Monks living by their own Labour, that being divided under ſeven Rectors, each Diviſion had no leſs than three hundred. One who led an Anchoret's Life amongſt them, ſtaid behind, and by his Wiſdom effected more than thoſe who went: For being reputed as an Oracle, and demanded how they might know whether Auſtin was a Man from God, he anſwer'd, That if they found him meek and humble, they ſhould earneſtly hearken to him, as having the trueſt Marks of Chriſt's Diſciple; but if he carry'd himſelf with Pride and Haughtineſs, they ſhould not regard him, for he could not be then a Man from God: Adding alſo ſome Marks by which they might know whether he was a meek or a proud Perſon.

Auſtin is oppoſed by the Britiſh Biſhops in Wales.

Beda. With this Advice they haſted to the Place of Meeting; where Auſtin carrying himſelf as the Pope's Legate, and their Metropolitan, as they drew near ſat ſtill and pontifically in his Chair. This gave immediate Offence to the Britains, who according to Advice rejected his Propoſals; and tho' he demanded their Obedience in only three Particulars, namely in the Time of the Celebration of Eaſter, in the Manner of Baptiſm according to the Romiſh Church, and in aſſiſting them to preach to the Engliſh Saxons, promiſing them to forbear them in other Things, tho' contrary to the Cuſtoms us'd by him; yet they utterly refus'd to comply in any Thing, or to acknowledge him for their Arch-Biſhop; declaring among themſelves, That if he will not riſe to us now, how haughtily will he treat us, if we were under his Power and Subjection? And for a final Anſwer to him Dinooth of Bangor in the Name of all the reſt, declar'd, That as to the Subjection he requir'd, he might be aſſur'd, That in the Bond of Love and Charity, they were all Subjects and Servants to the Church of God, to the Pope of Rome, and every good Chriſtian by Word and Deed to help them forward in the Way to Life. But other Obedience than this they did not know to be due to him whom he term'd The Pope; which Obedience they were always ready to pay to him and every Chriſtian: Beſides they were govern'd under God by the Biſhop of Caer-leon, who was to overſee them in all ſpiritual Matters. To whom Auſtin is reported thus threatningly to have denounc'd againſt them; Since ye refuſe to accept of Peace with your Brethren, ye ſhall have War from your Enemies; and ſince ye will not preach the Word of Life to whom ye ought, from their Hands ye ſhall meet with Death. Auſtin liv'd not to ſee the Iſſue of his Prediction, but dy'd in the following Year 605, being ſucceeded in his Archbiſhoprick by Laurentius, a Roman whom he had ordain'd in his Life Time, to ſupport the weak Eſtate of a new eſtabliſh'd Church. Two Years after the poor Britains met with the Puniſhment ſuppos'd to have been foretold by Auſtin, from Ethelfrid King of Northumberland, who meeting them with an Army near Cheſter, not only deſtroy'd great Numbers of them, but of twelve hundred Monks, who ſtood near to pray for the Succeſs of the Britiſh Arms, ſcarce fifty eſcap'd.

Auſtin dies. Hunting.

Not long after the Death of Auſtin, King Ethelbert ſummon'd a Mycel Synod, or great Council, as well of the Clergy as Laity, wherein by their common Conſent and Approbation, all the Grants and Charters of this King, whereby he had ſettled great Endowments on the Church of Canterbury and others, were confirm'd, with heavy Imprecations againſt any who ſhould afterwards dare to infringe them. This Prince alſo gave his People ſeveral Laws and Statutes, by the Advice of his wiſe Men, according to the Example of the Romans, written in the Saxon Tongue, and obſerv'd in Beda's Time; wherein his great Care was to puniſh ſuch as had ſtolen any Thing from the Church or Church-Men, thereby ſhewing how gratefully he receiv'd from them the Chriſtian Faith. In his Reign Chriſtianity daily encreas'd in this Iſland; and in the Year 608, Laurence Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury brought the Scots to ſome Conformity with him, eſpecially in the Obſervation of Eaſter. In 611, this King's Nephew Sebert King of the Eaſt-Saxons, founded the Church and Abby of Weſtminſter, and Melleus the Biſhop of London dedicated it to St. Peter. Ethelbert omitted nothing that might advance the glorious Cauſe of Chriſt, and encreaſing in Piety, he dy'd in the Year 616, after he had been near twenty Years a Chriſtian, twenty three chief Monarch of England, and fifty ſix King of Kent.

Chriſtianity encreaſes.

Ethelbert dies.

Ethelbert was ſucceeded in his Kingdom by his Son Eadbald, who at firſt us'd his Endeavours to extinguiſh Chriſtianity; not only relapſing to Paganiſm, but alſo that which Paganiſm was wont to abhor, marrying his Father's ſecond Wife. This Wickedneſs ſoon diſcover'd what Multitudes, who for Fear or Countenance of the former King had profeſs'd Chriſtianity, now returning as eagerly to their old Idolatry. Nor was this Apoſtacy confin'd to this Province, but ſoon ſpread it ſelf over to the Eaſt-Saxons; occaſion'd and promoted by the Death of their Chriſtian King Sebert; whoſe three Sons not being in his Life Time brought to Baptiſm, now after his Deceaſe eſtabliſh'd the free Exerciſe of Idolatry; and not ſo ſatisfy'd, they ſet themſelves to ſome open Profanation of the other Sacrament. Coming therefore into the Church where Mellitus was adminiſtring, they in Scorn requir'd him to deliver to them unbaptiz'd the Conſecrated Bread, as he had done to their Father; and upon Refuſal, drove him him disgracefully out of their Dominions. Mellitus repair'd immediately to Kent, where finding Christianity in much the same Condition, with Justus Bishop of Rochester, left the Nation and pass'd over into France. But the Divine Vengeance soon overtook these impious Men; For Eadbald tormented with an evil Spirit, often fell into Fits of Distraction; and the Sons of Sebert, in a Battel against the West-Saxons perish'd, with their whole Army. But Eadbald, within a Year, became penitent, by Means of an extraordinary Accident that Beda relates. When Laurence Arch-Bishop of Canterbury was preparing to follow Justus and Mellitus into France, we are told that St. Peter, in whose Church he spent the Night before in Watching and Praying, appear'd to him, and to make the Vision more sensible, gave him many Stripes for endeavouring to desert his Flock: Which being shown to the King the next Morning, and the Cause of them related, Eadbald repented, in great Fear dissolv'd his incestuous Marriage, and apply'd himself to the Christian Faith more sincerely than before, together with all his Subjects. But the Londoners refusing again to receive their Bishop Mellitus, this King had not so much Power as his Father to compel them to it; yet nevertheless he and his Nation endeavour'd wholly to submit to the Divine Precepts, and built a new Church to the Honour of the blessed Virgin, which was consecrated by Mellitus.

Beda. H. Hunt. III. Upon the Death of Ethelbert, by the Mismanagement of his Son Eadbald, and other Accidents, the chief Monarchy of the English was lost wholly to the Kingdom of Kent, and fell next upon Redwald the third King of the East-Angles, who for above twenty Years had been Vice-Roy to Ethelbert. This Prince had formerly receiv'd Baptism in Kent, but returning into his Country, through the powerful Persuasion of his Queen he relaps'd to his old Superstition; and thinking to be safe, he in the same Temple erected one Altar to Christ, and another to his Idols, which stood in the Days of Beda. But as she was an Instigator to the Nation's Idolatry, so she was an accidental Instrument to the further spreading of Christianity in saving the Life of Edwin, of the Royal Blood of Northumberland; who flying from the Rage of Ethelfrid, King of that Country, receiv'd Protection in the Court of her Husband Redwald. The Northumbrians us'd both Threats and Rewards to procure him to be deliver'd up, or put to Death; but his Queen alledging the Laws of Humanity, the Trust of a Friend, and the Word of a Prince, prevail'd so far, that Redwald did not only save his Life, but assisted him in Battel, to the Destruction of his Enemies, and the regaining of the Crown of Northumberland. For upon the Return of Ethelfrid's Ambassadors, who were sent for Edwin's Ruin, he with the whole Power of the East-Angles, as an Enemy march'd towards Northumberland. Whereupon Ethelfrid with what sudden Preparations he could make, met the East-Angles almost at Nottingham, and near the River Idle, where boldly encountering the unequal Enemy, at the first Onset slew King Redwald's Son Reynhere, to the great Grief of the whole Army; who pursu'd his Revenge so warmly, that they slew King Ethelfrid in the Field, and establish'd Edwin in the Kingdom of Northumberland. By this Victory Redwald became far superior to the other Saxon Kings; and besides this Conquest of the North, had likewise all on this Side Humber at his Obedience. He reign'd successfully about six Years after, and dy'd in the Year 624, after he had been forty four Years King of the East-Angles, and eight chief Monarh of the English.

His Death.

Beda. Upon the Death of Redwald, the Monarchy reverted from the East-Angles, and was next possess'd by the Northumbrians, where it was retain'd with greater and larger Glory. For Edwin, grown potent in the Life of Redwald, after his Death became his Successor in the English Monarchy, and was the greatest King of all the Saxons; subduing all the Coasts of Britain, with the Isles of Anglesey and Man. His first Wife being dead, he became a Suiter for the Lady

3. EDWIN chief Monarch.

Lady Edelburga, Daughter of the great Ethelbert; to whoſe Ambaſſadors her Brother Eadbald return'd Anſwer, That a Chriſtian Virgin ought not to marry a Pagan. Edwin in Love with the Lady's Fame, inſiſted, That her Religion need not be any Impediment, ſince ſhe and her Attendants ſhould have the free Exerciſe of it; and further, if upon Examination he found it more excellent than his own, he himſelf would embrace it. Theſe ingenuous Offers, opening ſo fair a Way to the Advancement of Truth, were readily accepted; and Paulinus a Roman, was conſecrated Biſhop of the Northumbers by Juſtus, and ſent as a ſpiritual Guardian along with the Lady. Paulinus omitted no Occaſion to plant the Goſpel in thoſe Parts, but with ſmall Succeſs, 'till the next Year this uncommon Accident made way for it: Quincelm, one of the Weſt-Saxon Kings, jealous and envious of Edwin's Greatneſs, ſent Eumerus a deſperate Aſſaſinator to ſtab him; who, under Pretence of delivering a Meſſage, with a poiſon'd Weapon ſtruck at Edwin, whilſt he was diſcourſing with him in his Houſe, by the River Derwent in Yorſhire; which being perceiv'd by Lilla, one of the King's Attendants, with a noble Loyalty he interpos'd his own Body to receive the Blow, through which alſo it reach'd the King's Perſon, with a dangerous Wound. The Murderer being now encompaſs'd with Swords, and made more deſperate by his own Danger, ſlew another of the King's Servants in the ſame Manner. Paulinus improv'd this Opportunity, and at length obtain'd this Promiſe from him, That if Chriſt, whom he ſo magnify'd, would grant him his Recovery, and Victory over his Enemies who had thus baſely aſſaulted him, he would then become a Chriſtian; as a Pledge of which he order'd his young Daughter Eanfled to be bred up in that Religion, who with twelve others of his Family was baptis'd on Whitſunday. Being well recover'd of his Wound, to puniſh the Authors of ſo diſhonourable an Action, he march'd againſt the Weſt-Saxons; whom he ſubdu'd, put ſome to Death, pardon'd others, and return'd home Victorious.

From this Time King Edwin forſook his Idols; yet ventur'd not raſhly on Baptiſm, but ſtill conſulted with himſelf and others, who were Men of the greateſt Wiſdom; tho' Boniface the Pope, by large Letters of Exhortation both to him and his Queen, was not wanting to quicken his Belief. But while he was long delaying and deferring to compleat his Chriſtianity, Paulinus by Revelation, as was believ'd, coming to the Knowledge of a Secret which ſtrangely befel him in the Time of his Troubles, on a certain Day went in boldly to him, and laying his right Hand on the Head of the King, ask'd him, If he remember'd what that Sign meant. The King trembling, with great Aſtoniſhment fell at his Feet: Behold, ſaid Paulinus, raiſing him from the Ground, God has deliver'd you from your Enemies, and given you what you requeſted; perform now what you long ſince promis'd him, to receive his Doctrine, which if you do, he ſhall to your temporal Grandeur add eternal Felicity. Edwin being much mov'd, immediately conſulted his great Men, and propounded the Reaſons to them, that naturally might induce them to embrace Chriſtianity; to which they with no great Difficulty comply'd, and firſt of all Coifi his chief Pagan Prieſt, who alſo offer'd himſelf to deſtroy the Altars and Temples of their Gods, which he immediately effected, making ſome Amends for his teaching Men to adore them. Then Edwin, with the chief Nobility of his Nation, and many of the common People, in the eleventh Year of his Reign, were baptiz'd; after which vaſt Numbers of the Vulgar daily flock'd in to be inſtructed in the Chriſtian Religion, and to be baptiz'd, the next Rivers ſerving inſtead of Fonts, which at that Time were wanting, nor were then ſcarce any Churches built, unleſs one ſmall one at York, which Edwin caus'd to be erected of Wood, for the Solemnity of his own Baptiſm, where he fix'd Paulinus's Epiſcopal See, in the Year 627.

Blecca the Governor of Lincoln, with his Family, and moſt of that great City: In which he built a Church of Stone of curious Workmanſhip, whoſe Roof being fallen down, either by Neglect, or hoſtile Incurſions, the Walls were only ſtanding in Beda's Time. Edwin alſo ſeeking every way to propagate the Faith which with ſo much Deliberation he had receiv'd, perſuaded Eorpwald, King of the Eaſt-Angles, and Son of his Friend Redwald, to embrace the ſame Belief; who under Edwin retain'd only the Name of a King. But Eorpwald did not long ſurvive his Converſion, being ſlain in Battel by Ricbert a Pagan; whereby the People having lightly follow'd the Religion of their King, as lightly relaps'd to their old Superſtition, for above three Years after. Edwin in the mean Time, to his Faith adding Virtue, by the due Adminiſtration of Juſtice, brought ſuch a Peace and Security over all his Territories, that Beda tells us, in his Reign a Woman with a Child in her Hand might have ſafely travell'd from Sea to Sea. His Care extended to Fountains near the High-ways, where he caus'd drinking Veſſels of Braſs to be ſet upon Poſts, for the Refreſhment of Travellers, which none either out of Love or Fear would preſume to remove; and not unmindful of Regal State, either in Peace or War, he had a Royal Banner, which the Romans call'd Tufa, conſtantly carry'd before him. But his Glory declin'd on a ſudden, after he had reign'd with great Honour and Reputation, being at length ſlain in Battel with his Son Oſfrid, at a Place call'd Hethfeild, now Hatfeild in Yorkſhire, and his whole Army routed, by Cadwallon King of the Britains, and Penda the Mercian, who rebelled againſt him. This happen'd in the Year 633, in the ſixth Year of his Chriſtianity, the ninth of his Monarchy, and the ſeventeenth of his Reign; his Head being carry'd to York, was there depoſited in the Church of St. Peter, which he himſelf had began to build with Stone.

His Death.

Beda. This Overthrow prov'd pernicious both to the Church and State of the Northumbrians; for Penda being a Heathen, and the Britiſh King of a barbarous Diſpoſition, no Cruelties were omitted in the Slaughter of either Sex or Age; Cadwallon threatning to extirpate the whole Nation, tho' then made Chriſtian. For Beda tells us, that even to his Days, the Britains accounted Saxon Chriſtianity no better than Paganiſm, and held as little Communion with the one as the other. In theſe calamitous Times Paulinus was conſtrain'd to fly with Queen Ethelburga and her Children to Eadbald King of Kent, who kindly receiv'd them, and made Paulinus Biſhop of Rocheſter, where he ended his Days. And now the Kingdom of Northumberland became divided as formerly, Oſric ſeizing Deira, and Eanfrid taking Bernicia; both of whom from Chriſtians became ſuddenly Pagans. But being overtaken by God's Vengeance, neither their Lives nor this Diviſion laſted long; for Cadwallon and Penda, in the firſt Year of their Reign, found Means to cut off the one in Battel, and the other by Treachery. Cadwallon now ranging at pleaſure through both the Provinces, was at length met by the pious Oſwald, Brother to Eanfrid, who with a ſmall Chriſtian Army, unexpectedly charg'd him, and deſtroy'd both him and his ſuppos'd invincible Forces, by a little River near the ancient Picts Wall, the Place being afterwards call'd Heav'n-feild, from a Croſs reported miraculous for Cures, which Oſwald there erected before the Battel, in Token of his Faith againſt the great Numbers of his Enemies. Oſwald being the Son of Ethelfrid, by the Siſter of Edwin, eaſily reduc'd both Kingdoms of Northumberland as before into one; nor did he loſe any Part of Edwin's Dominions; but rather enlarg'd them over ſeveral Nations; ſo that he became the next chief Monarch of the Engliſh.

This Prince obtaining the Kingdom, took particular Care to inſtruct his People in Chriſtianity; ſending to the Scots, among whom he had been baptiz'd, he deſir'd ſome faithful Teacher, who might reſtore Religion in his Dominions, which the late Troubles had much impair'd; and they, ready to aſſiſt, ſent Adian a Monk and Biſhop of ſingular Zeal and Humility, with ſeveral others, others, whom at their own Desire he seated at Lindesfarne, now Holy Island. Beda says much of the Devotion, Meekness and Charity of this Prince; that he disdain'd not to be the Interpreter of Aidan, while in Scotch or bad English he preach'd to his Nobles and Servants; and that he had the Poor continually served at his Gate: Particularly at a Festival, he not only sent them his best Meats in a Silver Charger, but also order'd the Charger to be broken in Pieces and divided amongst them; which caus'd Bishop Aidan to take him by the right Hand, and to pray that That Hand might never corrupt. In the second Year of his Reign, the West-Saxons, by the Preaching of Berinus, a Bishop whom Pope Honorius had sent, were converted to the Faith with Cynegils their King; whom Oswald receiv'd out of the Font, and his Daughter in Marriage. The following Year the East-Angles were recover'd to Christianity, which for some Years past had been thrown off. But Sigebert, the Brother of Eorpwald, a most learned and pious Man, who had been taught the Christian Religion during his Exile in France, now succeeding in this Kingdom, he instructed his People in the Faith by the Preaching and Labours of Fælix a Burgundian Bishop, who fixt his See at Domoc, or Dunwich in Suffolk. In a few Years after, with the Assistance of some Teachers out of Kent, he erected a famous School, which is generally thought to be the University of Cambridge then first founded. In the Year 640, Eadbald was succeeded by his Son Ercombert in Kent, who was the first of the English Kings who commanded the destroying of Idols in all his Dominions, and the first who establish'd the Observation of Lent by an human Law and Penalty. In the mean Time Oswald, having happily reign'd eight Years, and worthy of a longer Life, met with the same Fate with Edwin, and by the same Hand; being in a great Battel defeated and slain by Penda King of Mercia, at a Place call'd Maserfield, now Oswestree in Shropshire, which as Beda tells us was noted for Miracles after his Death.

Oswald's Death.

A. D. 643. Upon the Death of Oswald, the Kingdom of Northumberland again became divided for six or seven Years; Oswy gaining Bernicia, and Oswin obtaining Deira. The former was an illegitimate Offspring, and half-Brother to Oswald, who in a few Years became the next chief Monarch of the English. But the former Part of his Reign was extreamly disturb'd by Penda King of Mercia, by the Rebellions of his natural Son Alkfrid, and by the Oppositions of Ethelwald the Son of Oswald; but most of all by the virtuous Government of Oswin of Deira, whose pious Zeal, Moderation, and princely Qualities did much eclipse his Actions, and lessen the Love and Esteem of his own Subjects. Beda speaks much of the remarkable Piety and Humility of Oswin; but his Virtues were so far from protecting him, that they gave Occasion to Oswy in the seventh Year of his Reign, to begin a fatal War with him. Oswin finding himself much exceeded in Numbers, thought it more Prudence, by dismissing his Army, to reserve himself for some better Opportunity. But committing his Person, with one faithful Attendant to the Loyalty of Earl Hunwald, his supposed Friend, he was by him treacherously deliver'd up, and slain by the Command of Oswy; whose Death in twelve Days was succeeded by that of the pious Bishop Aidan, who dy'd of Grief for the Loss of so excellent a Prince. This Fact of Oswy was so detestable to all, and became so afflicting to himself, that to expiate the Offence, a Monastery was founded upon the Place; as many the like Foundations were laid, whose Stones were thus cemented with Blood.

A. D. Oswy, upon the Death of Oswin, united both Kingdoms again, and as his Greatness encreas'd, so did his Virtues and good Actions begin to show themselves. And now Peada the Son of Penda, whose Father had made him King of a Part of his Dominions, was by Oswy's Means converted to Christianty, with his Subjects. For coming to Oswy to desire his Daughter Alfleda in Marriage, he would not consent but upon Condition, that he and all his People should embrace the Christian Faith. Therefore hark'ning to what was preach'd to him of eternal Life, and being perſuaded by Alfrid the King's Son, who had marry'd his Siſter Kyniburg, he readily agreed to turn Chriſtian, whether he obtain'd the Lady or not; and was baptiz'd with all his Followers. Upon his Return, he took with him four Presbyters to teach the People of his Province, who by their Care and Vigilance won great Numbers: Nor did Penda, tho' himſelf a Pagan, prohibit any in his Kingdom to hear or believe the Goſpel, but hated and deſpis'd all thoſe whoſe Works were not anſwerable to their Faith; condemning them for miſerable and mean Wretches, who obey'd not that God in whom they choſe to believe. About this Time, the Eaſt-Saxons, who had formerly expell'd their Biſhop Mellitus, and renounc'd their Faith, were by the Means of Oſwy thus reconverted. Sigebert the ſecond, coming to viſit Oſwy, his great Friend, was by him at ſeveral Times ſtrenuouſly diſſuaded from Idolatry, and being at length convinc'd, forſook it, and was baptiz'd. On his Return home, he took with him Kedda a laborious Preacher, afterwards made Biſhop; by whoſe Teaching, and the Aſſiſtance of others, the People were again recover'd from their Infidelity. This good Prince was afterwards murder'd by the Conſpiracy of two Earls near him, who being demanded what mov'd them to a Crime ſo heinous, return'd this barbarous Anſwer, That it was becauſe he was ſo gentle to his Enemies, as to forgive them their Injuries, as often as they beſought him. But the Occaſion of his Death is much more remarkable; for one of theſe Brothers who ſlew him, being for unlawful Wedlock ſo excommunicated by the Biſhop, that no Man might preſume to enter into his Houſe; the King not regarding the Church's Cenſure, upon an Invitation went to feaſt at his Houſe, whom the Biſhop meeting in his Return, tho' penitent and fallen at his Feet, he pronounc'd this Sentence: Becauſe thou haſt not abſtain'd from the Houſe of this excommunicated Man, in that Houſe thou ſhalt die; which happen'd not long after, God bearing Witneſs to his Miniſter, in the due Power of Church Diſcipline when ſpiritually executed on Contemners.

The Eaſt-Saxons reconverted.

Bede. Sax. An. Oſwy having reign'd about twelve Years, had now the good Fortune to ruin his chief Enemy Penda, after he had endur'd many Ravages and Devaſtations from him, and in vain offer'd large Gifts and Preſents to purchaſe his Friendſhip. Finding himſelf too weak for human Relief, he turn'd his Gifts into Vows for the Divine Aſſiſtance; and according to the uſual Zeal of thoſe Times, he devoted his Infant Daughter to perpetual Virginity, and certain large Portions of Lands for the building and endowing of Monaſteries. His Vows, as may be conceiv'd, produc'd greater Effects than his Treaties; for hereupon, he with his Son Alfred, gathering a ſmall Army, at Leeds in Yorkſhire, engag'd and defeated the whole Body of the Mercians, tho' they were thirty Times more in Number, and led on by experienc'd Commanders. The unexpected Retreat of Ethelwald the Son of Oſwald, who join'd with the Mercians, much contributed to this extraordinary Victory; which was attended with the Death of Penda himſelf, Ethelhere King of the Eaſt-Angles, and many other Commanders, who were drown'd in a River call'd Winred. The Fall of cruel Penda, who had been the Death of four or five Chriſtian Kings, caus'd a general Rejoycing, and alſo brought Oſwy to the Height of his Power, who in three Years ſubdu'd the whole Kingdom of Mercia, and the greateſt Part of the Picts in the North. In the Time of his Proſperity, and the Year 664, a Synod of Scotch and Engliſh Biſhops, in the Preſence of him and his Son Alfred, was held at a Monaſtery in the North, concerning the Time about celebrating Eaſter; a Controverſie which had long before diſturb'd the Greek and Latin Churches; wherein the Scots not agreeing with the Cuſtoms of Rome, nor yielding to the Diſputants on that Side to whom the King was moſt enclin'd, ſuch as were Biſhops here reſign'd, and return'd home with their Diſciples. Not long after, by Means of Theodore, a learned Monk of Greece, whom the Pope had made Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, under Egbert King of Kent, the Greek and Latin Tongues, with all the Liberal Arts and Sciences, began firſt to to flouriſh among the Saxons, and daily encreas'd under potent and religious Kings, 'till the Days of Beda, as he himſelf informs us. And now Oſwy having granted Part of Mercia to his Son-in-Law Peada, and he being ſlain by Treachery, he was oppos'd by Wulfer, who freed the Country from his Subjection. And thus Oſwy ended his Days in Troubles as he began in Wars, after a Reign of twenty eight Years; when falling ſick, he was ſo ſtruck with Remorſe for the Blood of Oſwin, and of others that he had ſhed, that he vow'd a Pilgrimage to Rome, in which Place he thought to have laid his Bones: But Death ſoon put an End to his Deſigns, and in the Year 670 remov'd him, and the Seat of the chief Monarchy of England from his Dominions.

Oſwy's Death.

A. D. 670.

IV. Upon the Death of Oſwy, the chief Monarchy of England, which had continu'd forty ſix Years in the North, began to remove Southwards, and to fix it ſelf in the Kingdom of Mercia, where it was preſerv'd for above an hundred and thirty Years. Wulfer King of Mercia was the firſt Monarch of this Nature, who in the Life of King Oſwy freed himſelf from his Power, and after his Death became Chief of the Engliſh Nation; tho' more in Name than in Reality. For his Reign was not only ſhort, but in a little Time after Oſwy's Death, he loſt the Iſland of Lindſey to Egfrid King of Northumberland. Yet three Years after he warr'd againſt the Weſt-Saxons with greater Succeſs, triumphantly paſs'd through their Country, and gain'd the Iſle of Wight from King Renwald; which Iſland he gave to Edilwach King of the South-Saxons, who being then baptiz'd, Wulfer became his God-Father. Wulfer himſelf had not long before been a zealous and cruel Pagan; but now becoming Chriſtian, he deſtroy'd the Worſhip of Idols throughout his Dominions, and caus'd the Goſpel to be preach'd in all Parts of his Kingdom: Notwithſtanding he is tax'd by Malmesbury with the ſcandalous Sin of Simony, in ſelling to Wina, the depriv'd Biſhop of Wincheſter, the Biſhoprick of London. In this Reign, and about this Time, Chriſtianity being generally eſtabliſh'd, many conſiderable Monaſteries were founded, and Kings and Queens began to take upon them the Habits of the Religious, and frequently to withdraw from their Thrones to the Monkiſh Cells. And now Wulfer having reign'd above four Years ſince the Deceaſe of Oſwy, and about ſeventeen in all, he dy'd, and left his Body to be bury'd in the Monaſtery of Peterborough, which had been his and his Brother's Foundation.

A. D. 675.

Wulfer was ſucceeded by his Brother Ethelred, the third Son of King Penda; who enter'd upon the Kingdom by the Conſent of young Kenred his Nephew, who was next Heir to the Crown. This Prince in a ſhort Time not only regain'd Lindſey, and all that Wulfer had loſt to Egfrid of Northumberland, but found himſelf powerful enough to extend his Arms a contrary Way, againſt Lothar King of Kent, whoſe Country he waſted without Reſpect to Churches or Religious Houſes; particularly Rocheſter was plunder'd, and its Biſhop Putta driven to ſuch Extremities, that in his old Age he was oblig'd to teach Arts and Muſick in Mercia, to preſerve himſelf from Want. Not long after, the South-Saxons, whoſe King had been baptiz'd in Wulfer's Reign, were all converted to the Chriſtian Faith, by Means of Biſhop Wilfrid, who had been depriv'd, and driven from Northumberland by King Egfrid. And now Chriſtianity having been receiv'd by all the Engliſh-Saxons, King Ethelred, by the Advice and Conſent of Theodore Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, divided the whole Kingdom of Mercia, the largeſt in the whole Nation, into five Dioceſſes, namely Hereford, Worceſter, Litchfield, Leiceſter, and Cidnaceſter; all which were compleated in the Year 679. In the following Year, at the Command of Ethelred, and three other Kings, viz. Egfrid of Northumberland, Aldwulf of the Eaſt-Angles, and Lothar of Kent, Arch-Biſhop Theodore ſummon'd a Synod at Hatfield in Hartfordſhire; in which were receiv'd the Canons of five General Councils, as Nice, Conſtantinople, Epheſus, Calcedon, and another in Conſtantinople,

And at the ſame Time, John the Præcentor or chief Chantor of St. Peter's at Rome, brought over hither the yearly Order and Courſe of Singings and Readings, as was practis'd there. Ethelred had a long and peaceable Reign, and as his Power encreas'd, that of Egfrid declin'd, who in the Year 685 raſhly leading his Army to deſtroy the Province of the Picts, under his Subjection, he and all his Forces were cut in pieces. From which Time, ſays Beda, military Valour decay'd in that Kingdom, and not only the Picts, 'till then in a peaceable Condition, but alſo many of the old Britains recover'd their Liberty for many Years after. In the latter End of King Ethelred's Reign, Oſtred his Queen was kill'd by her own Nobles, call'd Southimbrians; but both the Cauſe and Conſequence of this ſtrange Fact is unknown to us. About this Time Ina King of the Weſt-Saxons publiſh'd his Laws, which are the firſt that remain to us entire, and were both Eccleſiaſtical and Civil; by which it appears, that Theft, Murder, and other heinous Crimes, were then redeemable by pecuniary Mulcts. And now at length King Ethelred being ſtrucken with Remorſe, for his deſtroying Religious Places in the Beginning of his Reign, to make amends, he founded the famous Monaſtery of Bardney in Lincolnſhire; into which he retir'd himſelf, became a Monk, and laſtly dy'd Abbot of the Place, after he had reign'd about thirty Years.

Sax. An. Beda. Ethelred upon his Reſignation paſs'd by his Son Ceolred, and appointed Kenred, the Son of his Brother Wulfer, for his Succeſſor, who was the neareſt Heir to the Crown. Of which Prince we know but little, only that he had the Repute of being the chief Monarch of the Engliſh, and that after four Years peaceable Government, being deſirous of Contemplation, according to the Example of his Uncle Ethelred, he ſought a more private and religious Life: And accordingly having appointed his Coſen Ceolred to rule in his Place, he relinquiſh'd both his Kingdom and Country; and having concerted Matters with Oſfa, King of the Eaſt-Saxons, a Prince of uncommon Zeal and Piety, he with him and Edwin Biſhop of Worceſter, travell'd to Rome; where both theſe Kings were made Monks in the Time of Pope Conſtantine the Firſt, and in a Monaſtery of that City ſpent the reſt of their Lives. Such was the accuſtom'd Fervour of thoſe Times; when a Monk's Habit was accounted the greateſt Badge of Humility, and a religious Solitude the main Step to Eternity. Ceolred ſucceeded with the Applauſe of the People, and reign'd for a few Years in great Peace and Proſperity: But his Quiet was at laſt diſturb'd by the growing Power of Ina, King of the Weſt-Saxons; who having gain'd great Advantages over the Britains, and conſtrain'd Kent to purchace Peace by a Sum of Mony, turn'd his Forces againſt Mercia. Accordingly a ſharp and doubtful Battel was fought between theſe Rivals Ceolred and Ina, at Wodensburgh in Wiltſhire, in the Year 715. The Succeſs of this Battel is uncertain; and the following Year, and the ſeventh of his Reign, Ceolred feaſting with his Nobles, was ſuddenly poſſeſs'd with an Evil Spirit, and expir'd in Deſpair, as Boniface Arch-Biſhop of Mentz, an Engliſh-Man, who taxes him for a Defiler of Nuns, writes by Way of Caution to his Succeſſor.

Beda. Sax. An. Upon the Death of Ceolred, Ethelbald his Coſen, once remov'd, ſucceeded him in his Kingdom. This Prince had a very long, and for the moſt part a peaceable Reign; which he began with the Foundation of the celebrated Monaſtery of Croyland, now Crowland in Lincolnſhire, in Honour of St. Guthlac the famous Anchoret, who is ſaid to have clear'd that Place of Demons and evil Spirits. The former Part of this Reign was in a great meaſure rivall'd by Ina King of the Weſt-Saxons, who not only worſted the Eaſt-Angles in ſeveral Encounters, but in the Year 725 alſo intirely ruin'd the Kingdom of the South-Saxons, ſlew Aldwin their King, and added all the Dominions to the Weſt-Saxon Kingdom: So that the Saxon Heptarchy was now reduc'd to ſix Kingdoms.

doms. This Prince is said to have been the first who laid a Tax of a Penny a House to be paid to the Pope, which was afterwards call'd Peter-Pence. And not long after, whether to expiate the Effusion of so much Blood, or to comply with the Genius of the Times, at the Persuasion of his Queen Ethelburga, he resign'd his Kingdom, and ended his Days in a Monastery at Rome. After whose Death, Ethelbald of Mercia commanded all the Provinces on this Side Humber, with their Kings. The Picts were now in League with the English, the Scots peaceable within their Limits, and the Britains were partly under their own Government, and partly under the English. In which peaceful State of the Land, many in Northumberland, both of the Nobility and Commons, laying aside the Exercise of Arms, betook themselves to Monasteries; and many others, both of the Clergy and Laity, Men and Women, hastning to Rome in Companies, thought themselves no ways secure of eternal Life, 'till they were cloister'd there. These Retirements of the best of the People afterwards prov'd a fatal Weak'ning of the Nation; and with this State of the Land the learned and celebrated Beda finish'd his History, about the Year 731.

A. D. 732.

V. From this Time forwards, and for many Years, we have a more imperfect Account than ever of the Affairs of this Nation; and not long after the finishing his History, Beda dy'd at his Monastery in Northumberland, whose great Piety, as well as Learning, justly obtain'd for him the Title of Venerable Beda. After whose Decease, as Malmsbury observes, all Knowledge of publick Transactions were for a long Time almost lost, since none prov'd an Emulator of his Studies, nor a Follower of his Learning; so that to a sloathful Generation, one more sloathful succeeding, the Love of Learning became cold in this whole Island. In the mean Time Ethelbald reign'd chief Monarch of the English; and his Power was much strengthen'd and confirm'd by his taking Somerton from the West-Saxons, and afterwards much Spoil and Plunder from the Northumbrians. And moreover about the Year 747, he became Master of London, and in effect brought the East-Saxon Kingdom to a Period; so that the Heptarchy was now reduc'd to five Kingdoms. Under this Prince were held two Councils at Cloveshoe in Kent, one in the Year 742, and the other in 747; at both which Ethelbald himself was present. The first was principally to confirm King Withred's Acts concerning the Monasteries in Kent, according to the Directions of Cuthbert Arch-Bishop of Canterbury. The second was at the Instance of Pope Zachary, who by his Epistles severely admonish'd the Saxons of all Sorts, from the Highest to the Lowest, to forsake their wicked and scandalous Actions. Here several Canons were made concerning the Pastoral Charge, and many Provisions against the Inordinacy, extravagant Habits, Incontinency, Luxury, and irregular Lives, of the Clergy, Monks and Nuns, as well as the Laity. The reigning Vices of these Times, as Fornication, Adultery, Murder, Drunkenness, Perjury, &c. were only punish'd with longer or shorter Penances, of Days, Weeks, Months or Years; but what these Penances were, we do not find. These Times were now become loose and luxurious; and Kelwulf King of Northumberland, retiring from his Throne to the Monastery of Lindesfarne, brought those Monks from the Use of Milk and Water to Wine and Ale. But Ethelbald proceeded to greater Irregularities, and contemning Marriage, gave himself all the Freedom of unlawful Enjoyments, making no Difference between Places and Persons, Nuns and other Women; and by his fatal Example the Nobility and People were infected with an universal Viciousness and Luxury. Which being related to Boniface the Pope's Legate then in Germany, he severely reprov'd Ethelbald by an Epistle, which had so good an Effect upon him, that he repented of his former Life, and endeavour'd to make Satisfaction by many charitable Works, and several large Immunities which he granted to the Church and Monasteries. At length, after a Reign of above forty Years, fighting against the West-Saxons in a War not prudently undertaken, he

he was traiterouſly ſlain by his own Subjects, at the Inſtigation of Beornred, who likewiſe endeavour'd to ſtep into the Throne, but was himſelf ſlain by Oſfa the Mercian, before he could compleat his Deſigns. His Death was accompany'd with the Deprivation of Sigebert, King of the Weſt-Saxons, who for his Cruelty and Injuſtice was ſolemnly depos'd from his Kingdom, by the Authority of the grand Council of the ſame; which is the firſt Example of that Nature that we have in our Engliſh Hiſtory. He is Slain.

Sax. An. Malmsb. Sim. Dun. &c. Beornred the Uſurper being ſlain, Oſfa Coſen to King Ethelbald ſucceeded in the Kingdom; being the eleventh King of the Mercians, and the moſt valiant and powerful of all the Engliſh Saxons, ſo that no Attempts ſeem'd too high for his Undertaking. The neighbouring Kings foreſeeing his ambitious Aims, ſolicited the Alliance of Charles the Great, King of France, whoſe Intereſt could no ways prevail upon Oſfa to cauſe him to deſiſt from his Deſigns. The firſt that felt his Fury were the Kentiſh Men, under Alric their King, whoſe Overthrow was the leſs diſhonourable, ſays Malmsbury, becauſe they were vanquiſh'd by ſo great a Monarch. The Place was Ottanford, where their King was ſlain by Oſfa's own Hand, their Forces diſpers'd, and all their Country waſted by the Mercians. This happen'd about the eighteenth Year of his Reign, when turning his Forces againſt Kenwulf King of the Weſt-Saxons, who had aſſiſted his Enemies, he overthrew him at Benſington in Oxfordſhire, and took the Town. But not long after, in the Year 776, all the Britains, both of North and South-Wales, gather'd themſelves together, and invading the Kingdom of Mercia, made terrible Devaſtations in many Parts of the Country, waſting all with Fire and Sword. Whereupon King Oſfa was conſtrain'd to make a Peace with the other Saxon Kings, and turn all his Forces againſt the Welſh-Men; who being unable to reſiſt ſo great a Power, were oblig'd to abandon all the plain Country between the River Wye and Severn, and retire to the Mountainous Parts. Upon which Advantage, Oſfa immediately ſeiz'd on all the plain Country, planted it with Saxon Inhabitants, annex'd it to his own Kingdom, and caus'd a famous Ditch or Intrenchment to be made from Sea to Sea, between his Kingdom and Wales, by which he might the better defend his Country from future Incurſions; which Ditch is ſeen at this Day in divers Places, and is call'd in Welſh, Clawdh Oſfa, that is Oſfa's Ditch.

Malmsb. Sim. Dun. After this Oſfa reign'd many Years in great Splendor, and for the moſt part in Peace, having Trumpets ſounded before him when he travell'd or appear'd in publick. And as a Mark of his Grandeur, he procur'd Lichfield to be made an Archbiſhoprick, over all the Biſhops in Mercia and Eaſt-England; and becauſe Jambert Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury oppos'd him, he bereav'd that Archbiſhoprick of all its Lands that lay in the Mercian Territories: In which State it continu'd all his Reign. He call'd alſo a Synod or Council at Calcuith, where among ſeveral Canons, Tythes were firſt order'd to be paid in England, and alſo declar'd to be by Divine Right. Not long after, Charles the Great, who now held an amicable Correſpondence with Oſfa, ſent a certain Book of Synodical Decrees into England, as Simeon of Durham relates; in which alſo, as our Author complains, were found many inconvenient Things, and contrary to the true Faith: For, adds he, it had been decreed in a Council at Conſtantinople, by more than three hundred Biſhops, that Images ought to be ador'd, which the Church of God does abominate. Againſt which Impoſition Albinus, or Alcum, the moſt learned Man of the Nation, wrote an Epiſtle, and preſented that with the Synodical Book to the King of France, in the Name and Perſon of all the Biſhops and chief Men of the Engliſh Nation.

Sim. Dun. &c. About the thirtieth Year of the Reign of King Oſfa, and third of Birthric the Weſt-Saxon, birth was given to new and great Calamities in the Iſland. For in the Weſt arriv'd three Ships of Danes or Norwegians, by Chance, or for Pillage; who upon their Landing being commanded to come to Dorcheſter, and give an account of their Lading at the King's Cuſtom-Houſe, they ſlew the Officer ficer and all that came with him, as an Earneſt of the numerous Slaughters, Rapines and Hoſtilities, which they return'd not long after to commit over all the Iſland. Three or four Years after theſe Pagans landed in the North, and plunder'd the great Monaſtery of Lindesfarne, kill'd many of the Friars, took others Priſoners, ſparing neither Clergy nor Laity. Theſe were the firſt Daniſh Ships that infeſted the Engliſh Nation; where it is obſervable, That the ſame People who were firſt call'd Normans in the Saxon Annals, are there alſo nam'd Danes in other Places; which ſhews, that the Danes and Normans were then accounted to be one and the ſame People. In the mean Time King Osfa maintain'd his Power, and kept up his Ambition, ſhewing as little Faith as Mercy: For Ethelbert, King of the Eaſt-Angles, coming to his Court, to obtain his Daughter in Marriage, was by the Inſtigation of his Queen Quendrith treacherouſly murder'd, and all his Dominions ſeiz'd and added to the Kingdom of Mercia, in the Year 792. So that now the Saxon Heptarchy was reduc'd to four Kingdoms, viz. Mercia, Weſt-Saxony, Northumberland and Kent; that of the South-Saxons being ſwallow'd up by the Weſt-Saxons, and thoſe of the Eaſt-Saxons and Eaſt-Angles by the Mercians. At the ſame Time the Kingdoms of Northumberland and Kent were in a declining Condition. In the former, Eadbert, an excellent Governor, contrary to the Advice of the neighbouring Princes, and his beſt Friends, follow'd his Predeceſſor Kelwulf's Steps, and retir'd to a Monaſtery. His Son Oſwulf was ſlain by the Treachery of his own Servants: Ethelwold the next King was aſſaſinated by Alhred his Succeſſor, who after eight Years Reign was formally depos'd by his Subjects: Ethelred the next, in four Years Time fled his Country; Alfwold his Succeſſor was ſlain by a Conſpiracy, and Oſred in a Year's Time depriv'd by the State: Which frequent and violent Changes brought the Kingdom to a very tottering Condition. As to the Kingdom of Kent, in the Year 793, the Death of Alric, the fourteenth King, put an End to the Race of Hengiſt; from which Time whoever was advanc'd by Wealth or Faction took upon him the Title of King of that Province.

The Kingdom of the East-Angles at an End.

And now Osfa having reign'd with mighty Authority about thirty ſeven Years, with great Devotion repair'd to Rome, where with the like Zeal of Ina the Weſt-Saxon, he made his Kingdom ſubject to a Tribute then call'd Peter-Pence and Romſcot. Beſides which, he made rich Preſents to Pope Hadrian for Canonizing St. Alban, the firſt Britiſh Martyr; in Honour of whom, and by way of Penance, he founded a magnificent Monaſtery near Verulamium, and endow'd it with large Revenues. Alſo as a Teſtimony of his Repentance for his great Effuſion of Blood, at his Return to his Kingdom, he gave the tenth Part of all his Goods to the Church and Poor; he built another Monaſtery at Bath, and the Cathedral Church of Hereford, with another Church at Warwick, where the adjoining Town from that and him bears the Name of Off-Church. He did not long ſurvive theſe Charities, but in Year 794 dy'd in Peace at Oſf-ley; and with great Solemnity his Body was interr'd near Bedford, in a Chappel upon the Banks of the Owſe, after a triumphant Reign of about thirty nine Years. *Malmſb. A. D. 794. 12. EGFERTH of Mercia chief Monarch.

Osfa was ſucceeded in his Kingdom by his Son Egferth, who being a Prince of great Worth, had been crown'd King in his Father's Time, nine Years before; and after his Death, he reſtor'd to the Church whatever had been violently taken from it; but this hopeful Prince reign'd but a few Months before he dy'd, and left the Crown to Kenwulf, the next of the Royal Line; who by his excellent Behaviour both in Peace and War ſufficiently ſhew'd that he deſerv'd it. In the ſecond Year of his Reign, in a War againſt Eadbert King of Kent, he not only gave him a total Overthrow, but alſo took him Priſoner, to the great Diſhonour of all his Subjects, and gave his Kingdom to Cuthred. Two Years after, at the Dedication of a magnificent Church built by him at Winchcombe in Gloceſterſhire, Kenwulf in the Preſence of Cuthred, thirteen Biſhops, ten Dukes, many noble Men, and a great Concourſe of People, led Eadbert the Captive *Sax. Captive King to the High Altar, and there without either Intreaty or Ranſom, gave him his Liberty; manifeſting at once his Devotion to God, and his Generoſity to the unfortunate. This Prince reign'd ſeveral Years after in Peace and Happineſs, and was the laſt of the Mercian Kings that was chief Monarch of the Engliſh.

Malmſb. Sim. Dun. &c.

VI. The chief Monarchy of England had continu'd about an hundred and thirty Years among the Mercians; but now in the End of the eighth Century, it began to remove from thence to the Weſt-Saxons, and in a few Years became a more real and compleat Monarchy than ever before. The Year 800 made way for great Alterations in this Iſland, gradually uniting the ſeven Kingdoms into one, by means of Egbert the famous Weſt-Saxon, who was the only Surviver of the Royal Line of that Kingdom, being deſcended from Inegild the Brother of King Ina. Having a noble Education, he began early in his Youth to give ſignal Hopes of more than common Worth and Abilities; which being apprehended by King Birthric, and withal his juſter Title to the Crown, he ſecretly ſought his Life, ſo that at length Egbert was oblig'd to fly for Security to Oſfa King of Mercia. But he having marry'd his Daughter Eadburga to King Birthric, was eaſily prevail'd upon by his Ambaſſadors to deliver up the Refugee; ſo that Egbert was conſtrain'd to make his Eſcape, and take a new Flight into France, where he much improv'd his Abilities, and refin'd his Education, under the Reign of Charles the Great. At length Birthric met with the Reward of all his Injuſtice, by the means of his Wife Eadburga, who having prepared a Cup of poiſon'd Wine for one of his Favourites whom ſhe hated, it accidentally prov'd the Death of the King himſelf. After whoſe Deceaſe, Aſſer relates, That when this Queen, by reaſon of her wicked Actions, could live no longer among the Engliſh, ſhe repair'd to France with all her Treaſure, where ſhe was kindly entertain'd by Charles the Great, and upon her making ſome rich Preſents to that Emperor, he propos'd to her to chuſe whom ſhe would have for her Husband, Himſelf or his Son: But ſhe imprudently nam'd his Son, as the younger Man; ſo that the Emperor with a Mixture of Mirth and Seriouſneſs told Her, That if ſhe had choſen Him, ſhe ſhould have had his Son, but now ſhe was not to expect either. Nevertheleſs he aſſign'd her a rich Monaſtery, where ſhe liv'd ſome Years as Abbeſs, but being detected of Incontinency, ſhe was expell'd, and forc'd to wander with one Servant into Italy, where at Pavia ſhe ended her wicked Life in great Poverty.

14. EGBERT chief Monarch.

He flies into France.

Sax. An. Malmſb. &c.

Birthric being dead without Iſſue, Egbert after three Years Retirement in France, was recall'd by the Nobility of the Weſt-Saxon Kingdom, and acknowledg'd King with univerſal Satisfaction; where he reign'd with greater Glory and Renown, than any of the Engliſh-Saxon Kings before him. The former Part of his Reign was wiſely employ'd in eſtabliſhing his own Intereſt at Home, and in ſetling his Power and Soveraignty in the Love and Affection of his Subjects. And then finding his own Strength, he began to caſt his Eyes upon his incroaching Neighbours; and the firſt Trial of his Martial Conduct was againſt the Britains, firſt making a Conqueſt of them that ſtill inhabited Cornwall, and after that, in two Years more, he render'd thoſe in Wales Tributaries to his Dominions. His Succeſs and Progreſs was ſuch, that his Neighbours were exceedingly ſtartled, and apprehenſive of his encreaſing Power. Beornwulf King of Mercia was the firſt that actually concern'd himſelf, and thinking it a Matter of Glory by his Courage and Reſolution to remove the Fears of others, was reſolv'd to engage with this Conqueror; but meeting with him at a Place call'd Ellandune in Wiltſhire, he was totally defeated, in the Year 823. Egbert elevated by this Succeſs, and founding Hopes upon the ſame Grounds that his Neighbours had done their Fears, while the Fame of his late Succeſs was freſh, he ſent Ethelwulf his Son, Ealſtan Biſhop of Sherburn, and Walfheard his General with a powerful Army into Kent, to conquer that Province, which which he accounted not difficult to perform, while the Inhabitants were both enervated with Sloth, and disoblig'd at their King. They that were sent vigorously executed his Commands, and passing over all the Country, found their Work more easie than they imagin'd; for having driven out Baldred their King beyond the Thames, they subdu'd all Kent and Surry, with the Southern and Eastern Saxons. And also the same Year, the Inhabitants of East-England dreading and hating the Government of the Mercians, submitted themselves to his Vassallage and Protection.

Next Kent, with the South and East-Saxons.

A. D. 825.

The East-Angles having submitted themselves to Egbert, never desisted 'till they had slain Beornwulf and Ludecun the Mercian Kings, who had been continual Disturbers of their Neighbours. Their Successor Withlaf was soon after expell'd his Kingdom by Egbert, but afterwards by the Mediation of Siward Abbot of Crowland, with whom he privately remain'd in that Monastery, was restor'd upon Condition of Subjection, and Payment of an annual Tribute. Still the Kingdom of Northumberland remain'd unconquer'd, which now of it self began to fall into Pieces; the Kings were so frequently slain by the People, that for thirty three Years none had the Courage to accept of the Crown; and many of the Nobility and Prelates fled from the Country, or retir'd into Monasteries. Which Weaknesses and Mismanagements gave a fair Opportunity to the Pagan Danes to enter this Kingdom, terribly wasting not only Cities and Towns, but more especially Churches and Religious Houses; the Lent before whose Arrival, we are told, That on the North Side of St. Peter's Church in York there was seen from the Roof to run Blood. The Causes of these Calamities, and the Ruin of this Kingdom, is attributed by the learned Alcwin who wrot in these Times, to the general Ignorance and Decay of Learning, which much increas'd after the Death of Beda; to their Neglect in enducating Youth in the Knowledge of the Scriptures; and to the extravagant Apparel of their Priests and Nuns, discovering their loose and wanton Dispositions, of which many Examples were in Beda's Time. From whence Altars were defil'd with Perjuries, Cloysters violated with Adulteries, the Land polluted with the Blood of its Princes, and infected with the Dissentions of the People; and generally the same Vices reigning of which Gildas before had complain'd, and declar'd to have been the Ruin of the Britains. In this Condition Egbert, who had reduc'd all the South, and design'd a full Conquest of the Island, found them in the Year 827; upon whose Appearance they yielded without any Bloodshed, and gave Security to him for their quiet and obedient Deportment.

Sax. An. Malmsb. Ingulf. &c.

And lastly Northumberland.

He puts an End to the Heptarchy.

A. D. 828.

King Egbert having now with great Success subdu'd the HEPTARCHY, and reduc'd it to his own Power, he was solemnly crown'd King of all Britain at Wincheſter; and by an Edict or Proclamation commanded that the whole Heptarchy should hereafter be call'd Englelond or England, which in Latin was call'd Anglia from the Angles the most numerous and valiant of the three Nations which came over with Hengist; who possess'd, as was formerly observ'd, the Kingdoms of Northumberland, Mercia and East-England, the Jutes having only Kent and the Isle of Wight, and the Saxons East-Sex, South-Sex and West-Sex. Yet the Name of England was us'd long before this Time, tho' never by publick Edict, as appears from Beda and other Writers. Tho' Egbert was now supreme Monarch of England, and in a more absolute Manner than any before him, yet he was not sole King and Governor; for several of the petty Kings, tho' Tributaries, held their Titles for many Years, and some Successions of Kings after him; as Withlaf King of Mercia under himself, Bertulf under Ethelwulf his Son, Beorred King of Mercia, and Edmund King of the East-Angles under the same; and so they continu'd for above sixty Years 'till the Reign of Edward the Elder.

Which he calls ENGLAND.

Thus we have given a general View of the chief Transactions of the Saxon Heptarchy, collected from little else but a Heap of Rubbish, and from trifling, lame and confus'd Accounts; for which we are to beg the Reader's Favour, if he

he has been disappointed, or complains of Omissions, and the want of some Facts mention'd in other Writers. Both the Secular and Ecclesiastical Story of the Saxons are vastly defective. The former consists chiefly of Wars and Battels, by which we discern great Barbarity, Violence and Rapine; but for what Cause they were undertaken, by what Councils they were directed and carry'd on, or what Reason or Equity there was for them, we can hardly so much as guess. Nor are the Battels themselves more artfully describ'd than the Combats of Wolves and Bears, or the Skirmishes of ravenous Birds in the Air. There were frequent Attempts among the petty Kings upon each others Dominions, and as frequent Rebellions of the great Men against them; and many Times, he whom Riches, Popularity or Faction advanc'd, took upon him the Title and State of a King. The Church Story is in a great Measure a confus'd Collection of Legends, Visions, Tales, and vulgar Reports, which pass'd for current in those ignorant and credulous Times. Yet out of these Clouds of Darkness, out of these Monkish and inconsistent Discourses, we may pick out many Things surprising, and Matter sufficient for strange Admiration, if we take notice of the frequent Fastings, the fervent Prayers, the large and almost profuse Alms of those Times; what stately and magnificent Fabricks, Churches, Palaces, and Monasteries were built and founded in those Days; what plain and unlearned Zeal, what obedient, quiet and hearty Devotion then possess'd the Minds of the People, when in about two hundred Years Time, thirty Saxon Kings and Queens resign'd their Crowns with all the Glories of the World, and enter'd into a Religious Solitude.

The Devotion of these Times.

CHAP. IV.

The Monarchy of the English Saxons, From the Establishment of King Egbert, to the Beginning of the Monarchy of the Danes in England, under King Canute.

Containing the Space of about 189 Years.

1. EGBERT.

I. BEING arriv'd at the End of the Saxon Heptarchy, we begin to pass from Darkness to Twilight; from a State of Confusion in Story, to some Degree of Order, and from the Transactions of a many-headed Government, to those of an united Monarchy, founded and erected by the Power of King Egbert. It might have been reasonably expected, that a wise and fortunate Prince, at the Head of such large Dominions, and so numerous a People as the English, after the Expulsion of the Picts and Scots into the Northern, and the Britains into the Western Corners of the Isle, should not only have enjoy'd the Fruits of Peace and Quiet, but left much Felicity as well as Greatness to many succeeding Generations. Yet such is the Uncertainty of Human Affairs, and the Weakness of the best Conjectures, That he who rul'd over all the English should have little Cause to rejoice in the Obedience of those of his own Blood; for he was scarcely establish'd in his united Throne, when both he and his Subjects were alarm'd by the Invasions of a formidable Enemy from from abroad, whose Fury and Violence extended not only to himself, but to his Successors for many Years. For about these Times a new Swarm of People, from the Northern Parts of Europe, under the Names of Danes and Normans, or Norwegians, began at first to infest the Seas, and at length the Lands of the Belgick, Gallick and British Shores, filling all Places with Slaughters, Spoils and Devastations. The Normans first over-run the Belgick Provinces upon the Mouth of the Rhine, and gave to those Parts next the Sea the new Names of Holland and Zealand. Afterwards they sail'd in vast Numbers into the Mouth of the Seyne, and with great Fierceness subdu'd that Northern Part of France, which ever since has been call'd by the Name of Normandy, and became the Seat of a great Norman Duke, and his Successors for several Generations. In the mean Time the Danes began their Inroads and furious Invasions upon the Coasts of England, with mighty Numbers, and with greater Fury and Pagan Barbarity than the Saxons before them; never giving this Island any long Respite for above 230 Years.

A. D. 832. They infest England.

Egbert was now in the full Height of his Glory, and had enjoy'd his Conquests but a few peaceful Years, when the Danes made their first Invasion in this Reign, which was in the Isle of Shepey in Kent, ravaging those Parts without any great Resistance. In the following Year they arriv'd in greater Numbers with thirty five Ships, and landed at Charmouth in Dorsetshire, where they were vigorously encounter'd by Egbert himself, and a severe Battel ensu'd; in which Herefrid and Wigferth two Bishops were slain, as also Dudda and Osmund, two Saxon Commanders. Egbert had the Advantage in the former Part of the Battel, yet towards Night he lost the Victory, tho' by the Help of it he retreated, and sav'd the Dishonour of an entire Defeat; which was the only Time that Fortune ceas'd to favour this Monarch's Undertakings. But two Years after, the Danes returning with a powerful Navy, and joining in League with the Cornish Britains, Egbert encounter'd all their Forces, gain'd a compleat Victory over them, and freed his Kingdom at that Time from the Invasion of these barbarous Enemies. At length after a mild and glorious Reign of thirty six Years and seven Months, he dy'd and was bury'd at Winchester, leaving his Son great Opportunities of establishing his Fame, and predicting his Felicity, in case what he had obtain'd by Industry, were not lost by Sloathfulness, to which this Nation had been too much addicted. He dy'd in the Year 836, after he had been near nine Years supreme Monarch of the English Nation.

Sax. An. &c.

The Death of Egbert.

2. ETHELWULF.

A. D. 836.

Upon the Decease of Egbert, his eldest Son Ethelwulf succeeded in all his Dominions, upon the fourth of February. This Prince had been formerly educated in the Monastery of Wincheſter, under the Tuition of Helmestan Bishop, and Swithune Dean of that Church, where he enter'd into Orders, and is said to have been both a Monk and Bishop of Wincheſter. But after his Father's Death, being urg'd by the Nobility and Clergy, and absolv'd from his Vows by Pope Gregory IV. he enter'd upon the Monarchy of England; yet still he retain'd much of the Monkish Temper, lov'd Ease and Solitude, and had small Inclinations to Ambition. Therefore resting satisfy'd with his paternal Kingdom of West-Saxony, he made over the Kingdoms of Kent, and of the South and East-Saxons, which had been his Father's Conquests, to a Brother, or perhaps a Son of his, called Athelstan, who for some Years retain'd those Dominions. He gave the Bishoprick of Wincheſter to his Tutor Swithune, to whom and Alstan Bishop of Sherburne, he left the Management of his principal Affairs.

Sax. An.

King Ethelwulf divides his Dominions.

The unwarlike Disposition of King Ethelwulf gave both Encouragement and an easie Entrance to the Pagan Danes, who in the Beginning of his Reign made ſeveral Deſcents into England, and not like generous Conquerors, but devouring Caterpillers, barbarouſly waſted ſeveral Parts of the Nation at the ſame Inſtant; ſo that the Inhabitants were confounded, and at a loſs how to make any Reſiſtance. Many of theſe Northern Princes enter'd the Land at Southampton and Portſmouth; at the former Place with a Defeat, and at the latter with Victory; and not long after, at a Place call'd Mereſwar, the Engliſh under the Command of Earl Herebert were routed, and the greateſt Part of the Army deſtroy'd. The following Year they committed great Devaſtations in Lindſey, Eaſt-England and Kent; and embolden'd with theſe Succeſſes, they march'd on as far as Canterbury, Rocheſter and London it ſelf, with no leſs barbarous Hoſtilities. And giving no Reſpite to the peaceful Deſires of Ethelwulf, the next Year they return'd with thirty five Ships, fought with the King at the River Carr, where they had encounter'd his Father, and made good their Ground. But in the ninth Year of this Reign, they met with a conſiderable Stop in the full Courſe of their outragious Inſults: For Earl Earnulf with the Men of Somerſetſhire, Alſtan the Biſhop, and Count Oſric with thoſe of Dorſetſhire, engaging them at the Mouth of the River Pedridan, ſlaughter'd them in great Numbers, and obtain'd a memorable Victory, which quell'd their Power for about ſix Years after.

The Danes waſte England in divers Places.

Sax. An. Aſſer. But in the fifteenth Year of this Reign, Mars was more predominant than ever, and Fortune kept the Scale on the King's Side: For the deſtroying Danes with two or three hundred Ships enter'd the Thames, landed in Kent, and took and pillag'd both Canterbury and London; and proceeding further they defeated Berthulf King of Mercia with his whole Army; then marching into Surry, they behav'd themſelves as tho' they were able to withſtand the whole Power of the Engliſh Nation. Here they were met by King Ethelwulf himſelf, and his Son Ethelbald, with all the Weſt-Saxon Forces, at a Place call'd Aclea, now Oakley in Surrey; where after a long and ſharp Conteſt, the Victory fell intirely to the Engliſh, with a vaſt Slaughter of theſe inſolent Invaders. So that this was accounted a fortunate Year to England, and added to the King great Fame and Reputation. With the like Succeſs his Brother Athelſtan King of Kent encounter'd the Danes at Sandwich, where purſuing of them to the Sea, he took ſeveral of their Ships: And in Devonſhire, Earl Ceorle at Winleſhore ſo weaken'd their main Power, that in a kind of Deſpair they withdrew themſelves into the Iſland of Thanet, where they continu'd all the Winter Seaſon; and if Deſtiny had not withſtood the Engliſh Nation, the Danes in human Probability might have been totally expell'd the Land. But the Saxons imagining themſelves free from the common Enemy, renew'd their old Conteſts with the ever depreſſed Britains, againſt whom Burthred King of Mercia ſucceſsfully obtain'd the Aſſiſtance of King Ethelwulf, whoſe Daughter Ethelſwith he had obtain'd in Marriage; which for a while ſupported the Fame and Power of that valiant but unfortunate Prince.

A. D. 851.

They are ſeveral Times worſted by the Engliſh.

Aſſer. Sax. An. Ethelwulf, now enjoying Peace, ſent his youngeſt Son Alfred, then but five Years of Age, with a large Retinue to Rome, whom Leo the Pope both conſecrated to be King afterwards, and adopted to be his Epiſcopal Son. But this Peace laſted not long; for in the ſame Year the Danes landed afreſh in Thanet, where Ealker with the Forces of Kent, and Hudda with thoſe of Surry engag'd with them, and at firſt repell'd them; but the Slain and Drowned were at length ſo many on either Side, as left the Loſs almoſt equal on both. In the next Year the Danes winter'd again in Shepey, and became more formidable than before. Inſomuch that the King, Nobility and Clergy being extreamly allarm'd and affrighted at the Devaſtations of theſe Pagan Invaders, and judging theſe Calamities to be the Effects of their Sins and Corruptions, bethought themſelves of a wholeſom and uniform Remedy, as they term'd it, and a proper Security againſt their Enemies; which was an Act of the great Council or Parliament in thoſe Days, ſince often called The Grant of King Ethelwulf, of the Tithe of the Profits of all Lands to the Church, free from all Burdens, Taxes and Exactions whatſoever. This Grant, by the Conſent of the grand Council, was ſign'd by all the Arch-Biſhops, Biſhops, Abbots, Abbeſſes, and Secular States of all England; and likewiſe by Burthred King of Mercia, and Edmund King of the Eaſt-Angles, then ſubject and tributary to King Ethelwulf. After this Grant was confirm'd and ſubſcrib'd, Ethelwulf with great Solemnity offer'd it upon the Altar of St. Peter's in the Cathedral of Wincheſter, where the Parliament was held, and the Biſhops caus'd it to be publiſh'd in every Church of their reſpective Dioceſes and Diſtricts.

A. D. 855. He takes a Journey to Rome.

Having ſetled theſe Affairs at home, he took his beloved Son Alfred with him, and with great Devotion took a Journey to Rome, where he was honourably receiv'd and entertain'd for the Space of a whole Year; in which Time he rebuilt the Engliſh School that Oſfa King of Mercia had founded in that City, which had been burnt down, and now bore the Name of Thomas the Holy. His Return from Rome was through France, and being a Widower, he there marry'd Judith the beautiful Daughter of Charles the Bald then Emperor, in honour of whom he ever plac'd her in a Chair of State, and gave her ſuch Marks of Dignity as were contrary to the Weſt-Saxon Law that had been made upon the Account of Etheburga's Crimes. His Abſence and this Marriage gave Occaſion to a dangerous Conſpiracy in his own Nation, form'd and carry'd on by his eldeſt Son Ethelbald, Biſhop Alſtan his imagin'd Friend; and Enwulf Earl of Somerſet, who us'd all poſſible Endeavours to deprive him of his Kingdom. This Inſurrection was expected to produce nothing leſs than an unfortunate War: But Ethelwulf foreſeeing the Dangers and Miſeries of Civil Diſcord, out of his meer Clemency and great Condeſcenſion, by the Aſſent of his Nobles, agreed to divide the whole Kingdom between Himſelf and his Son. Accordingly a Diviſion was ſolemnly made, but with ſo much Artifice and Partiality, that the Weſtern and beſt Parts were given to the Son, and the Eaſtern and worſt left to the Father; which rais'd ſuch an Indignation among many of the Nobility, that they offer'd the King their utmoſt Aſſiſtance for the Recovery of the whole; but he peacefully diſſuaded them, reſting ſatisfy'd with the Portion aſſign'd him. Two Years after, finding himſelf declining, he diſpos'd of his Kingdom to his two Eldeſt Sons Ethelbald and Ethelbert, and his Hereditary Eſtate to his other Sons and Daughters. For the Advantage of his Soul, he order'd that in his Hereditary Lands, every tenth Hide or Manſion ſhould maintain one poor Parſon with Meat, Drink and Cloathing; and he commanded that three hundred Marks ſhould be paid annually to Rome, for theſe Purpoſes, one hundred to buy Oyl for the Lamp in the Church of St. Peter, as much for Oyl in the Church of St. Paul, and the other hundred to the Pope himſelf. Not long after he dy'd at a Place call'd Stamrige, upon the 13th Day of January, in the Year 857, and was bury'd at the Cathedral in Wincheſter, having reign'd twenty Years and five Months.

A. D. 857. Ethelbald and Ethelbert ſucceed.

II. Ethelwulf left four Sons behind him, Ethelbald, Ethelbert, Ethelred, and Alfred, who all ſucceſſively aſcended the Throne, and became Kings of England. Upon his Deceaſe, his two eldeſt Sons divided their Father's Kingdom, according to his laſt Will and Teſtament; Ethelbald the Eldeſt ſucceeded him in Weſt-Saxony, whilſt his ſecond Brother Ethelbert reign'd in Kent, as alſo over the Eaſt and South-Saxons. Notwithſtanding this Diviſion, Ethelbald has been always accounted ſupreme Monarch: But we have very little remaining of his Perſon and Actions. All that we find is, that he was a luxurious and perfidious Prince; and being charm'd with the Beauty of his Step-Mother Judith, he marry'd her, contrary to the Laws of God and Man. But not long after, we we are told, that by the Admonition of Swithun Biſhop of Wincheſter, he repented of his Inceſt, put away his unlawful Wife, and obſerv'd all Things that the Biſhop enjoin'd him. Having, without any other memorable Action, reign'd almoſt three Years, he dy'd on the twentieth Day of December, and the Year 860; being bury'd firſt at Sherburn the Cathedral in Dorſetſhire, and afterwards remov'd to the Church at Salisbury. 4. ETHELBERT.

Sax. An. &c. Upon the Deceaſe of Ethelbald, his ſecond Brother Ethelbert, who had been join'd with him in the Government, ſucceeded in the whole Monarchy of England, which he rul'd with great Peace and Concord at home. But from abroad he was ſoon moleſted by the deſtroying Danes, who with a powerful Navy landed at Southampton, and took and plunder'd the City of Wincheſter. But in their Return to their Ships, they were met by Oſrick Earl of Southampton, and Ethelwulf of Barkſhire, who put them to flight, and conſtrain'd them to abandon their Booty. Afterwards, taking a large Compaſs, they again enter'd the Iſle of Thanet, and there took up their Winter Quarters. The Kentiſh Men being weary'd out with frequent Allarms, found themſelves oblig'd to purchace their Peace by a Sum of Mony; but the Pirates under Pretence of receiving this Mony, and confirming the League, made an Excurſion into the Country, and waſted all the Eaſtern Parts of Kent. Nevertheleſs the Inhabitants, by uniting all their Forces, expell'd theſe perfidious Wretches. About which Time King Ethelbert, after a worthy Reign of five Years, dy'd, much lamented by his Subjects, who honourably interr'd him at the Cathedral of Sherburn, by his Brother Ethelbald. A. D. 860. Ethelbert ſole Monarch. The Danes again invade the Land. The Death of Ethelbert.

5. ETHELRED I.

Sax. An. Aſſer. Hunting. Ethelbert was ſucceeded in his Kingdom by his next Brother Ethelred, the third Son of Ethelwulf, whoſe Reign was more tempeſtuous than any before him, and was one continu'd Conflict with the Pagan Danes. In the Beginning of which a vaſt Army of theſe Ravagers, under the Conduct of Hinguar and Hubba, two valiant Brothers, invaded the Nation, landed in Eaſt-England, and there wintering made a Truce with the Inhabitants, only with Deſign to obtain from them a ſufficient Number of Horſes for their Men. Being well furniſh'd for a long Expedition, in the following Year they paſs'd over the Humber as far as York, where the Civil Diſſentions of the Northumbrians afforded them great Incouragement and Advantage. For they had lately depos'd Osbert their King, and had choſen Ella the Head of another Faction in his Room; but being at length rous'd by the common Danger, both Parties united, made Head againſt the Danes, and prevail'd; but too raſhly purſuing them into York, then but ſlenderly walled, the Northumbrians were terribly ſlaughter'd both within and without, their two Kings ſlain, and the City burnt. The Remainder of the People made the beſt Terms they could with the Enemy; yet notwithſtanding they were over-run, and the Country ravag'd as far as the River Tine, and Egbert, one of the Engliſh Race, appointed King over them. Brompton gives us this particular Occaſion of the Danes marching to York; That Bruern a Nobleman, whoſe Wife King Osbert had raviſh'd, call'd in Hinguar and Hubba to revenge the Injury: A remarkable Example, if the Truth were as evident. Being thus victorious, the Danes in the following Year paſſed over into Mercia and winter'd at Nottingham; which ſo allarm'd Burhed the King of that Country, with his Noblemen, that they implor'd the Aſſiſtance of our King Ethelred, with young Alfred his Brother. To which they A. D. 866. The Danes arrive under Hinguar and Hubba. They ravage all the North of England.

readily agreed; and aſſembling their Forces, together with Edmund King of the Eaſt-Angles, they join'd the Mercians, and offer'd Battel to the Enemy; but the Danes apprehending the Hazard, kept themſelves within the Town and Caſtle; 'till the Mercians, weary'd out with Delays, came to Articles of Truce with them. Upon which the Danes abandon'd the Place, and return'd back to York with great Booty, where they continu'd about a Year, practiſing great Severities and Cruelties.

A. D. 869. Winter being paſt, the Danes ſoon broke their Truce, paſs'd over Humber into Lindſey, and landing at Humberſtone, miſerably waſted all the Country; and particularly deſtroy'd the famous Monaſtery of Bardney, killing all the Monks in the Church without Mercy. Having continu'd in thoſe Parts all the Summer, and conſum'd all Things with Fire and Sword, about the Feaſt of St. Michael they enter'd Keſteren, another Part of Lincolnſhire, and there committed the like Ravages and Barbarities. At length the valiant Count Algar drew together all the Youth of Hoyland, now Holland in the ſame County, with Wibert and Leofric two Knights, who march'd at the Head of them, together with a brave Body of two hundred Men belonging to Croyland Abby, who were led by one Toly, then a Monk. Theſe taking with them about three hundred couragious Men from Deeping Langtoft and Baſton, to whom alſo join'd Morchard Lord of Bourne, with his ſtrong and numerous Family, and being met by Oſgot Governor of Lincoln, an old Commander, with the Lincoln Squadron, upon the Feaſt of St. Maurice they reſolutely engag'd the Pagan Deſtroyers, kill'd three of their Kings, great Numbers of the Soldiers, and purſu'd the reſt to their Camp. From the Death and Burial of theſe three Kings, the Village before call'd Laundon, was afterwards call'd Trekingham, and now by Corruption Frekingham. But the Night following, Gothurn, Baſey, Oſketil, Halfden and Hamond, all five Kings, and as many Earls, Hinguar, Hubba, Frena, Sidroc the Elder and Younger, coming in from ſeveral Parts with great Spoils and numerous Forces, the greateſt Part of the Chriſtians, terrify'd with their Power, retir'd in the Night. The reſt having early in the Morning heard Divine Service, and receiv'd the Sacrament, reſolv'd to die for their Religion and their Country, and march'd directly againſt their Enemies. Algar drew up his Forces to the beſt Advantage, leaving one Part to Friar Toly and Morcard of Bourne, another to Oſgot of Lincoln, and headed a third himſelf; and finding them much inferior in Number to the Enemy, he form'd them into the Shape of a Wedge, againſt the Archers ſetting as it were a Paliſado of their Bucklers, and againſt the Violence of the Horſe a Wood of Lances; in which Poſture they kept unbroken 'till Night approach'd. The Enemy perceiving that neither their Archers nor Horſe could do Execution, counterfeited a Flight, which occaſion'd the Engliſh to break their Ranks and purſue, contrary to the Orders of their Commanders, ſo that they were eaſily broken and diſpers'd with great Slaughter. The brave and renowned Algar, with his Commanders and a few Soldiers, cluſtering together upon a Hill, long ſuſtain'd the Brunt of the Pagan Army, and ſeeing the ſtouteſt Chriſtians dead, they continu'd valiantly fighting over their Bodies, 'till with many Wounds they expir'd. Only a few young Men of Sutton and Gedney, caſting away their Arms eſcap'd to the adjoining Wood, from whence with much Difficulty they reach'd Croyland, and brought the ſad News of the Overthrow, as the Monks were at their Veſpers. Not long after the Danes plunder'd and burnt the rich Abby of Croyland, and maſſacred all the Monks; from whence they march'd to the Monaſtery of Medeſhamſted or Peterborough, where they did the like; and thence with innumerable Ravages they paſs'd on to Huntington, then to Grantebrig or Cambridge, and then to the Iſle of Ely, where they pillag'd and burnt that famous Monaſtery, and kill'd the Monks, with great Numbers of others who had retir'd thither for Security. After this they march'd into Eaſt-England, where meeting with Earl Wulketule, who made a vigorous Reſiſtance, they cut him off with all his Army, Army, and winter'd at Thetford. Here the pious Edmund, King of the Country, oppoſing them, was put to flight, taken at Heyleſdune, now Hoxon, and ſet up as a Butt to ſhoot at; where calling upon God, and profeſſing himſelf a Martyr, he was firſt ſcourg'd, then ſhot through with many Arrows, and at length beheaded; the Place of his Burial being afterwards call'd St. Edmund's Bury. At the ſame Time Dummoc or Dunwich was alſo deſtroy'd by theſe Ravagers, and the Biſhop's See was remov'd to Helmham in Norfolk.

King Edmund martyr'd,

Sax. An. Aſſer. The furious Danes having over-run Northumberland, Mercia and Eaſt-England, in the following Year bent their Courſe towards the Weſt-Saxons, whoſe Territories had not felt the Effects of their Avarice and Cruelty, and who alone were in a Capacity to reſiſt them: For the Monarchy not being compleatly eſtabliſh'd, the Overturning of the Heptarchy had weaken'd all the other Provinces. Arriving at Reading, the Danes with new Recruits and a mighty Force encamp'd between the Rivers Thames and Kenet, and ſent two Earls to forage in the Country; but they were met by Ethelwulf Earl of Barkſhire, who engag'd them at Engleſield, kill'd one of their Earls, and obtain'd the Victory. Four Days after King Ethelred with his Brother Alfred gave Battel to the chief Body of the Danes, in which Earl Ethelwulf was ſlain, together with great Numbers on both Sides, and the Danes kept the Field. Yet the Advantage was not ſo great againſt the Engliſh, but in four Days after the King and his Brother appear'd again in the Field at a Place call'd Eſceſdune, or Aſhdoune, where they engag'd on both Sides with their full Strength. The Danes divided their Army into two Bodies, the one led by Baſcai and Hulfden their two Kings, the other by their Earls; and the firſt engag'd with Ethelred, and the latter with Alfred. In the former Body King Baſcai was ſlain, in the latter the two Sidrocs, beſides three other Earls, Osbearn, Frena and Hareld; and both were put to flight, with the Slaughter of many Thouſands; ſo that ſuch a Victory had not been known for many Ages. Yet after this great Loſs, within fourteen Days Time, being headed by Agnere and Hubba, they engag'd the King and his Brother at a Place call'd Baſing, where they apparently gain'd the Advantage. Still the Loſs ſuſtain'd by the Engliſh could not be great, for about two Months after, they were ſo well recruited that they durſt a third Time engage with the Pagans at Merotune, tho' lately reinforced, and divided into two Bodies, and in the ſame Poſture they had formerly fought. Both theſe Bodies were put to flight, tho' for a great Part of the Day they kept the Advantage, and the Slaughter was great on both Sides; and yet the Annals tell us that the Danes remain'd Maſters of the Field; ſo various was the Fortune of this Day, or rather ſo uncertain their Intelligence. Of all the Landings and Devaſtations of the Danes, from the Days of Ethelwulf 'till their two laſt Battels with Ethelred, or of their Leaders, whether Kings, Dukes or Earls, the Daniſh Hiſtorians of beſt Credit are wholly ſilent; ſo little Value they had for the Memory of their barbarous and inhuman Actions; unleſs we may ſuppoſe them, according to Aſſer, to have come from Danubius, or ſome other Parts, rather than Denmark. In the Summer, there happen'd a dreadful Plague, of which King Ethelred is ſaid to have dy'd, after he had reign'd above five Years in great Reputation. He dy'd on the 23d Day of April, ſome ſay by the Wounds receiv'd in his laſt Battel; which ſeems to be confirm'd by an Inſcription on his Tomb at Winborne, cited by Mr. Camden; but that being of a modern Date, the Authority of it is doubted by many.

6. ALFRED.

Aſſer. Sax. An. III. The great Egbert, above forty Years ago, had begun and mark'd out the Way for the Monarchy of England, and like Julius Cæſar founded it; but the full Eſtabliſhment of it was left to his glorious Grandſon Alfred, the youngeſt youngeſt Son of King Ethelwulf, who like Auguſtus compleated it, and ſo firmly fix'd it, that it continu'd ever ſince. Notwithſtanding his Reign was fill'd with infinite Troubles, and innumerable Moleſtations from the Danes, which ſometimes reduc'd him to greater Exigencies, than had been known to any of his Predeceſſors. This Prince is by ſome ſaid to have been firſt ſupreme Monarch of England, and by others the firſt King that ever was anointed in this Nation. He was couragious and brave, of a winning Behaviour and a charming Converſation, and a ready Wit and profound Wiſdom. Being now twenty two Years of Age, he took Poſſeſſion of the Kingdom not without Reluctancy, being juſtly apprehenſive of the conſtant Invaſions and barbarous Hoſtilities of the Pagans. And he had ſcarcely ſolemniz'd his Brother's Funeral, when in a Month's Time with an inconſiderable Army he was oblig'd to engage the whole Power of the Danes at Wilton; where at firſt by his Courage and Valour he forc'd them to fly, but at length finding the Number of the Purſuers to be ſmall, they rallied, encounter'd the wearied Engliſh, and became Maſters of the Field. And that it might not ſeem ſtrange to any that the Numbers of the Chriſtians were ſo ſmall, Aſſer and the Annals tell us, That in this one Year the Engliſh had been ſpent and weaken'd by eight or nine ſeveral Battels againſt the Pagans, beſides innumerable Skirmiſhes; in which, tho' the Danes loſt one King and nine Earls, or principal Commanders, yet receiving ſuch frequent Recruits from beyond the Seas, whilſt the Engliſh wanted that Advantage, it is no Wonder if they prevail'd. But now being tired with inceſſant Hoſtilities, this Year a Peace was made with the Danes, upon Condition that they ſhould leave the Kingdom; which they for ſome Time obſerv'd, but to no great Effect. For the next Year the Danes having landed again, march'd from Reading to London, and there took up their Winter Quarters; where the Mercians were conſtrain'd to make Peace with them.

Alfred the firſt anointed King of England.

The Mercians make Peace with them.

A. D. 874. In the Summer following, theſe Rovers march'd Northwards, and winter'd at Torkſey in Lincolnſhire, where the Mercians gladly renew'd their Articles of Peace. Notwithſtanding which, removing their Forces to Rependune, now Repton upon Trent in Darbyſhire, they there forc'd Burhed King of the Mercians to quit both his Kingdom and the Nation, and retire to Rome; leaving all his Dominions to their Poſſeſſion. His Kingdom was farm'd out by the Danes to one of his Servants call'd Ceolwulf, upon Condition that he ſhould reſtore it upon the ſame Time it was demanded. After which, theſe Pagan Devourers divided themſelves into two Parties; one of which, under the Conduct of Hafden one of their Kings, march'd into Northumberland, where they winter'd by the Tine, ſubdu'd all the adjacent Countries, and waſted the Territories of the Picts, and the Pictiſh Britains. The other Party, commanded by Cuthrun, Oskitell and Amund, three other of their Kings, march'd directly to Grantbrig or Cambridge, where fixing their Quarters, for a Year they ſpread themſelves like Locuſts over all that Country. In the mean Time King Alfred, now perceiving that theſe Miſchiefs at Land proceeded from the Enemies being Maſters at Sea, mann'd out a ſmall Fleet, deſigning to ſurpriſe theſe Pirates before their Landing; and meeting with ſeven of their Ships, they took one, and diſpers'd the reſt: A promiſing Succeſs from ſo ſmall a Beginning; for the Engliſh at that Time were but little experienc'd in Sea Affairs. The following Summer the Danes remov'd to a Caſtle of the Weſt-Saxons call'd Werhum; where Alfred, whoſe Power had been much weaken'd, either by a wiſe Management, or as ſome ſay by Mony, brought them to ſuch Terms of Peace, that they ſwore the moſt ſolemn Oaths, immediately to depart the Land. But in a ſhort Time, falſifying their Oaths, they with all their Horſe got by Night to Exeter, and winter'd in thoſe Parts, At the ſame Time Hafden their King had brought his Affairs to that Perfection in Northumberland, that he divided that Country amongſt his Men, and began to cultivate it with Tillage. And it was in this Year, according to Aſſer, that Rollo with his Danes or Normans, having winter'd here in England, paſs'd over the Sea, invaded France, and took Poſſeſſion of all Neuſtria, ſince call'd Normandy, there reigning himſelf Fifty Years.

Sax. An. Aſſer. In the following Year, the Daniſh Fleet ſailing or roving about the Weſt, met with ſuch a Tempeſt near Swanſnich in Hampſhire, as overſet an hundred and twenty of their Ships, and left the reſt eaſie to be maſter'd by thoſe Gallies, which King Alfred had plac'd there to guard the Seas. At the ſame time the Danes were beſieg'd by the King's Troops in Exeter, and being humbled by the Loſs of their Fleet, they offer'd ſufficient Hoſtages, took ſeveral Oaths, and enter'd into new Articles of Peace. According to which Articles they left Weſt-Saxony, and departed into Mercia, of which they divided part of it among themſelves, and left the reſt to Ceolwulf their ſubſtituted King. But notwithſtanding all their Oaths and Obligations, in the Beginning of the next Year, they with a great Power enter'd into Weſt-Saxony, and quartering at Chippenham in Wiltſhire, waſted all the Country, forc'd many of the Inhabitants beyond Sea, and took Poſſeſſion of the chief Parts of it: Inſomuch that the King himſelf was conſtrain'd with a few of his Nobles, and with ſome Soldiers and Vaſſals, to retire among the woody and boggy Parts of Somerſetſhire, where he led a melancholy Life, in great Trouble and Scarcity, having no Proviſions but what he could get by Incurſions from the Pagans, or from thoſe Chriſtians who had ſubmitted themſelves to their Power. At length he was forc'd to take Lodgings with a poor Neatherd; where we are told that the Man's Wife repremanded him for ſuffering her Bread to take Damage at the Fire, no ways ſuppoſing him to have been the Man who had fought ſo many Battels, and obtain'd ſo many Victories over the Pagan Power. His Retirement was ſo private, that neither his Friends nor Enemies could tell where he was; and all this Time his Royal Patrimony became a Prey, both to the Danes and the revolting Engliſh. And here performing an extraordinary Act of Charity, in the Time of his greateſt Want, it is ſaid that he receiv'd a Promiſe from Heav'n, by Way of Viſion, that he ſhould have a ſpeedy Deliverance from all his Trouble and Afflictions.

Alfred driven to great Extremities.

Sim. Dun. Sax. An. &c. This began to appear in a ſhort Time: For Hafden and the Brother of Hinguar, coming with twenty three Ships from North-Wales, where they had made great Devaſtations, landed in Devonſhire near a ſtrong Caſtle call'd Kenwith; where by the ſudden Sally of the Garriſon, they were ſlain with twelve hundred of their Men. This gave Encouragement to King Alfred to build a Fortreſs at Athelney in Somerſetſhire, in which he bravely defended himſelf and his Followers. And in ſeven Weeks Time he march'd from thence with his Subjects and Vaſſals there, to engage with the Pagans. And coming to Ecbryt-ſtone now Brixſtone, he was met by the Inhabitants of Wiltſhire, Somerſetſhire and Hampſhire, who receiv'd their King with extraordinary Satisfaction, as one riſen from the Dead. But finding the Enemy to be far ſuperior in Numbers, and other Advantages, before he engag'd them, according to Ingulph and Malmesbury, he undertook a very uncommon Adventure; which was to take upon him the Form and Habit of an ordinary Muſician, and with one Companion to enter the Daniſh Camp as a Spy. Here he became ſo acceptable by his Singing and Playing, that he was at length introduc'd to the King's Tent; and having there and in the reſt of the Camp learnt as much as was convenient, he again return'd to his Caſtle at Athelney, where calling together all his Followers, he related the careleſs Condition of the Enemy's Camp, and with what Eaſe they might be deſtroy'd. Being thus incourag'd, they muſter'd up all their Power, and being led on by a valiant King, at Edendon in Wiltſhire, they engag'd the whole Forces of the Danes, and gain'd an intire Victory. They purſu'd them to one of their fortify'd Caſtles, where Alfred cloſely beſieg'd them for fourteen Days; 'till being pinch'd with Famine, they were reduc'd to that Neceſſity, as to beg a Peace on Condition that the King ſhould receive what Hoſtages he demanded from them, without depoſing any himſelf. Upon which they made ſuch a Peace as they had never done with any King before; for for they not only ſwore that they would depart his Dominions, but alſo that Guthram their King ſhould become a Chriſtian; all which was perform'd about three Weeks after, when the ſaid King with about thirty of his chief Nobility came to Alrey, where Alfred receiving him from the Font at his Baptiſm, became his God-father, call'd his Name Athelſtan, and took him for his adopted Son. Upon which, all the Danes retir'd from Weſt-Saxony into Eaſt-Sex and Eaſt-England; which Countries were given them for Habitations by Alfred, as appears from the League made at that Time between that King and the Danes.

and make Guthram their King a Chriſtian.

During this Negotiation, another Swarm of Daniſh Rovers from beyond the Seas, ſail'd up the Thames, and winter'd at Fullingham, now Fulham; but in the following Year, with another Body of their Countrymen, they paſs'd over into France and Flanders, where their Conqueſts and Ravages ſhew'd that the French and Flemiſh were no more able than the Engliſh to defend themſelves from theſe Pagan Invaders. In the mean time King Alfred, now at Peace and at Leiſure, reſolv'd to encreaſe his Naval Forces, and after three Years Diligence, he provided a conſiderable Fleet; with which he engag'd ſeveral of the Danes, and taking two of their Ships, he order'd the Men to be thrown over-board; and not long after he took two more, with two of their Princes, but not without ſome Loſs. Two or three Years after another Fleet of Danes appear'd on theſe Seas, ſo large that one Part thought themſelves powerful enough to enter France, while the other making up the Rivers Thames and Medway, beſieg'd the City of Rocheſter, and having built a ſtrong Fort before the Gates, from thence they attack'd the Place. But the Inhabitants made a brave Reſiſtance, and held out againſt all their Forces, 'till Alfred himſelf came to their Relief, the Fame of whoſe Approach frighted the Beſiegers to their Ships, who leaving all their Horſes and many Priſoners, return'd to the Coaſts of France. King Alfred having now reinforc'd his Fleet, reſolv'd to ſuppreſs the Daniſh Pirates who then ſhelter'd themſelves among their Countrymen in Eaſt-England, which occaſion'd a Breach of the League between him and King Guthram; and this Deſign ſo proſper'd, that coming to the Mouth of the River Stoure by Harwich, they met with thirteen of their Ships, which came prepar'd by an Encounter, took them all and kill'd their Men. But growing ſecure upon this Succeſs, and keeping in a careleſs Poſture, the Danes with all the Naval Forces, engag'd them in their Return, and much diminiſh'd the Honour of their Triumph. In the following Year King Alfred, after ſo many Cities being burnt, and ſuch diſmal Deſtruction of People, not only took the City of London from the Danes, who had it long in their Poſſeſſion, but he repair'd it, and reſtor'd it to its ancient Luſtre; and then committed it to the Government of Ethered Earl of the Mercians, to whom he gave his Daughter Ethelfleda in Marriage. And now Affairs being brought to a better Order than formerly, all the Engliſh, namely the Mercians and Kentiſh Men, as alſo the Eaſt and Weſt-Saxons, who before had been diſpers'd, and made Priſoners by the Danes, return'd to their Habitations, and put themſelves under King Alfred's Protection: And the King was now freed from the Inſults and Incurſions of the Danes for about eight Years.

A. D. 886.

And now the Affairs of the Nation being brought to a peaceable Poſture, the renown'd Alfred proceeded to many worthy Regulations, and to promote all Things that might tend either to the Honour or Advantage of his Subjects. Finding that in theſe Times Learning was at ſo low an Ebb in the Kingdom, that few on the South ſide of the Humber could read Engliſh, and ſcarce a Prieſt who could underſtand Latin, he order'd Gregory's Paſtoral to be tranſlated into Engliſh, and ſent a Copy of it to every Biſhop. And for the further Advancement of Knowledge, he ſent into France for Grimbald and John the Monk, and into Wales for Aſſer, who read to him and wrote the Hiſtory of his Life; all whom he plac'd at Oxford, where he founded that famous Univerſity in in the Year 886, and erected three Colleges, one for Grammarians, another for Philoſophers, and a third for Divines. For the Conveniency of Civil Government, this excellent Prince repair'd all his Cities and Caſtles, and built others in the moſt neceſſary Places, changing the whole Face of the Kingdom into a much better Form; and having walled ſeveral Towers and Caſtles, he made them defenſible againſt all the Pagan Power. Nor was he leſs careful in the Political Affairs of the Nation; for many of his own Subjects, under the Name of Danes having committed frequent Spoils and Rapines, in order to reſtrain all Exceſſes, he firſt divided all the Provinces of England into diſtinct Counties, and thoſe again into Hundreds and Tythings, as alſo Pariſhes; ſo that every legal Subject dwelling in ſome particular Hundred or Tything, if he was ſuſpected of any Robbery, he was to be condemn'd or acquitted by the ſame Diviſion. He divided the Governments of the Provinces into two Offices, into Judges whom we now call Juſtices of the Peace, and into Sheriffs, who ſtill retain that Name. And by this King's Care and Induſtry, there ſucceeded ſo great a Tranquility throughout the Realm, that if a Traveller had loſt a Bag of Mony in the High-Way, he might have found it untouch'd the next Day. And others add, That tho' there were Gold Bracelets hung up at the Parting of ſeveral High-Ways, yet Juſtice was ſo ſtrictly executed, that no Man durſt preſume to touch them. He was ſo exact and careful in doing Juſtice, that he frequently enquir'd after all the Judgments and Deciſions of the whole Country made in his Abſence, and very ſtrictly examin'd the Equity of them; and if he found any Failure in the Sentences of his Judges, he demanded whether it proceeded from Ignorance or a corrupt Mind; if from the former, he reprov'd their Folly and Inſolence in undertaking what they underſtood not, and commanded them either to quit their Places, or by Study and Books make themſelves fit to anſwer the Ends of them: And it was wonderful to ſee ſo many illiterate Earls, Sheriffs and publick Miniſters, apply themſelves to laborious Studies, even in their old Age, rather than forfeit their Places and Reputations. This Prince's Laws, of which many were Eccleſiaſtical, were for the moſt part Collections from the Laws of Ina, Oſfa and Ethelbert, to which ſome new ones were added. Theſe are extant in Lambard, and one or two of the Secular Laws are obſerv'd among us to this Day: As particularly, That for Entailing Eſtates, 'They that had 'Book-Land, or Eſtates in Land that came to them, or paſs'd by Deed from 'their Anceſtors, could not ſell or alienate it from their Heirs: And that for vouching of Things ſold, &c. 'No Man's Horſe or Oxe could be ſold with-'out a Voucher, one that ſhould take upon him to make good the Sale, and the 'Thing ſold according to the Bargain.

Sax. An. &c. And now after eight Years Intermiſſion, the Kingdom became infeſted worſe than ever by a freſh Invaſion of the Danes; for vaſt Numbers of them being driven by the Emperor Arnwulf out of France march'd Weſtward to Boloign; where taking Shipping in two hundred and fifty Veſſels, together with their Horſes, they arriv'd in the Mouth of the River Limene in Kent, near to the great Wood Andred, a Wood that extended an hundred and twenty Miles in Length, and thirty in Breadth. Into this Wood they drew up their Ships about four Miles from the River's Mouth, where they built a Fortreſs; and after them one Haeſten, with eighty Veſſels more enter'd the Mouth of the Thames, and built a Fort at Midleton, while theſe remain'd at Apledore. King Alfred to hinder this Storm that threaten'd his Kingdom, firſt reſolv'd to prevent the uſual Correſpondence between new Comers and thoſe already ſetled in the Nation, which had ever prov'd of pernicious Conſequence. He ſtrictly oblig'd the Danes of Northumberland and of Eaſt-Sex by an Oath of Fidelity, and receiv'd Hoſtages from them; and having gather'd together a conſiderable Power, he encamp'd himſelf between the Enemies two Armies, at ſuch a Diſtance, as to be ready to attack either, in caſe they offer'd to remove; then dividing his Army into two Parts, one continually obſerv'd the Enemy's main Body, whilſt the other remain'd ready to reſtrain ſuch Parties as foraged in the Country. The Danes rang'd about 'till they came to Eſſex, and then again paſs'd the Thames into Surry, where at Farnham King Alfred's Troops met them, and put them to flight. Their King was wounded, and with one Party ſtaid behind, the reſt croſs'd the Thames into an Iſland near Cooling or Colebrook, where the King's Army beſieg'd them ſo long, that their own Proviſions fail'd. In the mean Time the Danes of Northumberland, not able to hold their Hands while their Countrymen were inriching themſelves with Booty, broke their Faith, and with an hundred Ships coming to the East-Angles, ſcour'd the Southern Parts, as they did with forty Veſſels the Northern Coaſts, and ſailing about to the Weſt, they went and inveſted Exeter. Upon which Alfred haſten'd with all his Army towards that City, only left a ſtrong Party of Welſh, who marching to London join'd the Citizens and others from the Weſt, and paſs'd on Eaſtwards to Beamfleet; where Haeſten having built a Fort was himſelf gone out to forage, leaving a conſiderable Party to defend it. But the Engliſh ſoon cut this Party in pieces, plunder'd the Caſtle, took much Booty and many Priſoners, and either deſtroy'd all their Ships, or brought them up to London or Rocheſter. Among other Priſoners they took the Wife of Haeſten, with his Sons, which ſo affected the Barbarian, that he begg'd Peace of the King, and gave an Oath and Hoſtages for his Peaceable Deportment. Alfred willingly ſet his Wife and his Sons at Liberty, to one of whom he himſelf became God-father, and Earl Ethelred to the other; and beſides all, he generouſly beſtow'd on him a large Sum of Mony.

They are worſted.

But Haeſten being return'd to Beamfleet, could not reſtrain his ravenous Inclination, but without regard to his Reputation, proceeded to ravage all the adjacent Country; and joining with the other Daniſh Army, he built another Caſtle at Shobery in Eſſex. Then paſſing the Thames with ſuch as join'd them from Northumberland and East-England, they preſs'd on towards the Severn, waſting all the Country as they march'd. In the mean Time King Alfred ſtill carry'd on the Siege of Exeter, where the Danes being extreamly diſtreſs'd with Famine, and having eaten many of their Horſes, reſolv'd to ſally out and join with their Countrymen who lay encamp'd on the Eaſt Side of the River; but the King, with Loſs of ſeveral conſiderable Men of his Party, defeated them, and oblig'd the Remainder to fly into Eſſex to their Ships and the Fort they had built in that Country. But no ſooner was one Party ſuppreſs'd but another ſprung up: For Laf, one of their Leaders, before Winter gather'd a ſtrong Army out of East-England and Northumberland, and depoſiting their Wives, Ships and Goods into the Hands of the East-Angles, march'd Day and Night with ſuch Expedition, that they came and took the City of Wirheal near Cheſter in the Weſt, before the Purſuers could overtake them. And having waſted all the Country, the following Year they abandon'd the Place, and invaded North-Wales, from whence laden with Plunder they return'd into Northumberland and East-England; then proceeding into Eſſex, they ſeiz'd on a ſmall Iſland call'd Mercy, and another Party returning by Sea from the Siege, landed upon the Coaſt of Suſſex, where the Inhabitants of Chicheſter by a Sally ſlew many of them, and took ſome of their Ships. At the ſame Time ſuch as had poſſeſs'd themſelves of Mercy drew up their Ships ſome into the River Thames, and others into Lee-Road, on the Banks of which, the following Year they built a Fort about twenty Miles from London, at or near Ware. The Inhabitants of London looking upon this as a dangerous Curb, with other Aſſiſtants endeavour'd to demoliſh it, but were repell'd with the Loſs of many Men, and amongſt the reſt, three of the King's Officers. Upon which Alfred in the Time of Harveſt incamped nearer the City, to preſerve the Reapers from the Daniſh Incurſions; and riding on a certain Time by the River Lee, he diſcover'd a Way, by digging large Ditches, and dividing the Streams of the River, to cauſe the Enemies Ships to reſt upon dry Land; which he attempted with ſuch Succeſs, ceſs, that the Danes perceiving they were not to be got off, ſuddenly ſent away their Wives and Children into Eaſt-England, and march'd on foot as far as a Place call'd Quatbrig upon the Severn, where they built a new Fortreſs and winter'd. While the Citizens of London, with great Joy and Triumph brought ſuch of the Ships as they could get off, into their own Road, and burnt or diſabled the reſt.

A. D. 897. A great Plague

Sax. An. During theſe Wars and Calamities, there began a dreadful Peſtilence, which continu'd three Years, and rag'd both amongſt Men and Beaſts. In which the King loſt moſt of his choiceſt Nobility, as Swithulf Biſhop of Rocheſter, and ſeveral great Earls; Ceolmund in Kent, Brithulf in Eſſex, Wulfred in Hampſhire, beſides Eadbald Biſhop of Dorcheſter, Eadulf the King's Officer in Suſſex, Beornwulf Governor of Wincheſter, Eigulf Maſter of the King's Horſe, and many others. This Diſaſter was attended by many Irruptions of the Danes inhabiting Northumberland and Eaſt-England, into the Territories of the Weſt-Saxons, by means of their long Gallies, which they had built ſeveral Years before. To overmatch which King Alfred with great Charge and Induſtry order'd new Gallies to be built twice as long, higher and yet both ſwifter and ſteddier than them, ſome of ſixty Oars, and ſome of more. At the ſame Time the Iſle of Wight, the Coaſts of Devonſhire, and other Maritime Parts were ſeverely infeſted by ſix Daniſh Ships which hover'd about thoſe Quarters. The King by way of Experiment commanded ſome of theſe new Gallies to be mann'd out againſt them; which occaſion'd a Fight partly by Water and partly by Land, manag'd with great Dexterity and Courage on both Sides. Two of the Enemy's Ships were ſtranded, one eſcap'd away into Eaſt-England, and all the reſt of the Men were ſlain or taken Priſoners; but not without conſiderable Loſs on the King's Side. The Priſoners were brought to the King at Wincheſter, where he commanded them all to be hang'd up as Pirates and common Enemies; and the ſame Year not fewer than twenty of their Veſſels periſh'd on the Southern Coaſts with all the Men.

The Danes again worſted.

Aſſer. After theſe tempeſtuous Times King Alfred enjoy'd about three Years of Peace, which to his perpetual Renown he employ'd in the nobleſt Exerciſes, and after the moſt laudible Manner. And if we conſider his whole Life, we very rarely find any that ſo admirably diſcharg'd all the Offices of a King and Chriſtian; by whoſe Example it will appear that no Infirmity of Body, no Labour of Mind, nor no Diſquiets and Dangers can excuſe any from performing their Duties owing to God and Men. The perpetual Diſtractions, Cares and Anxieties in which he liv'd and reign'd have been already mention'd, yet his inward Griefs were as afflicting as his outward Moleſtations, for ſcarcely one Day from his Infancy 'till he was forty five Years of Age, was he free from extraordinary Pains, and unaccountable Diſtempers in his Body. Yet in the midſt of an infirm and ſhatter'd Body, he ſhew'd a couragious and heroick Mind, which even in his moſt debas'd Condition prov'd a continual Terror to his Enemies. His perſonal Valour was amazing, and his Actions in the Camp continually ſurpriſing; and in his Reign he fought with the Danes fifty ſix ſet Battels by Sea and Land, of which eight happen'd in one Day; ſo that by his wonderful Courage and Conduct, he ſo waſted their Forces, tho' they ſtill came in freſh and vaſt Numbers, that they were conſtrain'd to give what Hoſtages he demanded, and ſubmit to ſuch Conditions as he thought fit to impoſe. In the midſt of all the Diſturbances and Diſtractions of his Life, he order'd the Matters of State concerning his Kingdom, practis'd all the Art of Hunting, inſtructed all his Gold-ſmiths and Artificers, contriv'd new Buildings more magnificent than any of his Predeceſſors, he himſelf being the Inventor and Architect, read many Books, and ſaw that others did the like. He was conſtantly preſent at Divine Service, read Pſalms or Prayers, and alone in the Night Time when all others were at Reſt, he frequented Churches and perform'd his Devotions; he overſaw the Diſtribution of Alms to the Poor and Strangers, ſet himſelf to the ſearching of the Cauſes of unknown Things, and in all theſe Employments, and during his moſt afflicting Pains, he behav'd himſelf with incomparable Affability and Pleaſantneſs to all Men. Many Franks, Friſons, Galls, Pagans, Britains, Scots and Armenians voluntarily became his Subjects, as well Noble as Ignoble, all whom he lov'd, honour'd and reliev'd according to their ſeveral Qualities and Conditions. He conſtantly and attentively heard Sermons either from Strangers or his own Chaplains; and moſt affectionately lov'd his Biſhops, the whole Clergy, his Earls and Nobles, his Servants and Familiars. He took perſonal Care of ſuch of their Sons as were at Court, no leſs than of his own Children, inſtructing them himſelf Night and Day in good Manners and Literature. And notwithſtanding his inceſſant Care, and vaſt Improvements that he made in himſelf and others, his Humility was ſo great, that he frequently bewail'd his Condition both to God and his familiar Friends, that he was deſtitute of Divine Wiſdom, and of the Liberal Arts.

The Diſtribution of his Time and his Revenues.

No Prince in the World was ever more nicely careful of the two precious Things in Man's Life, his Time and his Revenue, and no Man wiſer in the Management and Diſpoſition of both. As to his Time, by Day and Night, he divided it by the Burning of certain Tapours into three equal Portions: The one was allotted for Devotion and God's Service, another for the Miniſtration of publick and private Affairs, and the third for Sleep and neceſſary Refreſhment; and how each Hour paſs'd, he was continually put in mind by one who had that Office. As to his Revenue, for the Management of that, he commanded all his Annual Income to be divided into two equal Parts; the firſt of which he appointed to Secular Uſes, and ſubdivided it into three Portions. The firſt Portion was appointed to pay the Wages of Soldiers, his choiceſt Miniſters, and thoſe who by their Turns attended him in his Court: For of ſuch he had three Diviſions, each waiting their Month, and then reſting two at their own Homes, return'd to their former Monthly Service. The ſecond Portion was aſſign'd to Workmen and Architects, of whom he conſtantly employ'd great Numbers of all Nations. The third Portion was kept in readineſs to relieve or honour Strangers according to their Worth and Quality, who came from all Parts to ſee him, and to live under him. The other equal Part of his annual Revenues was with a moſt free Will devoted to the Service of Almighty God; and he caus'd it to be divided into four Portions. The firſt of which he bountifully confer'd upon ſuch Poor as flock'd to him out of all Nations. The ſecond was beſtow'd on two great Monaſteries, which he caus'd to be built at Æthelingaeg, and at Scoftesburg. The third went to a famous School which he had erected for the Inſtruction of the Nobility of his own Nation, ſaid to have been at Oxford, but Aſſer names no Place. The fourth was beſtow'd on the Monaſteries round about in Weſt-Saxony and Mercia, and ſome Year by Turns to the Churches and Servants of God in Britain, Cornwall, Gall, Armorica and Northumberland; and alſo in Ireland he either according to his Ability ſent Relief, or reſolv'd to do it, as Opportunity and his Incomes would permit. Many more Excellencies might be related of this admirable Prince, but we ſhall diſmiſs this Subject with that Character given him by a great Man, who upon a due Conſideration of all Things thus breaks forth. 'O Alfred, the Wonder 'and Aſtoniſhment of all Ages! If we reflect upon his Piety and Religion, it 'would ſeem that he had never gone out of a Monaſtery: If on his warlike Ex-'ploits, that he had liv'd no where but in a Camp: If on his Writings and 'Studies, that he had ſpent his whole Life in an Univerſity: And laſtly, if 'we regard his Adminiſtration of the Affairs of his Kingdom and Subjects, one 'would think that his whole Time had been employ'd in nothing elſe but enact-'ing Laws, and promoting Juſtice in his Tribunals and Courts.

At length being arriv'd at the fifty firſt Year of his Age, God was pleas'd to remove this Great Man, after a tumultuous yet glorious Reign of twenty nine Years and above ſix Months, in the Year 900, and upon the 25th Day of October.

ber. His Body was firſt bury'd at Wincheſter, next remov'd into the Church of the new Monaſtery; and laſtly his Body, Monument, Church and Monaſtery were all remov'd without the North Gate of the City, ſince call'd Hide.

7. EDWARD the Elder.

Sax. An. Malmſb. IV. The Sorrow occaſion'd by the Loſs of King Alfred was much alleviated by the Succeſſion of his eldeſt Son Prince Edward, a Perſon highly promiſing in all his Actions; who tho' he was inferior to his Father in Learning and Abilities, yet he afterwards far exceeded him in Power and Grandeur, enjoying the Benefit of thoſe Labours which his Father had ſuſtain'd. But the Beginning of his Reign was much diſturb'd by the Pretenſions of his Coſen Ethelwald, who is ſaid to have been Son to his Father's Elder Brother Ethelred, who was his immediate Predeceſſor in the Kingdom. However his Title was thought ſufficient, if he could find Power to ſupport it; accordingly he ſeiz'd on two Towns call'd Winburn and Tweonam; in the former of which he fortify'd himſelf, declaring he would live or dye in that Place. But his Reſolutions were of ſmall Advantage, for the Memory of King Alfred was ſo dear in thoſe Parts, that the Inhabitants would admit of no Succeſſor but his Heir. King Edward, aſſur'd of their Fidelity, led an Army to a Place call'd Baddanbryg, not far from Winburn; which ſo terrify'd his Rival Ethelwald, that notwithſtanding all his boaſted Valour and Conſtancy, he fled out of the Town by Night, and got to Northumberland, where he join'd with the Daniſh Army, and was acknowledg'd as King of England: King Edward commanded ſome to purſue him, but not reaching him, he caus'd his Wife to be ſeiz'd, who being a profeſs'd Nun, and taken out of the Monaſtery without Leave from the King or Licence from the Biſhops, he return'd her to the Profeſſion and Place from whence ſhe came. Thus King Edward repell'd Ethelwald without Fighting; and the Kentiſh Men the following Year, at a Place call'd Holme fought ſucceſsfully againſt a Multitude of Daniſh Pirates. In the mean Time Ethelwald paſs'd from Northumberland into France, where being reinforc'd by the Normans, he return'd the next Year into England; and joining with great Numbers of Danes inhabiting Northumberland, Eaſt-England, and other Places, he invaded Mercia with Fire and Sword, as far as Crekelade in Wiltſhire. Then paſſing over the Thames, he waſted all Places, as well within Brædene as the adjacent Parts, and ſo return'd. King Edward with what Forces he could raiſe haſten'd after them, and laid waſte all their Lands lying between Decil's Ditch in Cambridgeſhire and the River Owſe, as far as the Marſhes and Fens. Thinking it convenient to return, he gave Orders that his whole Army ſhould decamp and march together; but the Kentiſh Men, careleſs of themſelves, ſtaid a while behind, by which Delay of theirs, and being ſeparated from the King's Forces, the Danes were incourag'd to give the King Battel, which was very obſtinate and bloody on both Sides. The King loſt the Earls Sigulf and Sigelm, with many other of his Nobles, and the Danes their King Eolrick, Ethelwald the Author of this War, with a greater Number than the Engliſh, tho' they had the Honour of keeping the Field. This Battel was fought in the Year 905, but we know not the Effect of it, but only in the ſecond Year after, a Peace was concluded between King Edward and the Danes of Eaſt-England and Northumberland, at a Place call'd Ityngaford, which laſted for the Space of three Years.

A Peace concluded.

Sax. An. &c. At the End of which Time, the Peace was broken, tho' the Annals ſay not by whom; but Hoveden charges all upon the Danes, who he ſays prevaricated with the King, and thereupon he ſent an Army of Weſt-Saxons and Mercians into Northumberland, which in five Weeks made great Devaſtations, kill'd great Numbers of the Danes, and compell'd them to renew the Treaty they had lately lately broken. But in the following Year they broke this alſo, and furiouſly invaded Mercia, where they were met by the Engliſh at Teoten hale, or Tetnal in Staffordſhire, and overthrown. King Edward was then in Kent, and had gather'd together about an hundred Sail of Ships, beſides ſuch as were ſent to the Southward and met him at Sea. The Danes imagining that he had ſhipt off the Majority of his Forces, took the Liberty to rove about beyond the Severn, and wherever elſe the Hopes of Booty could invite them. Whereupon King Edward ſent the lighteſt of his Army before, to divert the Enemy 'till he could come up; and then following with the main Body, he ingag'd them in their Return at Cantbridge in Gloceſterſhire, where he gave them a memorable Defeat. The Annals relate, that many thouſands of them were ſlain, together with Eowd their King; but Huntington mentions two other Kings, Haldene and Eolwulf, beſides Uther a Conſul, and eight other Noblemen, whoſe barbarous Names may without any Loſs to the Reader be omitted. In the following Year Ethered Duke of Mercia, to whom Alfred had given London with his Daughter Ethelfled in Marriage, now dying, King Edward reſum'd that City, and Oxford, with the adjoining Countries into his own Hands. And in the Year after, he built by his Soldiers, or much repair'd the Town of Hartford on either Side of the Lee, and leaving a ſufficient Number at Work, he march'd about the Middle of Summer with the other Part of his Forces into Eſſex, and encamp'd at Maldon, while his Soldiers built Witham in the ſame County; where a conſiderable Part of the Country, formerly ſubject to the Danes, yielded themſelves to his Protection. And now reigning in Peace, about the Year 915, he took care for the Reſtoration of the Univerſity of Cambridge, as his Father had done for that of Oxford: And by the Aſſiſtance of Pope John and Arch-Biſhop Plegmund, and by the Advice of all the Biſhops and chief Men of his Kingdom, he confirm'd to the Doctors and Scholars of this Univerſity, as alſo to their Servants, all the Privileges which had been granted by himſelf or his Predeceſſors, to endure for ever by a perpetual Right, as appears by the Copy of a Charter ſtill extant.

The Danes receive a great Defeat.

A. D. 917. About two Years after, the Danes from Northampton and Leiceſter, broke the Peace by a furious Inroad made into Oxfordſhire, where they committed all Kinds of Rapine, and made great Slaughters; while another Party with leſs Succeſs march'd into Hartfordſhire, where the Inhabitants, now ſufficiently inured to ſuch Allarms, bravely reſiſted them, repell'd them and recover'd the Booty they had taken, and made themſelves Maſters of their Horſes. During theſe Conteſts Ethelfleda the King's Siſter, and Relict of Ethered Duke of Mercia, having Charge of that Country, behav'd her ſelf as ſhe had done continually in her Husband's Time, with ſuch uncommon Courage and Conduct as ſhe became a mighty Help to her Brother in his Wars, and nobly defended all thoſe who were under her Care. But the Britains who were Neighbours to the Mercians, diſdaining to be checkt and reſtrain'd by a Woman, were ſo hardy as to make ſome Incurſions into the Engliſh Territories. She to divert and chaſtiſe them, ſent a Party into Wales, which eaſily defeated the Welch, took the Caſtle of Bricnam-mere by Brecknock, and beſides thirty four other conſiderable Captives, brought away that King's Wife Priſoner into Mercia. In the following Year this valiant Woman bravely attack'd the Town of Darby then in the Hands of the Danes, took it by Storm, after they had refus'd Battel in the open Field, and then ſubdu'd all the Country round, tho' with the great Hazard of her Perſon, and the Loſs of four of her beſt Officers who were ſlain at the Entry of the Gate. After this Victory ſhe conquer'd Leiceſter with the greateſt Part of the Daniſh Army that lay in thoſe Parts; and alſo thoſe of Yorkſhire promis'd Submiſſion and all good Deportment. But this Virago is not only celebrated by all Writers for taking of Towns and Caſtles from the Enemy, but alſo for repairing and building many others in the Engliſh Territories: As particularly Cheſter, Tamworth, Leichfield, Stafford, Warwick, Shrewsbury, Wedensbury,

At length after eight Years Government of Mercia, this renown'd Lady dy'd at Tamworth in Staffordshire, and was bury'd in the Porch of St. Peter in Gloceſter by her Husband. Huntington further writes, that she was reported to have been of so great Power, that by some she was not only call'd Lady and Queen, but King also, out of Admiration of her Abilities. She left only one Child, a Daughter nam'd Alwina, for she became so affected with the Pains of Child-bed at her Birth, that she would never more accompany with her Husband. To which Passage Ingulph adds, that in respect of the Cities she built, the Castles she fortify'd, and the Armies she manag'd, it might have been thought that she had chang'd her Sex. She made her Daughter her Heir, but King Edward so far understood his Interest, that within a Year he sent for his Niece into West-Sex, and took all Mercia into his own Hands.

Her Death.

Edward seizes on Mercia.

Sax. An. But to return back to this Prince, and his Affairs: The Year after the Taking of Darby, a new Fleet of Danes from the Southwards arriv'd at Lidwic in Devonshire under the Conduct of two Commanders call'd Ottor and Roald. Sailing Westward round the Land's End, they enter'd the Mouth of the Severn; where landing, they ravag'd all the Coast of Wales, and coming to Irchenfield, they took Kuveleac a British Bishop Prisoner, for whose Ransom King Edward afterwards gave Forty Pounds. As they proceeded, the Inhabitants of Herefordshire and Glocesterſhire, with some others, oppos'd their Progress, and put them to flight, killing their Captain Roald, with the Brother of Ottor, and many others: And pursuing them to a Wood, they there besieg'd them 'till they gave Security for departing out of the King's Dominions. In the mean Time the King hover'd with his Army between Severn and Avon, so that they durst not touch upon these Quarters, except twice in the Night Time, and then they came home short, being all cut off except some that by swimming escap'd to their Ships. The rest being almost famish'd in a small Island, remov'd from Place to Place, 'till at length they pass'd over into Ireland; and this was the Issue of this Invasion, when the Country enjoy'd a Breathing Time from these Calamities. The Pirates being departed, King Edward the better to secure himself against the Attempts of their Countrymen inhabiting about Bedford and in Buckinghamshire, who were always ready to join with fresh Comers, led his Army to Buckingham, where he continu'd a Month, and order'd Forts to be erected on each Side of the River Owse. This Management so curb'd the Power of the Danes, that many of them submitted themselves, particularly Turkitel a Commander, together with most of the considerable Men about Bedford, as also several about Northampton. This incourag'd the King to go down the following Year to Bedford, which being yielded to him, he continu'd there about a Month, and took care for the Building a Burh, as the Annals call it, on the South Side of the River Owse, which Townlet was in the Saxon's Time call'd Mikesgate. The following Year, a little before Midsummer, he went again to Maldon, where he built another Burh, and fortify'd the Town. And now Turkitel the Dane finding he was like to have but small Success in this Nation, while the King so wisely and industriously manag'd his Affairs, got leave with as many Volunteers as would follow him, to pass into France, where he knew his Countrymen might find him Employment. The King still pursu'd his Designs and Business, and to add to his Strength, he re-edify'd Torceſter in Northamptonshire, and caus'd it to be fortify'd, and likewise built and fortify'd a Place call'd Wigingmere, now Wigmore in Herefordshire.

While King Edward was busied about the Fortifications of Wigmore, the Danes of Northampton and Leiceſter, being apprehensive of the Inconveniency of so many strong Towns, laid Siege to Torceſter. But after a Days vigorous Resistance, and Supplies coming in, they left the Place by Night, and being pursu'd purſu'd and ſurpriz'd between Burnwood and Aylesbury, they loſt many of their Men, and much of their Baggage. About the ſame Time the Danes of Huntington, judging their Fortreſs not proper for their Purpoſe, demoliſh'd it, and erected another at Temesford in Bedfordſhire, by the Aſſiſtance of their Countrymen in Eaſt-England. From thence they made Excurſions to Bedford, in hopes of recovering that Town, but the Garriſon ſally'd out, and repell'd them with a great Slaughter. After which they rais'd a greater Army, both out of Eaſt-England and Mercia, which in a ſhort Time ſate down before Wigmore, but after one Days Trial, they were oblig'd to depart, with what Booty they could get out of the Country. Upon theſe Acts of Hoſtility many of King Edward's Friends gather'd themſelves together, and uniting their Forces, beſieg'd the new Fort at Temesford, which they took by Storm, after a vigorous Reſiſtance; in which they ſlew the Daniſh King, the two Earls Toylea and Mannan, with all the reſt in the Place, who choſe Death rather than Submiſſion. Incourag'd by this Succeſs, the Inhabitants of Kent, Surrey and Eſſex, with ſeveral from other Parts, went and laid Siege to Colcheſter, and ſo bravely carry'd on their Attacks, that in a ſhort Time they took the Place, and put all the Danes to the Sword, except ſuch as had the good Fortune to eſcape over the Walls. To the Relief of theſe great Numbers of Danes inhabiting the Ports and other Towns in England, united their Forces; but coming too late, they pleas'd themſelves with the Hopes of revenging the Injury upon Maldon; but that Town being timely reliev'd, they departed, not only with the Loſs of their Deſign, but alſo of many Thouſands of their Men. King Edward being jealous of their Countrymen haſten'd this Summer with an Army of Weſt-Saxons to Paſsham upon the Owſe, where he continu'd 'till Torcheſter was incompaſs'd with a Stone Wall. Which had ſuch an Influence upon the Danes in thoſe Parts, that Thurfert an Earl, with the Lords of the neighbouring Towns, and all their Army as far as Hampton North of Weolind came and ſubmitted to him. Now the King's Forces deſir'd to return home, yet Part of them were order'd to Huntington, where they repair'd the Breaches and fortify'd the Town; upon the Sight of which, all the People of thoſe Parts ſubmitted, and deſir'd the King's Protection. In the ſame Year he march'd with his Weſt-Saxon Forces to Colcheſter, where repairing and fortifying that Town, all the People of Eaſt-England, living under the Danes, together with the Daniſh Army, as well by Sea as by Land, ſwore Obedience to him, and to obſerve his Commands. The Daniſh Army at Cambridge alſo ſurrender'd themſelves, and took the ſame Oath. By this Means King Edward's Power and Dominions were not only inlarg'd, but alſo all the Eaſt-Angles were freed from the Tyranny of the Danes, who had kept them in Subjection for about fifty Years, ever ſince the Death of King Edmund; whoſe Body was this Year remov'd from Hoxon in Suffolk to St. Edmund's Bury in the ſame County.

A. D. 922. The following Year ſtill added to King Edward's Greatneſs and Soveraignty; for coming to Stamford and erecting a Caſtle on the South Side of the River, all the Inhabitants in thoſe Parts acknowledg'd him their ſupreme Lord. At the ſame Time his Siſter Ethelfleda dying, as we have formerly mention'd, all Mercia was reduc'd to his Power; which was immediately follow'd by the Submiſſion of Howel, Cledanc and Jeothwell the petty Princes of North-Wales, with all the Northern Britains, who put themſelves under his Protection. After this the King viſited Notingham, which he repair'd, and plac'd both Engliſh and Danes in it, of which two Nations, all inhabiting Mercia now became his Subjects. And to purſue and compleat his good Fortune, the next Year he march'd with an Army to Tethwall in Cheſhire, where he took Care for the building and fortifying that Town. While he continu'd there, he ſent for another Party of Soldiers out of Mercia, and order'd them to repair and fortifie Mancheſter in Lancaſhire. The next Year King Edward to ſecure all about him went down with an Army to Notingham, where he order'd a Borough to be be built on the South Side of the River over-againſt it, and a Bridge to be made for Intercourſe between them. From thence he march'd as far as the Territories of the Picts, to a Place call'd Bedecanwillan, where he commanded a Town to be built and ſtrongly fortify'd. Upon which the King of the Scots choſe him for his Lord and Patron, together with the Scotiſh Nation it ſelf, as likewiſe did Regiwald the Son of Eadulf, and all the Inhabitants of Northumberland, Engliſh and Danes, in the North as well as in the Southern Parts, as alſo the King of the Britains call'd Straetgledwalli, with all his Subjects. Theſe are the great Atchievments of King Edward as they are ſummarily ſet down in the Saxon Annals, which ſhew his Power ſo great, that none of his Predeceſſors extended his Dominions to ſuch a Proportion. By Malmesbury we are told that as it were to compleat his Grandeur, a little before he dy'd he reduc'd the Inhabitants of Cheſter and the Country about it, who having conſpir'd with the neighbouring Britains had attempted to ſhake off the Yoke; but he by his Diligence prevented their Forces joining, and by the Terror of his Name ſoon conſtrain'd them to ſubmit themſelves. And thus after a fortunate and triumphant Reign of about twenty four Years, this great Prince dy'd at Farrington in Barkſhire in the Year 924, and was bury'd in the Monaſtery at Wincheſter by his Father; leaving behind him a numerous Iſſue of five Sons and nine Daughters.

8. ATHELSTAN.

Malmsb. &c.

V. Of the five Sons that King Edward left behind, three aſcended the Throne and became Kings of England, viz. Athelſtan, Edmund and Edred. Ethelward was nearer than all the reſt, but dying a few Days after his Father, he made way for the Succeſſion of Athelſtan, who tho' the Eldeſt, and legitimated as it were by the after Marriage of his Mother, yet being born of a then Concubine, could hardly have obtain'd the Crown during the Life of Ethelward. Concerning the Birth of this Prince, Malmesbury and Brompton have this peculiar Story: That in the Reign of King Alfred, when his Son Edward was young, in a Village of the Weſt-Saxons, the Daughter of a Shepherd by Name Edgina, had a Dream that the Moon ſhone out of her Womb ſo bright, that all England was enlighten'd by the Splendor of it: Which being told to a grave Matron, who had been Nurſe to ſeveral of the King's Children, ſhe took her into her Houſe, and educated her as tenderly as if ſhe had been her own Daughter, inſtructing her to demean her ſelf as might become a Perſon both of Birth and Breeding. In proceſs of Time, Prince Edward, the King's eldeſt Son, occaſionally paſſing through the Town, thought himſelf oblig'd in Civility to viſit his Nurſe; which brought him to a Sight of this beautiful Maid, whoſe Charms ſo captivated his Affections, that he was inceſſantly importunate to lye with her. His Deſire being at length obtain'd, Edgina prov'd with Child, and being deliver'd of a Son, in reſpect to her former Dream, Edward gave him the Name of Athelſtan, which ſignifies The moſt Noble. But how uncertain ſoever his Birth was, he prov'd an excellent Governor; and now being thirty Years of Age, he aſcended the Throne by the Conſent of all the Nobility, and was crown'd at the Royal Town of Kingſton upon Thames, not without the Predeſignment of his Father by his laſt Will and Teſtament. By his own Pregnancy and Education he had arriv'd to many noble Qualifications of Mind, ſuitable to the Dignity of his Employment; and his Grandfather Alfred is ſaid to have preſag'd to him a fortunate Reign, being much enamour'd with his excellent Behaviour and his beautiful Features. When he was very young, he conferr'd on him the Honour of Knighthood, by inveſting him with a Purple Robe, a Belt adorn'd with Gems, and a Sword of the Saxon Faſhion put in a golden Scabbard; and caus'd him to be educated in the Houſe of his renowned Daughter Ethelfleda, and her valiant Husband, that he might be train'd up in ſuch Actions as might render him fit for that good Fortune and Condition which the Hopes conceiv'd of him did portend.

He is oppoſed by Alfred.

The Deſerts of this Prince, and the general Affection of the People were not effectual to prevent all Inconveniencies proceeding from the Condition of his Birth. One Alfred made a conſiderable Oppoſition againſt the Choice, as of an illegitimate Perſon, and conſpired with his Accomplices to ſeize him in the City of Wincheſter, and to put out his Eyes. But the Plot was happily diſcover'd, and Alfred denying it utterly was ſent to Rome, there to purge himſelf before the Pope; where coming to take his Oath before the Altar of St. Peter, he fell down, and being carry'd by his Servants to the Engliſh School, he dy'd three Days after. By reaſon of this Accident the Pope would not diſpoſe of his Body, but ſent to know the Advice of King Athelſtan; who being prevail'd upon by the Friends of Alfred, conſented that he ſhould have Chriſtian Burial, tho' his whole Eſtate was adjudg'd confiſcate for his Treaſon. Such good Fortune had Athelſtan againſt this Domeſtick Enemy. In other Places he found little Trouble, except on the North Side of the Humber; where Ingvald, one of the Daniſh Kings, ſeiz'd on York, and Sothric the Daniſh King of Northumberland, who formerly had kill'd his Brother Niel, by Force made himſelf Maſter of Davenport in Cheſhire. Malmesbury ſays that Sithric was a Barbarian both in Mind and Nation, that he was Kinſman to Guthram ſo remarkable in King Alfred's Reign, that having proudly contemn'd the Power of former Kings, now humbly deſir'd the Alliance of Athelſtan by Meſſengers, whom he himſelf follow'd to make good what they had petition'd on his Behalf. Athelſtan found him a Perſon ſo conſiderable, that he gave him his Siſter Edgitha in Marriage, upon an Agreement that he ſhould be firſt baptiz'd. Not long after Sithric dy'd, and was ſucceeded in his Kingdom by Godefrid his Son; but King Athelſtan thought fit to diſpoſſeſs him, and reduc'd all Northumberland to his own Dominions, to which he might lay Claim, both by an ancient Right, and a new Alliance. From which gaining of the Kingdom of Northumberland we may obſerve, That as King Edward had before conquer'd the Danes of Eaſt-England, and had alſo added Mercia to his own Kingdom; ſo King Athelſtan by the Expulſion of King Godefrid, who was alſo of the Daniſh Race, became the firſt King that ruled all England, without any King under him. And by his Conqueſts and Acquiſitions, this Prince juſtly deſerv'd the Title of firſt Monarch, tho' his Modeſty occaſion'd him to wave it, leaving it to his younger Brother Edred, who was the firſt King that aſſum'd it.

A. D. 934.

Upon the Reduction of Northumberland, Godefrid fled into Scotland, and his Brother Anlaf into Ireland; and the former was ſhortly follow'd by Ambaſſadors from King Athelſtan to Conſtantine King of the Scots, who demanded the Fugitive to be deliver'd up, upon the Peril of a ſpeedy War. Some write that a War did really commence which Athelſtan carry'd on with numerous Forces both by Sea and Land, and drove his Enemies before him by Land as far as Dunfeodor and Merlermore, and by Sea as far as into Cathneſs. But Malmesbury affirms, that not daring to diſpleaſe him, both Conſtantine and Eugenius King of Cumberland readily came to a Place call'd Dacor, where they deliver'd up themſelves and their Poſſeſſions into the Hands of the King of England, who became God-father to the Son of Conſtantine, now order'd to be baptiz'd in Teſtimony of the Agreement. But while they were preparing for their Journey, Godefrid eſcap'd, and travelling into ſeveral Parts with one Turfrid, at length gather'd ſome Men together, and laid Siege to York, where he us'd all verbal Methods to induce the Inhabitants to yield, but not prevailing, he retir'd, and was ſhortly after taken with Turfrid, and impriſon'd in a Caſtle, from whence by deluding their Keepers they made their Eſcape. Turfrid not long after was ſhipwreckt and drowned at Sea; Godefrid after having endur'd much Miſery, came in a ſuppliant Manner to the King's Court, who kindly receiv'd him; but but after he had been generouſly treated for four Days, he ſuddenly retir'd to his Ships, and his old Employment of Piracy. In the mean Time King Athelſtan demoliſh'd a Caſtle which the Danes had fortify'd at York, and carefully divided the large Booty he found in it among his Soldiers: For this Prince was ſo liberal, that he never hoarded up Mony for himſelf, but beſtow'd what fell to him, either among his faithful Servants, or upon Monaſteries.

Sax. An. Ingulph. Malmſb. But now a great Tempeſt began to gather againſt him in the North, where Conſtantine King of Scotland, exaſperated by the late Invaſion, join'd with Anlaf from Ireland, and engag'd Eugenius King of Cumberland, with great Forces rais'd out of ſeveral Nations ſummon'd to their Aſſiſtance. After four Years Preparations they invaded England by the River Humber, and paſs'd up the Country to a Place call'd Brunanburg in Northumberland; Athelſtan purpoſely giving way to obtain better Advantage againſt them. Anlaf perceiving the Valour and Reſolution of Athelſtan, and fearing his own Forces tho' numerous, reſolv'd firſt to ſpy out the Poſture of his Enemies: And following the Example of King Alfred in the laſt Age, in the Habit of a Muſician, by his Harp and Voice he got Admittance into the King's Tent, where he plaid the part both of a Spy and a Singer. Being diſmiſt in the Evening with a Reward, while he was viewing the King's Tent, and the Avenues to it, he was obſerv'd by one who had been his Soldier and well knew him; who upon acquainting the King with it, and being blam'd for letting ſuch an Enemy eſcape, anſwer'd, That he had firſt given his Military Oath to Anlaf, and if he had betray'd him, the King might have juſtly ſuſpected him for the like Treaſon. But as an Inſtance of his Fidelity he adviſ'd him to remove his Tent, which prov'd very ſeaſonable; for a Biſhop with his Retinue coming immediately after, and pitching his Tent in the ſame Place, was the firſt that loſt his Life in the Night Time. For Anlaf choſe rather by Night to ſurpriſe his Enemy, than fairly to give them Battel in open Field by Day Light; and accordingly he fell ſuddenly upon the Engliſh, and kill'd the Biſhop who came but that Night to the Camp, which cauſing a great Tumult, the King, tho' a Mile off, and his whole Army took the Allarm, and by Day Light came to the Place of the Slaughter, where they found the Aſſailants tired and diſorder'd by their late Travel, and for want of Sleep. King Athelſtan with the Weſt-Saxons met with Anlaf himſelf, and Turketul his Kinſman and Chancellor with the Londoners and Mercians engag'd Conſtantine; which occaſion'd vaſt Bloodſhed on both Sides. The Diſpute continuing hot and violent, by reaſon of the Multitude of the Barbarians, Turketul took with him a ſelect Body of Londoners, and a valiant Captain call'd Singin, and with them ruſh'd into the Middle of the Enemies, where he hewed down whole Ranks of Men on both Sides of him. He bravely paſs'd through the Heaps of Orcadians and Picts, bearing a Wood of Darts and Arrows on his Breaſt Plate, and breaking in upon whole Companies of Cimbrians and Scots, he at length reach'd Conſtantine himſelf, whom he diſmounted, and would have taken alive; but the Scots were ſo concern'd for their King, that they made a very dangerous Reſiſtance, and many of them preſſing upon the few Engliſh that follow'd him, and all aiming chiefly at Turketul, he began to repent of his Raſhneſs, ſeeing no Means of eſcaping or getting off his Priſoner; when on a ſudden Singin coming in afreſh to his Reſcue, kill'd King Conſtantine. And now their King being ſlain, the Scots were ſo diſcourag'd, that they ſoon retir'd; and the Report flying about the Army, Anlaf and all his Followers fled, after an incredible Slaughter of Danes and Scots upon the Place. This Battel, which prov'd highly to the Honour and Advantage of Athelſtan, was fought from Morning 'till Night, and was the bloodieſt that ever had been known in England; in which Ingulph aſſures us, that beſides Conſtantine, five other Kings were there ſlain, twelve Earls, and an infinite Number of the inferior Sort. Turketul, who had gain'd ſo much Honour, not long after, leaving all ſecular Affairs, became Abbot of Croyland in Lincolnſhire, which at his own Charge he had repair'd from the Daniſh Ruins, and there left the Memorial of his former Actions.

This Victory added vaſtly to the Reputation of King Athelſtan, and the Fame of it flying through all Chriſtendom, all Kings were ambitious to obtain his Friendſhip, and on any Terms to make Alliance with him. Henry the Emperor ſent Ambaſſadors to deſire one of his Siſters in Marriage for his Son Otho; Hugh King of France requeſted another for his Son; and Lewis Prince of Aquitain begg'd the like Favour for his own Perſon. With theſe Ambaſſadors were brought ſuch rich and noble Preſents as had never been ſeen in the Engliſh Nation, as rich Perfumes, Gems, Horſes of the fineſt Breed with golden Furniture, Veſſels of Onyx, and other moſt rare and precious Things, beſides the moſt valuable Reliques in thoſe Times. All which were kindly receiv'd by King Athelſtan, who under the Conduct of Turketul and his greateſt Courtiers ſent four of his Siſters, who, as Ingulph ſays, for Chaſtity were ſuperior to Diana, and for Beauty exceeded Helena. The two Eldeſt were marry'd to the Emperor's Son and another great Prince of his Court, and the two Youngeſt to the Kings of France and Aquitain; and the King's Courtiers return'd home loaded with noble Gifts, who to the meaneſt of them were richly preſented. The Renown of Athelſtan being ſo great abroad, nothing could withſtand him at home, where ſoon after his Succeſs in the North againſt the Scots, he with his Brother Edmund invaded Wales, and with great Eaſe reduc'd Ludwal their chief King to Subjection. Then cauſing all the petty Kings of Wales, as well as Ludwal, to meet him at Hereford, under the Name of Tribute he impos'd on them a yearly Payment of twenty Pound Weight of Gold, 300 of Silver, 25000 Beeves, and as many Hounds and Hawks as he ſhould demand. Moreover becauſe in the Weſtern Parts towards Cornwall the Britains and Engliſh dwelt confuſedly together, which bred Diſſentions, and frequently drew the Affections of the Engliſh from their Prince, he expell'd all the Corniſh Britains out of Exeter, and other Parts of Devonſhire; tho' they had formerly dwelt there in equal Right with the Engliſh. And to their Country of Cornwall he fix'd certain Limits, dividing it from Devonſhire with the River Tamar, as he bounded the other Northern Britains with the River Vaga or Wey.

Ingulph, &c.

All Kings ſeek Alliance with him.

Thus dreaded at home and fear'd abroad King Athelſtan liv'd in Peace for near three Years; during which Time he made ſeveral Laws, by the Advice of his wiſe Men and chief Commanders, for the preſerving of Quiet, and the Government of his Country. The Subſtance of theſe, as well as thoſe of his Father Edward's, are extant to this Day; among which were eſtabliſh'd the Price of Murder or Man-killing, from the King to the Peaſant; the Puniſhment of which at that Time was only Pecuniary, not Capital or by Death, which becauſe it makes out the peculiar Uſage of thoſe Times, we ſhall recite in particular. The Price of the King's Life by the Common Law of the Engliſh was 30000 Pieces of Silver call'd Thrimſa's, ſuppos'd to be about three Shillings a Piece; whereof one Half was paid to the King's Relations, and the other Half to the Nation or People. The Life of an Arch-Biſhop or Earl was valu'd at 15000 Thrimſa's, to be divided as the former: The Life of a Biſhop or Alderman at 8000: The Life of a Field-Marſhal, Knight-Marſhal, or General, at 4000: The Life of a Maſs-Thane or Prieſt, and a Secular or World-Thane, at 2000: And the Life of a Peaſant or Countryman at 267 Thrimſa's. King Athelſtan ſtill liv'd in great Glory and Renown; and among the foreign Princes that paid their Reſpects to him, Harold King of Norway ſent him a Ship whoſe Stern was of Gold, and the Sails of Purple, beſides other rich Preſents; and his Ambaſſadors were nobly rewarded by the King at York. At length in November 940 this great Prince ended his Days at Gloceſter, and was bury'd with many Trophies at Malmesbury, after he had reign'd fifteen Years and odd Months. This Prince's great Actions are only ſully'd by the Death of his younger Brother Edwin, of whom ſome Writers tell us, That King Athelſtan being jealous of of his Virtues, leſt being added to his Birthright, might ſome Time call in queſtion his Illegitimacy, caus'd him to be drown'd in the Sea; others ſay he was expos'd with one Servant in a rotten Bark without either Sail or Oar; where the young Prince in a deſperate Condition threw himſelf into the Sea; but the Servant more patient recover'd Land, and reported the Event. But this Story is disbeliev'd by Malmesbury, by reaſon of his great Kindneſs to his other Brothers and Siſters, and ſays that it was only to be found in the Songs of former Ages, and in no good Author. And Huntington mentions the Loſs of Edwin by Sea, but ſpeaks of it as of a ſad Accident, and a great Misfortune to King Athelſtan; ſo that we need not trouble our Reader with more Particulars in this Matter. Yet we cannot finiſh this Reign without taking ſome Notice of another Romantick Story mention'd by Bromton and other Modern Writers, That in this King's Reign, at the Time of a great Invaſion by the Danes, one Guy Earl of Warwick returning from the Holy Land in the Habit of a Pilgrim, at a Time when Athelſtan was in great diſtreſs for a Champion to fight Colebrand a monſtrous Daniſh Giant, who in Behalf of the Danes had challeng'd any Perſon the Engliſh ſhould bring into the Field; Guy accepted this Challenge, and without being known to any but the King, fought the Giant near Wincheſter, and kill'd him, and the Danes yielded the Victory; while Guy privately retir'd to a Hermit's Cell near Warwick, and there ended his Days.

Guy Earl of Warwick.

9. EDMUND.

Sax. An. Sim. Dun. &c. The great Athelſtan was ſucceeded in his Throne by his Brother Edmund, who tho' but a Youth of eighteen Years of Age, was not inferior to him in Courage and Bravery. As an Inſtance of his Power, in the ſecond Year of his Reign he invaded Mercia, and freed that Province from the Authority of the Danes, from whom he took the five Cities of Leiceſter, Lincoln, Notingham, Stamford and Darby, where they had been plac'd by his Father King Edward; but at this Time it was not thought convenient that they ſhould continue. For from what Simeon of Durham relates, it appears that he had Matter of Jealouſie and Provocation from thoſe Danes who inhabited Northumberland, whoſe King, Anlaf by Name, waſted the Country from York Southwards to Northamptom, but was ſtopt in his Progreſs by King Edmund near Leiceſter. Here Peace was made between them by the Intervention of two Arch-Biſhops, Odo and Wulſtan, which was enobled by the Converſion of Anlaf himſelf, to whom King Edmund was God-father, who alſo not long after receiv'd Reginald, another King, from the Hands of the Biſhops at Confirmation. At the ſame Time their Territories were bounded North and South by Watling-ſtreet. But this Treaty continu'd not long in Force; for in two Years Time King Edmund invaded their Dominions, and drove both Anlaf and Reginald out of Northumberland, reducing the whole Country to his own Subjection. Not long after he harraſs'd Cumberland, and gave it to Mulcolm King of Scotland, upon Condition that he ſhould aſſiſt him in all his Wars both by Sea and Land. Matth. Weſtminſter adds, tho' with no great Probability, that King Edmund having by the Aſſiſtance of Lewellyn Prince of North Wales, conquer'd Cumberland, he not only depriv'd Dunmaile of his Kingdom, but alſo his two Sons of their Eye-ſight.

He gains many Advantages.

Sax. An. Malmsb. &c. During the Time of Peace, Odo Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury ſet forth divers Canons, in the ſecond of which he admoniſh'd the King and the Nobility, that they obey'd their Arch-Biſhops and Biſhops with all Humility. The King alſo by the Advice of his Biſhops and Lay Nobles, commanded and eſtabliſhed many Laws, of which ſeveral were purely Eccleſiaſtical. And to ſhew his Love to God, and Bounty to his Church, he gave the Town of St. Edmund's Bury, with the Liberties thereof, wholly to the Martyr of that Name, and to the Monks Monks that liv'd by ſerving at his Altars; and likewiſe he added many Privileges and Advantages to the Abbot and Monks of Glaſſenbury. Thus did King Edmund flouriſh, ſtill giving Hopes of greater Actions to be perform'd by him, when in the Height of the Expectations of his Friends, and his own Confidence, a venturous Act cut him off, and a ſtrange Accident depriv'd the People of their Prince. The Year that follow'd the Conqueſt of Cumberland, the King ſolemnly kept the Feaſt of St. Auguſtine, with many of his Nobility, at a Place now call'd Puckle-Church in Glocesterſhire. As he ſat at the Table with his Gueſts, he eſpied one Leof a notorious Robber, who for his Crimes had been baniſh'd by the King ſix Years before. Being enrag'd at the Man's Boldneſs of appearing there, without conſidering his Royal Dignity, he aroſe from the Table, ran furiouſly upon Leof, caught him by the Hair, and pull'd him to the Ground. The Robber expecting nothing leſs than Death, reſolv'd not to dye unreveng'd, but pulling out a ſhort Dagger, gave the King a Mortal Wound in the Breaſt, whilſt he lay upon him with his full Weight. The Company being vaſtly ſurpriz'd at the Accident, immediately ſurrounded the Murderer, and cut him in pieces, who yet like a wild Beaſt at Bay made a furious Reſiſtance, and before he was kill'd wounded ſeveral of the Aſſailants. This was the ſtrange End of King Edmund, after he had reign'd in great Reputation ſix Years and ſix Months. His Body was bury'd at Glaſſenbury, where St. Dunſtan was then Abbot; and the Town where he was kill'd was beſtow'd on the ſame Monaſtery to ſing Maſſes for his Soul. This happen'd in the Year 946.

His ſtrange Death.

10. EDRED.

A. D. 946. Tho' King Edmund left two Sons by the Queen his Wife, namely Edwi and Edgar, yet his youngeſt Brother Edred ſucceeded him in the Throne, and was unanimouſly crown'd at Kingſton. The Courſe of his brave and pious Actions ſufficiently ſhew'd that he did not degenerate from his Anceſtors; and he was the very firſt King of England, who in Writing ſtil'd himſelf King of Great Britain. In the firſt Year of his Reign he ſubdu'd all Northumberland, which was frequently revolting by the Practices of its petty Princes, in which Action he gain'd ſuch an extraordinary Reputation, that the Scots ſwore Obedience to him to will whatſoever he ſhould will, as the Saxon Annals expreſs it. But the Northumbrians ever unfaithful, now alſo ſhew'd the Unſteadineſs of their Diſpoſition. They recall'd Anlaf, and ſet him up for a conſiderable Space; and after that they choſe one Eric the Son of Harald, a Dane, for their King, againſt whom Edred enter'd Northumberland, and having waſted the Country, return'd to the South. In his Retreat Eric boldly fell upon his Rear, which engag'd him to face about, and prepare to charge the purſuing Enemy; which ſo diſcourag'd the Northumbrians, that dreading to prove what they had ſufficiently experienc'd, they threw off Eric's Authority, kill'd Arnanc the Son of Anlaf, with great Preſents appeas'd King Edred, and ſubmitted themſelves to his Government. And now quitting the Adminiſtration of their petty Kings, Northumberland was thenceforth govern'd by Earls, of which one Oſulf is reported to be the firſt. In this late War Wulſtan, Arch-Biſhop of York, ſided, or at leaſt conniv'd, as Malmesbury words it, with his Compatriots in their Revolt, for which he was committed to Priſon, where having continu'd a conſiderable Time, he was at laſt pardon'd and releas'd, out of Reſpect to his Gown and Function. As Edred thus proceeded to equal the Worth of his Predeceſſors, he was ſeiz'd with a languiſhing Diſtemper, and being admoniſh'd by the Abbot Dunſtan of his approaching Death, he did not only bear that Affliction with Patience, but ſpending his Time in Acts of Devotion, made his Palace a School of all Virtues, and being at length conſum'd by a tedious Sickneſs, departed this Life on the Feaſt of St. Clement,

II. EDWI.

Malmsb. M. West.

VI. After the Death of Edred the Succession naturally fell to Edwi, the Eldest Son of King Edmund, who now advancing towards Man's Estate, was unanimously admitted King, and crown'd at Kingston. He was now about fourteen Years of Age, and was so extraordinary fair and comely, that he obtain'd the Sirname of Pancalus, or altogether Fair; which Youth and Beauty unhappily expos'd him to the Arts and Allurements of loose Persons. Most Writers give him the Character of a dissolute Prince, and that he gave very great Offence to the Nobility by his inordinate Behaviour on the very Day of his Coronation. At that Time there was a Lady in his Court nearly related to him, who tho' very handsom her self, had a Daughter far exceeding her in Beauty, by Name Algiva: Which Mother and Daughter, by their unchast Deportment, had so insinuated themselves into his Favour, that he could neither be at Rest, nor dispatch any publick Business without them. The Ceremony of the Coronation, and the Dinner being over, he suddenly withdrew himself from the venerable Assembly of his Prelates and Nobility into the Chamber of these Women, where he cast himself upon a Bed between them. This was highly resented by the Lords, but none durst adventure to bring him back but Dunstan Abbot of Glassenbury, and Kinsi Bishop of Lichfield; who boldly enter'd the Chamber, and finding the Crown laid aside, and the Wearer of it in the Arms of two Concubines, Dunstan sharply rebuk'd the Women, gently reprehended the King, beseech'd him not to put so great an Affront upon his Nobility, and notwithstanding his and their Threats, he pull'd him from them, set the Crown upon his Head, and brought him back almost by Force into the Assembly.

Malmsb. Sax. An. &c.

This unusual Way of Proceeding with a crown'd Head had many mischievous Effects; and the Women transported to all the Degrees of Malice and Revenge, resolv'd to procure the Ruin of Dunstan, which they so far effected, that the King caus'd all the Wealth of his Monastery to be seiz'd, and banish'd him into Flanders; nay so great an Aversion he conceiv'd against Men of his Profession, that all the Monks were reduc'd to a low Condition in his Reign; and William of Malmesbury complains, that his Monastery, which for 270 Years had been inhabited by Monks, was now made a Stable of Clerks. He and others concern'd for a Monastical Life relate this Story with sharp Reflections upon his Person, which some others do more indifferently; however he was but a Child, and consequently liable to be suduc'd by the Charms of Women, and the Conceit of his Royal Authority, which he look'd upon as uncontrolable. At length Arch-Bishop Odo excommunicated him, and pronounc'd a Separation or Divorce between him and his beloved Algiva; and the People so resented the Indignities offer'd to the Church, that the Mercians and Northumbrians revolted from him, and set up his younger Brother Edgar, leaving to him the Kingdom of the West-Saxons, the ancient Patrimony of his Family. As for the two Ladies Odo was not satisfy'd with exercising his spiritual Jurisdiction in cutting them off from the Body of the Church, but by the Council and Assistance of the Nobility, he caus'd Algiva to be drawn out of the Court, contrary to the King's Will and Pleasure: And the Severity ended not here; for after that they added Marks of Scorn, defacing her Beauty by hot Irons, and laming her by cutting the Sinews of her Hams; after which they banish'd her into Ireland. Edwi having been King near four Years, and finding that he wanted Power and Interest to revenge himself, dy'd after two Years State of Excommunication. His Death happen'd in the Year 959, and his Body was interr'd in the new Monastery at Wincheſter.

12. EDGAR.

12. EDGAR.

A. D. 959. The Death of King Edwi immediately made way for his Brother Edgar, who peaceably aſcended the Throne, and became Monarch of all England at ſixteen Years of Age; which Title he bore after an uncontrolable manner, and with a better Colour, and a greater Appearance than any of his Predeceſſors. His whole Reign was a continual Calm, without Wars or Diſſentions, ſo that he obtain'd the Sirname of Peaceable; all which he ſupported by an extraordinary Care and Vigilance, and with no leſs Majeſty and Authority. His Actions, tho' not without ſome Mixtures of Vice, were generally noble, politick and pious, and his Government was attended with great Glory and Proſperity. Shortly after his Advancement, in an Aſſembly held at Bramford, he revok'd all the unjuſt Decrees of his Brother Edwi, and took care to put his Adultreſs to Death, and for the recalling of the famous St. Dunſtan with great Honour, whom he firſt made Biſhop of London and Worceſter, and ſoon after Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury. This Prince underſtood and practis'd the true Intereſt of his Country, which was to make good Laws, and to be Maſter at Sea; and was ſo wiſe as to know, that it was better to hinder the Invaſion of an Enemy, than to ſuffer his Kingdom to be the Seat of War, which would naturally bring Devaſtation and Poverty, and make the Conqueror himſelf a Loſer. Upon which Account he with great Diligence and Expence fitted out three vaſt Fleets, and was the firſt King of England who was truly Lord of our Seas. For every Summer, ſays Malmesbury, immediately after Eaſter, he commanded his Ships from each Shore to rendezvous at a convenient Place, and uſually ſail'd with the Eaſtern Fleet to the Weſtern Parts of the Iſland, then ſending that back, he ſail'd with the Weſtern Fleet to the Northern; and thence with the Northern, he remov'd to the Eaſtern Coaſts, ſailing in this manner quite round the Iſle. In all which Voyages he was very diligent to prevent the Incurſions of Pirates, and couragious in the Defence of his Kingdom againſt Foreigners, and no leſs careful in the training up his Subjects for Military Employments. Each of theſe Fleets, as we are aſſur'd, conſiſted of 1200 Ships, and each of conſiderable Bulk for thoſe Times; ſo that the whole Number muſt amount to 3600 Sail, as ſome of our Authors expreſly affirm, but others ſay 4000 Veſſels; and there are ſome who add a fourth Fleet to theſe three, by which means the Number will be increas'd to 4800 Sail, as may be ſeen in Matthew Weſtminſter.

Malmsb. &c.

He prepares vaſt Fleets.

These numerous Fleets added much to the Fame and Grandeur of this Prince, gave a riſe to that Right ſo long claim'd by the Crown of England to the Dominion of the Sea, and ſo clear'd the Northern World from Rovers and Pirates, that all Traders were ambitious of putting themſelves under his Protection. This, and the Encouragement given to Foreigners, caus'd great Numbers to come over from Saxony, Flanders, Denmark it ſelf, and other Places. But Malmesbury ſays that their Arrival was a great Detriment to the Natives of this Iſland, 'who from the Saxons learnt Rudeneſs and Fierceneſs, Effeminateneſs 'from thoſe of Flanders, and Drunkenneſs from the Danes; being before free from thoſe Vices, contented with a natural and innocent Simplicity, and not addicted to admire the Cuſtoms and Faſhions of other Nations. But ſtill King Edgar was very diligent in ſuppreſſing theſe Vices, and particularly that of Drunkenneſs, which the Danes had introduc'd with ſuch miſchievous Effects; upon the Account of which he order'd Silver or Golden Pins to be fix'd to the Sides of their Pots or Cups, beyond which it was unlawful to drink themſelves, or cauſe others to do the ſame. And becauſe the Lives of the Secular Clergy became more and more luxurious and ſcandalous, he in a ſevere Oration to them openly diſplay'd all their looſe and ſcandalous Actions and Vices, and at length committed the Care of their Reformation to Dunſtan Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, bury, Ethelwold Biſhop of Wincheſter, and Oſwald Biſhop of Worceſter, with Order that by his regular Authority, and their Epiſcopal Cenſures, the impious Seculars might be ejected, and the virtuous Regulars reſtor'd to their Monaſteries. That Juſtice might be done in all Parts of his Kingdom, in his frequent Circuits and Progreſſes through the Country, he took a ſpecial Account of the Actions and Demeanor of his Miniſters and Judges, ſo that the greateſt Perſon could not evade the Law, nor the Pooreſt want the Benefit of it. With the Corruptions and Vices of theſe Times, he alſo extirpated the wild Beaſts, by impoſing upon Ludwal King of Wales an annual Tribute of three hundred Wolves, which ſo deſtroy'd them in three Years Space, that in the fourth there was none to be found.

Malmſb. Florent. San. An. For the Support of his Grandeur, and towards the ſuſtaining of the Charge of his Navies, this Prince had at once eight petty Kings, who being his fiduciary Clients or Vaſſals, were by Oath bound to be ready at his Command, and to ſerve him both by Sea and Land; which Oath they took at Cheſter, where he had order'd them to meet him, as he ſail'd about the North of Britain with a great Fleet. Their Names were Kened King of Scotland, Malcolm King of Cumberland, Maccure King of the Iſles, with five of Wales, namely Duſval, Griffith, Huwald, Jacob and Judehil; who all meeting him at his Court of Cheſter, to ſet forth the Splendor and Greatneſs of his Dominions, he went into a Gally, and caus'd himſelf to be row'd by theſe eight Kings on the River Dee, whilſt he himſelf held the Steerage, and was waited upon by all his Dukes and Nobility in another Barge. In this pompous Manner he was carry'd to the Monaſtery of St. John Baptiſt, where an Oration being made to him, he in the ſame State return'd to his Palace; and being arriv'd there, he is ſaid to have declar'd to his Nobles about him, That his Succeſſors might then boaſt themſelves to be truly Kings of England, when they ſhould like him be attended by ſo many Kings his Vaſſals. King Edgar did not long out-live this Act of Ambition; tho' ſome ſay this was but the Epilogue of a more pompous Solemnity, being the ſame Year publickly crown'd in the City of Bath, with an infinite Confluence of all Sorts of People. This Ceremony, according to ſome, was omitted 'till the fifteenth Year of his Reign, when he was thirty Years of Age, out of Penance for ſome former Sins; tho' others are of opinion, that it was this Year only repeated, a Thing not very unuſual among the Kings of England. In this or the next Year, according to Ingulph, dy'd Swovebing a Monk of Croyland, in the 142d Year of his Age, and ſhortly after him another in the 115th; which being in a moſt fenny and wateriſh Air in Lincolnſhire, is ſo much the more remarkable. About the ſame Time dy'd the famous Turketul, who from Chancellor to King Athelſtan choſe to become Abbot of this Place, and repair'd and much inrich'd the Monaſtery, after it had been ruin'd by the Danes; and he was the firſt that by adding to the two great Bells of that Abby ſix more, made the firſt tuneable Ring of Bells in England.

The firſt Ring of Bells in England.

Malmſb. Notwithſtanding the many juſt and honourable Actions of King Edgar, this Prince was not without remarkable Stains, eſpecially in relation to Women; which are acknowledg'd by Authors moſt favourable to his Memory. Of which we have this memorable Inſtance: Ordgar Duke of Devonſhire had a Daughter nam'd Elfrida, ſo celebrated for her extraordinary Beauty, that the very Fame of her warm'd the King's Affections into the Paſſion of Love; and to be aſſur'd of the Truth, he ſent over Athelwold his Secretary and Confident, reſolving to marry her himſelf, if ſhe was found as beautiful as was reported. Athelwold at the firſt Sight of her was ſo captivated with her Looks, that he conceal'd his Meſſage, and reſolv'd to obtain her for himſelf; which being with no Difficulty effected, he vilify'd her to the King as a Woman of very ordinary Features, and of ſo ſmall a Stature, as would diſhonour his Royal Bed; by which means he marry'd her with the King's own Conſent, whoſe Thoughts he now diverted by other Objects. But at length Athelwold's Enemies diſcover'd the Intrigue, and inform'd the King of the whole Deceit; and the more to exaſperate him they omitted no Words that might deſcribe the wonderful Beauty of the Lady. Upon which, the King being inwardly inflam'd, reſolv'd by another Stratagem to over-reach this Deceiver; and the better to effect it, he with a pleaſant Air told him that he would at a ſet Time give him a Viſit, and ſee whether his Lady was as fair as Fame had repreſented her. This unexpected Deſign ſo exceedingly ſtruck him, that he earneſtly begg'd of Elfrida to conſult his Preſervation, by putting on her worſt Cloaths, and deforming her ſelf by what other Means ſhe thought beſt. She was now ſenſible that inſtead of a King ſhe had marry'd a Subject, and this rais'd ſuch a Female Indignation in her, that againſt the coming of King Edgar ſhe dreſs'd her ſelf after the moſt glorious and charming manner that Pride and Reſentment could poſſibly invent. This had ſuch powerful Effects upon the King, that his Love being the more kindled by being ſo long defrauded, he for a Pretence appointed a Day of Hunting in a Place now call'd Harewood Foreſt, where he found an Opportunity to compleat his Revenge, and to ſlay Athelwold with a Dart. The Earl's natural Son coming after the Fact was committed, and viewing his Father's Dead Body, the King ſternly demanded of him How he lik'd this Game? To whom he calmly reply'd, That whatſoever pleas'd the King, ought not to diſpleaſe him; with which Anſwer the King's Fury was ſo appeas'd, that he ever after highly favour'd this Youth, and endeavour'd to expiate the Crime committed upon the Father, by the Kindneſs ſhew'd to the Son. The King immediately after marry'd the fair Widow, and caus'd her to be crown'd Queen, tho' much againſt the Conſent of Arch-Biſhop Dunſtan, who never would ſee her; and ſhe to make the uſual Amends for Murthers and other horrid Crimes committed, built a Nunnery in the Place where her Husband was ſlain.

He is addicted to Women.

Another Thing laid to this Prince's Charge is, that he took a Virgin nam'd Wilfrida by force out of a Nunnery, where ſhe had been plac'd by her Friends to avoid his unlawful Purſuit, and kept her as his Concubine: But for this he was ſo penitent as to ſubmit to a ſeven Years Humiliation impos'd by St. Dunſtan, without the wearing of his Crown. There was another Story of the King, which ſhew'd him to have been more conſtant to his Love, than could be expected from a young amorous Man with Soveraign Authority. Coming to Andover, not far from Wincheſter, he attempted to enjoy a certain Duke's Daughter highly celebrated for her Beauty, and commanded her to be brought to his Bed. The Mother of the Lady not daring directly to deny him, yet abhorring to be ſubſervient to her Daughter's Infamy, reſolv'd by the Favour of the Night to deceive him; and accordingly ſent one of her waiting Maids in her room, who was not unhandſom, nor wanted Addreſs towards the making of her Fortunes. For as ſoon as it was Morning, ſhe made an Offer to riſe, which cauſing the King to ask, Why ſhe would make ſuch haſte from him, ſhe anſwer'd, That ſhe could no longer have the Happineſs of his Company, becauſe her Lady had ſet her ſome Work to finiſh. This extreamly ſtartled the King, who imagin'd that he had the Duke's fair Daughter in his Arms; and while he continu'd ſilent, ſhe with the utmoſt Tenderneſs beſought him to ſet her free from the cruel Service of her Lady, as a Recompence for her loſt Virginity. The King, confounded at his Diſappointment, was for ſome Time divided between Compaſſion for the poor Maid, and Anger at his being abus'd; but at length he turn'd it all into a Jeſt, ſet her free, carry'd her along with him, and lov'd her to that Degree, that he kept himſelf to her alone, 'till he marry'd the above-mention'd Elfrida. Theſe were the Stories commonly related of King Edgar, which undoubtedly would have been much aggravated by the Monks, had he not oblig'd them by building ſo many Monaſteries, to the Number of near fifty; which indeed prov'd one great Occaſion of the Danes conquering England, for by theſe means he exhauſted the Treaſury, and gave great Portions of Lands for the Maintenance of the Monks, who refus'd his Son Ethelred Aſſiſtance according to his Neceſſity. However England highly flouriſh'd under his Government, and his Reign was more ſplendid and magnificent than any of his Predeceſſors or Succeſſors. As to his Perſon, he was both low and ſlender, yet ſo well proportion'd, that he often choſe to contend with ſuch as were thought ſtrongeſt in his Court; and diſlik'd nothing more than that they ſhould ſpare him out of Reſpect, or Fear of hurting him. And he was ſo warm and couragious in his Temper, that when Kened King of the Scots was jeſtingly heard to ſay in his Court, That he wonder'd how ſo many Provinces ſhould be govern'd by ſuch a little Man, it ſo fir'd his Mind, that immediately ſending for Kened as for ſome private Buſineſs, he drew him out into a ſecret Place, and taking out two Swords, which he had brought under his Garment, he gave one to Kened, declaring, Now it ſhould be try'd who ought to govern, and who to obey; for it was a Shame for a King to be forward in a Feaſt, and backward in a Fight. Kened much confounded, fell at his Feet, begg'd Pardon of him, and declar'd, That he had ſpoken indiſcreetly, but no ways intended to his Diſhonour or Detraction; with which the King was ſatisfy'd. After this great Prince had reign'd ſixteen Years and two Months, he dy'd in the thirty ſecond Year and Flower of his Age, on the eighth Day of July, and the Year 975. His Body with all Funeral Solemnity was bury'd in the Abby of Glaſſenbury.

His Character, and Death.

13. EDWARD the Younger.

Malmſb. Sim. Dun. &c.

VII. After the Death of the great Edgar, the Kingdom was ſoon brought into a declining and dangerous Condition; and with him dy'd all the Glory and Power of the Engliſh Saxon Nation, which in leſs than one Age after ſuſtain'd the Miſeries of many Invaſions, and a double Conqueſt. Nor was the Succeſſion determin'd without Faction and Diſturbance; for having two Sons by two ſeveral Wives, the great Men of the Kingdom became divided, Arch-Biſhop Dunſtan, and all the reſt of the Biſhops being for Prince Edward, his eldeſt Son, while Queen Elfrida, Widow to the King, and many of her Party, were for ſetting up her Son Ethelred, then about ſeven Years of Age; raiſing ſome Scruples, and objecting againſt the Legitimacy of Prince Edward, as if King Edgar had not been lawfully marry'd to his Mother. Whereupon the Arch-Biſhops, Dunſtan and Oſwald, with the Biſhops, Abbots, and many of the Nobility, met together in a great Council, and choſe Prince Edward King, as his Father had ordain'd by his laſt Will and Teſtament; and being thus advanc'd, they immediately anointed and crown'd him at Kingſton, he being then but a Youth of fifteen Years of Age. Shortly after this King's Coronation, dreadful Comets appear'd, which were Forerunners, if not Portenders, of the Miſeries of the Nation; being immediately ſucceeded by Barrenneſs of Ground, Famine amongſt Men, Death of Cattel, with other Calamities. Among the Troubles of this Reign none prov'd of more pernicious Conſequence than the Factions between the Monks and Secular Prieſts, which were begun in King Edwi's Days, and now being unhappily reviv'd extended themſelves to the Nobility, many of whom ſided with each Party. Dunſtan with the Biſhops and Monks firmly adhered to King Edward, the Seculars and the other Party favour'd Queen Elfrida and her Son Ethelred; and many of the Nobility and great Men expell'd the Abbots and Monks which Dunſtan had plac'd in Monaſteries, and brought in the Secular Clerks or Prieſts with their Wives; all which were done by the Force of Arms. To appeaſe theſe Tumults, and to end the Controverſies between the Monks and the Seculars, ſeveral Synods or Councils were ſummon'd, particularly one at Wincheſter, and another at Caln in Wiltſhire. That at Wincheſter ended with confirming the Monks in their Poſſeſſion, being mov'd to it by a Voice from a Crucifix, that pronounc'd in favour of them. But this being juſtly look'd upon as an Impoſture, the Synod of Caln was conven'd, where while the Diſpute con-continu'd violent, the Room where they met ſuddenly fell down, kill'd ſeveral, and wounded others; but Dunſtan ſtrangely eſcap'd upon a Beam, which ſome alledg'd was ſupported by a Miracle: Which Accident in a great meaſure quieted the Controverſie, and brought both Parties to join with Dunſtan and the Monks.

In the mean Time King Edward kept to a quiet and undiſturb'd Life, who being very religious and mild by Nature, out of Self-Denial and Eaſe, permitted his Step-Mother to order all Affairs as ſhe pleas'd, reſpecting her as his Mother, and cheriſhing his younger Brother with the utmoſt Love and Tenderneſs. She on the other ſide from his Kindneſs conceiv'd a more implacable Hatred, and was no ways ſatisfy'd with the Soveraignty ſhe now enjoy'd, 'till ſhe could force the Title from him; but ſhe ſtill conceal'd her Deſigns with the greateſt Artifices, 'till ſhe found a convenient Opportunity for Execution. At length the Poor innocent Prince, wearied with Hunting, and tormented with Thirſt, while all his Companions follow'd the Game, rod alone to her Palace at Corfe Caſtle in Dorſetſhire, in order to refreſh himſelf. The Queen receiv'd him at the Gate with all the Marks of Reſpect and Love, urging him to alight from his Horſe; but he refuſing that, ſhe order'd Wine to be brought to him; but while he was drinking, one of her Servants, before inſtructed, ſtabb'd him with a Dagger in the Back. He exceedingly aſtoniſh'd at this barbarous Treatment, immediately fled with all Speed towards his Companions; but the Wound being mortal, and he ſpent with the Loſs of Blood, fell to the Ground, and having one Foot in the Stirrop was dragg'd through By-Ways, and trac'd by his Blood by thoſe ſhe ſent after him, who brought back the Dead Body, and bury'd it privately at Werham. Here they imagin'd that they had bury'd his Memory as well as his Body; but the Place of his Sepulture, as it is ſaid, grew famous for Miracles, whereupon Duke Elfer, who was acceſſary to his Murder, interr'd it Royally at Shaftsbury; but notwithſtanding this Amends, he dy'd ſhortly after eaten up with Lice. Elfrida was ſo convinc'd of her Wickedneſs, that from her Courtly and Luxurious Life, ſhe betook her ſelf to very ſevere Penances, as wearing Hair-Cloath, ſleeping upon the Ground without a Pillow, and other Auſterities, in which ſhe continu'd all her Days. Thus fell Edward the Younger, in the eighteenth Year of his Age, after he had only born the Name of King three Years and a half, who for his Innocence, and the ſuppos'd Miracles after his Death, obtain'd the Sirname of Martyr: Which Opinion of his Sanctity was the more confirm'd by the great Calamities which ſhortly after puniſh'd the Land, and which the People believ'd were inflicted on them for this Murder.

14. ETHELRED II.

A. D. 979. His Brother Ethelred ſucceeds.

Upon the Removal of the unfortunate Edward his half Brother Ethelred eaſily ſtept into the Throne; a Youth of a moſt comely Aſpect, but not above ten or perhaps twelve Years of Age. Malmesbury gives us this ſhort Character of Him and his Reign; That he rather diſtreſs'd than govern'd his Kingdom for thirty ſeven Years; That the Courſe of his Reign was cruel in the Beginning, miſerable in the Middle, and diſhonourable in the Concluſion. To Cruelty he attributes the Death of his Brother, which he approv'd of by not puniſhing the Murderers; he was remarkable for his Cowardice and Negligence, and miſerable in reſpect of his Death. His Sluggiſhneſs was predicted by Arch-Biſhop Dunſtan, when at his Baptiſm he ſuperadded his own to the Water of the Font. Yet it was no Inſtance of ill Nature which the ſame Monk tells us, that upon the News of his Brother's Murder, he cry'd out exceedingly; which ſo enrag'd his Mother Elfrida, that for Want of a Rod ſhe beat him with a Wax Taper 'till he was half dead; which gave him an inſuperable Averſion to a Sight of thoſe Lights ever after. Shortly after his Brother's Death he was publickly crown'd at Kingſton by Arch-Biſhop Dunſtan, who perform'd the Solemnity with great Reluctancy, and as he put the Crown upon his Head, he in a ſort of Prophetical Manner declar'd, That ſince he had aſpired to the Crown by the Murder of his Brother, the Sin of his ignominious Mother, nor thoſe of her Counſellors ſhould not be expiated but by great Bloodſhed of his miſerable People; for ſuch Calamities ſhould fall upon England as it never ſuſtain'd ſince it had that Name. About the Time of the Coronation, at Midnight a wonderful Cloud ſometimes bloody, and ſometimes fiery, appear'd all over the Land, portending, as it was believ'd, the Return of the dreadful Daniſh Tempeſt, which had been happily allay'd for above fifty Years.

He is crown'd by Arch-Biſhop Dunſtan.

Sax. An. Florent. Sim. Dun. Malmsb. &c.

Theſe barbarous and inhuman Rovers, underſtanding the true State of England under the Government of a Child, and not beloved, in the third Year of his Reign landed at Southampton, and from ſeven great Ships took the Town, pillag'd the Country, and carry'd away great Booty. From whence they paſs'd to the Iſle of Thanet, which they alſo waſted; when about the ſame Time others from Norway did the ſame by the Country lying about Cheſter. The following Year theſe Pirates extreamly harraſs'd the Maritime Parts of Devonſhire and Cornwall; and in the next, three other Veſſels arriv'd, and much infeſted the Coaſts about Portland; to which Miſchiefs this was added, that the City of London was burnt, in the Year 981, but by what Accident is not diſcover'd. The Diſorders hereby rais'd in the Nation were increas'd by Domeſtick Diſturbances: For an unknown Difference aroſe between the King himſelf and the Biſhop of Rocheſter, inſomuch that the King laid Siege to his City. Upon which Arch-Biſhop Dunſtan ſent him a terrifying Meſſage, admoniſhing him To beware of the Vengeance of St. Andrew, the Patron of the City. But the King, tho' young and unwiſe, would not regard Arguments of that Nature, but continu'd his Siege, 'till Dunſtan was oblig'd to purchace his Removal with an hundred Pounds; which ſo affected the Arch-Biſhop that he ſent him this new Prophetical Meſſage, That ſince he had reſpected Silver and Mony more than God and Religion, the Calamities formerly foretold ſhould ſpeedily come upon him, tho' not 'till his own Death. And within two Years this celebrated Arch-Biſhop dy'd, and his Death was uſher'd in with ſtrange Fevers among Men, and prodigious Fluxes among Cattle. Immediately after ſucceeded theſe Miſchiefs, which leſs than a Prophet might foreſee: The Danes furiouſly invaded the Coaſts of Devonſhire, againſt whom Goda and Stremewold, two valiant Men, made head, and put them to flight, but loſt their Lives in the Conteſt. For two Years they caus'd but little Diſturbance, but in the third they violently infeſted the Eaſtern Coaſts, under the Command of Juſtin and Guthmund, and plunder'd the Town of Gippſwich, now Ipſwich. They were bravely oppos'd by Britſtnoth the moſt valiant Duke of the Eaſt-Saxons, who fought with them at Maldon, where great Multitudes on both Sides were ſlain; but the Engliſh were at length worſted by reaſon of the Loſs of their Commander. And now all Havens, Harbours and Landing-Places were fill'd with Danes, who ſwarm'd in ſuch Numbers into the Land, that it could not be known where to meet them with Advantage. Doubtleſs the readieſt Courſe had been for this King to have imitated his Father, and mann'd out a ſufficient Fleet to ſcour the Seas; but he was too unactive to follow his Example, and as generally the Humour of a Prince makes a ſtrong Impreſſion upon the Minds of his People, eſpecially the Nobility, and thoſe near him, as he lay idle and uſeleſs, ſo they contracted a dangerous Ruſt. And agreeable to this ſloathful Temper, by Siricius Succeſſor to Dunſtan, and two Dukes Ethelward and Alfric, it was adviſ'd, That thoſe who could not be beaten with Iron, ſhould be brib'd with Gold; of which ten thouſand Pounds was agreed, and given them on Condition they ſhould quit the Country, and no more infeſt the Coaſts. An infamous Example, ſays Malmesbury, and unworthy of Men, to redeem their their Liberty with Mony, which no Violence can force from an unconquer'd Mind.

A. D. 993. The Danes renew their Devaſtations.

This Sum of Mony quieted the Danes for about a Year, but the Sweet of it ſoon rais'd their Appetites for more. And accordingly they landed in the North, took and plunder'd Bamborough, and then directing their Courſe to the Mouth of the Humber, they waſted Yorkſhire and Lincolnſhire on both Sides of the River, kill'd Men, Women and Children, and gather'd a vaſt Booty. The Country Men with ſome Precipitation made head againſt them, but in the Battel, three of the Leaders, Frana, Frithegiſt and Godwin, being Danes by the Father's Side, betray'd them, and procur'd their Defeat. At the ſame Time no leſs Treachery was practis'd at Sea by Alfric the Son of Elfer Duke of Mercia, who having been formerly baniſh'd for his Crimes, and now recall'd, and intruſted with a Fleet to ſurprize the Danes in the moſt advantagious Place, he over Night gave them Intelligence, and then fled to them himſelf, as Florent relates it; which his Fleet perceiving purſu'd him, took his Ship, yet by ſome Accident miſs'd his Perſon; but by chance falling upon the Eaſt-Angles, they kill'd and drowned many of them. But Huntington ſays, that the Danes being forewarned by Alfric, not only all eſcap'd, but with a great Number of Ships ſetting upon the King's Navy kill'd many of the Londoners, and led many of their Veſſels in Triumph, together with Alfric himſelf. By this Time the furious Swane, King of Denmark arriv'd, who being join'd with Anlaf King of Norwey, with a numerous Fleet enter'd the Thames, attack'd London, and endeavour'd to break in and burn it when it was ſcarcely rebuilt; but the Citizens ſo ſtrenuouſly oppos'd their whole Power, that they forc'd them with great Loſs to break up the Siege. Exaſperated by this Repulſe, they invaded Eſſex and Kent, waſted the Sea-Coaſts with Fire and Sword, and then paſs'd into Suſſex and Hampſhire; and Horſing their Foot, they made their outragious Progreſs through many Countries, ſparing neither Houſes, Buildings nor Fields, nor Men, Women or Children. To put a Stop to theſe Miſchiefs, the ſloathful King and his unactive Counſellors again implor'd the Aſſiſtance of Mony, which was offer'd to the Danes by his Ambaſſadors; and the Sum agreed on was ſixteen thouſand Pounds, in expectation of which they retir'd to their Ships at Southampton, where they winter'd. This being a Time for Compliments rather than Action, Anlaf King of Norwey receiv'd Hoſtages for his Safety, and accepted of Ethelred's Invitation to his Court, which was then at Andover. Being royally entertain'd and adopted the King's Son at Confirmation, or Baptiſm, as alſo nobly preſented, he ingag'd to depart the Land and moleſt the Kingdom no more; and accordingly returning to his own Country he faithfully kept his Word.

The ſecond Tribute paid to the Danes. 16000 Pounds.

This was no ill Advice given Ethelred, to take off ſuch a powerful Aſſiſtant from Swane; but as Arms abroad have but ſmall Effect without good Council at home, ſo in Caſes of Invaſions Conſultations without Action will not avail to remove an unfaithful pertinacious Enemy. The Influence of the laſt Mony operated ſcarcely three Years, when the Danes with a powerful Fleet enter'd the Mouth of the Severn, and waſted South-Wales, Cornwall and Devonſhire, burnt many Towns, and deſtroy'd Multitudes of poor People; then fetching a Compaſs, they came and winter'd at Taveſtock. The next Year they ſail'd to the Mouth of the River Frome, and waſted the greateſt Part of Dorſetſhire, with many other Parts; and tho' the Engliſh ſeveral Times made head againſt them, yet they were always hinder'd from Battel, either by Treachery, or ſome other Misfortune. It would be an endleſs Work to relate how the Danes wallow'd up and down in every particular Place, and to enumerate all the Devaſtations they made, and the Deſolations they left behind them. Being march'd into Kent, and having beſieg'd Rocheſter, King Ethelred and his Councellors were ſo rouz'd, that they prepar'd both a Fleet and a Land Army againſt them. But the King and his Commanders, alike in Diſpoſition, delay'd their March from from Day to Day, and ſeverely oppreſs'd the Country where they quarter'd; nor did they do any Thing tending to the publick Good, but burden'd the People, waſted the Treaſury, and by their fooliſh and effeminate Carriage more emboldened the Enemy to proceed; who in the following Year paſs'd over into Normandy, probably for Recruits, but at their Return committed greater Hoſtilities than before. In the midſt of theſe diſmal Times, and horrid Depopulations, Oxford and Cambridge were both burnt and deſtroy'd by the Danes in the Year 1000; and all Studies ceas'd in each of theſe Places, 'till above 130 Years after, as Thomas Redburn relates, one Robert Bolean began to read his Lectures on the Scriptures Anno 1133; from which Time, adds he, the Scholars have continu'd both at Oxford and Cambridge.

The two Univerſities burnt.

Sax. An. Sim. Dun. In the mean Time the King, to make ſome Diverſion, undertook an Expedition both by Sea and Land into Cumberland, where the Danes had been moſt planted and liv'd in Peace; and there, and in the Iſle of Angleſey, he imitated his Enemies in Ravages and Devaſtations. About the ſame Time the Danes returning out of Normandy, enter'd the Mouth of the River Ex, laid Siege to Exeter, batter'd the Walls, and reſolv'd to ſtorm it; but the Inhabitants, like thoſe of London, made ſo brave a Defence, that they were oblig'd to retire, all which was immediately reveng'd upon the poor helpleſs Country People, who after the Loſs of their Goods and Houſes were murder'd in great Multitudes. At length thoſe of Devonſhire and Somerſetſhire united in one Body, and made ſome Reſiſtance at a Place call'd Penho, but being overpower'd in Numbers, were repell'd with great Slaughter. This both incourag'd and inrag'd the inſolent Enemy, who now horſing all his Men, committed greater Ravages in Devonſhire than ever, and then return'd with his Fleet to the Iſle of Wight, and ſometimes there, and at othertimes in Hampſhire and Dorſetſhire, he without Reſiſtance follow'd this ordinary Courſe of Life, doing ſuch Execution by Sword againſt Men, and by Fire againſt Towns, that he terrify'd all from engaging with him either at Sea or Land. King Ethelred, whom no Adverſity could throughly awaken from his ſoft and eaſie Life, by the Advice of Counſellors as unactive as himſelf, ſent an effeminate yet aſſuming Courtier call'd Leof, to propoſe a third Tribute or Preſent to the Danes for Peace; to which theſe Devourers readily harken'd, but cunningly enhanc'd the Sum to twenty four thouſand Pounds; which being paid down, they deſiſted from all Acts of Hoſtility.

More Calamities.

The third Tribute paid to the Danes. 24000 Pounds.

Sax. An. Hunting. M. Weſt. &c. King Ethelred having thus bought off his Enemies, reſolv'd to ſtrengthen his Family by ſome potent Alliance; and accordingly he treated with Richard Duke of Normandy in France, a Perſon with whom formerly he had great Enmity, and marry'd his Daughter Emma, a Lady of ſuch admirable Beauty, that ſhe was ſtil'd the Flower and Pearl of Normandy. Her Mother's Name was Gunnor, deſcended from an eminent Daniſh Family; for which it was hop'd, that her Intereſt might be ſufficient to oblige the Danes to more Reaſon and Fidelity. But the King being now ſwell'd with the Thoughts of his new Alliance, reſolv'd upon a violent and dangerous Expedient, which was to take a full Revenge for all the Inſults and Barbarities of the Daniſh Nation. It ſeems at this Time vaſt Numbers of Danes dwelt in Peace in all Parts of this Nation, in a manner incorporated with the Engliſh, who leading lazy and idle Lives, lorded it over the Inhabitants, whom they made Servants and Drudges, and their Wives and Daughters ſubſervient to their Pleaſures; whence they were call'd Lord-Danes, and to this Day in ſome Countries a lazy idle Man is from thence call'd Lurdane. To put an end to all their Power at once, the King reſolv'd upon a general Maſſacre; and with the utmoſt Secrecy ſent Letters into all Parts, commanding all his Subjects upon a certain Hour on the ninth Day of July, to ſet upon the Danes wherever they found them, and to deſtroy them all without Mercy. This Command was ſtrictly executed, and the Danes, who by a League ſolemnly ſworn had been admitted to inhabit among the Engliſh, were moſt moſt ſhamefully and barbarouſly murder'd; no Age or Sex eſcap'd, the Women were butcher'd as well as the Men, and the Brains of Children daſh'd againſt the Walls. At London, in the Time of this Execution, great Numbers fled to Churches, but thoſe ſacred Places were no Security, for they were all without Pity ſlain as they ſtood embracing the Altars. And when the Multitude found themſelves Maſters, they proceeded to new Barbarities, digg'd Holes in the Ground, put Daniſh Women in them up to the Waſte, and then ſet fierce Maſtives upon them, which cruelly tore off their Breaſts. A popular Fury, when back'd by Authority knows no Bounds, nor Authority it ſelf, when it has broken publick Juſtice. There were ſeveral Danes of the higheſt Quality in the Land, receiv'd upon the publick Faith as Hoſtages to ratifie the late Peace; among whom was King Swane's Siſter Gunildes, Wife to Count Paleng, who ſeveral Years before had come into England with her Family, where ſhe had receiv'd the Chriſtian Faith; and being a Woman of great Prudence and Temper, had often interpos'd to make Peace between the two Nations, and had now lately given up her ſelf, her Husband and her Son as Hoſtages to King Ethelred. This Princeſs had firſt her Husband and Son ſlain before her Face, and was then order'd to be beheaded her ſelf, which Sentence ſhe took with an unconcern'd Bravery and Courage, and at her Death foretold, That her Blood would coſt England dear, and would not be long unreveng'd.

King Swane reſolves to revenge it.

The Conſequences of this horrid Maſſacre were very terrible to the Engliſh Nation; for King Swane being exaſperated to the higheſt Degree of Rage and Reſentment, invited all Strangers to his Aſſiſtance, and reſolv'd contrary to his former Methods, to make a full Puſh, and conquer the whole Kingdom. Accordingly with a powerful Fleet, arriving at the South Weſtern Parts of the Nation, by the Treaſon or Negligence of Count Hugh, whom Queen Emma had recommended to the Government of Devonſhire, he ſtorm'd the City of Exeter, demoliſh'd the Walls from the Eaſt to the Weſt Gate, and march'd off with great Booty. After this he waſted Wiltſhire, where a ſtrong Party drawn out of ſeveral Countries, advanc'd to give him Battel. But when the Armies were juſt ready to engage, Alfric the Engliſh General, whoſe Son's Eyes the King had put out for the Father's Treaſon, feign'd a ſudden Sickneſs, and diſcourag'd his Army ſo far, that the Soldiers retir'd with Precipitation. Upon which Swane without Reſiſtance march'd up to Wilton, which he both plunder'd and burnt, and having dealt in the ſame manner with Salisbury, he return'd to his Ships. The following Year he ſail'd to the Coaſts of Norfolk, where landing he plunder'd and burnt the City of Norwich, uſing ſuch Expedition, that he altogether ſurpriz'd the valiant Ulfketel Duke of the Eaſt-Angles, who wanting Time to levy an Army, by the Advice of the Nobility of thoſe Parts, made Peace with him. But Swane in a few Days perfidiouſly broke it, and removing ſuddenly from his Ships, he ſoon plunder'd and burnt Thetford. Ulfketel having Intelligence of this unexpected Enterprize, order'd a Party to haſten and burn his Ships in the Harbour, which out of Fear or Deſign was neglected; while he with the utmoſt Secrecy and Diligence gather'd together his Forces, couragiouſly march'd againſt the Enemy, and made a brave Attack, as they retreated towards their Ships. But being inferior in Numbers, moſt of the beſt Quality among the Eaſtern Engliſh loſt their Lives; yet the Danes receiv'd very great Loſs, and with much Difficulty recover'd their Fleet; confeſſing that in the whole Iſland they never met with ſo ſharp an Ingagement, as they did from this valiant Commander.

He invades the Nation.

A. D. 1005. So great a Famine happen'd in the following Year that it forc'd a Ceſſation, and for a while drove Swane back into Denmark, but ſupply'd the Place of his Sword in the Deſtruction of the poor People of England, as many of which periſh'd by Hunger, as formerly had ſuffer'd in a Year by his Cruelties. So that England was now in a miſerable Condition, and involv'd in all ſorts of Calamities: The King was luxurious, ſloathful and remiſs, wanting Vigour and Reſolution in all Emergencies: The Nobility and Officers were negligent and unexperienc'd, yet highly poſſeſs'd with private Heats and Animoſities, which occaſion'd not only a dangerous Diſunion, but a betraying of all Secrets to the Enemy: The Church Men hated the King, ſtood upon their Privileges, and refus'd to contribute any conſiderable Sums to the publick Neceſſities. To all which Miſchiefs, beſides Famine, Providence was pleas'd to add Storms and Tempeſts, which much endamag'd the King's Ships, and weaken'd the Naval Power of the Nation. So that the Enemy had free Liberty to range and ravage as they thought fit; and accordingly an innumerable Multitude of Daniſh Ships were ſeen in Sandwich Road in the Year 1006, from whence Swarms of Rovers overran all Kent and Suſſex, deſtroying all with Fire and Sword. The King to oppoſe them rais'd an Army out of Mercia and Weſt-Saxony, with a Reſolution to engage them in Perſon; but they who held it ſafer to live by Rapine, than to hazard a Battel, by ſwift and eaſie Removals, fruſtrated the ſlow Motions of a heavy Camp, and following their uſual Courſe of Robbery, they carry'd a vaſt Booty to the Iſle of Wight, where they ſafely winter'd 'till Chriſtmaſs. Then underſtanding that the King was in Shropſhire, where he was wickedly imploy'd in the Blood of ſome worthy Subjects, they over-ran Hampſhire and Barkſhire as far as Reading and Wallingford, which they burnt with other Places. Then returning by another Way, they found many of the People in Arms by the River Kenet; but making their Way through, they with new Plunder recover'd their Ships. The King and his Courtiers being weary'd with the Fatigues of the laſt Year's unſucceſsful March againſt the quick Motions of the Danes, agreed to have Recourſe to their laſt Remedy their Coffers; and therefore ſent a fourth Time to buy a diſhonourable Peace, which every Time prov'd dearer, and now could not be obtain'd under thirty ſix thouſand Pounds; which was extorted from the Nation already half ſunk with Poverty. At the ſame Time Ethelred advanc'd Edric, ſirnam'd Streone, to the Dukedom of Mercia; a Perſon who having rais'd himſelf to his Favour and vaſt Fortunes, by his ſubtle and plauſible Tongue, ſhortly prov'd a mighty Inſtrument in the Ruin of England.

The fourth Tribute paid to the Danes. 36000 Pounds.

Sim. Dun. Sax. An. The next Year produc'd ſomething laudable, which ſhew'd the King had not loſt all Care of his Nation; for he enacted that every 310 Hides of Land ſhould furniſh out a Gally, and every nine Hides find a Corſlet and Head-Piece, and commanded the Ships to be built with the utmoſt Expedition; which when ready, were victuall'd and mann'd with choice Soldiers, and their Rendezvous appointed at the Port of Sandwich, to ſecure all the Coaſts from the Deſcent of Foreigners. Now a Hide was ſo much Land as one Plow could ſufficiently till in a Year; which made the Fleet very numerous, ſo that England was believ'd to be now in a ſafe Condition; when ſuddenly Diſſention, the Bane of all good Deſigns, ſprung up among the Nobility. For this Year, Brithric, the Brother of Duke Edric, proud and deceitful like himſelf, falſly accus'd Wulwoth, a great Officer of the South-Saxons, to the King, who fearing the Malice and Potency of his Enemy, immediately fled to the Sea, where with twenty Ships he practis'd Piracy upon the Coaſts. Upon a Belief that he might be eaſily taken, Brithric follow'd him with eighty Veſſels, but by a violent Storm they were all caſt on the Shore, where Wulwoth ſoon after burnt them. This Misfortune ſo diſhearten'd the King and his Nobility, that they ſuddenly return'd home, ordering the Fleet up to London; ſo that the People were tax'd and oppreſs'd to no Advantage. Upon this, the next Year, Turkill a Daniſh Earl arriv'd on the Coaſts with ſome Ships, and in Auguſt was follow'd by an innumerable Company of Daniſh Veſſels commanded by Hemming and Eilaf, who landing in the Iſle of Thanet, join'd with Turkill, paſs'd to Sandwich, and then to Canterbury, where they forc'd the Inhabitants and Neighbours to purchace their Peace with three thouſand Pounds. Then returning to their Ships, they ſail'd to the Iſle of Wight, from whence entering Suſſex and Hampſhire, Factions among the Nobility.

Further Miſchiefs from the Danes.

ſhire, they follow'd their uſual Exerciſes of Plundering and Burning. King Ethelred was again ſo ſenſible of his Peoples Miſeries as to levy Forces throughout the Land, which he order'd in Places near the Sea to reſtrain their Irruptions; but all was acted ſo unskilfully, or at leaſt ſo unſucceſsfully, that the Enemy follow'd their Rapines as much as ever. Once having gone further than uſual from the Sea, the King ſuddenly ſtepp'd in between them and their Veſſels, ſeiz'd on a neceſſary Paſs of theirs, and reſolv'd with his whole Army to die or overcome. But after all this fair Proſpect, the traiterous Edric, who had now marry'd the King's Daughter, by ſubtle Arguments urg'd, That as Circumſtances now ſtood, it was their Intereſt to permit the Danes to paſs unmoleſted; which Council prevailing, the Enemy got ſafe back to their Ships contrary to their Expectations, with great Joy and Booty. After which they went to the Coaſts of Kent, and reſolv'd to winter in the Thames, where they maintain'd themſelves on both Sides of the River; often attempting to gain London, but were as often repell'd by the Citizens with no ſmall Loſs.

A. D. 1010. Before Winter was over, leaving their Ships, they march'd through Chiltern Wood into Oxfordſhire, burnt the City, and returning thence with divided Forces, waſted the Country on both Sides of the Thames; but hearing that an Army from London was marching againſt them, they on the North Side, paſſing the River at Stanes, join'd with thoſe on the South, and being laden with extraordinary Spoils, paſs'd through Surry to their Ships, in repairing of which they ſpent the Lent following. After Eaſter, they enter'd Suffolk, and coming near Ipſwich to a Place call'd Ringmere, they were warmly entertain'd by the brave Ulfketel and his Forces; but his Men at length giving back, through the Subtlety of a Daniſh Servant amongſt them who began the Flight, loſt the Field, tho' the Cambridgeſhire Men ſtill made a noble Reſiſtance, which turn'd much to their future Honour. In this Battel fell Ethelſtan, the King's Son-in-Law, Oſwi a Nobleman with his Sons and many others, together with a great Number of the ordinary Sort. The Danes being Maſters of the Field, had now Eaſt-England at their Mercy, in which horſing themſelves, they ſpent three Months in the moſt barbarous Ravages, burnt Thetford, Cambridge and other Places, and kill'd all they could meet in their Way, toſſing Infants on the Points of their Spears. After this, their Foot by Sea, and their Horſe through Eſſex, return'd to the Thames, where continuing a few Days, they again quitted their Ships, and paſs'd into Oxfordſhire, which they waſted, together with the Counties of Buckingham, Bedford and Hertford; and having burnt the Towns, and kill'd Mankind, and all other living Creatures, they return'd to their Ships. Yet ſtill the ſame Year they made a third Excurſion into Northamptonſhire; and burnt that Town with all about it; then as to freſh Paſture they betook themſelves to Weſt-Saxony, where having waſted Wiltſhire and other Parts, they return'd again to their Ships, as ſo many ravenous wild Beaſts glutted with Blood to their Dens. They were neither yet ſo wearied with Travel, nor ſatisfy'd with Wealth, but that in the following Year they took a larger Range than ever. For on the North Side of the Thames, with Fire and Sword they waſted all Eaſt-England, Eſſex, Middleſex, Hertfordſhire, Buckinghamſhire, the Counties of Oxford, Bedford and Cambridge, with Half of Huntington, and the greateſt Part of Northampton, and on the South Side Kent, Surry, Suſſex, with the Counties of Southampton, Wilts and Berks.

Dreadful Ravages and Barbarities from the Danes.

Upon theſe inſupportable Miſchiefs, Meſſengers were ſent to ſolicit for Peace, promiſing them more Mony; which they accepted, but without any Intention to keep their Faith. For they ſoon broke their Words, firſt by plundering the Country in ſeveral Parties, and in September by laying Siege to Canterbury, which in twenty Days they took by the Treachery of Almere the Arch-Deacon. Here they committed unheard of Barbarities by Way of Sport and Diverſion: They ſlew ſome by the Sword, threw others over the Wall, others into the Fire, hung up ſome by the Privy Members, Infants torn from their Mothers Breaſts Canterbury taken.

Breaſts were either toſt on Spears, or had Carts drawn over them, Matrons and Virgins were dragg'd about by the Hair and raviſh'd; Alfage the Arch-Biſhop was taken, wounded, and impriſon'd in a noiſom Place; Chriſt-Church was burnt, Monks, Men, Women and Children were decimated, whereof nine were kill'd, and the tenth reſerv'd to a Life worſe than Death: So that of the whole Multitude there remain'd only four Monks, and eight hundred Men. They kept the Arch-Biſhop Priſoner for ſeven Months, during which Time theſe barbarous Miſcreants were viſited with a Plague in their Bowels, of whom two thouſand periſh'd miſerably; and thoſe who ſurviv'd being grievouſly tormented, the Chriſtians took Occaſion to urge the Delivery of the Arch-Biſhop, but they ſtill deferr'd it. As ſoon as Spring appear'd, the traiterous Edric, and the reſt of the Nobility of both Orders aſſembled at London, where they held their Councils, and continu'd ſo long, 'till a fifth Sum or Tribute was paid to the Danes, which now was rais'd from thirty ſix to forty eight thouſand Pounds. In the mean Time the Arch-Biſhop had his Ranſom ſet at three thouſand Pounds, which he conſtantly refuſing to pay or procure, was at length barbarouſly murder'd by them in a full Aſſembly of drunken People; his Body being afterwards bury'd in the Church of St. Pauls in London. The Tribute being paid, and the Peace confirm'd by ſolemn Oath on both Sides, the Daniſh Fleet retir'd, only forty five Ships remain'd with King Ethelred for the Defence of England againſt all Foreigners, on Condition to be maintain'd with Victuals and Cloathing. It appears from the Saxon Laws, that beſides this Payment of forty eight thouſand Pounds, it was this Year reſolv'd that a yearly Payment ſhould be made call'd Danegeld, that is twelve Pence upon every Hide of Land in the Nation, for the Subſiſtance of thoſe who were to hinder the Irruptions of the Danes and other Pirates; which Tax continu'd for about thirty eight Years, 'till it was remitted by Edward the Confeſſor. So that there were two Sorts of Danegeld; the former, thoſe five occaſional Sums formerly recited; the latter, that continu'd Tax laſt mention'd. But both Sorts alike contributed to the Ends for which they were paid: The former only bought off the perfidious Danes for a ſmall Time; and the other was ſo far from ſecuring the Coaſts by ſcouring the Seas, that Turkill, who ſtaid behind as Admiral of the new modell'd Engliſh Fleet, ſeems to have done it for no other End, beſides ſqueezing the Nation's Mony, than to give Intelligence to King Swane when it would be moſt ſeaſonable to reinvade the Land.

The Payment of Danegeld.

Sax. An. Sim. Dun. &c. Accordingly in July 1013, King Swane with a powerful Force landed at Sandwich, reſolving now to make a full Conqueſt of the Nation; finding it ſufficiently weaken'd by Diviſions, and exhauſted by Poverty. He ſtay'd but a few Days there, finding Humber to be a more convenient Place, into which he enter'd; and paſſing up the Trent, he ſail'd to Gainsborough in Lincolnſhire, where he landed, and encamp'd his great Army. To which Place Earl Uthred with the Northumbrians repair'd to him with all Speed; the Inhabitants of Lindſey, afterwards thoſe of Fisburgh, and by Degrees all ſuch as inhabited North of Watling-Street, yielded up themſelves, deliver'd Hoſtages, and ſwore Allegiance to him as their King. He only now impos'd upon them the Furniſhing of his Army with Horſes and Proviſions, and then delivering the Hoſtages and the Fleet into the Hands of his Son Canute, with a choice Party of Auxiliaries taken from the Engliſh, he undertook an Expedition againſt the Southern Mercians. Having paſs'd over Watling-Street he gave order to his Men to waſte the Fields, burn the Villages, rob the Churches, kill all the Males, and reſerve the other Sex for their Luſt. Which being rigorouſly executed, in the Terror of theſe Actions he march'd to Oxford, and took it ſooner than he expected; where having receiv'd Hoſtages, he haſten'd to Wincheſter, which in a great Fear alſo yielded, and deliver'd up their Hoſtages. From thence he turn'd his Courſe towards London, and not being careful in finding a Bridge or Ford over the Thames, he loſt many of his Men in that River. Nor was his Expedition againſt London proſperous; for uſing all Methods of Force and Policy to take the City, where Ethelred himſelf, and Turkill with his Forces reſided, he was bravely repell'd as at other Times. Upon which he directed his March to Wallingford, and after that to Bath, where, after he had made new Devaſtations, he ſtay'd ſome time to refreſh his Army. To which Place Ethelmar Earl of Devonſhire, with other Officers of the Weſtern Parts, repair'd, gave Hoſtages, and made Peace with him; whoſe Example was not long after follow'd by the Citizens of London, who finding it in vain to ſtrive againſt the Univerſal Current, and dreading his Cruelties, ſent alſo their Hoſtages, and made their Peace. Which Things being accompliſh'd according to his Deſires, Swane was by all the Nation of the Engliſh both ſtiled and accounted King; if by Right we can call him a King, ſays our Author, who acted all things like a barbarous Tyrant.

All Places ſubmit to him.

and acknowledge him their King.

A. D. 1013. VIII. From this Time we may date the firſt Soveraign Power of the Danes in England, for which in the Space of two hundred Years they had been often contending, with infinite Ravages and Devaſtations. And now Ethelred, being a King more in Name than Nature, thought it moſt conſiſtent with the Straitneſs of his Fortunes to ſend away Emma his Queen, and his two Sons Edward and Alfred with all his Treaſure into Normandy to her Brother Richard, the ſecond of that Name, and Duke of that Province. He himſelf continu'd for ſome time at Greenwich with the Daniſh Fleet then lying in the Thames, and from thence remov'd to the Iſle of Wight; where having kept a melancholy Chriſtmaſs, he follow'd them into Normandy, and at Roven was ſplendidly entertain'd by the Duke, tho' known to have behav'd himſelf proudly and churliſhly to his Siſter Emma, beſides his diſſolute Company with other Women. In the mean Time Swane the Tyrant, reſiding at Gainsborough, laid inſupportable Taxes upon the Country, beſides the Contribution for Maintenance of his Fleet; and at the ſame Time Turkill at Greenwich was not backwards in his Exactions for inriching himſelf and his Followers. So that both Parties were fully agreed in this, by their Violence and Rapines to harraſs and exhauſt the miſerable Engliſh Nation. But Swane to all his other Cruelties and Impieties, added one, which in the Opinion of our Writers, compleated his Condemnation. He endeavour'd to prophane the Memory of the King and Martyr St. Edmund, and exacted a grievous Tribute from the Town of St. Edmund's Bury, where his Body reſted; threatning that if the Mony was not ſpeedily paid, he would lay the Town in Aſhes, demoliſh the Church of their Martyr, and put the Clerks to various Torments. Now to proceed in a Story, once univerſally believ'd; becauſe, ſay they, he would not moderate his Wickedneſs, divine Vengeance would not permit the Blaſphemer to live. But at Gainsborough, as he held an Aſſembly, incircled with arm'd Men, upon his caſting out his Threats, he immediately ſaw St. Edmund coming arm'd upon him, whereupon he cry'd out, Help, Fellow Soldiers, St. Edmund comes to kill me! upon which Words, he receiv'd a mortal Wound by the Hands of the Saint, and dy'd ſoon after in great Torment; his Body being bury'd in the City of York. Thus much our Monkiſh Writers report concerning his Death, which ſeems to hint this Truth to us, that Swane was kill'd by ſome unknown Hand, who had the good Fortune to eſcape. All agree that he met with a ſudden End at Gainsborough, which Place was his chief Reſidence the ſhort Time of his Engliſh Soveraignty, and the Place where moſt of his Ships and Soldiers lay, in order to make their Excurſions as occaſion requir'd.

A. D. 1014. King Swane being dead, his Subjects the Danes elected his Son Canute, or Cnute, for his Succeſſor. But the Inclinations of the Engliſh were towards their own natural Prince, whom they aſſur'd by Meſſengers ſent to Normandy, *That they would aſſiſt and join with him againſt all Pretenders, if he would promiſe to govern them with greater Care and Clemency than formerly. ſelf into their Hands, thought fit to ſend over his Son Edward to promiſe all good Deportment, and to ſound the Affections of the Nobility and People, who finding all Things correſpondent to his Deſires, return'd back with Confidence to bring over his Father. The King was receiv'd by his Subjects with all imaginable Joy and Applauſe, and he to oblige the Nation, and to anſwer their Expectations, us'd all Diligence and Diſpatch in raiſing an Army againſt Canute; who lying now at Gainsborough with his Fleet and Hoſtages, was no leſs diligent in levying Men and Horſes, threatning ſeverely to chaſtiſe the Revolters from his Father's Kingdom. But Ethelred's Forces ſurpriz'd him before he was fully prepar'd, and conſtrain'd him to quit the Parts of Lindſey, the Inhabitants of which being left to the Anger of their Countrymen, were proſecuted without Mercy by Fire and Sword. Canute ſailing away with his Fleet, and being driven by Weather into Sandwich Road, there to revenge himſelf upon the Engliſh Nation, he cut off the Ears, Noſes and Hands of all the Hoſtages he had in his Power, and ſetting them a-ſhore, departed for Denmark to recruit his Army. Upon the Danes Departure another Calamity ſucceeded; for on the 27th of September, the Sea aroſe to ſuch a Height, by an impetuous Wind and Tide, that it broke the Banks, and overwhelm'd many Villages, and drown'd a vaſt Number of People. And notwithſtanding this great Damage to the Nation, yet Neceſſity urging, a new Tax of thirty thouſand Pounds was levy'd for paying the Daniſh Fleet which lay at Greenwich. The next Year produc'd Miſchiefs of another Nature, when at an Aſſembley of the Eſtates, as well Danes as Engliſh, held at Oxford, by the Advice of the traiterous Edric, the King caus'd ſeveral Daniſh Noblemen to be put to Death under Pretence of a Conſpiracy againſt his Perſon. Beſides this, Edric by plauſible Words intic'd Sigeferth and Morcar, two Northumbrian Earls, into his Lodgings, and there ſecretly murder'd them; upon which their Servants and Dependents aroſe and endeavour'd to revenge their Deaths, but were repell'd by the King's Soldiers, and purſu'd into the Tower of St. Frideſwith's Church, where Fire being ſet to it, they all miſerably periſh'd in the Flames. The King, without any known Cauſe, ſeiz'd upon the Eſtates of the two murder'd Earls, and commanded Algitha, the Wife of Sigeferth, to be kept Priſoner at Malmesbury, as a Lady of great Power and Intereſt. But not long after Edmund the King's Son coming thither, fell in Love with her, and without his Father's Knowledge, marry'd her; after which he took her with him into Northumberland, where invading the Lands of Sigeferth and Morcar, he ſubdu'd that Country.

Ethelred returns back to England.

Sax. An. Bim. Dun. &c. About the ſame time King Canute arriv'd with a vaſt Power from Denmark, and as ſome write with two other Kings, Lachman of Sweden, and Olaus of Norway, making for the Port of Sandwich, where it is ſaid that Turkill join'd with him, and gave the Engliſh a great Defeat. Canute coaſting about Kent, enter'd the Mouth of the River Frome, and by it paſs'd up into the Counties of Dorſet, Somerſet and Wilts, where he committed his uſual Kinds of Hoſtilities. King Ethelred then lay ſick at Coſham in Wiltſhire, but had his Place better ſupply'd by his Son Edmund, whoſe only Infelicity was to have the falſe Edric join'd with him, which not only hinder'd his preſent Succeſs, but brought him into great Danger of his Life. For Edric made a Faction in the Army, and plotted the Prince's Death, which being timely diſcover'd, Edmund was oblig'd to remove ſuddenly from the Place where he lay. This Diſcovery gave an Occaſion to Edric to throw off the Mark he had worn ſo long, and openly to revolt to Canute, to whom he carry'd off no leſs than Forty Ships; which had ſuch an Influence upon the Weſt-Saxons, that they immediately gave Hoſtages to Canute, and provided Horſes for his Army. Canute, being thus ſtrengthen'd beyond Expectation, in the Beginning of the following Year, with Edric the Traitor, paſs'd over the Thames at Greeklade, and invaded Mercia, and proceeded in the uſual manner with Fire and Sword. Whereupon Prince Edmund gather'd together what Troops he could; but upon their March, the the Mercians refus'd to meet with the Danes and Weſt-Saxons, except the King and the Londoners would ſupport them, and thereupon the Army diſbanded it ſelf. But ſhortly after, Edmund with great Diligence rais'd more Forces, and ſent to his Father at London, to come and join him with all his Power; to which Ethelred agreed, but upon joining their Forces by the ſubtlety of the Enemy a Rumor was ſpread, that if the King did not uſe extraordinary Precautions, he would ſpeedily be betray'd. Which ſo confounded the diſpirited King, that he disbanded his Army, and retir'd to London; while his Son haſten'd into Northumberland, as was ſuppos'd, to raiſe a greater Army againſt Canute. But in this both ſides agreed in the ſame Meaſures; Canute and Edric waſted one Part of the Country, and Edmund and Uthred deſtroy'd the other, only with this Difference, that one Party harraſs'd the miſerable Inhabitants, becauſe they would not revolt, and the other pretended to puniſh them for their Neutrality. So that the Counties of Buckingham, Bedford, Huntington, Northampton, Lincoln and Nottingham were ravag'd becauſe they dare not oppoſe King Ethelred; and Staffordſhire, Shropſhire and Leiceſterſhire were waſted, becauſe they refus'd to fight againſt the Danes. At length Canute, piercing into Northumberland, Prince Edmund retir'd to London, and Uthred was conſtrain'd to ſubmit himſelf to Canute, and give up the North Country with Hoſtages; which notwithſtanding, either by Command or Permiſſion of Canute, he was kill'd by one Turebrand a Daniſh Nobleman. Upon this, Canute preferring one Eric to be Earl of Northumberland, haſten'd Southwards by another Way to his Fleet; with which he join'd his Army before Eaſter. About the ſame Time King Ethelred dy'd at London on the 22d Day of April, 1016, after an inglorious and miſerable Reign of thirty ſeven Years, and was bury'd in the Church of St. Paul's in London.

His Laws. In this Reign many Eccleſiaſtical and Secular Laws were enacted or confirm'd, among which theſe three were uncommon, 'That Prieſts ſhould not marry, it 'being the Cuſtom then for them to have two or three Wives. That none ſhould 'be ſold out of their Country, eſpecially to a Pagan. That Widows ſhould re-'main ſo for twelve Months after their Husband's Death. Other Laws were made for the Preſervation of the Peace, Correction of falſe Mony, and bringing of Weights and Meaſures to a juſt Rule.

15. EDMUND Ironſide.

A. D. 1016. His Son Edmund ſucceeds him in Weſt-Saxony.

Edmund the third Son of Ethelred, and the Eldeſt alive, was by the Nobility at London choſen his Succeſſor; who was not his Son by Emma his Queen, but as Matthew of Weſtminſter ſays by an ignoble Mother, or Concubine, tho' others affirm her to be the Daughter of Earl Thorold, and King Ethelred's former Wife. But ſetting aſide the Obſcurity of his Birth, he was a Man without all Exception, both for Strength of Body and Mind, whence he obtain'd the Sirname of Ironſide; and he might have made large amends for his Father's Cowardice, and his Mother's Diſhonour, had he enjoy'd a longer Life. Having obtain'd the Crown, Edmund haſten'd into Weſt-Saxony, where he was joyfully receiv'd by the People, and acknowledg'd for their Soveraign; while a far greater Number with many Biſhops, Abbots, and others of the Nobility meeting at Southampton ſwore Allegiance to Canute; and having abjur'd the Race of Ethelred, receiv'd an Oath from him of good Government, as well in Religious as Secular Affairs. Canute much animated by ſo conſiderable a Part of the Nation, haſten'd to London with his Fleet, about Rogation Week, where being arriv'd on Surrey Side, he caus'd a great Ditch to be made, and drew up his Ships Weſtward of the Bridge. He alſo ſurrounded the City with a vaſt Intrenchment, and made ſeveral Attacks; but the Citizens ſo bravely defended themſelves, that he found it more advantagious to break up; therefore leaving a Guard Guard for his Ships, he haſten'd into the Weſt to meet with King Edmund, before all his Forces were gather'd together. He found him very ill provided to receive an Enemy; but notwithſtanding that, Edmund ventur'd to give him Battel near Gillingham in Dorſetſhire, with ſuch Succeſs, that he forc'd Canute and his Army to retreat. Encourag'd with this Succeſs, he made greater Preparations, after Midſummer, he reſolv'd to engage with Canute a ſecond Time; and meeting him near a Town call'd Swarſtan, he gave him Battel, which muſt have prov'd fatal to the Danes, had not the Traitor Edric, together with Almar and Algar, the chief of the Nobility, who commanded the Hampſhire and Wiltſhire Men, join'd with them. So that it prov'd a drawn Battel, notwithſtanding Edmund perform'd all the Offices of a ſtout Soldier, and an expert General, which being parted by the Night, was renew'd with great Vigour the next Morning, and Edmund would again have won the Victory, but when he was near obtaining of it, the perfidious Edric cut off the Head of one Oſmear, who in his Face much reſembled the King, and lifting it up on high, cry'd to the Engliſh to behold the Head of their Party, and if they valu'd their own Lives to fly immediately. This much ſtartled and diſcourag'd them, 'till Edmund, ſenſible of the Cheat, from a Hill made himſelf known to his Soldiers, and toſs'd a Spear againſt Edric, which miſſing him kill'd two other Perſons who were next him; and recovering Courage, his Soldiers preſs'd bravely upon the Danes, but were parted by the Night as before.

Several Battels between him and Edmund.

Sax. An. Malmsb. Canute finding that in all Probability he would receive but ſmall Advantage from a pitch'd Battel, decamp'd in the Night, and returning to London, where he left his Ships, again inveſted the City. Upon which King Edmund with Speed march'd into Weſt-Sex to recruit his Forces; and now the perfidious Edric, having ſufficient Experience both of his Valour and Conduct, thought it the moſt effectual Method to be reconcil'd to him, that he might reveal his Councils, and by his treacherous Inſinuations ſtem the Current of his good Fortune. He made Application to him, owning him for his natural Prince, ſwore future Fidelity to him, and obtain'd Pardon for what was paſt. Being ſufficiently recruited, Edmund directed his March to London, rais'd the Siege, and drove the Danes with Diſhonour to their Ships. After two Days he paſs'd the Thames at Brentford, where many of his Men were loſt in the Water; yet coming ſuddenly upon the Backs of his Enemies, he put them to flight. By his Loſs ſuſtain'd in paſſing the Water, and his ſeveral Ingagements, the Number of his Men were ſo diminiſh'd, that he found himſelf oblig'd to retire into Weſt-Sex for Recruits; which the Danes perceiving, they return'd and beſieg'd London a third Time, uſing all poſſible Means to become Maſters of it. Yet ſtill the Induſtry and Courage of the Inhabitants fruſtrated all Canute's Attempts; ſo that deſpairing of Succeſs he drew off his Men, and with his Fleet enter'd a River then call'd Arenne, where landing in Mercia, he proceeded after his uſual Way to waſte the Country with Fire and Sword; then he caus'd his Foot to paſs by Ships to Medway, and the Horſe by Land with the Captives and Cattel. In the mean Time King Edmund having with great Diligence levy'd a ſtrong Army a fourth Time, croſs'd the Thames again at Brentford, and march'd into Kent; where at a Place call'd Otford, he bravely ingag'd the Danes, who not able to ſuſtain the Force of his Arms, fled in great Numbers into the Iſle of Shepey. And here he might have obtain'd a compleat Victory, had not Edric, ſtill as treacherous as ever, by his ſpecious Allegations obſtructed and detain'd his Purſuit of the Enemy at Engleſford: And Edmund, who never wanted Courage, here wanted Prudence to be ſo miſs-led, and from this Time began to be forſaken by his wonted good Fortune.

Canute beſieges London.

He is ſeveral Times worſted.

Sax. An. &c. King Edmund finding the Weſt-Saxons moſt firm and loyal to him, return'd for a while into their Country for new Recruits, the Opportunity of whoſe Abſence Abſence Canute took to vent his Malice and Revenge upon a naked People; for marching into Eſſex, he from thence invaded Mercia, where he ſhew'd more Cruelty than ever, commanding his Men to omit no Puniſhment that could be inflicted upon Enemies. Edmund with an Army gather'd out of all Counties overtook and engag'd them in their Retreat at Aſhdown in Eſſex, where a Battel was fought with great Reſolution and Bravery on both Sides; and Edmund had a fair Proſpect of gaining the Victory, which the impious Edric perceiving, as he had formerly ingag'd to Canute, fled over to him with all the Troops under his Command, and ſo leaving the Engliſh overnumber'd and diſappointed, by his Villany procur'd their Defeat and Ruin. For they never receiv'd a greater Blow, almoſt all their Nobility here falling, particularly Alfric, Godwin, Ulfketel and Ethelward, all Dukes; Eadwoth alſo Biſhop of Dorcheſter, and Wolk an Abbot, who came to the Place to pray for the Army's Succeſs, among the reſt loſt their Lives. Speed tells us that the Remembrance of this Field was retain'd to his Time, by certain ſmall Hills there remaining, from whence have been digg'd the Bones of Men, Armour, and the Water-Chains of Horſe Bridles.

A bloody Battel at Aſhdown.

Edmund by Treachery is worſted.

Yet this great Diſaſter did not ſo far diſcourage King Edmund, but by his Diligence in a ſhort Time he brought himſelf into a Condition to make another Trial of his Fortune in the Field, and both the Armies fac'd each other in Gloceſterſhire. Upon which, as Huntington aſſures us, the Noblemen dreading the Courage of Edmund, and the Power of Canute, began to murmur among themſelves, and to declare how fooliſh it was for them ſo often to venture their Lives for the Ambition of others, who alone ought to fight for the Crowns they wore. Which Saying being agreeable to the Temper of the two Kings, they generouſly agreed, to prevent the Effuſion of more Blood, and to decide the Controverſie by a ſingle Combat between themſelves. In which we are told, That their Darts and Lances on both Sides being broken, they fell furiouſly with their Swords upon each others moſt incomparable Armor, the reſounding Noiſe of which ſtruck the Ears of the Spectators with Terror, and their Eyes were dazled with the Flaſhes of Fire which flew from the Swords of theſe Heroes. At length the admirable Valour of Edmund prevail'd, whom Canute very ſtrenuouſly reſiſted, but fearing the Succeſs, he thus obligingly accoſted his Adverſary: Young Man, the moſt valiant of all others, what Neceſſity is there for either of us to dye by the Sword, out of Ambition of Governing? Let us be Adoptive Brothers, and divide the Kingdom; let me have a Share in yours, and do you Command in mine. With theſe Words the generous Mind of the young King was mollify'd, and a Kiſs of Peace was given on either Part; after which their Followers came together, and weeping for Joy, Edmund by Agreement had the Weſtern Parts of the Land, and Canute and the Danes the Eaſtern. Matthew of Weſtminſter agrees with Huntington as to the Combate, but Malmesbury ſays that Canute declin'd the Combate, but agreed to the above-nam'd Diviſion of the Land. But Simeon, Hoveden and Florent of Worceſter all mention the Diviſion, but ſay nothing about any Combate propos'd. So great an Uncertainty we have of the Affairs of theſe Times. All agree that the Danes retir'd to London after this Diviſion, and were peaceably receiv'd by the Inhabitants, and permitted to take up their Winter Quarters in the City.

Edmund and Canute fight a Combate.

and divide the Nation between them.

King Edmund did not long ſurvive this Diviſion, but dy'd ſuddenly at the Feaſt of St. Andrew, after a very ſhort but vigorous and honourable Reign of ſeven Months, three Weeks and five Days, and was bury'd by his Grandfather King Edgar at Glaſſenbury. Our Authors ſpeak as uncertainly about the Death of this worthy Prince, as about his Combate: Simeon, Florent and Hoveden, mention no Cauſe of it: Malmesbury confeſſes it was uncertain of what Diſeaſe or Caſualty he dy'd, but adds, That Fame charg'd Edric with hiring two of his Chamberlains, in whoſe Fidelity he confided, to murder murder him with a ſharp Iron thruſt into his Body as he ſat to eaſe Nature. Huntington will have it done at Oxford by one of the Sons of Edric, as the King ſat in a Privy-Houſe, with whom agrees Matthew of Weſtminſter. Radulphus de Diceto names neither Place nor Perſon, but ſays it was done with an Iron Spit, by the Procurement of the Traitor Edric. Thus Edmund in the ſame Year both began and ended his Reign; leaving two Sons behind him, Edward and Edmund, and two Daughters call'd Margaret and Chriſtian; beſides three Brothers, Edwin by his own Mother, and Alfrid, and Edward, afterwards call'd the Confeſſor, by his Step-Mother Emma. With Edmund fell the Glory of the Engliſh Saxons, and the aged Body of their oppreſs'd Monarchy, ſeem'd to be bury'd with him in the ſame Sepulchre: For however it might ſeem to recover it ſelf in the ſame Age, yet it prov'd like a Plant new ſet after it had been long out of the Ground, which while there remains any Sap in the Root will ſhoot out freſh Branches, but thoſe ſo weak and tender, that the leaſt Storm blaſts and deſtroys them. By his Death the Danes prevail'd, and the Saxon Monarchy in a great meaſure ended, after it had continu'd 189 Years from the Eſtabliſhment made by King Egbert, 421 after the Saxons had wholly diſpoſſeſs'd the Britains, and 567 after the firſt Entrance of the Saxons under Hengeſt and his Companions.

CHAP. V.

From the Beginning of the Monarchy of the Danes in England under Canute, to the Death of Hardecanute, the laſt King, and the Reſtoration of the Saxons in Edward the Confeſſor.

Containing the Space of about 26 Years.

16. 1. CANUTE.

Sim. Dun. Florent. I. THE Danes had formerly in ſome Parts of the Nation, as in Eaſt-England and Northumberland, ſet up their petty Kingdoms, but now at length, after two hundred Years Struggle, they obtain'd the entire Monarchy of England. They had formerly been Strangers, fierce Invaders, and ſavage Deſtroyers, but now they became principal Inhabiters, and chief Proprietors, and Canute one of their Kings Lord of the whole; ſoften'd and civiliz'd not ſo much by Chriſtianity and good Education, as by Policy and Secular Intereſt. This Prince upon the Death of King Edmund, finding that he had ſeveral Relations left, who were dear to the Engliſh Nation, ſummon'd all the Biſhops and Nobility to meet at London, and ſubtlely demanded of ſuch as had been preſent at the Agreement between him and Edmund, What Proviſion was made by that Agreement for the Sons and Brothers of Edmund, and whether in caſe Edmund dy'd before Him, any of them was to ſucceed in the Kingdom of the Weſt-Saxons? They being overcome with Fear made Anſwer, That to their Knowledge Edmund neither living nor dying had made any Proviſion for his Relations, but deſign'd Him the Protector and Guardian of his Sons 'till they ſhould come to Age. By this falſe Teſtimony they hop'd for Favour and Rewards from Canute; but ſome of them receiv'd a juſt Recompence for their Perjury, by being not long after put to Death. But Canute taking the Advantage that it afforded him, immediately exacted Oaths of Fidelity from all the Nobility, who readily chose him for their King, and at the same Time abjur'd the two Sons of Edmund from ever being Kings of this Nation. Thus Baseness and Fear caus'd the English Nobility servilely to submit, so that there was no want of any Thing to effect his Purposes but his bare Commands; which they often prevented by their Readiness in doing those Things, to which they knew he was but inclin'd. For Edwin, the Brother of King Edmund, a young Prince of excellent Endowments and great Hopes, was by them immediately voted to Banishment; which Resolution so full of Injustice and Flattery, gave Occasion to Canute, immediately to consult with the Traitor Edric how to take his Life. This wicked Design was by Edric first left to one Ethelward, who did not answer their Expectations; so that a seeming Reconciliation was pretended, and Edwin recall'd from Banishment, by which means Opportunity was given for some to end his Life whom he had most trusted. Edric not satisfy'd with this, advis'd Canute also to put to Death the two young Sons of King Edmund, namely Edward and Edmund; but this being accounted a Thing very odious, and such as would exasperate the People to have them murder'd in England, within a short Time they were sent to the King of the Swedes there to be dispatch'd, who notwithstanding the League and Kindness between him and Canute, abhorr'd the Fact, and by no Intreaties would be brought to commit it, but convey'd them to Solomon King of Hungary, by him to be carefully educated. Edmund in process of Time ended his Days in that Retirement; but Edward marry'd Agatha Daughter to Henry Emperor of Germany, by whom he had Margaret afterwards Queen of the Scots, Christina that turn'd Nun, and Edgar-Ætheling, who shall be treated of hereafter.

Canute acknowledg'd King.

Canute divides England into four Parts.

Canute being setled in his new Power and Soveraignty over all England, divided his Kingdom into four Parts; he committed the Government of Mercia to Edric, as an Instrument not yet to be laid aside, assign'd East-England to Earl Turkill, Northumberland to Eric, and reserv'd West-Saxony, as the ancient Possession of the English Line, to his own proper Management. After which he proceeded to punish such as were concern'd in the Death of King Edmund, who having discover'd themselves in Hopes of a Reward, he kept them close Prisoners, and in a grand Assembly of the People caus'd them to be executed, as those whom their own Mouths had condemn'd. Having thus smooth'd the Way, he made a Covenant with the Nobility and People, to govern according to Law, which was confirm'd by Oath, and an Amnesty decreed for whatsoever had formerly pass'd between the two Nations. Then to strengthen and establish his Interest, after the Death and Absence of all Competitors, he su'd and marry'd the famous Emma, Widow of King Ethelred, in July following; concluding that it would win him the Hearts of the People, and divert the Thoughts of her Brother Richard Duke of Normandy from the Sons she had had by the former King. Being now arriv'd at the Height of his Wishes, he thought fit to remove the Scaffolds by which he had ascended, lest they should serve the End of some other Pretender. He had for a long Time made use of the Treachery of Duke Edric; but now instead of loving he detested the Man, as well out of Fear as Honour, therefore thought it high Time to remove him. It is reported that after he had procured King Edmund to be slain in the Manner before related, he came to Canute and congratulated him as sole Monarch of England, to whom the King answer'd, That for so great a piece of Service he would exalt him above all the English Nobility. Remembring therefore that Promise, at a Time when Edric began to upbraid him with his great Services in betraying his two Soveraigns Ethelred and Edmund, he convicted him of Treason from his own Mouth, and caus'd him in the Time of Christmass to be beheaded, and his Head to be set upon a Pole on the highest Tower in London. Authors vary as to the Manner of his Execution, but all agree that he

he receiv'd the juſt Reward of his Villanies. Upon his Account ſeveral other Noblemen were put to Death, as Norman the Son of Duke Leofwin, Ethelward the Son of Duke Aglemar, and Brithric the Son of Elfege Governor of Devonſhire, who ſuffer'd under the Pretence of being Accomplices, or at leaſt Familiars with this Traytor. But ſtill King Canute thought himſelf not ſecure, but by keeping a ſtanding Army in the Nation, for the Maintenance of which, in the following Year, he exacted a ſevere Tax of ſeventy or eighty two thouſand Pounds out of all England, beſides fifteen thouſand out of the City of London. But no leſs than theſe Severities could be expected from an Uſurper and a Foreigner; yet after a few Years, at the Importunity of the Nobility he ſent back his Army to Denmark, having firſt taken Security for the Safety of his Nation by a particular ſtrict Law made againſt killing any Danes.

Sim. Dun. &c. These Things were done in the South, while in the Northern Parts a Conteſt aroſe between Malcolm Son of Cyneth King of the Scots, and Uthred the Son of Waldef Earl of Northumberland, or rather his Succeſſor Eric, for Uthred was ſlain by Canute two Years before. This Rupture proceeded to a great War, as our Author terms it, wherein on the Parts of the Scots, Eugenius Calous King of the Lothians was engag'd; but he does not tell what were the Effects of ſo great a Controverſie. In the mean Time King Canute having united the Engliſh and Danes in one Government, thought the beſt Cement would be to frame their Minds to the ſame Laws and Cuſtoms, for which purpoſe he call'd a general Aſſembly to Oxford, where both Parts conſented to obſerve the Laws of King Edgar and Ethelred. And here they eſtabliſh'd many wholeſom Acts both for the Clergy and Laity to obſerve, ſome of which are extant in Lombard, and a few of thoſe touching Religion we have mention'd here, as having been obſerv'd a long Time after, and ſome of them to this Day. And firſt, for the Celebration of God's moſt Divine Service, it was ordain'd, 'That all 'decent Ceremonies, tending to the Encreaſe of Reverence and Deyotion, ſhould 'be us'd as need requir'd. That there ſhould be no Markets, Fairs, Aſſemblies, 'or other Secular Actions practis'd on the Lord's Day. That all Chriſtians 'ſhould receive the Euchariſt, or Sacrament of the Lord's Supper at leaſt three 'Times in the Year. That if a Prieſt kill'd a Man, or committed any notorious 'Crime, he ſhould be depriv'd of his Order and Dignity. That a marry'd Wo-'man convict of Adultery, ſhould have her Noſe and Ears cut off. That a 'Widow marrying within twelve Months after her Husband's Deceaſe, ſhould 'loſe her Jointer and Dowry. Theſe and many others were made, whereby Sin and Looſeneſs were much reſtrain'd, and the Nation peaceably and juſtly govern'd. As alſo were divers other Countries by this King's pious Endeavours; particularly by means of a young Gentleman of the Daniſh Royal Blood nam'd Odin, whom Canute brought over with him into England to be inſtructed in Learning, where he improv'd ſo well, and by his Travels through France, that he obtain'd the Sirname of Sapient; and afterwards by his Preaching in Finland, Zeland, Scandia and Swedeland, he converted great Multitudes of Pagans to the Chriſtian Faith.

Sim. Dun. Hunting. M. Weſt. Sax. An. King Canute having ſo well ſetled his Affairs here, he thought he might ſafely give a Viſit to his ancient and native Kingdom of Denmark, to which Place he ſail'd in the third Year of his Reign, and continu'd there the whole Winter. Huntington writes, that he led thither an Army of Engliſh and Danes againſt the Vandals, by which he muſt mean no other than the Swedes: That incamping near his Enemies with Intention not to fight 'till the next Day, Godwin the Engliſh General without his Knowledge ſet upon them unprepar'd, kill'd many, and put the reſt to flight. In the Morning the King, imagining that the Engliſh were either run away or revolted to the Enemy, ſet the Danes in order of Battel, and advanc'd towards the Swediſh Camp, where he found nothing but Blood, Carkaſſes and Plunder, which caus'd him not only to reward Godwin with an Earldom, but exceedingly to prize the Engliſh, and to hold them in no leſs Eſteem than the Danes themſelves. In the Spring he return'd into England, and at Eaſter held a grand Council at Circeſter, in which he baniſh'd Duke Ethelward, or Edward, as others call him. In the following Year, fearing the growing Greatneſs of Earl Turkil the Dane, he baniſh'd him and his Wife Egitha out of England; and found occaſion to do the like by Eric the Daniſh Earl of Northumberland, upon the ſame Principle of Jealouſie. As ſoon as they ſet foot in Denmark, Matthew ſays, that Turkil, who had firſt perſuaded King Swane to invade England, was kill'd by the Noblemen of the Country. But whether it was that theſe baniſh'd Perſons excited the People againſt their King, or that his Abſence caus'd his Authority to be deſpis'd, Huntington tell us that Canute in the ninth Year of his Reign carry'd over another Army againſt Ulf and Eilaf, who had rais'd ſuch great Numbers againſt him both by Sea and Land, that they gave him a conſiderable Defeat. But others make this the ſame Expedition with the former; and indeed had his Affairs been ſo much embroild'd now in Denmark, he would not ſo ſoon have caſt his Thoughts upon the Conqueſt of Norway; from whence having Intelligence that the People deſpis'd Olaus their King, he ſent great Sums of Mony to make way for his own Power, which had ſuch prevailing Effects, that in the following Year 1028, he found ſufficient Incouragement to ſail into Norway with Fifty Ships. The Succeſs was, that he drove Olaus out of his Country, and then eaſily reduc'd it to his own Power, whither Olaus the following Year returning to try the Minds of the Revolters was ſlain by them with all his Followers. Canute being now King of England, Denmark and Norway, return'd with Applauſe into England; tho' not ſo ſecure in his Thoughts, but that under colour of an Embaſſy, he ſent into Baniſhment Hacun a powerful Dane, who had marry'd the Daughter of his Siſter Gunilda. This Man was grown ſo powerful and popular, that he ſtood in fear of being kill'd or depos'd by him, and thereupon he drove him to ſuch Extremities, that within twelve Months he either periſh'd at Sea, or elſe was kill'd in the Iſle of Orkney.

He conquers Norway.

A. D. 1031.

Such were the Fears of this Prince, and ſuch the Means he us'd to prevent them, declining no Actions or Methods that might fix and ſecure the Crown on his Head. But now the Occaſions and Temptations for Injuſtice being remov'd, he reſolv'd to be eminently religious, as ſuch who having gain'd vaſt Riches by infamous Practices, frequently think to appeaſe the ſupream Majeſty of Heav'n by dedicating ſome part of them to pious Uſes. Accordingly in the fifteenth Year of his Reign he took a Journey to Rome, viſited the Tombs of the holy Apoſtles, and on St. Peter conferr'd extraordinary Quantities of Gold, Silver and other valuable Preſents; procur'd from Pope John a Relaxation of all Tribute and Toll to the Engliſh School there, gave large Alms to the Poor both in his Paſſage and Return, and bought off ſeveral Tolls and Impoſitions laid upon Travellers. From this City he ſent an Epiſtle to the Engliſh Biſhops and Nobility, which is extent in Malmesbury and begins thus. Then he proceeds in vowing the Remainder 'of his Life and Reign to the only Service of God, and the due Adminiſtration 'of Juſtice to his People; to which end he firſt gives Command to his Counſel-'lors, that thence forward they preſume not, upon any reſpect to give Counte-'nance to the leaſt Injuſtice in his Kingdom: And next to his Officers of Ju-'ſtice, that as they tender his Royal Favour, and their own Lives, they deviate Sim. Dun. Hunting. &c. From Rome this King went to Denmark, and at his Return to England he spent a great Part of his Time in building and repairing Monasteries and Churches. In Essex he built the Church of Ashdown, in the Place of that great Victory over King Edmund which won him the Crown. In Norfolk he founded the noted Abby of St. Bennet's-in Holme, which Saint he highly respected; and in Suffolk with a special Devotion he rebuilt and endow'd the Monastery of St. Edmund's Bury, which Saint he no less dreaded. For it is reported that the seeming Ghost of St. Edmund often affrighted him; for which Cause, as also to expiate the Sins of his Father, who had done great Damage to his Possession, he surrounded the Monastery with a deep Ditch, and offer'd up his Crown at the Martyr's Tomb. He gave rich and extraordinary Jewels to the Church of Winchester, of which one is recorded to be a Cross, worth one Year's Revenue of the Kingdom; and to Coventry he gave the Arm of St. Augustine the great Doctor, which he bought at Pavia in his Return from Rome, for which he paid a hundred Talents of Silver, and one of Gold. The Magnificence of this great King now so shin'd in the Eyes of his Courtiers and Flatterers, that they extoll'd him equal with Alexander, Cyrus and Cæsar, and applauded him as possess'd with more than Human Power. But to convince and reprove such mischievous Instruments, and to shew the small Power of Kings in respect of the King of Heav'n and Earth, he caus'd his Royal Seat, says Huntington, to be plac'd by the Sea-shore at Southampton while the Tide was flowing in; and being seated in his Robes, and his Courtiers about him, he with all the Air of Majesty spoke in these Terms, Thou Sea art under my Dominion, and the Land on which I sit is mine; nor has any unpunish'd resisted my Commands: I charge thee therefore presume no further upon my Land, nor dare to wet the Feet of thy Soveraign Lord. But the Sea, as at other Times, came rolling on, and both wet his Feet, and dash'd against his Robes; which caus'd him suddenly to rise up, and cry'd out, Let all the Inhabitants of the World know how vain and frivolous is the Power of Kings! Nor is there any that can deserve that Title, but he whose eternal Laws the Heav'ns, Earth and Sea obey. From which Time this King would never wear his own Crown, but commanded it to be put upon the Head of the Crucifix at Winchester. From whose Example, according to Petrus Pictaviensis, arose that Custom of hanging up the Armour of great Men in Churches, as Offerings made to God, by whose Assistance they had obtain'd any Honour to themselves, or Benefit to their Country, either by Victory, or an honourable Death.

He returns to England.

His Buildings.

He reproves his Courtiers by an Example.

This King's Building of so many Churches and Monasteries so far repair'd his Fame and Esteem with the Monkish Writers, that notwithstanding all his Violence and Injustice, and his being a Deposer, and a Procurer of the Death of King Olaus one of their Saints, they all dismiss him with a very fair Character. Nay some tell us, that for his Piety he was rewarded with another Kingdom, that of Scotland, which, according to Matthew of Westminster, at this Time depended on England; for he writes that the Scots now rebell'd, and that thereupon he march'd thither with an Army, and easily conquer'd Malcolm the King, with two other Reguli which Huntington mentions by the Names of Melbeathe and Jermare. But if the Kingdom of Scotland was given him for his Piety, that of Heav'n follow'd not long after; for within two Years he dy'd, at Shaftsbury on the twelfth Day of November, and was bury'd in the old Monastery at Winchester, after he had reign'd nineteen Years, wanting a few Days. It cannot cannot be deny'd but that he was a magnificent Prince, bountiful both to religious Men and the Poor, even of other Nations. The Means and Methods by which he arriv'd at his Greatneſs, are no ways to be juſtify'd; but there are few that obtain'd Crowns ſo unjuſtly have afterwards manag'd their Power with ſo much Juſtice and Humanity; ſo that he may well bear away the Title generally given him of Canutus the Great. And we may ſay of him what a Roman Author does of one of his Emperors, That it had been well for the Kingdom if he had never reign'd at all, or elſe had continu'd longer; none of his Sons reſembling him either in Wiſdom or Valour.

A. D. 1036. II. Canute by Elgiva his firſt Wife, or rather Concubine, had two Sons, the firſt call'd Swane, and the ſecond Harold; tho' ſome ſay, to conceal her Barrenneſs, ſhe procur'd the former from a Prieſt's Wife, and the latter from the Wife of a Shoomaker, and ſo impos'd upon the Credulity of the King. By Emma the Relict of King Ethelred, whom he ſeems to have marry'd in the Life Time of Elgiva, he had a Son nam'd Harde-canute; and before his Death it is ſaid that he appointed Swane to be King of Norway, Harold King of England, and Harde-canute King of Denmark. But this ſeems very improbable that he ſhould ſeparate the Son of his beloved Wife ſo far from her; eſpecially if that be true which ſome have written, that he formerly promis'd to leave the Crown of England to ſuch Iſſue as he ſhould have by her. However it was, Harold by means of the Danes, and the Citizens of London, and afterwards by Injuſtice obtain'd the Engliſh Crown, but not without ſome Struggles and Difficulties. For each Pretender endeavour'd to ſtrengthen himſelf with Friends and Forces; as Earl Leofric with the Danes and Londoners ſtood up for Harold, ſo moſt of the Engliſh contended for Edward the Son of King Ethelred, and ſome for Harde-canute the Son of Canute by Queen Emma. Upon which Differences all expected a Civil War, which caus'd great Multitudes to quit their Habitations, and retire to the moſt Fenny and Impaſſable Places, particularly to the Monaſtery of Croyland, where they caus'd ſuch Diſturbance, that the Religious in the Place could neither meet in the Church, nor in their Refectory. All Things now tended to Confuſion, when by the Interpoſition of the more ſober ſort, Advice was given to the Heads of all the Factions to accommodate Affairs by a publick Aſſembly. The Place appointed was Oxford, where after a long Debate, the major Part concluded, That the Kingdom ſhould be divided between Harold and Harde-canute, the former to have all the Countries lying Northwards from the Thames, with the City of London, and the latter to enjoy all the Southern Provinces. But Harde-canute being abſent upon ſome neceſſary Affairs in Denmark, Harold ſoon took the Advantage, and being already in Poſſeſſion of the greateſt Part, he ſeiz'd upon all; which he obtain'd by the Aſſiſtance of the Danes and Londoners, and now at length by Godwin Earl of Kent, who being made up of Ambition and Cunning, had at the Beginning of the Conteſt profeſs'd himſelf a Champion for Emma and her Children, but upon the Turning of the Tide reſolv'd to ſwim with the Stream, or was wrought upon by the Promiſes of Harold, who gave him Hopes of marrying one of his Daughters. Yet ſtill the Clergy adher'd to the Children of Emma, and tho' the Nobility join'd with Harold, they continu'd ſo firm, that Ailnoth the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury refus'd the Office of crowning him, profeſſing, That as long as any of the ſaid Children liv'd, he would not give his Aſſent or Benediction to any other, and affirming, as ſome write, That Canute on his Death Bed had commended them to his Care and Fidelity. Then laying the Enſigns of Royalty upon the Altar, he denounc'd a Curſe againſt his Brethren the Biſhops in caſe any of them ſhould deliver them to Harold, likewiſe wiſe inhibiting Him from taking thoſe Things away which he had commited to God and that holy Place. But notwithſtanding all this Zeal and Reſolution, the Arch-Biſhop was at length prevail'd upon by Threats or Promiſes; ſo that the Ceremony was perform'd, and Harold acknowledg'd King of all England.

As to the Character of this Prince, Brompton tells us, That in all Reſpects he degenerated from the Worth of his Father Canute, for he was altogether careleſs both as to Matters of War and Peace, only he would purſue his own Will, and what was misbecoming his high Station, choſe rather to go on foot than ride, whence from the Lightneſs and Swiftneſs of his Feet he was call'd Harold Harefoot. One of the firſt Things he attempted was to inſnare and deſtroy his Emulators and Rivals in the Throne, particularly King Ethelred's two Sons, Edward and Alfred, then in Normandy. In order to effect his Purpoſe, the Author of the Encomium Emmæ ſays that he forg'd a Letter to theſe two young Princes in the Name of Queen Emma their Mother, earneſtly inviting them into England: Wherein, perſonating her, 'She ſeem'd to chide them 'gently for their Delay, in not coming over to inſpect their own Affairs; ſince 'they could not but know that it daily confirm'd the Uſurper in his Power, who 'omitted no Artifices to gain the chief Nobility over to his Party; yet alſo aſ-'ſur'd them that the Engliſh Nation had much rather have one of them to be 'their King; and in concluſion, urg'd them to come as ſpeedily and as privately 'as they could, to conſult with her what Methods were moſt proper to be taken. This Letter was ſent to the two Princes in Normandy by an expreſs Meſſenger, with Preſents alſo, as from their Mother; which they innocently and joyfully receiving, return'd anſwer by the ſame Hand, That one of them would be with her ſhortly, naming both the Time and Place. Alfred the younger was judg'd moſt proper for this Affair, who at the appointed Time, with a few Ships, and a ſmall Number of Normans on board, appear'd on the Coaſt, and no ſooner landed, but fell into the Snare that Earl Godwin had laid for them, being ſent purpoſely to betray them. For being deluded into a Belief that he was ſent for by the King then at London, he was in the Way met by Earl Godwin at Guilford, who with all ſeeming Friendſhip kindly entertain'd him, but in the Night ſurpriz'd the Prince and made him Priſoner, with all his Company, to the Number of about ſix hundred Normans. Moſt of theſe were us'd with the greateſt Barbarity, put to various Kinds of Torments and cruel Deaths; and being twice decimated, every tenth Man ſuffer'd without Mercy. The unfortunate Prince was brought to London, and by the King ſent bound to Ely, where he had his Eyes put out as ſoon as he landed; and being deliver'd up to the Monks to be kept there, out of Pain and Grief he dy'd ſoon after in their Cuſtody. This did not ſatisfie King Harold, for ſoon after he baniſh'd the Mother Queen Emma out of the Kingdom, tho' Winter was then begun. She retir'd not into Normandy, becauſe, as ſome alledge, Duke William, the baſe Son of her Nephew Robert, was then in the French Court, and ſome add, that her Son Edward was gone into Hungary to conſult with his Coſen Edward, whom Canute had formerly baniſh'd thither. Therefore ſhe went directly to Flanders, where ſhe was courteouſly receiv'd by Baldwin Earl of that Country, who pitying a diſtreſſed Lady and Queen, aſſign'd her Bruges for her Habitation, and munificently provided for her during her whole Continuance.

After two Years this Queen was viſited by her Son Harde-canute out of Denmark, and they comforted themſelves with the Hopes of better Fortune, that either the Hearts of the Engliſh would relent, or the Uſurper by ſome other Means finiſh his Days or his Reign. Harold on the other Side, incourag'd by Poſſeſſion, omitted nothing that might ſerve to exclude them, or any other Pretenders; and accordingly provided himſelf with a Fleet, the only Bulwark of the Iſland, for the furniſhing of which every Port in the Nation was oblig'd to pay eight Marks of Silver to every ſixteen Ships. This Tax ſo exaſperated the Engliſh, that it gave Occaſion to the Welſh to commit ſeveral Acts of Hoſtility; for for the quelling of whom Edwin Brother to Earl Leofric, Turkil and Algeat Sons of Essi, with several other Noblemen lost their Lives. But these Things could not accomplish the Hopes of the Banish'd, which was left to be effected by Ho Hist. Death, which not long after on the sixteenth Day of April seiz'd upon King Harold, after he had reign'd with no Reputation four Years and as many Months. He was bury'd at Westminster, and left neither Wife nor Child behind him. As for his Laws we have only one mention'd by Mr. Selden, which was, That whatsoever Welsh Man, coming into England without Leave, was taken on this Side Osfa's Ditch, should lose his right Hand.

18. 3. HARDE-CANUTE.

A. D. 1040. III. The States of the Land as well English as Danes, that had stood up for the Interest of Harold, now seeing him fallen, thought it most advantagious to make way for their Peace, before Harde-canute should command their Obedience by his Sword: Therefore they unanimously sent Messengers to him at Bruges, where he continu'd with his Mother, humbly desiring him to come over, and receive the Crown as his Right. Hereupon he hasten'd to Denmark, there to settle Affairs, and from thence with sixty Ships and many Soldiers he came over in the Month of August, and landing at Sandwich was there joyfully receiv'd, and both by English and Danes admitted, and crowned King. Having obtain'd the Kingdom, he perform'd but little worthy of his Condition and Station, but made use of that Advantage only to please and gratifie his exorbitant Passions. His first Undertaking was to shew his Resentment against Harold, for the Injuries offer'd to himself and his Mother, whose Body he caus'd to be digg'd up by Alfric Arch-Bishop of York, Earl Godwin and others, the Head to be cut off, and both that and the Trunk to be cast first into a Ditch or Privy, and then into the Thames, where being caught in a Fisherman's Net, it was by some of his Relations convey'd to Land, and bury'd in a Burying-Place of the Danes, which constant Tradition affirms to be the Church and Church-yard of St. Clements Danes in London. Following on this Course of Revenge, which some stile by the Name of Piety to his Relations, he deservingly depriv'd Living Bishop of Worcester, who was concern'd in the barbarous Treatment of his Brother Alfred; but within a Year he was appeas'd with a Sum of Mony, and restor'd him. Godwin that subtle Earl found Means to purchace his Peace with an extraordinary Present, which was a Gally with a gilded Stern, wonderfully rigg'd, furnish'd out with all Conveniencies both for War and Pleasure, and mann'd with eighty choice Soldiers, every one having upon each Arm a Golden Bracelet weighing sixteen Ounces, an Helmet and Corslet finely gilt, a Danish Scimiter adorn'd with Silver and Gold hung on his left Shoulder, in his left Hand a Shield with gilt Boss and Nails, and in his Right a Lance, which in the Language of the English was call'd a Tegar. This uncommon Present was not sufficient 'till he also took a solemn Oath, That Prince Alfred lost not his Eyes by his Advice or Desire, but in that he merely obey'd King Harold, then his Soveraign Lord; which Oath was also taken by most of the Nobility of the Land.

At the same Time he enquir'd after such as had been cruel to his Relations, and much incurr'd the Displeasure of the People by a new Tax he laid, for the Payment of eight Marks to every Rower in his Navy, and twelve to every Officer, a Burden so heavy, that every one repented their helping of him to the Crown. However he collected the Tax with all Rigour, insomuch that two of his Officers for that purpose call'd Feader and Turstan, going to Worcester, were slain by the People. The King highly incens'd sent Leofric Duke of Mercia, Godwin of the West-Saxons, Siward of the Northumbrians, and others with great Forces, and Orders to kill all the Men, to burn the City, and waste all the

the Country. Terrify'd with this News, all the People fled, the Country Men to ſeveral remote Parts, and the Citizens to a ſmall Iſland in the Severn call'd Beverege, which they fortify'd and valiantly defended, 'till Peace was granted them, and free Liberty to return home; but they found their City plunder'd and burnt. Appeas'd with this Act of Severity, Harde-canute began to ſhow a better Temper, and ſhortly after he gave a kind Entertainment to Edward his Brother, the Son of King Ethelred and Emma, who now return'd home, after a tedious Exile in Normandy. To his further Commendation he took care to prefer his Siſter Gunhilda to be Wife of Henry the German Emperor; a Lady of admirable Beauty, who in her Father's Time had in vain been courted by ſeveral Lovers. Her Brother ſent her forth with all imaginable Pomp and Splendor, the Nobility both accompanying her to the Sea, and greatly contributing to the Expences, beſides what the King's Exchequer could furniſh. But Covetouſneſs was not this Prince's Crime, for he delighted in extravagant Expences, eſpecially in Banquets and Feaſtings; and he allow'd four Meals a Day in his Court, which Huntington attributes to his Bounty, as rather deſiring that Meat ſhould be taken away untouch'd from ſuch as were invited, than that ſuch as were not invited ſhould complain of Scarcity. As Harde-canute liv'd ſo he dy'd in his beloved Cuſtom of Feaſting, at Lambeth at a Nuptial Entertainment, which with great Splendor was ſolemniz'd between Tovy a Daniſh Nobleman, and Gorthy the Daughter of Oſgod Clapa, a great Lord of the ſame Nation, in the Height of his Mirth and Jollity, carouſing with the Bride and ſome of the Company, he ſuddenly fell down ſpeechleſs, and dy'd on the eighth Day of June, in the Flower of his Age, after a ſhort Reign of two Years and almoſt two Months.

He marries his Siſter to the Emperor.

His ſtrange Death.

Such was the End of this diſſolute young Prince by that Vice which was too familiar to the Daniſh Nation, which to the Cruelty they ſhew'd before they got Poſſeſſion of the Land, they afterwards added Gormandizing and Drunkenneſs. But as he exceeded all in this kind, ſo tho' he was born in England, and conſequently might have naturally follow'd the Cuſtoms of that Country, yet out of Simpathy with the Humour of the Danes, he bore moſt Affection to them; nay and ſuffer'd them moſt inſolently to domineer over the Engliſh. So that we are told, If a Dane met an Engliſh Man upon a Bridge, the latter durſt not move 'till the former paſs'd over; and if the Engliſh Man did not bow in the moſt humble Manner, his Head ſhould be broken, or for his Clowniſhneſs he ſhould be ſeverely baſtinado'd. And according to Knighton, this Harde-canute ſo far increas'd this Inſolence, that upon every Engliſh Family he impos'd a Dane as their Lord and Governor; which confirm'd the Occaſion of the Word Lordane formerly mention'd. The ſame Vices of Luxury and Effeminacy, which had procur'd Slavery to the Engliſh, were now come to the Height in the Danes, and, as in all Changes of States, caus'd their Ruin in this Nation, and made way for another Revolution. Not that the Engliſh were much reform'd, for they ſtill retain'd ſuch Diſtempers, as within a few Years procur'd the intire Deſtruction of their Empire; but being unreaſonably inſulted and oppreſs'd, upon the Death of Harde-canute they found Means to throw off their Yoak, and to ſlay and baniſh the moſt inſolent and tyrannical of that Nation. And as the old Romans, for the Expulſion of their Kings, annually ſolemniz'd the Fugalia, ſo the joyful Engliſh in Imitation of them, being freed from the Daniſh Tyranny, inſtituted the annual Sports of Hock-Tide, which ſignify'd the Times of Scorning or Triumphing; of which there are ſome Remainders to this Day. Harde-canute dying without Iſſue, and Denmark being then embarraſs'd with Troubles, with him expir'd, not only the Dominion, but in Effect all Attempts or Invaſions of the Danes in England; which tho' they had been continu'd, and often renew'd with mighty Numbers, for two hundred and fifty five Years from their firſt Invaſion, left no conſiderable

Change of Laws, Cuſtoms, Language or Religion, nor other Traces of their Eſtabliſhment beſides the many Caſtles they built, and the many Families they left behind them, who in a few Years came to incorporate and make a Part of the Engliſh Nation without Diſtinction.

19. 16. EDWARD the Confeſſor.

A. D. 1042. I. THE Engliſh being happily deliver'd from the Power of the Danes, took the Advantage of the laſt King's dying without Iſſue, and began to caſt their Eyes upon the Poſterity of the unfortunate King Ethelred, particularly Edward, the Son he had by Queen Emma. However this Prince was ſtill at a Loſs, not knowing what Methods to take for his Safety, 'till at length he reſolv'd to caſt himſelf upon the Counſel and Fidelity of Earl Godwin, who being ſent to for a friendly Conference, for ſome Time conſider'd in his Thoughts whether he ſhould acknowledge him or not, but at length conſented to converſe with him. Edward gaining Acceſs, was ready to fall at his Feet, which when he would not ſuffer, he related the ſad Story of his Brother Harde-canute's Death, and with great Promiſes begg'd his Aſſiſtance towards his ſafe Return into Normandy. Godwin gave him this unexpected Anſwer, That he had better live glorioufly a King in England, than ignominiouſly to dye an Exile; that the Crown did of Right belong to him, as the Son of Ethelred, and Grandſon of Edgar, one who was ripe in Years, inured to Toils, and taught by Experience how to adminiſter publick Affairs, and by his own Afflictions how to prevent thoſe of his People. To effect this there would be no Obſtacle, if he would confide in him, whoſe Intereſt was ſo great in the Land. Therefore on Condition he would eſtabliſh a firm Friendſhip with him, prefer his Sons, and marry his Daughter, he ſhould ſhortly ſee himſelf a King; tho' now as one ſhipwrackt in his Fortunes, and a Man baniſh'd from all Expectations, he implor'd the Aid of another Perſon. This Prince's Circumſtances were ſuch, as not to reject ſo fair Propoſals, but to agree to every Thing, and comply with the State and Condition of the Times; and whatſoever he requir'd he promiſs'd by Oath. Godwin was a Man fitted by Nature for the managing ſuch an Affair, having a very ſmooth inſinuating Tongue, ſo eloquent and prevailing, that he could work upon the Affections of the People as he deſired, and draw them with Eaſe to any Thing he deſign'd. He procur'd a Council to be ſummon'd to Gillingham, where perſuading ſome by his Authority, ſome by Promiſes, and others being already inclin'd to favour Edward's Cauſe, he eaſily brought over a great Majority to his Party; the reſt who made Oppoſition, were overpower'd at preſent, diſgrac'd, and afterwards baniſh'd out of the Land. On Eaſter Day, which this Year fell on the third of April, he was was crown'd at Wincheſter by the two Arch-Biſhops, Edſi of Canterbury, and Alfric of York, aſſiſted with other Prelates, of whom Living, Biſhop of Worceſter, much contributed to the compleating this Deſign. This happen'd about ten Months after the Death of Harde-canute, ſo that this Alteration requir'd ſome conſiderable Time, and probably found as conſiderable Oppoſition, notwithſtanding the great Power of Earl Godwin. And thus was the Monarchy of the Engliſh reſtor'd to the Engliſh Royal Blood, and the People ſo unexpectedly deliver'd from the Daniſh Tyranny, were exceedingly tranſported with Joy, yet ſtill making way for another Revolution, which they little imagin'd was ſo near.

Malmſb. &c. Edward was now near forty Years of Age, of a ſoft and complying Temper; and being the Creature of Earl Godwin, he conform'd himſelf wholly to his Dictates and Advice. The firſt material Thing he did, was to ſeize on the Treaſure of his Mother Emma, then at Wincheſter. The Cauſe alledg'd was, that ſhe had been hard and unkind to him in the Time of his Exile and greateſt Neceſſities; and in reality, ſhe is believ'd to have born too little Affection, either to Ethelred or his Children: But Godwin however ſeems to have been the Inſtiller of this Treatment into the King's Mind, bearing a ſecret Hatred againſt her, for concerning her ſelf about the Cruelty ſhewn to her Son Alfred. Simeon expreſly ſays, that King Edward did it by the Advice of Leofric, Godwin and Geward, who accompanying him from Gloceſter to Wincheſter, he came ſuddenly to her, and took away all the Gold, Silver or Jewels ſhe had then in Poſſeſſion; to which Matth. Weſtminſter adds, that he yet commanded that ſhe ſhould be ſupply'd with Neceſſaries, and be free from all further Moleſtation. But how fair ſoever his Actions were towards his Mother, Godwin took care that he ſhould deal juſtly with him, in the Marriage of his Daughter Egitha, which about this Time he procur'd to be ſolemniz'd. The Lady for her admirable Perfections and Qualifications might well deſerve a Crown; ſo that this was none of thoſe many Things wherein the Earl impos'd upon the King. Ingulph the Abbot, who in his Youth had often been pos'd by her both in Grammar and Logick, teſtifies that ſhe was moſt beautiful, moſt chaſte and virtuous, but eſpecially noted both for her Humility and Learning, ſavouring nothing of the Inſolence either of her Father or Brothers, but mild, modeſt, faithful and obliging, never doing any kind of ill Offices, ſo that it became a Proverb, 'That 'as a Thorn produces a Roſe, ſo Godwin begot Egitha.

He ſeizes on his Mother's Treaſury.

He marries Godwin's Daughter Egitha.

Sim. Dun. Edward thus ſetled in the Throne, ſtill thought himſelf not ſecure, while any eminent Perſons of the Daniſh Blood continu'd in the Land. Therefore he baniſh'd Gunhilda, the Siſter of King Canute, marry'd firſt to Hacun, and then to Harold both Earls, but now a Widow, who with her two Sons Hemmung and Turkill, were oblig'd to leave the Land, go firſt to Bruges in Flanders, and then to Denmark. But while he thus thought to prevent Storms at home, he was threaten'd with a Tempeſt from the Northern World, where Magnus the Son of Olaus King of Norway, to revenge the Injury done here to his Father in the Reign of Canute, prepar'd to invade England. King Edward to ſecure himſelf, provided a ſtrong Fleet, which lay expecting Magnus in Sandwich Road; but Swane King of Denmark, tho' he had no Reaſon to oblige the Engliſh, yet to hinder the Growth of a dangerous Neighbour, intirely diverted Magnus by making an Invaſion of his Kingdom. This rais'd ſuch Fewds between theſe two Northern Kings, that Magnus in revenge enter'd Denmark in the following Year, expell'd King Swane, and made himſelf Lord of the Country. Upon which Swane ſent Ambaſſadors to King Edward, deſiring him, That he would now return ſuch Kindneſs as he had receiv'd from him, when he was in Danger. Godwin's Opinion was for ſupplying him with a Fleet of fifty Veſſels, both to requite Swane, and to give a check to the Succeſs and Ambition of Magnus; but Earl Leofric and others thought it ſafer That the King ſhould only be a Spectator, rather than to run the Hazard of diſobliging the prevailing Party, and bringing Danger upon himſelf. And tho' Swane had by his Invaſion of Norway, done that which tended to the Repoſe of England, yet ſince he took thoſe Meaſures purely from his own Intereſt, he could not take it amiſs, if King Edward alſo ſhould ſteer his Courſe by the ſame Compaſs. And their Counſel had this good Effect, that as Magnus, tho' he held the Crown of Denmark all his Life, offer'd no further Attempts upon England, ſo Harold Harvager his Uncle and Succeſſor, as ſoon as he came to the Crown ſent Ambaſſadors to King Edward, and made a ſolemn League and Alliance with him. This was look'd upon as a great Happineſs to the Nation; but an Earthquake at Worceſter and Darby, a Peſtilence and Famine in many Places, much diminiſh'd the Enjoyment of it.

A. D. 1045. He baniſhes many of the Daniſh Nobility

A. D. 1049. He engages with the Emperor againſt Baldwin Earl of Flanders.

While King Edward was free from Wars at home, he was ingag'd by Henry the Emperor againſt Baldwin Earl of Flanders, with whom he had a Conteſt about a Palace of his Country, which the Earl had fir'd. Pope Leo and Swane King of the Danes aſſiſted by Land, and leſt Baldwin ſhould eſcape by Sea, he procur'd King Edward to ſecure the Coaſts, which he perform'd, lying with his Fleet before the Port of Sandwich, 'till he underſtood that an Accommodation was made between them. In the mean Time Swane, the Son of Earl Godwin, having formerly been baniſh'd, or left the Land, for deflouring Edgitha Abbeſs of Cheſter whom he would have marry'd, came back from Denmark with eight Ships, pretending a great Deſire to be reconcil'd to the King; and Earl Beorn, a Dane and his Coſen-German, undertook to make his Peace. The War being ended between the Emperor and Earl Baldwin, this Beorn and Godwin who commanded forty two Veſſels, by the King's leave were remov'd to Pevenſey; to which Place Swane came and ſollicited his Coſen Beorn, according to Promiſe to carry him to the King at Sandwich, and obtain his Pardon. Beorn without Scruple repair'd to him, attended only with three Servants, but Swane having brought him to Boſenham, where his Ships lay at Anchor, carry'd him on Board, caus'd him to be bound, and removing to Dartmouth, he there murder'd him, and threw his Body into a deep Ditch. The Inhabitants of Haſtings took ſix of Swane's Ships, and killing all the Men, carry'd the Veſſels to the King at Sandwich. Swane with the other two fled into Flanders, where he continu'd 'till afterwards Aldred Biſhop of Worceſter brought him back, and notwithſtanding all this, reconcil'd him to this gentle King. Crimes of this Nature were at this Time but too common, and too little puniſh'd; ſuch was the Wickedneſs of the Engliſh Nation, which now again fell into a dangerous Security, tho' the late dreadful Scourge was but juſt remov'd from their Backs. Nay at this very Time it was again ſhaken over them: For Oſgod Clapa, having with his Wife, as well as other Danes, been baniſh'd the Land, had got together twenty nine Ships, which infeſted the Coaſts of Eſſex, but after great Damage done, they met with a Storm, and two of their Ships being driven on Shore, the Men were all put to the Sword. But the Engliſh were not only put in mind of the late Daniſh Cruelties, but the Remembrance of the old Devaſtations from the Iriſh Scots was reviv'd on the other Side of the Iſle; but with this Difference, that whereas formerly the Britains were Sufferers, now they were become Actors and Abettors. For, as Florent tells us, this ſame Year in the Month of Auguſt, certain Pirates from Ireland, with thirty ſix Ships enter'd the Mouth of the Severn, where joining with Griffen, King of South-Wales, they ravag'd the Country, and caus'd much Miſchief. They proceeded in ſeveral Places with Fire and Sword, but whether they retir'd of themſelves, or were ſuppreſs'd by the Engliſh Forces, we do not find.

A. D. 1051. He is too kind to Strangers;

The next Year but one, King Edward to comfort and relieve his People now oppreſs'd with Famine and Poverty, took off the Tax formerly mention'd call'd Danegeld, impos'd by his Father Ethelred, which had laid heavy upon them for thirty eight Years. But as this Effect of his Indulgence to them, tended much to their Eaſe and Conveniency, ſo other Acts of his Kindneſs to Strangers this this very Year, prov'd of dangerous Conſequence to the whole Nation. The Occaſion began from Euſtace Earl of Boloign, Father to the famous Godfry, and Husband to Goda the King's Siſter, who having been to viſit the Court, and returning through Canterbury to take Ship at Dover, one of his Harbingers was ſo rude with a Townſman in ſeeking for Lodgings, that in the Heat of Anger he provok'd him to kill him. The Earl with his whole Retinue going into the Houſe where this Servant had been kill'd, ſlew both the Murderer and eighteen more who defended him; but the Townſmen running to Arms, reveng'd themſelves by the Slaughter of twenty one more of the Earl's Servants, and the wounding almoſt all the reſt. Euſtace with much Difficulty eſcaping, with great Clamour haſten'd to the King, and being ſeconded by other Norman Courtiers, he rais'd him to that Fury, that he immediately order'd Earl Godwin to march to Canterbury, and puniſh the Citizens with military Execution. He on the contrary alledg'd, That no Man was to be condemn'd unheard, inwardly grieving that the King ſhould favour Strangers more than his own Subjects; for many of them he had preferr'd to great Places, and Truſt, both in Church and State; particularly Robert a Norman was made Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, and William another of that Country Biſhop of London, which much exaſperated the Engliſh againſt the Normans. Being join'd with ſome others who lov'd their Country, Godwin urg'd, That the chief Actors in the late Diſorder ſhould firſt be fairly try'd; in caſe they were found innocent to be diſmiſs'd, but if culpable to be fin'd, or undergo ſome corporal Puniſhment for the Breach of the King's Peace, and the Violence and Affront that they had offer'd to the Earl. He further put him in mind, That it was his Buſineſs to protect his People, and not to condemn them without due Proceſs. In concluſion he refus'd to obey his Commands, not regarding the King's Anger, which he conceiv'd would laſt but a ſhort Time; but Edward diſpleas'd at his Behaviour, and being by others excited to Revenge, he call'd an Aſſembly of all the Nobility at Gloceſter. Moſt repair'd thither, only Godwin and his Sons appear'd not, ſuſpecting that the Nobility were too much of the King's Humour, but immediately took to Arms. Godwin rais'd Forces out of his Earldom, which conſiſted of Kent, South-Sex and Weſt-Sex; his Eldeſt Son Swane did the ſame in his, which contain'd Oxfordſhire, Gloceſterſhire, Herefordſhire, Somerſetſhire and Barkſhire; and Harold the youngeſt Son out of his, compriſing Eſſex, Eaſt-England and Huntingtonſhire.

which occaſions Godwin and his Sons to take to Arms.

Malmſb. Sax. An. Theſe took up their Quarters at Beverſtan, and ſpread a Report that their Forces were to march againſt the Welſh, who deſign'd an Irruption into Herefordſhire; and Swane under that Pretence lay encamp'd with Part of his Army in thoſe Parts. But the Welſh having ſome notice of this Artifice, prevented it by clearing themſelves at Court, where Godwin and his Sons were render'd ſo odious, that the King's Army now immediately expected to march againſt them. Edward had ſent to Leofric Earl of Mercia, and Syward of Northumberland to come and aſſiſt him in this Extremity; who after a little Time gather'd together a conſiderable Force, with which Rodulph, the King's Nephew by his Siſter Goda, join'd himſelf. In the mean Time Godwin and his Sons proceeded into Gloceſterſhire, and incamp'd at a Place call'd Langtreo, from whence they ſent to the King then lying at Gloceſter, and demanded Earl Euſtace and his Company to be deliver'd up, together with ſuch Normans and Bulloignois as held the Caſtle at Canterbury, upon Refuſal denouncing War. The King was much ſurpriz'd at this Meſſage, not knowing how to act; but upon hearing that the Forces of Leofric, Syward and Rodulph were on their March, he ſent back the Meſſenger with an abſolute Refuſal. They were newly gone when the King's Forces arriv'd at Gloceſter, ſo enrag'd, that he with great Difficulty reſtrain'd them from marching immediately to engage with Godwin. Leofric and the wiſer Sort, ſenſible of the Miſeries of a Civil War, perſuaded the King to come to a Treaty, of which they conceiv'd the greater Hopes, becauſe Godwin had had given Orders to his Sons not to engage firſt, but to defend themſelves if they were attack'd by the King's Forces. They brought both Parties to this Agreement; that Hoſtages ſhould be given on both Sides, and the whole Conteſt be referr'd to a further Debate to be held at London. The King having encreas'd his Forces out of Mercia and Northumberland, went with them and his Nobility to London; and Godwin having done the like in Weſt-Sex, repair'd to Southwark. The grand Council, by way of Satisfaction to the King, order'd Godwin and his Son Harold to appear before them unarm'd, and but with twelve Attendants, and to deliver up all their Forces into the Hands of the King. They pleaded That they could not give up themſelves into the Hands of their Enemies without ſufficient Caution and Security, otherwiſe they were ready to ſurrender their Forces, and to obey the King in all Things that were conſiſtent with their Honour and Safety; but to come unarm'd, and with ſo few Followers, was to hazard both their Lives and Reputations. The King by this Anſwer was further exaſperated, and thereupon an Edict was publiſh'd by Conſent of the Council and Army, That Godwin and his Sons ſhould quit the Land within five Days. His Soldiers dreading the Conſequence, began to abandon him, ſo that finding it ſafeſt to give way to the Times, the Earl departed with his Wife Gytha, and three Sons, Swane, Gyrth and Toſti, into Flanders to Earl Baldwin, Father-in-Law to Toſti, with as much Treaſure as the Ship could carry. Harold and Leofwin, his other Sons, went to Briſtol, where taking a Ship that their Brother Swane had provided for himſelf, they ſail'd into Ireland. Harold's Earldom was confer'd on Elgar, the Son of Leofric; and the King to purſue his Indignation, depriv'd Egitha his Queen of all her Jewels and Treaſure, and ſent her away only with one Attendant to the Nunnery of Warewell, there to be kept in Cuſtody by the Abbeſs his Siſter.

who are forc'd to quit the Land.

William Duke of Normandy viſits King Edward.

The Enemy thus remov'd, William Duke of Normandy, with a great Train of Normans, came over into England to viſit his old Friend King Edward, where he and his Retinue were nobly and magnificently entertain'd, richly preſented, and imprudently led to the chief Caſtles and Forts, and ſhew'd the whole Strength of the Nation, and whatever elſe was in a ſhort Time to be their own. Tho', as Ingulph aſſures us, there was yet no Expectation of his ſucceeding in the Kingdom, or at leaſt no Mention made of it between the King and the Duke. About the ſame Year, we are told that Queen Emma was accus'd both of conſenting to the Death of her Son Alfred, and alſo of preparing Poiſon for Edward, and laſtly of Incontinence with Alwin Biſhop of Wincheſter, and all this by Robert the Norman, whom the King had made Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury. Upon which Accuſation, being cloſely confin'd to Warewell, ſhe wrote to all the Biſhops of England, who were her Friends, profeſſing, That ſhe was more afflicted at the Scandal rais'd againſt the good Biſhop, than at her own Infamy; and that ſhe was ready to clear her Innocency by undergoing the ſevere Trial by Ordeale, and paſſing over red hot Irons. Upon which the Biſhops met, and had eaſily prevail'd upon the King to remit and forget all, but Robert violently oppos'd them, demanding of them, How they durſt defend a Woman guilty of ſo many Crimes? concluding, That if ſhe would paſs barefoot and blindfold over nine red-hot Plow-ſhares, four ſteddy Paces for her ſelf, and five for the Biſhop, ſhe might paſs for Innocent. Whereupon the Day of Trial was appointed, and before the King and all his Biſhops, except Robert, ſhe paſs'd unhurt over all the Plow-ſhares; uſing theſe Words to her Leaders, as not knowing ſhe was paſt Danger, O Lord, when ſhall I come to the Place of my Purgation? But having her Eyes uncover'd, and ſeeing her ſelf at Liberty, ſhe fell upon her Knees, and with Tears gave Thanks to her Deliverer; whereby ſhe recover'd both the Love, and her former Eſtate of the King, with the Eſteem and Applauſe of the People. In Memory of which ſhe gave nine Mannors, according to the Number of the Plow-ſhares, to the Cathedral of Wincheſter, and beautify'd it with many rich Ornaments; as likewiſe the the King, repenting the Injury done to her, beſtow'd on the ſame Church the Iſle of Portland and other Poſſeſſions. The Subſtance of this remarkable Story is deliver'd both by Bromton and Knighton, and Harpsfield has enlarg'd it with ſome Circumſtances. But the ancient Authors, as Malmesbury and others, are wholly ſilent in this Matter; ſo that the Story is juſtly ſuſpected, tho' not yet fully confuted. Of more Certainty we find that this famous Queen dy'd the Year after this ſuppos'd fiery Trial, and was bury'd in the Cathedral of Wincheſter. Her Death.

Sax. An. Malmſb. In the ſame Year Griffin the Welſh King made an Inroad into Herefordſhire, and ravag'd a great Part of the Country; againſt whom the Inhabitants aroſe, and the Normans that held the Caſtle of Hereford ſally'd out and engaging him were defeated, ſo that he return'd home with great Booty. Not long after Harold and Leofwin, Sons of Earl Godwin, returning out of Ireland, paſs'd with many Veſſels up the Severn, and landing in the Counties of Somerſet and Dorſet, they plunder'd many Villages; and tho' great Numbers march'd againſt them, they put them to the rout, and having ſlain thirty principal Officers, beſides many of the ordinary Sort, they return'd with much Booty to their Ships. King Edward allarm'd with the News, and expecting Earl Godwin as well as his Sons, order'd forty well-furniſh'd Ships into Sandwich Road to prevent his Landing; but notwithſtanding this Care, he found Means to come aſhore undiſcover'd in Kent, where he ſent Meſſengers round about, and firſt ingag'd the Inhabitants of Canterbury who own'd him as a Sufferer for their Sakes, then thoſe of Suſſex, Eſſex, Surry, and all the Sea-men of Haſtings, and others of thoſe Maritime Parts, who promis'd to live and dye with him. The Fleet having Notice of his Landing, ſome were ſent to purſue him; but he concealing himſelf, they return'd firſt to Sandwich, and then came up to London. Godwin paſs'd to the Iſle of Wight, and coaſted about 'till he was join'd by his Sons Harold and Leofwin. Yet ſtill they forbore all Hoſtilities, but on the Coaſts and elſewhere they drew over as many Men as they could, eſpecially Sea-Men, and ſo made for Sandwich Road, from whence the News flew to London, and ſo ſtartled the Court, that immediately Command was iſſu'd out from the King to all his Loving Subjects, to haſten and aſſiſt him in a Time of ſo great Neceſſity. Yet they delay'd ſo long, that Godwin had Opportunity to paſs up the Thames as far as Southwark, where waiting for a Tide, he ſpent the Time in conferring with the Londoners, whom he procur'd to act according to his Deſigns. At high Water he advanc'd further, and no Oppoſition being made upon the Bridge, he row'd up by the Southern Bank 'till he met with his Land Army, which he drew up in Battalia formidable to the Spectators on the other Side; and now he directed his Navy towards the King's Gallies, ſhipping off his Men, and making all Things ready to follow. Edward by this Time on the other Side had gather'd together a competent Force, and all Perſons expected an Ingagement; but the Soldiers on both Sides agreed in this, that they were not willing to fight Engliſh againſt Engliſh, which gave the wiſer Sort an Opportunity of mediating a Peace, by means of which the two Armies were ſpeedily disbanded. The Effect of it was that Godwin, his Wife and Sons were reſtor'd to their former Honours and Eſtates, all except Swane, who as a Penance for Murdering his Coſen Beorn had undertaken a Pilgrimage bare-foot from Flanders to Jeruſalem, and in his Return dy'd of a Cold he had got in Lycia. The King receiv'd his Wife Egitha the Earl's Daughter to her former Dignity; Right and Juſtice was now promis'd to all Men, and ſuch Normans as had abus'd his Authority and given him ill Counſel, were baniſh'd the Land. Some few, as Robert the Deacon, Richard his Son-in-Law, Alverede the King's Groom, Axfrid ſirnam'd Cooksfoot, and ſome others whom the King much favour'd, and who had done no ill Offices, were permitted to ſtay. But Robert Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, William Biſhop of London, and Ulf Biſhop of Lincoln with their Followers with much Diffi-

Difficulty eſcap'd, and got over Sea: Yet afterwards William upon the Account of his good Temper was permitted to return. Osbirne and his Companion Hugh ſurrender'd their Caſtles, and by Leave of Earl Leofric, paſs'd through his Government into Scotland, where they were entertain'd by King Macbeth. In this ſame Year on St. Thomas's Night happen'd ſo violent a Tempeſt, that it overturn'd many Churches and Houſes, and broke and tore up by the Roots an innumerable Quantity of Trees.

A. D. 1053. In the following Year, Res the Brother of Griffin King of South-Wales being taken Priſoner, as a publick Enemy, for the many Inſolencies he had committed, was by Command of King Edward put to Death at a Place call'd Bulendum, and his Head ſent to him at Gloceſter. This afforded ſufficient Matter for Diſcourſe, but as little Reports are ſuppreſs'd by greater, this was ſoon quaſh'd by the Rumour and Talk about the Death of Earl Godwin, which happen'd the ſame Year at Eaſter. King Edward celebrating this Feaſt at Winchеſter, and Godwin, as his Cuſtom was, ſitting at the Table with him, was ſuddenly ſeiz'd with ſo violent a Diſtemper as ſtruck him ſpeechleſs, and threw him down from the Seat where he ſat. His three Sons, Harold, Toſti and Gyrth being preſent, remov'd him into the King's Chamber, hoping it was but a Fit that would not laſt long; but he lay in that languiſhing Condition four Days, and dy'd on the fifth, and was bury'd in the old Monaſtery. This is the uſual Account of his Death; to which the Norman Monks, and ſuch as write in favour of them, add other Circumſtances, which much ſhew his Guilt, or their Malice. They relate, that Mention being made at the King's Table of Alfred his late Brother, he thereupon look'd very angrily at Godwin; and he to vindicate himſelf, readily reply'd, That he perceiv'd that upon every Mention made of that Prince, he caſt a frowning Countenance upon him: But, added he, let not God ſuffer me to ſwallow this Morſel, if I am guilty of any Thing done, either towards the taking away his Life, or againſt your Intereſt. After which Words, he was choak'd with the Bit he had juſt put into his Mouth, immediately ſunk down, and never recover'd. But whatever was the Manner of his Death, he was a Man of an active and a turbulent Spirit, not nicely conſcientious either in gaining or keeping, and not to be vindicated in his forcing his Soveraign to what he pleas'd. But had he not been ſo great a Lover of his Country, and an Enemy to Strangers, thoſe who wrot in the Norman Times, and who durſt not but write what would pleaſe their Maſters, would have diſmiſs'd him without this Story, and with a fairer Character. His firſt Wife was the Siſter of King Canute, who was kill'd by Thunder, a Judgment which was believ'd fell upon her for her Cruelty, for ſhe made Merchandiſe of ſelling handſom Boys and Girls into Denmark. By his ſecond Wife he had ſix Sons, Harold, Swane, Wined, Toſti, Gyrth and Leofwin; his Earldom of Weſt-Sex was given to his Son Harold, and the Earldom of Eſſex, which Harold had before, was conferr'd on Algar the Son of Leofric Earl of Mercia.

A. D. 1054. In the next Year, Syward the valiant Earl of Northumberland was ſent with a powerful Body of Horſe and a ſtrong Fleet into Scotland, where he fought a Battel with Macbeth King of that Country, whom he defeated, with the Deaths of many of his Scots, and ſuch Normans as had before gone over to him; and quite expelling him, he made Malcolm King in his ſtead, according to the Orders he had receiv'd from King Edward. But this Victory was purchas'd with the Lives of many of the Engliſh and Danes, beſides Syward's own Son, of whoſe Death when he heard, he demanded Whether he had receiv'd his Wound before or behind? and when he was anſwer'd Before, he declar'd himſelf Glad, otherwiſe he ſhould not have thought him worthy of Burial. King Edward having ſent this Earl into the North to fight, about the ſame Time he ſent Aldred Biſhop of Worceſter with great Preſents, to treat with the Emperor of Germany about his Coſen Edward, the Son of King Edmund Ironſide, and of ſending him out of Hungary into England; for having no Iſſue of his own to ſucceed ſucceed him, and the Sons of Godwin being very powerful, he took Care for his neareſt Kinſman, to whom the Crown of Right ſhould belong. But Syward Earl of Northumberland did not long ſurvive his Victory, and his Son's Death, dying the following Year at York, where he was bury'd in the Monaſtery of St. Mary's without the Walls, built by himſelf, according to Ingulph, tho' Simeon ſpeaks of his being interr'd at a Monaſtery call'd Galmanho of his own Erection. Huntington, who gives him the Epithete of Conſul Rigidiſſimus, tells us his Diſeaſe was a Dyſentery, and that he was highly afflicted that he ſhould end his Days in ſuch a Manner. Therefore perceiving his Death to approach, he cry'd out, How aſham'd am I, that I could not dye glorioufly in one of the many Battels I have fought, but be thus reſerv'd to the ignominious Death of Beaſts: Arm me with my impenetrable Corſlet, gird me with my faithful Sword, and ſet my Helmet upon my Head; give me in my left Hand my large Buckler, and in my right my gilded Scimiter, that being a valiant Soldier, like a Soldier I may die. Thus couragiouſly he ſpoke, and as he ſpoke, he dy'd ſtanding in that honourable Poſture he deſir'd. His Son Walteof being very young, his Government was beſtow'd on Toſti the Son of Earl Godwin. Syward's Death.

About the ſame Time King Edward in an Aſſembly held at London, baniſh'd Earl Algar the Son of Leofric, without any Cauſe ſays Simeon, but Huntington writes, that he was publickly convicted of Treaſon. Whether guilty or not, he thought himſelf ſo aggriev'd, that he went over into Ireland, and there procuring a Fleet of eighteen Piratical Veſſels, he with them ſail'd to Griffin King of the Welſh, deſiring his Aſſiſtance againſt his Soveraign King Edward. Griffin ready to ſerve him in this Particular, ſoon rais'd a conſiderable Force, and joining with Algar invaded Herefordſhire, againſt whom the King's Nephew Rodulph made Head, one of ſmall Courage, who meeting them two Miles from Hereford, hors'd all the Engliſh contrary to their accuſtom'd Way of Fighting; which only ſerv'd them for the greater Conveniency of flying; for when the Battel was ſcarce begun, Rodulph with his French and Normans firſt began to run, which ſoon occaſion'd the reſt to follow, who in their Flight loſt about five hundred Men, beſides what were wounded. Griffin and Algar ſwell'd with this Succeſs enter'd Hereford, where they ſlew ſeveral Canons who in their Habits would have maintain'd the great Door of the principal Church againſt them; which done they burnt the Monaſtery with all its Ornaments and Relicks, kill'd ſeveral of the Citizens, took more Priſoners, plunder'd and burnt the City, and departed with great Spoils. The King highly allarm'd at theſe Actions, commanded Forces to be rais'd throughout England, which rendezvouſing at Gloceſter, he committed the Conduct of them to Earl Harold, who marching ſpeedily into Wales, encamp'd beyond Straddale, where Griffin and Algar durſt not face him, but knowing him to be a Man both of Skill and Vigour, they retir'd into South-Wales. Harold finding the March difficult, left the greateſt Part of his Forces to obſerve their Motions, and with the reſt return'd to Hereford, which he ſtrongly fortify'd. During this Employment, the two Commanders thinking it beſt to obtain Peace, ſent to deſire a Meeting at a Place call'd Byligeſleage, where a firm Peace and Amity was concluded; in Purſuance of which Algar ſent away his Ships, and went himſelf to the King, by whom he was reſtor'd to his former Command. But Griffin the next Year broke the Peace on his part, by ſetting upon Leofgar Biſhop of Hereford, whom he ſlew together with his Clerks, and Agelwoth Vice-Earl of the County, and many others. Earl Algar rebels. He is reſtored.

Sim. Dun. In the following Year, Edward the Son of King Edmund Ironſide, at the Deſire of his Uncle came into England out of Hungary, being by him deſign'd for his Succeſſor; but not long after he dy'd at London, and was bury'd at St. Paul's Church, leaving behind him one Son nam'd Edgar Etheling, and two Daughters, Margaret and Chriſtina. Not long after he was follow'd to a better Life by Earl Leofric, who dy'd in his own Village of Bromleage, and was A. was bury'd in a Monaſtery of his own Founding at Coventry, a pious charitable Man, and the Neſtor of his Age, one to whoſe Counſels ſeveral Kings, and the whole Nation had often been oblig'd. He was ſucceeded by his Son Algar in his Earldom, which ſoon miſs'd him, he being baniſh'd a ſecond Time in leſs than a Year after his Father's Death, yet by the Aſſiſtance of Griffin, the Welſh King, who would not deſert him, and a Fleet of Norway Men, which by Chance came into his Aid, he ſhortly after by Force recover'd his Government: So ſucceſsful was Treaſon in theſe vicious Times. The following Year 1060, Malcolm King of the Scots came and gave a Viſit to King Edward, and contracted ſo great a Friendſhip with his Neighbour Toſti, who brought him on his Way, that they became ſworn Brethren, tho' to what Effect, the Event ſhew'd within two Years; for Toſti being gone to Rome with Aldred Arch-Biſhop of York, his ſworn Brother Malcolm took the Advantage of his Abſence, and cruelly waſted the Places under his Government, and broke the Peace of St. Cuthbert in the Holy Iſland, as Simeon complains. While Malcolm thus diſtreſs'd the Northern Parts, Griffin King of the Welſh, both by Sea and Land ſeverely harraſs'd the Weſt, which occaſion'd King Edward from Gloceſter to diſpatch Harold with a Party of Horſe, ſoon after Chriſtmaſs, to ſurprize him, if poſſible. Yet Griffin got Notice of his coming, and with Difficulty eſcap'd; but abandoning moſt of his Ships, Harold commanded them to be burnt, and ſo return'd. About Rogation Week with a conſiderable Fleet Harold ſet Sail from Briſtol, and compaſſing the greateſt Part of Wales, he join'd himſelf to the Horſe, with which his Brother Toſti by the King's Order met him, and did ſuch Damage to the Country, that the Britains yielded themſelves to him, deliver'd up Hoſtages, conſented to pay Tribute, and entirely renounc'd Griffin their King. At preſent Griffin eſcap'd, but in the following Year he was taken by Griffin King of North-Wales; and being for his perfidious Dealings puniſh'd with Death, his Head, together with the Head of his Ship, were ſent as a Preſent to Harold. He ſent them to King Edward, who was ſo generous as to beſtow the Dominions of Griffin upon his two Brothers, Blechgent and Rithwalan, who in the Preſence of Harold ſwore Allegiance to him, to obey him both by Sea and Land, and ingag'd to pay whatever had been paid out of the Country to the former Kings of England. Griffin left behind him a Son nam'd Caradoc, who was highly diſſatisfy'd to find his Inheritance thus made over to his Uncles; therefore when Harold, as a Curb to the Country and his own Conveniency of Hunting, had erected a ſtately Houſe upon the Severn, furniſh'd with the choiceſt Proviſions, Caradoc out of Diſdain and Revenge, ſuddenly came down with a Party, kill'd all the Artificers, demoliſh'd the Houſe, and took away all the Proviſions.

which ended with the Death of their King.

Thus was Harold diſappointed in thoſe Parts; but ſoon after his Brother Toſti was in greater Danger, from a Conſpiracy rais'd againſt him in his own Government of Northumberland; occaſion'd by an Officer nam'd Goſpatrick, with whom having a Conteſt, his Siſter Queen Egitha caus'd him to be ſlain at Court. This Quarrel being eſpous'd by the Friends of Goſpatrick, two of them, nam'd Ganiel and Ulf, were treacherouſly drawn in, and murder'd in Toſti's Chamber. Theſe Actions, with the intollerable Exactions upon the Country, ſo incens'd the Inhabitants, that three or four of the principal Men, viz. Ganiolbarn, Demſtan and Gloineorn, with four hundred others in Arms, enter'd York, and firſt ſlew two of Toſti's Houſhold Servants, who were flying from the City, and the Day following, above two hundred more of his Attendants, on the North Side of the River Humber. Then breaking open his Treaſury, they rifled all they could find, and departed. Upon which Toſti made great Complaints to the King, and at his Deſire, his Brother Harold was appointed to accommodate this troubleſome Affair. But as they were going into the North for that purpoſe, the whole Country in a manner met them them at Northampton, and afterwards at Oxford vehemently oppos'd the Designs of Tosti, declaring, That they were free Men born, and as freely educated; That they would not indure the Insolence of an Earl; for they had learnt from their Ancestors to chuse either Death or Liberty. They continu'd so unanimous and resolute, that in a short Time they procur'd Tosti and his Ministers to be all banish'd. He went over with his Wife to Baldwin Earl of Flanders, his Father-in-Law, and Morchar, the Son of Algar, according to the Country's Request, was made Earl of Northumberland in his room. This was the most probable Occasion of Tosti's Banishment; tho' Huntington, who had heard many Stories of hated Earl Godwin and his Sons, gives us a different Account; namely, That Tosti being jealous of the King's Favour towards his Brother Harold, openly assaulted him in his Presence at Dinner; and afterwards when Harold had prepar'd an extraordinary Entertainment for the King at Hereford, Tosti slew several of his Servants, and put their mangled Limbs into the Butts of Wine and other Liquors, making a barbarous Jest, That they should not want pickled Meats. The same Author says, that the King foretold, That the Destruction of their Family was nigh, and that the Wrath of God would not much longer be deferr'd: For, adds he, they were arriv'd to that Degree of Barbarism and Cruelty, that if they lik'd the House or Possession of any Man, they would by Night procure the Owner to be murder'd, with all his Children, to get his Estate: And these were at that Time the chief Justiciaries of the Kingdom.

He and his Agents are banish'd.

But if the King upon this or some other Occasion predicted the Ruin of the Sons of Godwin to be just approaching, it so far prov'd true, that their ill Stars began to operate about this Time; for Tosti was not only banish'd the Land, but Harold was driven from it by the very Winds and Seas. Being at his House at Bosenham in Sussex, a Place unjustly obtain'd by his Father, Harold for his Recreation with some of his Retinue, took a Fisher-Boat on the Sea; but sailing a little further than they design'd, a Tempest arose, and drove them cross the English Channel to the Coasts of Normandy, where they were oblig'd to land in the Territories of the Earl of Ponthieu. The Inhabitants of that Country, according to a barbarous Practice usual in most Sea-Coasts, immediately seiz'd upon the Earl and his Followers, took them Prisoners, and put Fetters upon them. Harold upon this hired a Messenger to go to William Duke of the Country and acquaint him, That he was sent over by the King of England, by his Word and Presence to confirm what other lesser Envoys had only whisper'd; but that he was detain'd Prisoner, and hinder'd from the Discharge of his Message by Gwido Earl of Ponthieu. Upon which Harold by the Command of Duke William was immediately set at Liberty, and by Gwido conducted to his Court; where being honourably entertain'd, he was also invited to an Expedition into Little Britain, where at that Time the Norman Duke made War. By his Wit and Valour he so well recommended himself to the Duke, that he was highly esteem'd by him; to whom, that he might also the more endear himself, he promis'd by a solemn Oath, That when King Edward dy'd, he would deliver up the Castle of Dover to him, which was then under his Command, and procure him to succeed in the Kingdom of England. Upon which Promise the Duke's Daughter, as yet too young for Marriage, was contracted to him; and he was sent home with very rich Presents. This is the Account that Malmesbury and some others give of this important Accident. But Ingulph tells us, That King Edward now grown old, perceiving his Brother Edgar Etheling both in Body and Mind unfit to govern, and on the other Side Duke William his Kinsman by the Mother of great Merit and Renown, sent Arch-Bishop Robert, to acquaint the Duke with his Purpose of making him his Successor, not long before Harold came thither. But if the Substance of this be true, it must be by some other Messenger, for Arch-Bishop Robert was dead long before. Eadmer and Simeon write, That Harold went into Normandy by the the King's Permiſſion, or Connivance, to free his Brother Wulnod, and his Nephew Hacun the Son of Swane, whom the King had taken Hoſtages of Godwin, and ſent into Normandy; that King Edward foretold Harold that his Voyage thither would be to the Detriment of all England, and his own Reproach; and that Duke William then inform'd Harold, That Edward before his coming to the Crown had promis'd him that he ſhould ſucceed him, if ever he obtain'd it himſelf. Laſtly Matthew Paris believes him driven to Normandy by a Tempeſt, where to gain his Liberty he made a Promiſe contrary to his Intentions, and enter'd into that ſecret Confederacy out of Neceſſity.

Whatever the Occaſion of his Promiſe and Ingagement was, the Time drew near, that he ſhould be put to the Trial. For now approach'd that Year, that dreadful Year to him, and his Engliſh-Saxon Nation, ſignaliz'd by a famous Comet, which according to Ingulph portended that great Change of Government, that ſlaughter of the People, and that great Calamity which ſhortly fell upon the Land. King Edward declining in Years and Stength daily grew weaker, yet kept his Chriſtmaſs at Weſtminſter, and aſſiſted at the Dedication of St. Peter's Church there, which he had founded, or at leaſt re-edify'd it with great Magnificence, and by a Charter granted it many Immunities and Privileges, to which was annex'd the firſt great Seal us'd in England. But on the fifth Day of January, having receiv'd the Bleſſed Euchariſt, he recommended his Soul to God, and quietly departed this Life; to the exceeding Grief of the miſerable People. According to his Commands he was bury'd in his late Dedicated Church with great Solemnity; having reign'd from the Death of Harde-canute twenty three Years, ſix Months, and twenty ſeven Days. This Prince is noted for his great Innocence and Simplicity, being much inclinable to Devotion and Religious Exerciſes; and we are told that he was the firſt King of England that by Touching cur'd that Diſtemper call'd the King's Evil. He is ſaid to have been ſo chaſte, that never as a Husband enjoy'd his own Wife, tho' a very beautiful Lady; for which, as well as his other Virtues, and particularly his Charity to the Poor, he is commonly ſtil'd St. Edward the Confeſſor. But he was indeed but a weak and eaſie Prince, and too liable to be miſs-led by the Suggeſtions of thoſe about him, as may be obſerv'd in his ſevere Proceedings againſt his Mother and Wife: Tho' that very eaſineſs of Nature is in him reckon'd for a Virtue, as appears from this Story related by Abbot Ailred: This King being in an Afternoon laid down upon his Bed to repoſe himſelf, with the Curtains cloſe about him, and no Perſon in the Chamber, a Boy employ'd in the meaner Offices of the Houſe came in, who ſeeing none in the Room, and finding the Cheſt open where Hugolin the Chamberlain kept the Mony for the King's ordinary Expences, he run haſtily to it, and filling his Pockets with Mony departed: All which was thorough the Curtains ſeen by the King, who without Diſturbance let him paſs. The Boy finding his Succeſs, reſolv'd to make a ſecond Attempt; and coming to get more, the King call'd out to him, Sirrah, you had beſt be content with what you got, for if Hugolin comes, he'll not only whip you ſeverely, but take away all you have ſtolen. Upon this the Boy fled, and when Hugolin came in, and expreſs'd much Paſſion for the Mony that he miſs'd, the King calmly bad him reſt contented, For, the poor Rogue that has it, wants it more than we. So that in ſhort, we may rely upon Malmesbury's Character of this Prince, That if we conſider his Simplicity, he ſeem'd very unfit for Government; yet by reaſon of his Virtue and Piety towards God, he was ſo directed by him, that the moſt Politick and Couragious Kings have ſcarce ruled more happily: For during his Reign the Kingdom was never invaded by Foreign Enemies, nor diſturb'd by Civil Conteſts, but what were eaſily ſuppreſs'd.

His Character.

Yet it was the Misfortune of the Nation, as well as himſelf, that he was formerly driven into Baniſhment, and living in another Country, was moulded into the Humour, Faſhions and Cuſtoms of it, and out of good Nature conſtrain'd to be grateful to ſuch as had well deſerv'd of him in his Neceſſities, more than than the Temper, if not the Intereſt of his own Subjects could bear. Yet moſt of the People in Compliance and Conformity with him did ſo transform themſelves into Foreign Shapes, as foretold their Subjection in a ſhort Time to thoſe the Manners and Uſages of whom they had already aſſum'd; ſo that the Conquerors had nothing to do but to Maſter their Bodies, ſince their Minds and Affections were theirs already. Ingulph, an Eye-Witneſs, informs us, That Edward being bred up in Normandy, through his long Continuance in that Country was almoſt chang'd into a Frenchman, and brought great Numbers over with him, whom he promoted to various Dignities, and higheſt Places of Truſt. Thus introduc'd, all the Nation began to leave off their Engliſh Cuſtoms, and to imitate the Manners of the French: All the Nobility in their Houſes ſpoke the French Tongue, as an Inſtance of Gallantry, made their Writings and Letters after the French Faſhion, and became aſham'd of their own Uſages, both in theſe and other Matters: And this Humour, together with the Vices of the Nation, more and more encreas'd, 'till at length to thoſe they admir'd they became Slaves and Vaſſals: So much was that Saying verify'd, 'That where a Foreign 'Tongue prevails, it is reckon'd half a Conqueſt. The Laws of this Prince have bore a great Reputation, being collected from thoſe of the Mercians, Weſt-Saxons and Northumbrians, as well as from thoſe of Alfred, Edward the Elder and Edgar, reduc'd into one Body, and writ in Latin, of which we have ſtill ſome Remains. But when the Reader hears the Laws of St. Edward, ſo much applauded, and ſo much conteſted after the Conqueſt, he is to remember that the Engliſh-Saxon Laws are there meant, which were in a great Degree the Fountain of thoſe which to this Day we term the Common Law, tho' the Forms of Pleading and Proceſs were afterwards brought in by the Normans. But they receiv'd their Denomination from King Edward, as being in Effect the laſt King of the Saxon Race, and one whoſe Memory the People reverenc'd, for the high Reputation he had gain'd for his great Sanctity, and Clemency to his Subjects. In this Prince the Royal Regnant Line of the Weſt-Saxon Kings, which from Cerdic the firſt of them had Dominion in Britain five hundred and forty ſeven Years, receiv'd its Period.

II. Tho' the Glory and Happineſs of the Weſt-Saxon Family was now at a Period, yet this did not put an End to the Engliſh Empire, and in its own Fall involve the Fate of the Nation: This was reſerv'd to be the Work of an inferior Houſe, out of which a Stranger ſhould ariſe to pull down the whole Fabrick, and bury himſelf in its laſt Ruins. King Edward being dead, three laid Claim to the Crown; firſt Edgar Etheling, the undoubted Heir, as being Grand-Son to King Edmund Ironſide, who was Elder Brother to the King laſt in Poſſeſſion. The next was William Duke of Normandy, the Kinſman of the late King by his Mother Emma, being her Brother's Grandſon, one who in Blood could find no Pretext, but upon the Kindneſs and Promiſe of his deceas'd Kinſman. The laſt was Harold the Son of Earl Godwin, who could produce no ſhew of Right by Deſcent, but poſitively alledg'd the late King's Deſignment, and thought he could plead more Merit than both the other. Edgar was too much a Stranger, and had neither Time nor Ability in Eſtate or Mind to make any more Intereſt than what mere Conſcience had wrought in the Minds of the People, which is uſually very feeble and infirm upon ſuch Occaſions. William was a glorious Prince, and as ſuch acknowledg'd, but between him and England was a Ditch ſo deep and ſpacious, that the Danger was too far diſtant to be much regarded. Harold was a noble and popular Man, the greateſt Miniſter of the deceas'd King, one of great Valour and dextrous Conduct, civil and obliging, and of ſuch Qualifications as fitted him for a Crown; and what was more advantagious, vantagious, he had all the Court and Grandees at his beck, whom he had either oblig'd by his Kindneſs, or won by his Authority. He therefore took the immediate Advantage of his Power, and being declar'd Succeſſor by the late King, on the ſame Day that he was bury'd, he aſſum'd the Title, and was crown'd King, being choſen, as Simeon aſſures us, by the Princes of all England. Only a Manuſcript Chronicle in the Cottonian Library relates, That when King Edward laid upon his Death Bed, Earl Harold came to him, and deſir'd him to nominate him for his Succeſſor, to whom the King reply'd, That he had already made Duke William his Heir. But the Earl and his Friends ſtill perſiſting in their Requeſt, the King turning his Head to the Wall, reply'd, When I am dead, let the Engliſh make either the Duke or the Earl their King: Which if true, ſhews that it was but a Conſent in part, which was alſo extorted from him.

Harold being made King immediately proceeded to the Performance of many laudable Actions: He repeal'd many hard and antiquated Laws, and made others that were better; he became a Patron to Churches and Monaſteries, and ſeem'd not only to reſpect, but to reverence the Biſhops, Abbots, Monks and all the Clergy; to all good Men he ſhew'd himſelf humble and obliging, to the Vicious he declar'd an Averſion, commanding all his Officers to detect and puniſh all Thieves, Robbers and Diſturbers of the publick Peace; and in concluſion, he made it his Buſineſs to defend his Country both by Sea and Land. But both his own Fate, and that of the Nation was too urgent to permit him long to continue theſe Methods. On the 24th of April a dreadful and unuſual Comet appear'd with great Luſtre for ſeven Days; ſeen, as was reported, throughout the World. The firſt Miſchief believ'd to have been portended by it, was from Harold's own Brother Toſti, who having been baniſh'd chiefly by his Procurement, and unable to bear his Brother's high Preferment, was excited by ſo much Envy and Indignation, as to endeavour his certain Ruin. For which purpoſe he ſail'd out of Flanders with ſome Ships to the Iſle of Wight, from whence having forc'd Mony from the Inhabitants, he practis'd Piracy upon all the Coaſts 'till he came to Sandwich Haven. Harold being then at London, immediately got ready both a ſtrong Fleet, and a conſiderable Party of Horſe, reſolving like a good Warrior to go in Perſon to Sandwich; which being made known to Toſti, he took all the Seamen with him he could find, and ſail'd to the Coaſts of Lincolnſhire, where he burnt many Villages, and kill'd many Men: But Edwin Earl of Mercia, and his Brother Morchar Earl of Northumberland, haſten'd into thoſe Parts with an Army, and ſoon conſtrain'd him to abandon the Country. From whence he ſail'd into Scotland to King Malcolm, where he continu'd the whole Summer. In the mean Time King Harold ſail'd to the Iſle of Wight, and ply'd all Summer 'till the middle of September about thoſe Coaſts, having alſo a Land Army plac'd to the beſt advantage on the Sea Side. For he expected a more formidable Invader than his Brother Toſti, namely the great William Duke of Normandy, who before had ſent Meſſengers to him to remind him of his Promiſe and Oath, and to require a Performance of what had been agreed between them. Harold thought it very unreaſonable to require ſuch a Performance of one actually in Poſſeſſion of a Kingdom, and who was come to it by the unanimous Conſent of the Nobility and People. Therefore he made Anſwer, That what he then promis'd was in Captivity, when he wanted his Liberty, which could not be called his own Act, ſince it was extorted by Neceſſity. But ſuppoſing what he had done had been voluntary, it could not have been valid, ſince as King of England, he could not marry a Foreigner, without the Aſſent of the States of the Nation, much leſs alter the Succeſſion and Right to the Crown, without their Knowledge, Conſent and Allowance. He inſiſted further, That ſince the Duke's Daughter was dead, the marrying of whom was the Foundation of the Alliance, all Obligations were diſſolv'd. To theſe Reaſons Harold, thinking himſelf ſufficiently powerful, added Contempt, according according to Matth. Paris, and ſent away William's Ambaſſadors on lame and maimed Horſes.

Sim. Dun. M. Paris, &c.

This Uſage was highly provoking to Duke William, who thereupon made the utmoſt Preparations for an Invaſion. In the mean Time King Harold, having expected him all the Summer, and now concluding that he had deferr'd his Voyage 'till the next Spring, remov'd all his Forces from the Southern Coaſts, and march'd towards the North, where he was call'd by a new Storm that threaten'd him from thoſe Parts. This was rais'd by his Brother Toſti, who applying himſelf to Harold Harvager King of Norway, join'd Fleets with him, and ſail'd up into the River Humber, and next into the Owſe; where landing at a Place call'd Rickale, they march'd to York, and took it by Storm. Before Harold could arrive in theſe Parts, the two Brother Earls, Edwin and Morchar, with conſiderable Forces march'd againſt them, and upon the twentieth Day of September, at Fulford on the Owſe, ingag'd them with great Bravery, and with good Succeſs in the Beginning: But after a long Fight, the Engliſh unable to ſuſtain the Violence and Numbers of the Norwegians, retired with the Loſs of many of their Men, both in the Field of Battel, and in the adjoining River. Upon this, the Norwegians receiv'd from the Inhabitants of York five hundred Hoſtages, and leaving there a hundred and fifty of their own, return'd towards their Ships. Five Days after the Battel, King Harold arriv'd at York; from whence marching to a Place upon this Occaſion ſince call'd Battel-Bridge, he ingag'd their whole Forces, and after a terrible Reſiſtance both Harold Harvager and Toſti were ſlain, and the Victory remain'd to the Engliſh. But we ought to remember what Malmesbury tells us of one Norwegian, who with incredible Valour keeping the Bridge a full Hour againſt the whole Engliſh Army, with his ſingle Reſiſtance retarded their Victory; and ſcorning to accept of Quarter, 'till no Man daring to grapple with him, as too ſtrong and deſperate, he was at length ſhot dead with an Arrow; and by his Fall open'd the Paſſage of Purſuit to a compleat Victory. But Olave the King of Norway's Son, and Paul Earl of Orkney, who had been left with many Soldiers to guard the Ships, upon ſurrendring themſelves, and giving Hoſtages and Oaths never to return to England as Enemies, were permitted freely to depart with twenty Ships, and the ſmall Remainder of their Army. The Body of Toſti being known by a Wart between his Shoulders, was carry'd to York, and there bury'd. In the Plunder of the Field, if we may believe Adam Bremenſis, ſo great a Quantity of Gold was found, that twelve luſty young Men were ſcarcely able to bear it on their Backs. Whatever the Quantity was it prov'd of dangerous Conſequence to King Harold, who being fluſh'd with Succeſs, and excited by Covetouſneſs, impolitickly took that and all the Plunder to his own Uſe; which ſo diſoblig'd his Soldiers, in defrauding them of the Price of their Blood, that they began to renounce his Intereſt, and repented of their former Services; which was ſo much the more dangerous, becauſe he was ſo much weaken'd by the two laſt Battels, loſing moſt of his beſt Men, and Flower of his Army. This Error was no ſooner committed, but as he ſat feaſting in a triumphant Manner at York, he receiv'd the uncomfortable News, that the Norman Duke was landed with very numerous and diſciplin'd Forces, from which Time we may date the Fall and Ruin of this Prince.

Pictav. Malmsb. &c.

Here it will not be improper to look a little back, and give ſome ſhort View and Account of this famous and fortunate William Duke of Normandy. This Prince was Natural Son to Robert the Sixth Duke of Normandy, by Arlotta, the beautiful Daughter of a Skinner in Falaiſe; with whom he fell in love, as ſhe ſtood gazing at a Door, while he paſs'd through the Town; from whoſe Name, according as ſome conjecture, was deriv'd the Word Harlot. But notwithſtanding his diſhonourable Birth, when he was about nine or ten Years of Age, his Father declar'd him his Succeſſor, and caus'd his Nobles and chief Norman Subjects to ſwear Fealty to him, and afterwards carry'd him to do Homage

An Account of William Duke of Normandy.

Homage to Henry the First, King of France, for the Dutchy of Normandy, according to the Custom of the former Dukes. Then delivering him to the Guardianship of that King, and to the Care of the Duke of Bretaign, he made a Pilgrimage to the Holy Land, in which Journey he dy'd; leaving the Young Prince to be the Founder of his own Fortunes, rather than the Heir of his Father's; which he found expos'd to all the Difficulties arising from the Tenderness of his Age, the Reproach of his Birth, a suspected Guardian, a disputed Title, and a distracted State. For upon the first News of Duke Robert's Death, the Nobles of Normandy, who were intrusted with the Government during the Son's Minority, found themselves involv'd in great Difficulties, by the open Factions of some Noblemen, who envy'd their Greatness, and by the private Practices of others, who being descended from some of the former Dukes, resolv'd to set up themselves, but at first conceal'd their Designs, and join'd with the common Murmurers against the present Administration. The Governors were still faithful to their Trust, and judg'd the Presence of the young Prince necessary to support their Authority and his Title; they thereupon prevail'd with the King of France to send him into Normandy, which he did with great Honour to himself, and Kindness to his Pupil, as well as Satisfaction to all his Loyal Subjects; but to the great Disappointment of those who pretended their Discontents were only against the Governors, and not the Succession.

No Prince ever came so early into the Cares and Burdens of a Crown, nor felt them longer; engag'd in Toils and Difficulties, in Hardships and Dangers; his Person expos'd to the Arms of Enemies, and the Plots of Assassins; his Reign embroil'd by the Revolts of his Subjects, and the Invasions of his Neighbours; and his whole Life spent in the necessary Defence of his own Title and Dominions, or in the ambitious Designs of acquiring greater. Yet none ever surmounted all with more Constancy of Spirit, Prudence of Conduct, and Felicity of Fortune: For he had a strong and active Body, and a brave and vigorous Mind; and seem'd to have been born more for a Heroe, than a happy Man. His first Contests arose from the Pretenders to the Succession, who favour'd by the Defects of his Birth, found so many Followers at home, and such Assistance from Neighbours abroad, that they rais'd great Forces, and constrain'd the young Duke to appear, not only at the Head of his Councils, but of his Armies too, before he was eighteen Years of Age. These Civil Wars continu'd long, with many various Successes, bloody Encounters, defeating of Troops, surprizing, besieging and relieving of Towns, and wasting of Countries; 'till at length William by his Vigilance, Bravery and Industry totally subdu'd, not only the Forces, but the Courages of all his Competitors and Enemies at home, and constrain'd them to quit both Normandy and France, and to seek new Fortunes in several Parts of Italy, as Apulia, Calabria and Sicily. His Troubles and Bravery. Ibid.

When Duke William had subdu'd all his Domestick Foes, another appear'd from abroad more formidable than any of the former: This was Martel Earl of Anjou, who was not only a Prince of great Power, but was also strengthen'd by the Assistance of the King of France himself, who jealous of the Norman Greatness was very ready to join in the Reducing of an aspiring Prince. To which End he encourag'd, if not set on foot the Earl of Anjou's Pretensions to the Dutchy of Normandy, gave him his Assistance to justifie his Claim and pursue it by Arms, and by Degrees engag'd in an open and declar'd War against the Duke. This he prosecuted with much Passion and Violence, appear'd himself in the Field with his Nobility, and threaten'd, That nothing but the Ocean should stop the Progress of his Arms. On the other side Duke William proceeded with invincible Bravery, and with such a Presumption of Success, that he scorn'd to set upon his Enemies by Surprize, but sent them Notice of the very Day he would give them Battel; a sort of Courage unknown to this present Age. After many Successes, he at length brought the Contest to the Ibid.

Decision

Deciſion of two fierce Battels. The firſt ended in an intire Victory on the Duke's Side, with the Slaughter of three Parts of his Enemies, amounting to above thirty thouſand Men. This Loſs rather enrag'd than diſcourag'd the King of France, who gave neither himſelf nor his Enemies any Quiet 'till he had engag'd the Normans in a ſecond Battel, with greater Forces and Fury on both Sides, but the ſame or worſe Succeſs than the former. For in this the King of France loſt the Flower of his Army, the greateſt Part of his Nobles, and with great Difficulty eſcap'd himſelf in Perſon. Yet that but little avail'd this unfortunate Prince, who was ſo ſenſible of his Loſs, and Diſhonour, as he conceiv'd, gain'd by ſo unequal a Match, that he had not the Courage to ſurvive it long, but dy'd with Grief of it, and left Duke William a calm and peaceable Reign. This gave him Opportunity in a ſhort Time to enlarge his Dominions, firſt by the Earldon of Mans, and next by Part of the Dukedom of Bretaign: After which he liv'd in Peace for a conſiderable Space, 'till he diſturb'd his own and his Neighbours Quiet by new and greater Adventures.

His great Succeſſes.

Malmſb. Hunting. Camden. &c.

This happen'd not long after by Means of the Death of King Edward the Confeſſor, from whom he had receiv'd, or pretended a Promiſe of being his Succeſſor to the Crown of England, and likewiſe the Aſſiſtance of Harold the preſent Poſſeſſor. But when Harold, as we before related, refus'd to make any Compliance, this valiant Prince, not doubting his uſual Train of Proſperity, reſolv'd to obtain that by Force of Arms, which he could not gain by Arguments. But knowing he was to grapple with a ſtout and reſolute Prince, and a powerful Nation, he us'd more than common Diligence and Application: And firſt aſſembling the Eſtates of Normandy, he repreſented to them his Claim to the Crown of England, the Wrong done him by Harold, and his Reſolutions of righting himſelf; the Glory as well as Juſtice of the Enterprize, the Proſpect of Succeſs from his own Right, and the Hatred of the Uſurper in England, as well as the Friends and Intelligences he had in that Kingdom; the Greatneſs of the Riches and Poſſeſſions by the Conqueſt of his Enemies, and the Share he deſign'd for his Friends and Followers, according to their Zeal and Contribution towards the Support of this Cauſe. At firſt he met with great Oppoſition and Backwardneſs, and many Difficulties were ſtarted; but the Vigour and Bravery of this Prince, together with the Hopes of Fame and Riches, ſoon diſſipated all Doubts and Obſtructions; ſo that his Subjects became very unanimous in joining in this extraordinary Deſign. He kept all his Soldiers in pay the whole Year, and tho' at great Charges he hired others from adjacent Parts. He us'd great Caution and Wiſdom in the Choice of his Men, liſting ſuch as were tall and of a hardy Conſtitution. His Captains and Officers were excellently ſkill'd in warlike Affairs, and of a mature Age both to govern themſelves and others; not heady raſh young Men, who by their Heat and Indiſcretion often ruin an Army. And indeed he was admirably well ſerv'd at that Time, his Prelates ſtriving who ſhould excel each other in Acts of Religion and Piety, and his Nobles in Deeds of Magnanimity and Generoſity; ſo that Malmesbury admires how they ſhould ſo much degenerate in his Time, within the Term of ſixty Years; not conſidering the luxurious Effects of Wealth and Proſperity, of great Poſſeſſions, and Affluence of all Things in a new conquer'd Country. As to the Pretences us'd by Duke William againſt Harold, Brompton with great Probability reduces them to theſe three Heads. Firſt to revenge the Death of Prince Alfred his Coſen, who had been formerly murder'd by the Means of Earl Godwin. Secondly to reſtore Arch-Biſhop Robert, Earl Odo, and the reſt of the Normans, unjuſtly baniſh'd in the late Reign. And Thirdly Harold had contrary to his Oath poſſeſs'd himſelf of England, which as well by the Right of Conſanguinity, as by that of a double Promiſe, ought to be his.

He prepares to invade England.

His Pretenſions.

Malmſb. &c.

The Duke, aſſiſted to his Expectation by his own Subjects, began to work upon the Hopes and Ambition of his Neighbours; and being fam'd in all Parts for his Wiſdom, Conduct and Bravery, he found a Concurrence in his Deſign from many Princes his Friends, and ſome who had been his greateſt Enemies.

Many Princes join with him. He was aſſiſted with Mony or Soldiers by the Dukes of Britain and Brabant, the Earls of Flanders and Bologne, and his ancient Competitor the Earl of Anjou; by many Princes of France, the moſt conſider'd in that Court, as the Duke of Orleans, Earls of Poictou and Maine, excited by the Glory or Advantage of the Enterprize, at the Time when the Infamy of their King gave them no Hopes of Action at home, and left that Crown unconcern'd at what paſs'd abroad. The Emperor ſent ſome choice Troops, and experienc'd Commanders,

The Pope favours him. to ſerve in this Expedition; and Pope Alexander induc'd by the Fame of the Duke's Piety and Virtues, and poſſeſs'd with the Juſtice of his Cauſe, ſent him a conſecrated Banner with ſeveral Reliques; which in thoſe Times was thought ſufficient both to juſtifie his Title, and to ſanctifie his Arms. Having receiv'd the Banner as a good Omen, he aſſembled his Nobility and Officers at Lillibone, where laying open the whole Cauſe to them, they promis'd to ſtand by him with their Lives and Fortunes, which Reſolution he cheriſh'd by Promiſes of great Rewards, according to the Merit of their Actions. His whole Fleet is ſaid to have conſiſted of nine hundred Sail, but others increaſe the Number to above a Thouſand; being all ſmall flat-bottom'd Veſſels, fit for tranſporting Men and Horſes. Of which an Anonymous Writer, about the Reign of his

His Forces. Son Henry, has given us the Particulars; William his Sewer the Son of Oſbern ſupply'd him with ſixty Veſſels: Hugh his Nephew, afterwards Earl of Cheſter, with as many; Hugh de Mumfort with fifty Ships, and ſixty Soldiers; Romus the Elemoſynary of Teſcan, afterwards Biſhop of Lincoln, with one Ship and twenty Men. Nicolas the Abbot of St. Audoen ſupply'd him with fifteen Ships and a hundred Men: Robert Earl of Angus with ſixty Ships: Gerold the Sewer with as many: William Count of Deurons with eighty Ships: Roger of Montgumeri with ſixty: Roger de Baumont with ſixty: Odo Biſhop of Baieux with a hundred: Robert de Mortimer with a hundred and twenty: And Water Giſfard with thirty Veſſels and a hundred Men. Beſides theſe, from others of his Dependants he had many other Ships, from every one according to his Abilities. His Wife Matilda for the Honour of the Expedition caus'd a Ship to be made nam'd Mora in which he himſelf croſs'd the Sea, having on the Prow a Child of Gold with the right Hand pointing to England, and with the left holding an Ivory Whiſtle in his Mouth; for which the Duke her Husband afterwards aſſign'd her the County of Kent.

With all theſe Advantages the valiant Duke began and finiſh'd his mighty Malmſb. &c. Preparations, by a generous Concurrence of his own Nobles and Subjects, and a Confluence of moſt of the bold adventurous Spirits in the neigbouring Provinces, led on by the Deſire of Glory or of Gain. In the Month of September they all rendezvous'd at St. Valerie a Port Town, where they ſtaid many Days for a Wind, which Stay caus'd the common Soldiers to murmur, condemning their Leader for attempting to gain another Man's Country, and alledging, That his Father had miſcarry'd in the like Deſign, and that it was fatal to the Family to be obſtructed by Heaven in their Endeavours after Things too high for them. The Duke was ſenſible of the Danger of ſuch ſuperſtitious Suggeſtions, therefore by the Advice of his Council, he caus'd the Reliques of St. Valerie to be brought forth and expos'd for the obtaining a fair Wind; and immediately after their Expectations were fully anſwer'd. The Soldiers then

He puts to Sea, very chearfully call'd to each other to put out to Sea, and the Duke himſelf being the firſt that went on Shipboard, by his Example haſten'd the reſt. Following cloſe to the Admiral Gally, they had a fair and quick Paſſage; and af-and lands near Haſtings. ter they had refreſh'd themſelves, they landed at or near Haſtings on the Coaſt of Suſſex. At the Duke's firſt touching upon Land, his Foot ſlipt by Accident, and threw him down upon the Ground; which a Soldier obſerving he immediately turn'd it to a good Omen, and cry'd out aloud, That he had already already taken Poſſeſſion of England. As ſoon as his Army had landed, he ſtrictly charg'd them not to plunder or commit any Outrages, declaring, That they ought to ſpare thoſe Things which would ſhortly be their own. For fifteen Days he continu'd with his Army in a quiet and peaceable manner, either to expect the Event of his Claim and to conſider how to proceed, or to build a Fort to have recourſe to in Caſe of Extremity; for he had order'd his Ships to be burnt, according to Camden's Account, that his Men might think of nothing but Death or Conqueſt. where he builds a Fort.

Malmſb. Pillaw. &c. William's Arrival was accompany'd with ſome of thoſe fortunate Hits, Circumſtances or Accidents which uſually attend upon Conqueſts. Harold, who had expected him all the Summer, was now abſent and in the North; where he not only weaken'd his Forces by two bloody Encounters, but after that highly diſguſted his Soldiers by defrauding them of their Share of the Norwegian Spoils. So that he was juſt ripen'd for Ruin, when in the midſt of his Jollity at York he receiv'd the fatal News of the Duke's Landing in Suſſex; and being now to loſe all, his Fate hurry'd him to Reſolutions and Actions quite contrary to thoſe of him who was to raiſe himſelf out of his Misfortunes. His Adverſary proceeded with the utmoſt Caution and Judgement, and he with a continu'd Precipitation, neither allowing Time for gathering together his Troops, nor for Conſultation upon ſo weighty an Affair; but all bloody as he was, and with a ſlender Force haſten'd towards the Place where the Normans lay, as if the Fortune of Cæſar had been devolv'd upon him, becauſe of his late Northern Succeſs. Coming to London all in a Flame, he would not tarry for ſuch Supplies as were on the Way to join him, but hurry'd into Suſſex, with a Reſolution to engage the Enemy, before a third Part of his Army could well be put in order. Yet he ſent ſome Spies to ſurvey the Number and Strength of of the Normans, who being diſcover'd, Duke William with uncommon Courteſie caus'd them to be ſhown through all the Camp, and to be ſent back with Rewards. At their Return they much applauded the Magnificence and Confidence of the Duke, and declar'd to Harold that all the Army ſeem'd to be Prieſts, becauſe they had their Faces and Lips cloſe ſhaven; contrary to the Cuſtom of the Engliſh who then wore large Muſtachoes. The King ſmiling at their Simplicity, reply'd, That he well knew thoſe they had ſeen to be no Prieſts, but valiant Soldiers. His Brother Gyrth, a Youth of Courage and Knowledge above his Years, upon this took occaſion to adviſe him Not to fight in Perſon, ſince he could not deny but either by Choice or Compulſion he had given William his Oath: Therefore he ought to withdraw himſelf, and permit him and the reſt to try their Fortune, who were never oblig'd by any Oath, and might juſtly fight in Defence of their Country. If he fought, it was to be fear'd that Death or Flight would be his Fortune; but if the ſame befel them, he might either ſuccour them flying, or revenge their Deaths. Harold would by no means harken to this Advice, thinking it tended to his Diſhonour, and that a King's declining to meet Death at the Head of his Army, would be ſuch a Mark of Cowardice as would blemiſh the Actions of all his Life. And being puſh'd on by his unlucky Fate, he haſtily ſent away the Monk who brought him theſe Propoſals, 'That either he ſhould reſign his Kingdom; Or hold it 'of him; Or elſe try the Juſtice of his Cauſe by their two ſingle Swords in 'the ſight of both Armies: Or in caſe Harold ſhould refuſe all theſe, he was 'ready to ſubmit to the Apoſtolick See. His Anſwer was, God, and the Swords of the Nation, ſhould decide the Controverſie. No Hopes of Accommodation appearing, both Parties prepar'd to fight the next Morning: The Engliſh are ſaid to have ſpent all the Night in Singing and Drinking, and the Normans in much Devotion, and receiving the Sacrament.

Harold's Raſhneſs.

He marches againſt Duke William.

He rejects William's Propoſals.

He prepares for Battel.

Ibid. The memorable Day being come, which was to decide the Fate of the Nation, the Engliſh were drawn up into a cloſe Body arm'd with Battel-Axes and Shields, and by the Standard ſtood the King on Foot with his Brothers, that the Danger being common, none might think of flying. The Front of the Normans conſiſted of Foot, moſt of them Archers, flank'd on each Hand with a Wing of Horſe, in which conſiſted the great Strength of their Army. The Duke himſelf chearfully and audibly declar'd, That his Cauſe was juſt, and that God would reſpect it accordingly, and call'd for his Armor, which being brought to him in a hurry, his Corſlet was put on the wrong Way, which Error he corrected by this pleaſant Conceit, He now perceiv'd that his Dukedom was chang'd into a Kingdom. At the Head of his Army he put the Soldiers in mind 'of the Valour and Renown of their Anceſtors, and of the Succeſs 'and good Fortune of his own Arms, and concluded with Confidence of Victory 'from the Guilt and Perjury of the preſent Uſurper of the Engliſh Crown. The Normans upon this began with the famous Song of Rowland, by the Martial Example of that Heroe to rouſe and excite themſelves to Imitation; and imploring the Divine Aſſiſtance advanc'd againſt the Engliſh, who were as ready to meet them, tho' the Ground they ſtood on was ſtrait and inconvenient. The Fight began with great Fury, Order and equal Bravery on both ſides; in which the Engliſh were ſeverely gaul'd by the thick Showers of Arrows from the Norman Long-Bows, before the Battel join'd; which was a Weapon then unus'd in England, and thereby the more ſurpriſing, the Wounds coming from Enemies ſo far diſtant, and not ſuddenly to be reveng'd. But when they came to a cloſe Fight, the Normans were hew'd down by the Engliſh Bills after a deplorable manner; and their Points were ſo ſtrong and ſo cloſe together, that no Charges of the Norman Horſe could break the Engliſh Ranks, tho' the Duke aſſaulted them ſo often, and with ſo great Bravery, that he had three Horſes kill'd under him in the Attempt. But finding them to continue firm, he at length by a Signal caus'd his Men to feign a ſudden Flight; upon which the Engliſh, eaſily deceiv'd by their Courage as well as Hopes, began ſuch an eager Purſuit, as caus'd them to diſſolve their Ranks, which otherwiſe had been impenetrable. The Sight of this gave Occaſion to the Normans to return, and fall with freſh Fury into the diſorder'd Body of the Engliſh, ſo that they ſoon broke them, and drove them to a riſing Ground. Yet in their Flight they often rally'd, and ſold their Lives at very dear Rates; and part of them having gain'd a Hill, when the Normans climb'd up after them, by caſting down Stones quite overpower'd them. In another Place, by their Knowledge of the Country, being more dextrous in paſſing a Ditch, they made an exceeding Slaughter of their Enemies, and fill'd it up with their dead Carkaſſes. Thus the Succeſs remain'd doubtful, and the Battel vaſtly bloody, from nine a Clock in the Morning 'till it grew dark, when Harold, after he had diſcharg'd all the Parts of a skilful Commander and valiant Soldier, was ſhot into the Head with an Arrow and dy'd. His Death turn'd the Scale, and caus'd the Engliſh to betake themſelves to flight. With Harold fell his two Brothers Gyrth and Leofwin, with the greateſt Part of the Engliſh Nobility; ſo that William remain'd a compleat Victor, who by his noble Courage, Diligence and Conduct well deſerv'd the Succeſs. He ſhew'd himſelf generous to his dead Enemy, and without Ranſom gave his Body to his Mother, tho' ſhe had offer'd large Sums for it; and when, as it lay in the Field, a certain Soldier by way of Contempt gave it a Wound in the Thigh, he immediately caſhier'd him for ſo mean and cowardly an Action. Harold dy'd on the 14th Day of October, after a ſhort but vigorous Reign of nine Months, one Week and two Days; and was by his Mother's Care bury'd at Waltham in a Church of Canons founded and endow'd by himſelf.

Both Armies engage.

Harold ſlain, and the Engliſh defeated.

Thus ended the Empire of the Engliſh-Saxons in this Nation, who from their firſt Entrance under Hengiſt and Horſa, had kept Poſſeſſion and with ſome Interruptions held Dominion for about ſix hundred and ſeventeen Years. And here it may juſtly be ſaid, that notwithſtanding the Valour and Conduct of the Normans, the Engliſh were the chief Forgers of their own Fortune; and they behav'd themſelves as if they deſir'd to be inſlav'd by thoſe whom they admir'd, and and imitated only in the worſt of their Qualities. For beſides the late Miſmanagements of Harold, in other Reſpects a wiſe Prince, the Nation and Nobility were divided into Factions, and could not agree upon the Perſon to ſucceed him; and Edwin and Morchar retir'd with Diſcontent into Northumberland, not regarding the Safety of their Country, becauſe their ambitious Purpoſes were not gratify'd. A firm Union, and a wiſe Management muſt ſtill have put a ſtop to William's Arms; but inſtead of Preparation for expelling the common Enemy, the Nobility became Enemies to one another, and ſtrove for that Crown which the Duke had already got, on the Point of his Sword, tho' not on his Head. Theſe were prodigious Miſcarriages, not incident to any who had their Reaſon, but abſolute Effects of ſuch vicious Tempers as infatuate Mens Minds, enervate the Power of their Souls, and render them abject, and ripe for Servitude. Such were the Engliſh at this Time, as we are aſſur'd from Malmesbury, who being of Engliſh as well as Norman Deſcent, profeſſes that he had no Prejudice to either Nation, and declares, That for ſome Years before the Arrival of the Normans, Piety and all good Literature became ſo unfaſhionable even among the Clergy, that contenting themſelves with a very ſmall Share of Devotion, as well as Learning, they could ſcarce read Divine Service; and to underſtand Grammar was next to a Miracle. The Monks were clad in fine Stuffs, and obſerv'd not the Rules of their Orders. The Nobles were given up to Gluttony and a diſſolute Life, neglected the Service of the Church, made a Prey of the common People, debauch'd their Daughters whom they had in their Service, and then turn'd them off to the Stews. While the meaner Sort ſpent Night and Day and their whole Subſtances in Rioting and Drunkenneſs, and thoſe other Vices which effeminate Mens Reaſons. From hence it came to paſs, that being carry'd away with Temerity and Fury, rather than true Valour, they engag'd with Duke William, and brought ſuch Calamities upon themſelves and their Country. In Sum, the Engliſh then wore their Cloaths ſhort, cut their Hair, loaded their Arms with golden Bracelets, mark'd their Skins with divers Images, would eat 'till they ſurfeited, and drink 'till they vomitted; which laſt Vices they communicated to the Conquerors, in all Things elſe following and admiring their Modes. But our Author would not have this underſtood of all, but of the Engliſh in general; for to his Knowledge, there were many good Men both among the Clergy and Laity. 'But, 'adds he, as the Mercy of God often permits the Bad as well as Good to en-'joy the like Proſperity; ſo his Juſtice does not always exempt good Men from 'partaking in the common Calamites of their Country. Since Diviſions and Factions, Immorality and Impiety occaſion'd ſuch great Miſeries to our Anceſtors, we ought carefully to remember this one Maxim, That the ſame Cauſes ordinarily produce the ſame Effects.

I. HAVING got through the Reigns of our Saxon Monarchs, we begin to remove from Twilight to Day-light, and a clearer Prospect of Affairs; being now arriv'd at that memorable Period when the State of England receiv'd great Alterations in Laws, Language, Customs, Fashions, Fortifications, Buildings, and in most Things besides Religion. So that from these extraordinary Mutations, we are to begin with a new Account of England, now larger in Extent and Dominion abroad, more more in State and Ability at home, and in a ſhort Time more in Fame and Reputation in the World. All which proceeded from that Branch of the Northern People call'd by the Name of Normans; who having for many Years receiv'd more of the Sun and Civility than the Engliſh themſelves, are thus deſcrib'd by the judicious Malmesbury. They were at this Time a People very curious in their Cloathes, choice in their Diet, but without Exceſs; train'd up to War, and ſcarce knowing how to live without it; quick in attacking their Enemy, and when open Force was too hazardous, over-reaching them by Cunning and Stratagem, or corrupting them with Mony. They built large Edifices, tho' they liv'd in them at a moderate Expence; apt to envy their Equals, and deſirous of ſurpaſſing their Superiors, yet defended thoſe who were ſubject to them, from the Violence of Strangers. While they were pleas'd they were faithful to their Soveraign, but upon a ſlight Occaſion they would renounce their Fidelity, judging of their Perfidy according to Succeſs, and changing Sides for Advantage; yet being Lovers of Humanity, they treated Strangers with the ſame Reſpect and Civility as they did themſelves, nor did they diſdain to marry with thoſe who were ſubject to them. And this muſt be own'd for their Honour, that by their coming hither they reviv'd the Diſcipline of the Chriſtian Religion, then almoſt extinct in England: Whence, as our Author obſerves, might be ſeen Churches new built in the Towns and Cities, and Monaſteries erected after a nobler Way of Architecture, inſomuch that the whole Country began to flouriſh after an extraordinary Manner. Theſe Advantages the Nation in general obtain'd by this Change, tho' it prov'd fatal to many noble Families in particular; to which Advantages we may add, That the Engliſh Nation for above five Hundred Years before had been but little known for any Atchievements abroad, 'till King Canute made uſe of their Aſſiſtance in his Wars againſt the Swedes: But after this, we ſhall find that this Nation under the Conduct of their Princes of the Norman Race made a nobler Figure abroad, and in a ſhort Time conquer'd that Country by which they had been before ſubdu'd.

A deſcription of the Normans.

The firſt of theſe Princes that govern'd this Nation was the renowned William, who was about forty two Years of Age when he gain'd that famous and deciſive Battel at Haſtings. There like a wiſe General, who deſign'd to make the beſt Advantage of his Succeſs, he reſolv'd to leave no ſtrong Place behind him; ſo having left a ſufficient Garriſon in his late built Fort at Haſtings, he march'd from thence to Romney in Kent, and reveng'd himſelf upon the inhoſpitable Inhabitants of that Place, for the Slaughter of ſome of his Men, who by Miſtake had landed there. He continu'd his March along the Coaſt to Dover, to which Caſtle great Multitudes had fled for Refuge, as to a Place then thought impregnable; yet all theſe at the firſt Approach of the Conqueror, without Reſiſtance yielded to his Mercy. After which, continuing about eight Days in the further Fortification of the Caſtle, and leaving there his ſick Men, he march'd from Dover towards London, when in a ſhort Time the Body of the Kentiſh Men came in to him voluntarily, ſwearing Fealty, and giving Hoſtages for Security; whereupon the City of Canterbury preſented him with her Submiſſion by certain Deputies ſent for that Purpoſe. This Relation being made by Pictavienſes, who was himſelf an Eye-Witneſs to theſe Tranſactions, may ſerve ſufficiently to confute that vulgar and plauſible Story of the Kentiſh Men meeting this Conqueror with green Boughs, and their procuring from him a Confirmation of all their Privileges.

The Duke, having reduc'd all Kent to his Subjection, receiv'd Intelligence that Stigand Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, together with the Earls Edwin and Morchar, being ſupported by the City of London and its Mariners, intended to ſet up Edgar Etheling, the true Heir, for their King; upon which this valiant General reſolv'd to prevent all ſuch Attempts, and therefore marching towards London, he encamp'd not far from the City. panies ſally'd out againſt him, but with five hundred Horſe he eaſily repuls'd them, killing great Numbers as they paſs'd the Bridge; and here began the Miſeries of England. The Duke ſeem'd reſolv'd before this to uſe all gentle Methods, and to reduce the Engliſh by kind Uſage; but finding they made head againſt him, and put him to further Trouble and Danger, he chang'd his Purpoſe, and proceeded with greater Severity. For upon this unfortunate Sally, he commanded or permitted all the Buildings South of the Thames, now call'd Southwark, to be deſtroy'd by Fire. But not being able as yet to enter the City, he reſolv'd firſt to ſubdue the Countries lying South-Weſt on the other Side of the Thames, and thereupon march'd towards Wallingford in Barkſhire, where he permitted his Soldiers to ravage ſeveral Parts of the Country. In the mean Time Aldred Arch-Biſhop of York, Wulſtan Biſhop of Worceſter, with Edgar Etheling himſelf, and other Noblemen, confounded in their Deſigns, and tranſported with Fears, quitted London, and repaired to the Duke at Berkhamſted in Hertfordſhire, where ſubmitting themſelves, they ſwore Fealty to him, and upon their giving Hoſtages, he made a firm League or Contract with them; nevertheleſs he ſtill permitted his Men to burn and plunder all the Way they march'd, which is reaſonable to underſtand of ſuch Places as had not yet ſubmitted to him.

The Nobility ſubmit.

Pictav. Malmsb. &c. The Feaſt of Chriſtmaſs approaching, the Duke with all his Army march'd up towards London, and was met by all the chief Men of the City; at which Time all the Biſhops and Lay Nobility requeſted him That he would accept the Crown, declaring, That they had been always accuſtom'd to obey Kings, therefore they were ready to acknowledge him for their Soveraign. Upon which he immediately conſulted with his greateſt Intimates, and ſhew'd much Averſion to his Acceptance of that Honour at preſent; but all perſuaded him to a Compliance, as being to their Knowledge the unanimous Deſire of his whole Army. He weighing all Things, could not but yield to the Importunity of ſo many Petitioners; therefore ſtaying near London, he ſent ſome of his Men before to erect a Fortreſs and Place of Security in the City, and to prepare all Things fit for ſuch a royal and magnificent Solemnity. The Day deſign'd for his Coronation was Chriſtmaſs-Day, and Stigand Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury being under ſome Cenſures from the Pope, the Ceremony was perform'd by Aldred Arch-Biſhop of York; who firſt in a neat ſhort Speech demanded of all the Engliſh there preſent, Whether they did conſent to have the Duke crown'd King? who all chearfully and unanimouſly gave their Aſſents. At the ſame Time the like Queſtion was put to the Normans by the Biſhop of Conſtance, and the ſame Approbation given. Duke William being thus elected King, as Pictavienſes expreſſes it, Aldred in the Abby Church at Weſtminſter ſet the Crown upon his Head, and plac'd him on the Throne in the Preſence of all the Biſhops, Abbots and Lay Nobility: And the old Book of Ely, as alſo Florence of Worceſter, gives us the Form of the Coronation Oath which he took before the Clergy and Laity at the High-Altar, being the ſame in Effect with that of the Engliſh-Saxon Kings; Namely, 'That he would protect the Holy 'Church and its Governors; That he would govern all the People ſubject to him 'prudently and juſtly; That he would ordain and keep juſt Laws, and wholly forbid all Rapines and unjuſt Judgments; to which Malmesbury alſo adds, 'That he would behave himſelf mercifully towards his Subjects, and would 'govern both the Engliſh and Normans by the ſame equal Law. After this he never claim'd any Power by pure Conqueſt, but as a regular Prince ſubmitted himſelf to the Orders of the Kingdom; being deſirous to have his Teſtamentary Title, weak as it was, to make good his Succeſſion, rather than his Sword.

The Coronation Oath.

Pictav. William being thus eſtabliſh'd in his Throne, immediately began to perform all Things worthy of his Dignity; ſo that he ſeem'd inflam'd with a new Zeal for the attempting great and noble Actions, uſing his utmoſt Endeavours both in Divine and Secular Affairs. In the firſt place he diſtributed great Quantities of Treaſure found in Harold's Exchequer among his faithful Friends and Followers; as alſo many rich Gratuities which he beſtow'd on the Monaſteries, and large Alms to the Poor. He likewiſe preſented the Pope with a great Sum both in Gold and Silver, beſides the Standard of King Harold; in the doing of all which he was much aſſiſted by the Benevolence of all the Cities, and of ſeveral great and wealthy Men, to obtain the Favour of their new Lord. While he ſtaid in London he order'd all Things juſtly, wiſely and mercifully, ſome of which tended to the particular Honour and Advantage of that City, while others prov'd highly beneficial to the whole Nation; and in all other Matters he chiefly conſulted the Good of the Church and Kingdom. He enjoin'd all his great Men to obſerve Equity in all their Actions, and ever to regard that Eternal Monarch by whoſe Aſſiſtance they had been victorious; and tho' they were Conquerors, they ought not to oppreſs the Vanquiſh'd, who were Chriſtians as well as themſelves, leſt by Injuries they ſhould provoke thoſe to riſe up againſt them whom they had already ſubdu'd. Next he reſtrain'd the Common Soldiers by ſevere Edicts from violating the Chaſtity of Women, or ſo much as frequenting Taverns and infamous Houſes; he alſo ſtrictly prohibited all Murders, Robberies and Tumults. Thus as he bridled the People by Arms, ſo thoſe very Arms were reſtrain'd by juſt Laws, appointing Judges to inflict ſevere Puniſhments upon thoſe common Soldiers who ſhould dare to tranſgreſs his Orders; and for a Time he was no more partial to the Normans, than to any other Nation then in his Service.

His laudable Government.

Theſe were the happy Beginnings of this King's Reign; but he not ſtaying long in London, retired to a Place not far off call'd Berking, 'till the Fortreſs he had begun at London was finiſh'd; for he found it abſolutely neceſſary to curb the fickle Humours of that great and ſtubborn People. For his greater Security he plac'd Norman Garriſons in Wincheſter, Dover, and many other Places; and in Memory of the great Battel he obtain'd over King Harold, he gave Orders for the Building of that noble Monaſtery near Haſtings call'd Battel-Abby, which he endow'd with great Privileges and Immunities. During his Stay at Berking, the powerful Earls Edwin and Morchar, came and ſubmitted themſelves to the King's Mercy and Clemency; in which they were follow'd by many other Noblemen of great Note, to whom he generouſly reſtor'd their Eſtates which had been forfeited, and having taken their voluntary Oaths of Fidelity, he receiv'd them into his Favour. As for Edgar Etheling, who was ſometimes call'd England's Darling, to alleviate the Regret he might receive by the miſſing of a Crown, he not only ſhew'd him great Favours, but alſo conferr'd upon him very large Poſſeſſions. After this he made a Progreſs into divers Parts of the Kingdom, in all Places ordering ſuch Things as were not only advantagious to himſelf, but alſo to his People in general. And now wherever he travell'd he found none to oppoſe him, nor the Roads any ways obſtructed, all Men willingly ſubmitting themſelves to him; whilſt he look'd upon the Common People with a benign Aſpect, commiſerating their Condition, and ordering his Men to treat them with Mercy, eſpecially when he obſerv'd the poor Widows with their little Children upon their Knees imploring his Clemency. And this is the Account that King William's Chaplain Pictavienſes has given us of the two or three firſt Months of his Reign.

All ſubmit to him.

Ibid.

II. King William having eſtabliſh'd all Things for the Nation's Security and his own Subjection, reſolv'd to make a Journey into his own Country of Normandy, and accordingly committed the Government of this Nation to his Brother Odo Biſhop of Bayeux, and his Coſen William Fitz-Oſbern. The Removing ſo ſoon from a new gain'd Country, looks like a Strain of his uſual Courage and fearleſs Temper; but yet like a politick Prince he took extraordinary Pledges along with him, ſuch of the Nobility as were moſt potent, particularly Arch-Biſhop Stigand, the two great Earls Edwin and Morchar, Earl Waltheof, with with ſeveral of the chief Nobility, and alſo Edgar Etheling himſelf. With this noble Train he arriv'd at Normandy, and celebrated the Feaſt of Eaſter at the Abby of Feſcamp, where he was met by Rodolph the potent Father-in-Law to the King of France, with great Numbers of the French Nobility, the handſomeſt of whoſe Youth envy'd the Beauty and Gracefulneſs of the young Engliſh Gentlemen; while others were raviſh'd with the Richneſs and Magnificence of the King's Habit, as well as thoſe of his Attendants, as alſo the Quantity of his Silver and Gold Plate, which, ſays our Author, would be incredible to relate. So that when theſe Noblemen return'd home, they were fill'd with Praiſes of the Magnificence, and eſpecially the Generoſity of King William, who paſs'd all that Summer, and the Beginning of the following Winter in this Country.

Vitales. Florent. Malmsb. While Normandy was thus happy, the Engliſh were ſeverely oppreſs'd, according to Vitales, by Odo and Fitz-Osbern in their Governments, eſpecially thoſe in Kent, who being highly exaſperated, took Occaſion from the Abſence of Odo and Hugh Montfort with a conſiderable Force, to ſend to Euſtachius Earl of Bulloign, then the King's Enemy, inviting him to join with them in the Surprizal of Dover Caſtle. He agreed with them in the Deſign, and paſs'd over in the Night with a Fleet fill'd with choſen Soldiers, and joining with them attack'd the Caſtle; but finding the Defendents more reſolute and numerous than they expected, he drew off with his Men to his Ships, and return'd home; after which he was reconcil'd to the King, and was honour'd as one of the greateſt Perſonages about him. About the ſame Time Edrick, ſirnam'd the Foreſter, in the County of Hereford, call'd in the Aſſiſtance of two Kings of Wales, and ravag'd ſeveral Parts of that Country. Theſe Tranſactions were ſufficient to haſten the Return of the King, who leaving the Government of Normandy to his Wife Matilda and his Son Robert, croſs'd the Sea into England in December; where he was now to ſatisfie three Sorts of Men, Firſt ſuch Adventurers, with whom he had not yet clear'd; Next thoſe of his own People, who juſtly expected a Recompence, but being very numerous, ſome were to live upon Promiſes; Laſtly the People of this Kingdom, by whom he was now chiefly to ſubſiſt. Being arriv'd at London, he treated the Engliſh Biſhops and Nobility with much Subtlety and Officiouſneſs, granting them what they ask'd, and freely hearing them what they offer'd; but at the ſame Time began to have a ſtricter Hand and Eye over them than before, and exacted a ſevere Tax upon the Engliſh Nation, which was that of Danegueld, which had been remitted by Edward the Confeſſor. Upon which Occaſion Malmesbury informs us that Aldred Arch-Biſhop of York lov'd William as his Son, and honour'd him as a King, while he carry'd himſelf with Temper and Juſtice towards the Engliſh, but when he levy'd this unreaſonable Tax, he ſent Meſſengers to him concerning it; but they being roughly treated, he took the Liberty to denounce a Curſe againſt William and all his Progeny. Which had ſuch an Effect upon the King, that he immediately ſent Friends to appeaſe the Arch-Biſhop, but before they got to him, he dy'd with Grief. But ſome Time before he dy'd, he had the Honour to crown the King's Wife Matilda with great Solemnity, who in the ſame Year was deliver'd of a Son, nam'd Henry, afterwards King of England.

Florent. Hunting. &c. The Taxes and Impoſitions ſeem to have been the Occaſion of a freſh Rebellion this Year in the Weſt; for the City of Exeter refus'd to ſwear Fealty to the King, or admit of a Garriſon there, tho' they offer'd to pay Contributions: But not being ſatisfy'd with that, he ſent this Meſſage to them, That he was never us'd to ſuch Subjects; therefore tho' it was Winter, he march'd in Perſon with an Army againſt it, always placing the Engliſh in the Front. Approaching near the City, the chief of the Citizens came out to meet him, begging Peace, promiſing Obedience, and depoſing ſuch Hoſtages as the King demanded; but in the mean Time the ordinary Townſmen refus'd to deliver up the City, whereupon he commanded his Army to make their Approaches to it. Then bringing one of the Hoſtages before the Gates, he there put out his Eyes, and beginning to batter and undermine the Walls, the Inhabitants implor'd his Mercy, which he readily granted, by the Mediation of thoſe who firſt came over to him, with the Clergy, who all begg'd Pardon for the Folly and Obſtinacy of the Common People. So all Things were forgiven them, and they had their Goods ſecur'd from the Violence of the Soldiers, by placing Guards at the Gates to keep them out. But Githa, Mother to King Harold, with many Citizens eſcap'd and fled with great Riches into Flanders. Here within the Walls the King choſe out a Place for the Building of a Caſtle, and left Baldwin the Son of Earl Gilbert to ſee it compleated, and with many ſtout Soldiers to remain there in Garriſon. Not long after this Expedition the King thought fit to divide the Lands among his Norman Commanders, as well as thoſe of other Nations; which is to be underſtood, only of the Lands of thoſe who had been in Arms againſt him in the Battel of Haſtings, and of thoſe who were ingag'd in the late Inſurrections; all which he look'd upon as forfeited Eſtates. And this appears plainer from the Controverſie between Warren the Norman, and Sherburn the Engliſhman, whoſe Lands tho' the King had given them to Warren, yet when Sherburn alledg'd in Court, That he never bore Arms againſt the King, that he was his Subject as well as the other, and held his Lands by the Law eſtabliſh'd among all his Subjects, the King himſelf gave Judgement againſt Warren, and commanded that Sherburn ſhould hold his Land without Moleſtation.

It is reduc'd.

The King divides the Lands among the Normans.

One Inſurrection was no ſooner quell'd, but another more dangerous began, by means of Earl Edwin, who after Promiſe of one of the King's Daughter's in Marriage, was unjuſtly diſappointed. This and ſome other Affronts provok'd him and his Brother Morchar to take up Arms; and being both very powerful and popular, many in the Northern Parts, where their Governments lay, came in to their Aſſiſtance, as alſo their Nephew Blethyn, Prince of North-Wales, with a great Number of Welſhmen. Upon this, the King as a vigilant Commander inquir'd into all Places of Strength that might be ſerviceable to their Retreat; and to prevent their ſeizing of them, he fortify'd ſuch as were moſt advantagious, as the Caſtle of Warwick, which he now built, and committed to the Cuſtody of Henry de Beaumont, afterwards made firſt Earl of Warwick. At the ſame Time he built Nottingham Caſtle, and gave the Cuſtody of it to William Pendel a Norman; which vigorous Proceedings ſo diſcourag'd the two Earls, that doubting of Succeſs, they ſoon begg'd the King's Mercy, and were generouſly receiv'd into Favour. Upon which the Inhabitants of York deliver'd up the Keys of their City to the King, who was now ready to beſiege it; but ſtill doubting of their Fidelity, he immediately rais'd a Fortreſs in the City, and mann'd it with a ſtrong Garriſon. In his Return, he built Caſtles or ſtrong Forts at Lincoln, Huntington and Cambridge, and plac'd in each of them valiant Commanders. Upon which Archil a potent Nobleman of Northumberland made his Peace with the King, and deliver'd his Son to him as an Hoſtage; likewiſe Egelwin Biſhop of Durham was now receiv'd into Favour, and by his Mediation, a Peace was concluded with Malcolm King of Scotland who had been a Favourer of this Inſurrection. But this continu'd not long, for about Autumn following, Earl Goſpatrick, with ſeveral of the Northumbrian Nobility, fearing to be impriſon'd as many others at that time were, drew over Prince Edgar Etheling to their Party, and with him, his Mother Agatha, and his Siſters Margaret and Chriſtina, paſs'd by Sea out of England into Scotland, where being kindly receiv'd by King Malcolm, they remain'd all that Winter in Peace. And Malcolm was ſo affected with the Beauty and Virtues of the Lady Margaret, that about two Years after he marry'd her himſelf; by whom the Blood of our ancient Kings was preſerv'd, and conjoin'd with the Normans in King Henry the Second, and by that means became Engliſh again.

In

M. Weſt. Vitales, &c. In the mean Time King William us'd all Methods poſſible for his own Security, and the bridling and diſarming the Engliſh; particularly he commanded every Houſe-Keeper to put out both Fire and Candle at eight of the Clock at Night, at which Hour, in every City, Town and Village, he caus'd a Bell to be rung, by the French call'd Conorefew; which is partly yet in uſe, and in Name very near it, commonly call'd Corfew. But notwithſtanding theſe Precautions, Godwin, Edmund and Magnus, Sons of the late King Harold, coming out of Ireland, landed in Somerſetſhire, ingag'd with Eadnoth, formerly their Father's Maſter of the Horſe, ſlew him with many others, and taking large Booties both in Cornwall and Devonſhire, return'd again to Ireland. Theſe were unſetled Times, often accompany'd with Troubles and Diſturbances; when ſeveral Norman Gentlemen and Perſons of Quality, uneaſie in the Nation, took their leaves of the King, and return'd into Normandy. Beſides Commanders and Officers, great Numbers of the common Soldiers, tired with the perpetual Deſolation of the Country, where they ſaw nothing but Rapines and daily Slaughters committed, not only by themſelves, but by the Natives iſſuing out of the Woods and other Retreats, killing what Normans they could, deſir'd now to be disbanded, that they might return and live in Peace in their own Country; which Requeſt was readily granted by the King, who kindly diſmiſs'd them, having firſt well paid and rewarded them for all their Services.

The King's Care.

Divers Norman Gentlemen return home.

Sim. Dun. &c. The next Year was remarkable for new and greater Troubles in the North, which began to break out upon the Arrival of Robert Cumin, the new Governor at Durham; who, not being ſo cautious as valiant, lying ſecurely as he thought in the City, was ſurpriz'd in the Night by the Northumbrians, and he and all the Normans except one, to the Number of ſeven hundred were maſſacred. And while this Inſurrection was on foot, the fugitive Engliſh in Denmark ſo far prevail'd with King Swane, that they procur'd his Aſſiſtance to recover their Rights, and his Kingdom, as was pretended; and accordingly he ſent a Fleet of two hundred and Forty Sail well mann'd, under the Conduct of his Brother Osbern, and his Sons Harold and Canute. Theſe arriving in the Humber, landed their Men in order to march to York, and ravag'd the Country through which they paſs'd; and being ſhortly after join'd by Edgar Etheling and all his Aſſociates from Scotland, they became very ſtrong and formidable. Upon their nearer Approach to the City, the Normans who kept the Caſtle, fearing leſt the Houſes near them being pull'd down might ſerve the Danes to fill up the Ditches, ſet them all on fire, which ſo violently rag'd by reaſon of a high Wind, that it ſoon burnt all or moſt of that noble City, together with the Cathedral Church, the Monaſtery of St. Peter's, and a famous Library. But the Divine Vengeance ſeverely puniſh'd this Barbarity, for before the City had done burning, the Daniſh Fleet arriv'd, and both the Danes and Northumbrians, beſieging the Caſtles, quickly became Maſters of them, with a terrible Slaughter of their Governor and three thouſand Normans, very few eſcaping. After which the Daniſh Fleet, together with the Northumbrians, well loaded with Plunder, retir'd to their former Quarters.

Weſtmin. Hoveden, Sim. Dun. &c. The King upon receiving this ill News immediately ſent his Queen into Normandy for her greater Security, and threaten'd not only to chaſtiſe the Rebels, but to extirpate the Northumbrians. But before he march'd, wiſely conſidering that theſe Diſcontents aroſe in a great Meaſure from his own Management and Partiality to the Normans, he began to ſhow a greater Regard to the ancient Saxon Laws, and to curb the Inſolence of his Countrymen, and withal recall'd many of the Engliſh Noblemen from Baniſhment, and made a firm League with them. Arriving in Yorkſhire, which was then Part of the Earldom of Northumberland, he put moſt of the People to the Sword, and laid the whole Country waſte, to prevent the Danes harbouring themſelves there, who now with their Engliſh Confederates lay incamp'd at York. Here the King came to an Ingagement with them, and routing the Daniſh Army, the Engliſh were ſo diſcourag'd courag'd in the City, that they ſoon ſurrender'd it to the Conqueror. Yet Malmesbury repreſents this Victory as not ſo eaſily obtain'd, and informs us that the valiant Earl Waltheof in this Fight at York, cut off the Heads of a great many Normans one after another, as they would have forc'd a Gate which he took upon him to defend. After this Victory, the King ſoon became Maſter of the whole Country, and recover'd it from the Danes as much by Mony and Promiſes as by Force. Edgar Etheling retir'd into Scotland, and ſeveral of the Nobility were generouſly reſtor'd to Favour, particularly Goſpatrick and Waltheof, the latter of whom the King ſo admir'd for his Strength and Valour, that in a ſhort time after he gave him his Neice Judith in Marriage, together with the Earldoms of Northampton and Huntington. But the Country ſuffer'd miſerably in this War, all the Northern Parts being ſo depopulated by the Danes and Normans, that between York and Durham there remain'd no Town inhabited, but the Land lay waſte and untill'd for above nine Years. This was alſo attended by ſo dreadful a Famine in all thoſe Parts, that in this Year, as well as the next, the miſerable Remains of the People were forc'd to feed upon Horſes and Dogs, and even Man's Fleſh, to ſave themſelves from periſhing.

The North laid waſte.

A. D. 1070. Reg. 4/5.

III. King William having quell'd the Inſurrections in the North, and in other Parts, from this Time began to ſhow a greater Averſion to the Engliſh, whoſe Unconſtancy he daily dreaded; therefore by hard Uſage, Impriſonments and Baniſhments he conſtrain'd them to ſubmit. He gave moſt of the Earldoms and Boronies, Biſhopricks and Prelacies of the whole Nation to his Normans, and ſcarce permitted the Engliſh to enjoy any Place of Honour, Dominion or Power. To William Fitz-Osbern, Sewer of Normandy, he gave the Iſle of Wight and Earldom of Hereford. He gave the Town and County of Cheſter, firſt to Gherbod a Flemming, then to Hugh of Almonches. To Roger Montgomery he firſt gave Arundel, and then Chicheſter, and afterwards the County of Salop. To Walter Giffard the County of Buckingham; to William Warren the County of Surrey; and to Ralph Guader the Earldom of the Eaſt-Angles. And to many other noble Perſons, he diſtributed many Cities and Towns, with great Power and Honours; and to many Strangers and others of mean Quality, he gave many Titles and Honours, inſomuch that they had here in England Clients and Dependents far richer and more powerful than their Fathers were in Normandy. But to his two half Brother's Odo and Robert he was profuſe in his Gifts and Honours. The former was Earl of Kent, a Count Palatine who gave Laws like a King, and Juſticiary of England, the chief Man for adminiſtring Juſtice under the King; and after the Death of Fitz-Osbern, he made him Vice-Roy of the whole Kingdom. He had beſides for his Share one hundred eighty four Lordſhips or Mannors in Kent, and two hundred fifty five more in other Counties. Robert had the Earldom of Cornwall given him, in which he had two hundred eighty four Lordſhips, beſides five hundred fifty eight more in other Counties.

Vitalis, &c.

The King diſpoſes of all Preferments to the Normans.

Nor did the King think himſelf ſecure only by having all Perſons in Secular Authority his Dependents, and at his Command; but he alſo brought the Clergy, Arch-Biſhops, Biſhops, Abbots, and all Degrees of that Function under his Subjection. For the Biſhopricks and Abbies which held Baronies, hitherto free from all Secular Service, were now put under Military Service; and according to his Will and Pleaſure he appointed how many Knights and Soldiers they ſhould find in Time of War, and drove many Eccleſiaſticks out of the Kingdom, who refus'd to ſubmit to this hard Conſtitution. He did not only charge their Lands with the Tenure of Knights Service, but alſo quarter'd Soldiers which he had hired in France, Germany and Spain, in all Monaſteries of England; who were not only a Charge to their Purſes, but alſo Spies upon their Actions. Nor did he think this enough to reſtrain the Power of the Clergy, who then bore the chief Sway in the Government; but by the malicious Advice of Fitz-Osbern,

M. Paris. Rudborn. &c.

He reduces the Clergy to Subjection.

Osbern, and others of his Council, he ſearch'd all the Monaſteries, and took away the Mony which the richer Sort of Engliſh out of Fear of his Severity had ſecured there, and commanded it to be carry'd into his Exchequer. Mat. Paris ſays he robb'd all the Monaſteries of their Gold and Silver, not ſparing their Shrines and Chalices: And yet he did not think himſelf ſecure from the Power of the Clergy in that Age, 'till he had brought into England moſt of the Laws and Uſages generally obſerv'd in Normandy, and had made ſuch Biſhops, Abbots and Governors, who would in all Things ſubmit to his Ordinances; and therefore all Divine and Human Matters were chiefly according to his Will and Pleaſure. To this purpoſe a great Council was held at Wincheſter, eight Days after Eaſter, at the Command of the King, and the Conſent of the Pope; in which Stigand Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury was depriv'd, together with Agelmar Biſhop of Elmham, Agelrick Biſhop of Selſey, and ſeveral Abbots; the King promoting this Work, that he might put into their Places Men of his own Nation, for the Security of his new acquired Kingdom. He alſo kept ſeveral Biſhops and Abbots in Priſon during Life, without any evident Cauſe, and without Condemnation by Synods or Secular Laws, purely out of Jealouſie that they endeavour'd for a new Revolution. Yet in his new Promotions he generally acted with Wiſdom and Honour, and for the moſt part advanc'd Men of Piety and real Worth. Particularly he gave the Archbiſhoprick of Canterbury to Lanfranc, an Italian of great Learning and Abilities, then Abbot of Caen in Normandy: The Archbiſhoprick of York was given to Thomas Chanon of Bayeux, and the Biſhopricks of Wincheſter, Elmham and Selſey, to his three Chaplains, Walkelin, Arfaſt and Stigand. And notwithſtanding many Acts of Severity and Injuſtice, which were often the Effects of Danger and Neceſſity, this Prince generally endeavour'd to promote Peace and Piety in the Nation.

Several depriv'd.

M. Paris. But the Engliſh Nation was now ſo far diſguſted, that they reſolv'd to endeavour to throw off the Norman Yoak; and accordingly they aſſembled a numerous Army, and once more ſet up Edgar Etheling for their King; Fretheric Abbot of St. Albans, a rich and powerful Man, being the chief Promoter of this Deſign. Upon which the King became very uneaſie, fearing at laſt to loſe that Kingdom which he had acquir'd with ſo much Blood. Wherefore by the wiſe Advice of Arch-Biſhop Lanfranc, he began to deal more gently with the Engliſh Nobility, and propoſing to them Terms of Peace, he invited them to a ſubdolous Treaty; who ſuſpecting no unfair Deſign, under the Conduct of Abbot Fretheric met the King at Berkhamſtead, where after many Debates, he in the Preſence of the Arch-Biſhop ſolemnly ſwore upon the Holy Evangeliſts, and the Relicks of the Church of St. Albans, 'That he would obſerve the good, 'approv'd, and ancient Laws of the Kingdom, which the holy and pious 'Kings, his Predeceſſors, and chiefly King Edward had ordained: By which the Engliſh being ſatisfy'd, all return'd to their Habitations. But the King, who had conceal'd his Intentions, within a few Days after privately and ſuddenly endeavour'd to ruin thoſe ſeparately, whom united he could not overcome; which he perform'd by killing ſome, diſpoſſeſſing others, and outlawing many more, to the Breach of his Oaths, and the great Affliction of the Engliſh. Upon this Prince Edgar fled again into Scotland, and ſeveral of the Engliſh Nobility into Denmark, and ſome into Norway, purſuing any Methods to avoid the Norman Yoak. Abbot Fretheric fled into the Iſle of Ely, where he ſhortly after ended his Days; upon whoſe Death the King kept the Abby of St. Albans vacant in his Hands, and very much oppreſs'd it by cutting down the Woods, and impoveriſhing the Tenants; and unleſs he had been reſtrain'd by the Reproofs of Arch-Biſhop Lanfranc, he had irreparably deſtroy'd that noble Foundation.

lowers, and ſlain; Morchar betook himſelf to the Iſle of Ely, where he met with Egelwin Biſhop of Durham, Siward ſurnam'd Barne, Walter Biſhop of Hereford, and many other great Men of the Engliſh. Theſe daily increaſing, ſent for Hereward, a Perſon renowned in many Places for his extraordinary Valour, to be their chief Commander; particularly urging him on the Behalf of Thurſtan, then Abbot of the Place, and his Monks, who were Owners of the Iſle; and upon their Account the ſame was fortify'd againſt the King. Not long after, the King, who never gave Time to Inſurrections, march'd down againſt theſe Male-Contents, and by the Aſſiſtance of his Marriners, ſtopp'd up all the Paſſages on the Eaſt Side of the Iſland, and built a Caſtle at Wesbich; and on the Weſt Side he made a Bridge from the Continent to the Iſle, two Miles in length. Yet ſtill he met with great Difficulties and Reſiſtance, 'till after the Loſs of many Men, he was adviſ'd to ſeize all the Lands and Goods belonging to the Monaſtery, that were out of the Iſle, and divide them among his Soldiers, in order to oblige them to greater Care and Vigilance. This being effected, and the King's Power increaſing, the Monks after a Conſultation with their Abbot reſolv'd not only to ſubmit to the King, upon Condition he would honourably reſtore all their Lands, but alſo to give him a thouſand Marks, and accordingly ſent their Propoſals; which were readily and graciouſly accepted, and the Iſland peaceably deliver'd into his Hands. The Noblemen were all conſtrain'd to ſubmit to the King's Mercy, only the valiant Hereward with a few Followers with great Difficulty eſcap'd over the Fens, and got into Scotland. Then the King, having cut off the Hands and put out the Eyes of many of the common Soldiers, let them go; but for Earl Morchar, with the Noblemen and Gentlemen taken with him, he ſent them to ſeveral Priſons; and Biſhop Egelwin, being ſent to Abingdon, there ſtarv'd himſelf to Death. The better to ſecure the Iſland to his Obedience, the King quarter'd forty Norman Knights in the Monaſtery, obliging the Monks not only to find them Subſiſtance, but alſo their uſual Wages.

A. D. 1072. Reg. 6/7.

The King having happily finiſh'd this Adventure, found that the Root of all his Dangers was in Scotland, which Country had always been a Sanctuary for his Enemies and the Male-Contents of his Kingdom, and now the Receptacle of his Competitor Prince Edgar. Therefore to put an End to all future Diſputes, and alſo to revenge ſome late Devaſtations made in England by the King of Scotland, he reſolv'd to invade that Kingdom in Perſon, and accordingly with a powerful Army enter'd Galloway, where the Soldiers were more harraſs'd in paſſing over the barren Mountains and Marſhes than purſuit of the Enemy; wherefore he was oblig'd to turn another Way, and march directly towards King Malcolm's Army in Lothian, with a Reſolution to finiſh the War with one Battel. But Malcolm wiſely conſidering the Danger to which he was expos'd, ſent Ambaſſadors to King William with Terms of Agreement; and the other conſidering the Hazards of a Battel in a difficult and unknown Country, accepted of his Terms, on Condition that he ſhould take an Oath of Fealty to him, and all Offenders on both Sides be pardon'd. And hereupon King Malcolm did his Homage to King William; but whether for all Scotland, or the Low-Lands, or for Cumberland, Authors are not well agreed. In the Memory of this Treaty there was a Stone Croſs erected in the Middle of the Mountains of Stanemore in Richmondſhire, which was call'd the Royal Croſs, having the Arms of both Kings engraven on the ſeveral Sides of it, which was for the future to ſerve as a Boundary between the two Kingdoms, the Remainder of which was to be ſeen in Camden's Time. And here with the univerſal Change brought about in England, the Kingdom of Scotland is likewiſe obſerv'd to have had no ſmall Share: The former great Recourſe of the Engliſh into Scotland, both to attend the Queen and her Brother Edgar, as well as for their own Safety, not only introduc'd the Engliſh Language, into the Court and Country, but alſo the Faſhions, Vanity of Apparel, Riot, Luxury and Exceſs of the Engliſh, much to the Damage and effeminating that hardy and warlike Nation. And many of the Engliſh, forſaking the Place of their Birth and Habitation, were receiv'd into the Favour of that King; who being by his Liberality there ſetled, have ſince that Time propagated, and brought forth Branches of many noble Families, whoſe Poſterity continue to this Day. And we are inform'd that about this Time were the Degrees and Titles of Honour firſt known in that Country, as Duke, Earl, Baron and Knight; and the nobler Sort of the Scots, in Imitation of the French and Engliſh, began to be call'd by the honourable Titles, from the Names of their Families, or the beſt of their Poſſeſſions.

Ingulph. In this Year, a Conteſt of another Nature was alſo decided, which was between the two Arch-Biſhops of this Kingdom, Lanfranc and Thomas, who being lately return'd from Rome, by the Pope's Order a great Synod was held concerning the ancient Diſpute of the Juriſdiction of the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury over the other at York; where the Matter being fully debated on both Sides, at length the Synod gave Sentence in favour of the See of Canterbury, in the Preſence of the King, the Pope's Legate, the Biſhops and Abbots of ſeveral Orders; and the Decree was ſubſcrib'd by the King, Queen, and chief of the Nation.

A Conteſt between the Sees of Canterbury and York.

Sax. An. &c. IV. For about ſeven Years, King William had met with Diſturbances only in his new acquir'd Kingdom; but now having ſurmounted theſe Difficulties, he was diſquieted with new Troubles from the King of France, who this Year renew'd the ancient Conteſt, and invaded his Dominions about Normandy. Upon which the King without Delay tranſported a powerful Army into Normandy, as well Engliſh as Normans; and in a ſhort Time, chiefly by the Valour and Bravery of the Engliſh, he retook the City of Mans, and the Province of Maine, which had lately revolted; but not without great Spoil in deſtroying of Vineyards, and burning of Cities and Towns. Here Edgar Etheling came to him out of Scotland, who was graciouſly receiv'd with all his Followers, and he himſelf honourably maintain'd in the King's Court, where he was generouſly allow'd a Pound Weight of Silver for every Days Expence: A rare Example of a prevailing Conqueror, ſhew'd upon a Man ſo unconſtant, who had twice broken his Oath of Fidelity, and dangerous ſo near his Perſon, as being the only Competitor of his Crown. But this Prince dealt more roughly with Eadmer. the new Pope Gregory, who about this Time by Letters demanded an Oath of Fealty from him for the Crown of England, to be held of the Roman See; alledging, 'That the Royal Power next under God was to be ſubject to the Care 'and Government of the Apoſtolick Juriſdiction. To whom King William return'd a free Anſwer, in which he utterly deny'd any ſuch Authority, and he was ſo far from paying him any ſuch mean Submiſſion, that Eadmer aſſures us, He would not permit any Subject in his Dominions to acknowledge any Man for Pope, but whom he had firſt allow'd of, nor ſo much as to receive his Letters, unleſs they had been firſt ſhewn to himſelf.

Sax. An. Florent. Malmſb. While the King continu'd in Normandy, a dangerous Conſpiracy was form'd againſt him in England, not only by ſome of the Engliſh, but alſo Norman Nobility; which was occaſion'd by Ralph de Waher, Earl of Norfolk and Suffolk, who having marry'd Emma the Daughter of Roger Earl of Hereford, Coſen to the King, without his Conſent, was ſo tranſported with the Greatneſs of the Alliance, and the Power of Wine, that on the Wedding Day he perſuaded his Gueſts into a Rebellion. With whom the Bride's Father readily join'd, together with Waltheof, lately made Earl of Northumberland, with ſeveral other Barons, Abbots and Biſhops. But Earl Waltheof repented the next Morning, alledging that he was deluded and overcome with Wine, and immediately went to Lanfranc Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, confeſs'd the whole Deſign, and receiv'd Abſolution from him; by whoſe Advice he alſo went into Normandy, discover'd all to the King, and threw himself upon his Mercy. But the rest returning to their several Castles, began the Rebellion with all their united Forces, and confederating with the Welshmen, they burnt and plunder'd many of the King's Towns: But the Governors of his Castles, together with the People of those Countries, soon frustrated their Designs; for Wulstan, Bishop of Worcester, with a great Number of Men, and Egelwin, Abbot of Evesham, with his Tenants, being sent for to his Assistance with Urse, Sheriff of Worcestershire, and Walter de Lacy and his Men, all marching together prevented the Earl of Hereford from passing the Severn, and joining with Earl Ralph at the appointed Place. At the same Time Odo Bishop of Bayeux, and Godfrey Bishop of Constance, being incamp'd near Cambridge, hinder'd Earl Ralph from marching any further; who seeing his Designs thus disappointed, retired to Norwich, where committing the Castle and the Garrison to the Custody of his Wife, he took Ship, and sail'd over into Bretaign, and from thence into Denmark. But his Opposers took as many of his Followers as they could find, and either kill'd or disabled them; and the King's Lieutenants laid close Siege to the Castle of Norwich, which at length surrender'd, and the Countess, with those of her Party, by the King's Permission left England, and went over to her Husband in Denmark. Not long after, Earl Ralph with Canute, Son to Swane King of Denmark, and a certain Earl call'd Haeun, return'd to England with two hundred Sail of Ships; but finding no great Prospect of Success, they withdrew into Flanders.

Which is quell'd

King William now return'd from Normandy, and some Relicks of the Rebellion remaining in the West, he hasten'd thither, where he soon put an End to all Tumults, and us'd the Conspirators with great Severity, cut off the Hands of some, put out the Eyes of others, hang'd some upon Gibbits, and those who escap'd best, suffer'd Banishment. Nor could Earl Waltheof himself escape Punishment, notwithstanding he had reveal'd the Conspiracy; for after the King had tax'd him with Ingratitude, he caus'd him to be beheaded at Winchester, tho', as it is said, he had before promis'd him his Pardon, his great Possessions being his greatest Enemies; for he was Earl of Northumberland, Northampton and Huntington, which Dignities were by the King thought more fit for his Norman Subjects; and the Desire of a new Marriage excited his Wife Judith not a little to promote his Death. His Body being bury'd at the Abby of Croyland, his Tomb soon became so famous for pretended Miracles, and the King thereby so far disoblig'd, that he depriv'd the Abbot of the Place, and put in Ingulphus, one of our most considerable Historians. By reason of this Conspiracy Malmesbury excuses the King's future Severity to the English, and says he scarce found any of them faithful, which so exasperated his Temper towards them, that he depriv'd the more Powerful of them first of their Mony, then of their Lands, and afterwards many of them of their Lives. So that from about this Time we may date that remarkable Epocha, which the same Author mentions in another Place, and which had continu'd to his own Time, namely, That England was then become the Habitation of Strangers: So that it is certain when he wrot, that tho' many English Men enjoy'd Estates, yet there was no Native original English Man, who was Earl, Bishop, or Abbot; but, adds he, Foreigners devour the Riches of England, and eat out its very Bowels.

The King having with his usual Success suppress'd all Disturbances, and committed the Earldom of Northumberland to the Care of Walcher Bishop of Durham, went a third Time into Normandy, enter'd Bretaign with an Army, and there besieg'd the Castle of Dole, which belong'd to the rebellious Earl Ralph; but the Garrison so long defended it, that Philip King of France found Time to relieve it, and raise the Siege; so that the King was oblig'd to return into England, and to pass this and the next Year in Peace. in London, under Arch-Biſhop Lanfranc, the uſe of Eccleſiaſtical Synods being 'till then almoſt obſolete in England. In this the Precedency of Biſhops in Synods and Councils was determin'd, and the chief Thing ordain'd was, That ſeveral of the Biſhops Sees ſhould be remov'd from ſmaller Towns to Cities: By Virtue of which, the See of Selſey was tranſlated to Chicheſter; that of Wells to Bath; that of Shirbune to Salisbury; that of Dorcheſter to Lincoln; and that of Litchfield to Cheſter, which was afterwards remov'd firſt to Coventry, and then to Litchfield again. About the ſame Time alſo the See of Elmham was remov'd to Thetford, and not long after to Norwich. A. D. 1076. Reg. 10/11. The Removal of ſeveral Biſhops Sees.

Florent. Hoveden. After King William had, as he imagin'd, finiſh'd all Wars and Conteſts both at home and abroad, a leſs ſuſpected and more unnatural War broke out in Normandy, which with ſome Intermiſſions laſted two or three Years. This was occaſion'd by his eldeſt Son Robert whom he had left in Normandy, a Gentleman of an aſpiring and prodigal Temper, who being openly aſſiſted by Philip King of France, and privately incourag'd by his own Mother Matilda, boldly laid Claim to the whole Dukedom of Normandy, alledging his Father's Promiſe made to him when he firſt gain'd England. Accordingly being aſſiſted by the French King, he vigorouſly invaded the Country, burnt ſeveral Towns, and made great Devaſtations. The King, tho' at firſt diſcompos'd at the News of his Son's Inſolence, yet believing it had no deeper Root, but what would ſoon wither or be cut off by his Preſence, gather'd immediately what Forces he could raiſe, and with an Army of his Engliſh Subjects ſail'd over now to invade Normandy, as he had done formerly to invade England with the Normans. In the firſt Year, after no very great Struggles on either Side, a Truce and a Peace was made; but in a ſhort Time Duke Robert, reſtleſs in his Ambition, broke through all Obligations, enter'd into new Acts of Hoſtility, and at length preſs'd very hard upon his Father near the Caſtle of Gerboret. At which Place they came to a general Battel, which was very obſtinate on both Sides, in which Duke Robert furiouſly encounter'd his Father unknown to him, and not only wounded him in the Arm with his Lance, but diſmounted him. King William thus fallen, immediately call'd for a Horſe, ſtorming to ſee his Blood ſplit in his own Land, which had never been drawn by the Weapons of Foreigners, and in a great Rage threaten'd Revenge. Robert knowing his Father's Voice haſtily alighted, and in his Arms took him from the Ground, humbly deſiring his Pardon for this unknown Fact, and Forgiveneſs of his raſh Attempt; then mounting him upon his own Horſe, he brought him in Safety out of the Throng, who now ſeeing himſelf too weak to withſtand the Enemy, left the Honour of the Field to Robert, with the Loſs of great Numbers of his Men, and the Wounding of his Son William Rufus. This uncommon Accident in a ſhort Time after brought both Parties to an Accommodation; and Peace being made, Robert return'd into England with his Father, but could never wholly regain his Favour. This was the only conſiderable Defeat the King receiv'd in his whole Life; in all the reſt of which he was ſo ſucceſsful, that even Foreign Nations dreaded his very Name. A. D. 1077. Reg. 11/12. The King's Son Robert rebels in Normandy. The King worſted. A Peace made.

During the Time of theſe Wars, the better to ſecure the City of London, the King laid the Foundation of a ſtrong Caſtle or Citadel, ſurrounded with a large deep Ditch, lying on the Eaſt Side of the City, now call'd the Tower of London; the chief Surveyor of which Work was Gundulph, Biſhop of Rocheſter. Therefore thoſe who would have it founded by Julius Cæſar are much miſtaken, unleſs they can prove that the King only built it upon ſome old Foundation laid by him; which yet is not probable, ſince no Author relates that ever Julius Cæſar came to London. About a Year after, Duke Robert marching into the North againſt King Malcolm, founded another remarkable Caſtle upon the River Tine, at a Ford or Paſſage where before ſtood a ſmall Village call'd Monkceſter, from certain Monks who liv'd there in great Auſterity and Retirement: But after the Building of this Fortreſs, it was from thence call'd New-Caſtle upon Tine, which Name it ſtill retains. V. King William had now ſo firmly eſtabliſh'd his Affairs both at home and abroad, that for the laſt ſeven Years of his Reign he met with no very conſiderable Diſturbances; ſo that he had leiſure to apply himſelf to the Arts of Peace, and the Orders of the State, in which he was no leſs skilful and vigorous than in thoſe of War. In ſome Things he proceeded laudably and honourably, in others ſeverely and arbitrarily, and in all Things conſiderately and politickly. One of his great Deſigns was to make a general and compleat Survey of the whole Nation, which he began this Year, and did not finiſh it 'till ſix Years after. This great Work was manag'd and carry'd on by particular Commiſſioners, who were ſome of the greateſt Earls and Biſhops of the Nation; who by the Verdict or Preſentment of Juries, or certain Perſons ſworn in every County, Hundred or Wapentach, enquired and noted down what Arable Land, Paſture, Meadow and Wood every Man had, and what was the Extent and Value of them in the Time of King Edward the Confeſſor. And alſo at the ſame Time, the Survey was made by Counties, Hundreds, Towns or Mannors, Hides, half Hides, Virgates and Acres of Arable Land, Meadow, Paſture and Wood. Alſo they noted what Mills and Fiſhings, and in ſome Counties, what and how many Free-Men, Sock-Men, Villains, Borders, Servants, young Cattle, Sheep, Swine, working Horſes, Hives of Bees, &c. belong'd to every Town and Mannor, and whoſe they were; always in every County putting down the King's Name firſt, and after him all the great Men in Order, that held of him in Chief, with Numbers plac'd before them, for the eaſier finding them in the Book, as may be ſeen in the Catalogue of Tenants in Chief, or the Poſſeſſors of ſuch Lands at the Time of the Survey. All England, with Part of Wales, was deſcrib'd, except the three Counties of Weſtmorland, Cumberland and Northumberland; and the Deſcription or Survey written was in two Books, now call'd the great and little Domeſday-Book, remaining in the Cuſtody of the Vice-Chamberlains of the Exchequer. The little Book contains only the Counties of Norfolk, Suffolk and Eſſex. The Reaſon given for the Name of Domeſday is, That it was no more lawful to depart, or appeal from what was in it, than from the Day of Dome, or laſt Judgment. And being the higheſt Record in the Kingdom, it was then, and ſtill continues to be a deciſive Evidence in any Trial where there is Occaſion to refer to it.

A general Survey made of the Nation.

Domeſday-Book.

Brady.

This great Survey did not only increaſe, but alſo much more aſcertain the Revenues of the Crown, which then conſiſted of ſeveral Branches: As firſt the Crown Lands, which conſiſted of one thouſand four hundred and twenty two Mannors or Lordſhips in ſeveral Counties, beſides ſeveral Farms and Lands in Middleſex, Shropſhire and Rutlandſhire. Theſe with the Eſcheats forfeited to the King for Felony or Treaſon, or reverted to the Crown for want of Heirs, together with the Rents reſerv'd of the Baronies and Lands he gave to his Followers, rais'd a vaſt Revenue in Mony. Another Branch was a Land-Tax call'd Hidage, which this King found here before his Arrival in the Time of Edward the Confeſſor, as appears every where in Domeſday-Book. A third Branch was Tolls and Cuſtoms for many Caſes, Wardſhips, Knights Fees, Forfeitures, Fines and pecuniary Puniſhments for Murder, Manſlaughter, Batteries, Fightings, Treſpaſſes, Miſdemeanor, &c. which were all redeem'd and ſatisfy'd by Penalties and Fines, as well now as in the Saxons Times. Not to proceed to every Particular, in ſhort this King's Revenue in general was ſo very great, that Vitales aſſures us that it was computed at above one thouſand and ſixty Pound of Sterling Mony every Day of the Year, beſides his Gifts, Preſents and pecuniary Puniſhments; which was an immenſe Sum in thoſe Days, amounting to near four hundred thouſand Pounds per Annum, and which now by a moderate Computation may be valu'd at five Millions of our Mony. Beſides this vaſt Revenue, he had a mighty ſtanding Army, eſpecially of Horſe, with which he made good his Acquiſitions without any Expence or Charge out of his Exchequer: For the ſame ſame Author affirms, that he ſo diſtributed the Lands of England to his Followers and Soldiers, that he had ſixty thouſand Knights or Horſemen conſtantly at his Command, to be imploy'd in any Expedition where Occaſion requir'd.

Vitales. &c. As this King was careful as to his Revenues and Power, ſo was he no leſs diligent as to Laws and Government; and upon pretence of Juſtice and Piety, or elſe of Neceſſity and Safety, he aboliſh'd ſeveral ancient Saxon Inſtitutions, and made ſeveral new, beſides great Changes in others. He alſo caus'd the Laws of the Kingdom, which had been anciently written in Saxon, and by Edward the Confeſſor publiſh'd in Latin, now to be tranſlated into Norman. He order'd all Pleas in the ſeveral Courts to be made in the ſame Language, as likewiſe all Petitions preſented to the King, and all Orders of Court and Council. This introduc'd new Terms, new Forms of Pleading and of Proceſs, new Names of Offices and of Courts; and with them all the Cuſtoms and Subtelties of the Norman Pleas and Conveyances, inſtead of the old Saxon Simplicity. Among the Saxons it was uſual to grant Lands and Houſes by bare Words, and with the Delivery of ſome trivial Gift, as an Horn, a Sword, an Arrow, or a Helmet; yet the Honeſty of thoſe Times left them little ſubject to any Diſputes or Contentions. But this Prince reduc'd all Grants to Writing, to Signature, and to Witneſſes, which in Time introduc'd more Cavils and Actions, than former Methods. He appointed Juſtices to preſerve the Peace, and to adminiſter Juſtice in every County, purſuant to what was us'd in the former Reigns. For the Pleas of the Crown, and thoſe of greater Moment between Subjects, he created learned and noble Judges, and ordain'd four Terms each Year, conſiſting of a certain Number of Days, wherein Juſtice ſhould be duly adminiſter'd, and all Suits heard in ſuch Places as the King ſhould appoint, and find moſt convenient. Beſides theſe Orders he inſtituted the Courts of Chancery and the Exchequer; the firſt for tempering the Rigor of Laws, according to the Dictates of Conſcience and Equity; and the other for determining all Actions concerning the Revenues of the Crown, and puniſhing unjuſt Officers who levy'd or receiv'd them, as well as backward Paymaſters. By theſe Changes he alſo abrogated the Judiciary Power exercis'd by the Biſhops in each County where Juſtice was adminiſter'd; where the Biſhop with the Alderman, or Earl of each Shire, ſat as Judge in thoſe Courts, which had not only increas'd their Authority but alſo their Revenue, by a Share they had in the King's Fines they levy'd.

His Laws and Inſtitutions.

But whatever Innovations and Changes were made in all other Things, the Government of the Peace and Security of the Kingdom ſeems to have been continu'd as before; and particularly he retain'd the Uſe of that famous Law, not yet wholly diſus'd, call'd the Borough Law, by which every free Man of the Commons of England ſtood as Surety for each others good Behaviour, every Borough or Tything being oblig'd to produce their Criminals to Juſtice; by which means Innocence became every Man's Intereſt, as well as Duty, ſince they were otherwiſe to ſhare in the Penalty. In the Beginning of his Reign the Kingdom had been much infeſted with Outlaws and Robbers, and many Normans were ſecretly murder'd by the Engliſh, as they paſs'd alone upon the High-Ways or the Fields, eſpecially in the Night. To remedy which Miſchief, he impos'd a heavy Fine upon the Hundred where the Body of any Norman ſhould be ſlain, whether the Authors of the Fact were diſcover'd or not. All Adulteries by his Laws were made equal with Manſlaughters and Murders; and for all Rapes and Robberies, he caus'd them to be puniſh'd ſo ſeverely by cruel Mutilations of Members, and Hardſhips of Labour, as left them miſerable Spectacles, or Warnings of their Crimes, during the reſt of their Lives. By the Rigor of theſe Courſes, and ſuppreſſing of Idleneſs and Luxury, the chief Cauſes of ſuch Offences, he in Time reduc'd the whole Realm to ſuch Security, that it is recorded that in his Time a fair Virgin with a Purſe of Gold in her Hand, might have travell'd through the Nation, without any Danger to her Honour, or her Mony.

His Regulations.

Not-

He makes the New Forest in Hampshire.

Notwithstanding many excellent Laws and Regulations, which greatly display'd the Wisdom and Abilities of this Prince, several of his Actions were misinterpreted and disliked, and others were too apparently blameable to admit of any Vindication, as savouring too much of the Tyrant and Oppressor. Particularly after an arbitrary manner he dispeopled the South-Western Parts of Hampshire, destroy'd all the Towns and Villages, with thirty six Mother Churches, turn'd out the poor Inhabitants, for above thirty Miles together, and made a Forest for wild Beasts, which the English then call'd Ytene, and at this Time The new Forest: Of which W. Mapes, who liv'd in the next Age, severely observes, That the Conqueror took away great Quantities of Land from God and Men, and converted it to the Use of wild Beasts, and the Sport of his Dogs. This he did either to make a more easie Access for his Normans into England, in case of Insurrections; or to indulge himself in his Hunting, or else to raise Mony by Methods, tho' never so unjust. For he, more merciful to Beasts than to Mankind, appointed most grievous pecuniary Fines, and other more severe Penalties, to be inflicted on those who should presume to trespass upon his Game and Retirement. But the Divine Vengeance seem'd to have pursu'd him not long after in the untimely Deaths of several of his Posterity: For his second Son Richard, was in this Forest goared by a Deer, or poison'd by a pestilential Blast; his third Son William was afterwards casually slain by an Arrow in the same Place; and his Grandson Henry, by his Son Robert, while he hotly pursu'd his Chace, was caught up by a Bough, like Absolon, and left hanging 'till he dy'd. Besides several Acts of Injustice and Oppression, this King in a particular Manner disoblig'd the English by his apparent Partiality to his Countrymen the Normans: For he did not only give them the greatest Preferments, introduce their Customs, and publish his Laws in their Language, but also endeavour to make their Language to be general in the Nation. To which End, he caus'd many Schools to be erected for teaching that Tongue, which was a Bastard French, not well understood by the French themselves, and scarce at all by the English. But his Endeavours were in a great Measure frustrated by the Over-Ballance of the Numbers of the Nation, in Proportion to the Strangers, and by a general Aversion in the English to change their Language, which they thought would occasion the final Overthrow of their Liberties. So that in this very Reign, instead of the English speaking of the Norman, the Normans by means of Intermarriages, ordinary Commerce and Conversation, began generally to use the English Tongue, which has ever since compos'd the main Body of our Language, tho' chang'd like others by Mixture of many new Words and Phrases, not only introduc'd by this great Revolution, but by the Uses and Accidents of each succeeding Age.

His Partiality to the Normans.

In the midst of his Partiality to the Normans, this Prince shew'd so much Justice, that he would spare none who were guilty of great and known Crimes. Nor would he pass by his Brother Odo, whom he had made Bishop of Bayeux, and Earl of Kent, and on whom he heap'd such great Honours and Favours. This Prelate, aspiring to the Papal Chair, had purchas'd a magnificent Palace at Rome, whither he was going with a noble Retinue, and a vast Treasure, when the King came suddenly upon him in the Isle of Wight, where he was ready to set Sail, and seiz'd him with his own Hand, when he could not persuade those about him to do it, since he alledg'd he was a Clergy-Man, and not to be sentenc'd without the Judgment of the Pope; but the King reply'd, he seiz'd on him not as a Clergy-Man, but as Earl of Kent; whereupon all his mighty Riches were taken from him, and his Estate confiscated: The Crimes the King laid to his Charge were the grievous Oppressions of the People during his Government, and the Seduction of his Subjects to forsake the Realm without his Leave; for he had ingag'd Hugh Earl of Chester, with many Knights and other Persons of Quality, to attend him in his Journey to Rome. This happen'd in the Year 1082, after which, for four or five Years, 'till the last of this this Reign, we find but little of Moment; only in the Year 1084 the King laid a heavy Tax of no leſs than ſix Shillings upon every Hide of Land throughout England; being threaten'd with an Invaſion from the Danes, againſt whom in the next Year he rais'd a vaſt Army, but found no great Service for his Soldiers. In the ſame Year his Queen Matilda dy'd in Normandy, to her Husband's great Affliction. In the next, Edgar Etheling having obtain'd the King's leave, went into Italy with two hundred Knights, from whence he paſs'd into the Holy Land with Robert the Son of Godwin to fight againſt the Saracens; but his Siſter Chriſtina had ſome time before vow'd her ſelf a Nun in the Monaſtery of Rumſey in Hampſhire.

Malmsb. The laſt Year of this Reign, which was 1087, prov'd very calamitous to England by reaſon of the malignant Feavers and Famines that deſtroy'd vaſt Numbers; alſo ſudden Fires conſum'd ſeveral of the principal Cities in the Nation; and St. Paul's Church, with the greater and better Part of the City of London, were burnt to the Ground. In which Year King William having ſetled his Affairs in England, and taken new Oaths of Fidelity from the Nobility, paſs'd over into Normandy with a powerful Army, to revenge himſelf upon the King of France for former Injuries; but not long after a Truce was made between them for a conſiderable Time. This was well obſerv'd on King William's Part, 'till the King of France indiſcreetly took an Occaſion to jeſt upon his great Corpulency, for which he was then in a Courſe of Phyſick, declaring, That his Brother of England was gone only to lay his great Belly at Roven, and he doubted he muſt be at the Charge to ſet up Lights at his Up-riſing. This Scoff from a young King ſo rous'd and exaſperated the old Warrior, that he ſwore a deſperate Oath, That as ſoon as he was Church'd, he would ſave him the Charge of ſetting up of Lights, and come himſelf, and light a thouſand Fires in the Bowels of France. Accordingly in Auguſt following, the King to make good his Oath, enter'd France with a mighty Army, deſtroy'd all the Corn and Fruits, committed great Ravages, and burnt many Towns and Villages; after which he beſieg'd the City of Mante, took it ſoon after, and burnt it, commanding the Fire to be continu'd 'till all the Buildings and Churches were burnt to the Ground. But the King being too eager in his Revenge, his Body was ſoon inflam'd by the Warmth of the Seaſon, as well as the Heat of the Fires; and then in his Retreat, upon leaping over a Ditch on Horſe-back, he ſo bruis'd the Rimm of his Belly againſt the Pummel of the Saddel, that he was ſoon thrown into a dangerous Diſtemper that ended his Days.

The King goes into France.

He is provok'd by the King.

He receives a Hurt.

Eadmer. Vitales. The King finding his Death approaching, began to be apprehenſive of his future Happineſs, and to think upon Acts of Mercy and Charity, and order'd great Sums to pious Uſes, particularly for the re-edifying thoſe Churches he had burnt in Mante. He likewiſe gave Order for the ſetting at Liberty the Earls Morchar, Roger and Syward, as alſo Wulnoth, Brother to King Harold, whom he had kept Priſoner from his Childhood, together with all others who were in Cuſtody, either in England or Normandy; not excepting his Brother Odo, who not without much Interceſſion was releas'd. Vitales tells us that a little before his Death, he made a ſolemn Speech to his Sons and Friends about him, 'wherein he recounted many charitable Deeds and munificent Gifts of 'his own, but withall he acknowledg'd with infinite Sorrow, that he had been 'brought up in Wars, and polluted with Blood, and that he had been guilty 'of many Cruelties and Oppreſſions in relation to the Engliſh. Here he be-'queath'd to his three Sons his whole Eſtate; to his eldeſt Son Robert the 'Dukedom of Normandy; but for the Kingdom of England, having obtain'd 'it by ſo many Crimes, he durſt leave it to none but God; tho' his Deſire was, 'that William, his moſt obedient Son, might enjoy it after his Deceaſe. But 'to Henry, his third Son then living, he left five thouſand Marks in Mony, 'without any Territories. His Son Henry complaining of this, and asking,

His laſt Speech.

What

What he should do with the Money, unless he had some Place to secure it; he in a prophetical Manner is said to make Answer, That in Time he should enjoy all the Honour that he himself had, and that he should exceed both his Brothers in Glory and Riches. Then to prevent any Disturbances in England, he wrot a Letter to Arch-Bishop Lanfranc in favour of his Son William, who having receiv'd it with his Father's last Benediction, immediately hasten'd towards his new Kingdom. This King having settled his Affairs concerning this Life, the better to prepare for the next, caus'd himself to be remov'd to the Village of Hermentrude, near Rouen, to avoid the Noise of that City, where

His Death. shortly after, with all the Marks of Devotion, he departed this Life, upon Thursday the ninth Day of September, A. D. 1087, in the sixty first Year of his Age, and the fifty second of his Dukedom, after a tumultuous and glorious Reign of twenty Years, ten Months, and twenty six Days, reckoning from the Battel of Hastings. His Body was ungratefully abandon'd by all his Servants, and with the utmost Privacy convey'd to his own Church at Caen, where the very Soil was challeng'd by a Country Gentleman, and a Sum of Mony laid down, before it was permitted to be bury'd; so that he who was Lord of so many Territories, now wanted Ground enough for a single Grave.

This was the End of this great Monarch William the First, commonly call'd the Conqueror, who tho' he had that Name given him in all Ages, yet he obtain'd and enjoy'd the Crown of England by such a Concurrency of various Circumstances, that it may in a great measure be said of him as was said of Augustus, that he came to the Empire neither by Conquest, nor Usurpation, nor Inheritance, nor Election, but by a strange Mixture of all these together. To determine the Matter nicely is very difficult, and not so material as some would have it; but which way soever we admit of his Accession to the Throne, we find, that being once possess'd of it, he acted as all wise Princes ever have done, that is labour'd by all Methods to continue himself in it. In which he illustriously display'd both his Wisdom and his Valour; having to encounter not only the Troubles rais'd by a discontented Kingdom and a rebellious Dukedom, but also the whole Power of France, Denmark, Scotland and Wales; all which he bravely surmounted with an uninterrupted Course of Prosperity; so that scarce

His Character. any Prince ever made a greater Figure in History. As to his bodily Perfections, Malmsb. &c. he was well proportion'd, of a vigorous and healthful Constitution, of a noble Presence, sitting or standing; of a masculine Beauty, in which there was a Mixture of Majesty and Severity; and had so great a Strength, that few of his Court could draw his Bow. As to those of his Mind, he was both wise and active, penetrating in his Designs, daring in his Enterprizes, and steady in the Prosecution of them. All agree that he was chaste and temperate, pious, valiant and great in all his Actions, especially in such as express his Royal State and Dignity. His Pastimes were chiefly Hunting and Feasting, in the latter of which he always display'd his Grandeur, annually keeping the Feasts of Christmass at Gloucester, that of Easter at Winchester, and that of Whitsuntide at Westminster; to which Places he summon'd all the great Men of the Kingdom, both Clergy and Laity, that Foreign Ambassadors might be Witnesses of his extraordinary Magnificence; at which Times he was more easie of Access, and shew'd great Instances of Bounty and Indulgence to all Men. Yet among his many Virtues, he is much accus'd of being of a covetous, rapacious and cruel Disposition, which produc'd innumerable Acts of Injustice and Oppression; which others think were rather the Effects of his Policy, the Necessity of his Affairs, and the Inconstancy and frequent Rebellions of those Subjects who had sworn Allegiance to him. But in the Prosecuting of such he oftentimes shew'd uncommon Generosity, pardoning the same Offenders two or three Times over; Earl Waltheof being the only Nobleman that was put to Death in his Reign. He was of so brave and fearless a Temper, that contrary to the Policy of other Kings, he promoted his only Rival Edgar Etheling, after he had been twice in Arms againſt him, and gave him a Revenue ſuitable to his Quality. The reſt of the Engliſh no doubt might have been happy under the Government of this Prince, who was really a Promoter of Piety, Learning, and all that was Great; but being degenerated in their Morality and Virtue, divided in their Intereſts, and impolitick in ſtrugling for that Liberty they had actually given up, great Numbers of them brought themſelves under the moſt extream Miſeries and Oppreſſions. But England in general gain'd great Honour and Advantages by this Conqueſt, as will appear more plainly in the ſucceeding Hiſtory.

twice

SECT. II.

The Reign of King WILLIAM the Second.

Containing 12 Years, 10 Months, and 22 Days.

Sax. An. Vitals. Eadmer. &c.

I. KING William left three Sons behind him, Robert, William and Henry, of whom the two youngeſt obtain'd and poſſeſs'd the Crown of England. Before his Breath was departed, young William knowing his Father's Intentions, poſted for England with Bloet the Houſhold Chaplain, together with Earl Morchar and Wulnoth, who for a while he kept as Priſoners, 'till he had ſeiz'd all his Father's Treaſure at Wincheſter, which amounted to ſixty thouſand Pounds in Mony, beſides Gold, Jewels and Plate, an immenſe Sum in thoſe Days. In obtaining of which he is ſaid to have been much aſſiſted by his Father's Steward Eudo, who before his Arrival had ſecur'd not only Wincheſter, but alſo Dover, Pevenſey, Haſtings, and other Caſtles on the Coaſts. After which, ſtill fearing his elder Brother's Intereſt, he apply'd himſelf with his Letters to Arch-Biſhop Lanfranc, by whom he had been both educated and knighted; and to remove all Obſtructions, he ſolemnly ſwore, 'To preſerve Juſtice, Equity and Mercy throughout his Kingdom, and alſo to defend the Peace and Liberty of the Church, and in all Things to obſerve the Arch-Biſhop's Directions. Upon which, and other Promiſes made to the Nobility, he ſoon procur'd ſo great an Intereſt, that upon Sunday the twenty ſeventh Day of September, he was crown'd King at Weſtminſter, by the two Arch-Biſhops of the Nation, in the Preſence of moſt of the other Biſhops, and many of the Nobility.

A. D. 1087. Reg. 1.

William Rufus comes over into England.

He is crown'd King.

Vitalis. Malmsb. Sax. An. &c.

This Prince, who from his ruddy Complexion, or red Hair obtain'd the common Name of Rufus, was now about thirty one Years of Age, and in the Vigour of his Youth; being bred up to the Sword, he was naturally warm, rough and haughty, more couragious than pious, and more gallant than good. Yet in the former Part of his Reign, being in a great Meaſure govern'd by the wiſe Councils of Lanfranc, he acted in many Things worthily and honourably; and was very careful in the Diſtribution of his Father's Treaſure to thoſe pious Uſes mention'd in his Will. But his Natural Temper, and his Want of Primogeniture, ſoon rais'd a great Faction in the Nation againſt him, who favouring the Pretenſions, and liking the Perſon of his elder Brother Robert, occaſion'd great Troubles and Diſturbances. The chief of this Party was his Uncle Odo, Biſhop of Bayeux, who tho' he had been lately reſtor'd to all his Honours and Dignities, yet envying the Power and Intereſt of Arch-Biſhop Lanfranc, he made no better uſe of them, than to endeavour to ruin both him and his Soveraign. And drawing into this Conſpiracy his Brother Robert, Earl of Hereford, with many others of the Engliſh Nobility, he wrote Letters to his Nephew in Normandy, urging him to haſten into England, and recover his Right, which he did not doubt but by his Means would be effectual. The Buſineſs thus forwarded, and the Engliſh daily reſorting into Normandy, aſſur'd Duke Robert of a happy Succeſs; but having before liv'd above his Fortunes, his greateſt Obſtruction was Want of Mony. Therefore applying himſelf to his youngeſt Brother Henry, who had much Gold and no Land, he furniſh'd himſelf by Mortgaging to him the County of Conſtantine, a Province in Normandy; and then ſent to Odo, that he ſhould expect his Landing in the Weſt of England by a Day prefix'd. Upon this the Biſhop aſſum'd more Courage, and ſhew'd himſelf firſt in the Action; and fortifying Rocheſter, began to diſturb the County of Kent, urging his Accomplices to follow his Example, which was accordingly perform'd: For in the Weſt Robert de Mewbray Earl of Northumberland, aſſiſted by Geffrey Biſhop of Conſtance, ſeiz'd upon Bath and Berkley, with a great Part of Wiltſhire, and ſtrongly fortify'd the Caſtle of Briſtow againſt King William: In Norfolk, Roger Bigot, in Leiceſterſhire, Hugh Grentemeiſnil did extreamly waſte thoſe Counties: Roger Montgomery, with his Welſh Men, aſſiſted by William Biſhop of Durham, Barnard of Newmerch, Roger Lacie, and Ralph Mortimer, all Normans, with Fire and Sword paſs'd the Country of Worceſter. And theſe Inſurrections were ſo dangerous, and Duke Robert ſo favour'd, that in the Judgment of Gemeticenſes, had he haſten'd his Arrival, and purſu'd the Opportunity, he might with no great Difficulty have obtain'd the Crown of England.

King William's Proviſions.

King William obſerving the Poſture of his Affairs, vigorouſly proceeded to the ſuppreſſing theſe Inſurrections; and to that end he aſſembled many Biſhops, Earls, and natural Engliſh, with Lanfranc at the Head of them; and declaring his Intentions, with the Addition of many ſpecious Promiſes, they all aſſur'd him of their Aſſiſtance. Then ordering his Fleet to guard the Seas againſt his Brother Robert's intended Deſcent, he march'd in Perſon againſt his Uncle Odo, and in May beſieg'd him in Rocheſter, together with Euſtathius Earl of Bulloign, Robert de Beleſme, and many other Noblemen, and Perſons of inferior Rank, who in vain expected the Aſſiſtance of Duke Robert, who was detain'd only by Eaſe and Sloath from his promis'd Expedition. Theſe were at length forc'd out of the Town into the Caſtle, where many periſh'd by a raging Sickneſs, and being preſs'd with many other Neceſſities, they ſent a Meſſage to the King, That upon Condition they might enjoy their Lands and Eſtates, they would deliver up the Caſtle, and for the future ſerve him faithfully as their natural Lord. But the King, provok'd by their Behaviour and theſe Propoſals, ſolemnly ſwore, That he would take the perfidious Rebels by Force, and deſtroy them with all Kinds of Deaths; and when his Nobility, who had many Friends and Relations in the Caſtle, perſuaded him to Moderation, he return'd them this remarkable Anſwer, That whoſoever ſpar'd Perjur'd Men, Robbers, Plunderers and Traitors, depriv'd all good Men of their Peace and Quietneſs, and laid a Foundation of innumerable Miſchiefs to the Virtuous and Innocent. But at length, overcome by the Interceſſion of his faithful Friends the Biſhops, with the Engliſh Noblemen, and other loyal ancient Barons, he granted the Beſieg'd their Lives, pardon'd the Loſs of their Limbs, and gave them leave to paſs out of the Caſtle with their Horſes and Arms, but without Hopes of ever enjoying their Lands and Eſtates during his Reign. Whereupon they were all forc'd to quit the Kingdom, as was alſo Biſhop Odo, who now irrecoverably loſt all his Honours, and vaſt Eſtate in England.

Vitales. Sax. An. &c.

He beſieges the Rebels in Rocheſter.

He reduces them.

After this King William beſtow'd the Eſtates of theſe baniſh'd Noblemen upon others, who had ſerv'd him faithfully during this War; which tho' it was now happily and unexpectedly finiſh'd, it was chiefly the Effect of ſome politick Methods which the King took at the Beginning of theſe Commotions. For it was not by open Force that he quell'd this great Defection of the Normans, but by publiſhing, That he would eaſe all his Subjects, and eſpecially the Native Engliſh of their great Taxes, promiſing them better Laws, with the free Liberty of of Hunting in his Foreſt; as alſo by deluding ſome of the chief Norman Noblemen with large Promiſes, and ſpecious Pretences. Thus he inſinuated himſelf to Roger Montgomery, a Principal in the Inſurrection, to whom he promis'd, That he would willingly quit the Government, if he and thoſe his Father had deſign'd his Curators ſhould think fit: Yet adding, He could not conceive why they ſhould be ſo violent againſt him: For if they expected Mony, or an Augmentation of their Lands, they ſhould not be diſappointed, provided they did not queſtion his Father's Will and Judgment, which by deſpiſing would hazard their own Safety; for the ſame Man who made him King, made them Earls and Noblemen. With theſe and the like Inſinuations the Earl was brought off from the Confederacy, which was then immediately broken, and the Nation reduc'd to quiet; all Parties concern'd either ſubmitting or leaving the Kingdom.

Eadmer. Malmſb. But no ſooner was the King freed from his Fears, and well eſtabliſh'd in his Throne, but forgetting all Oaths and Promiſes, he took quite contrary Meaſures, and us'd many Extortions and Oppreſſions. And being mildly admoniſh'd of his Breach of Faith by Arch-Biſhop Lanfranc, he in a Paſſion reply'd, Who can perform all that he has promis'd? and would never after afford him a kind Look. Yet ſtill the Preſence of this worthy Man was ſome Awe and Reſtraint upon his Actions; but that was remov'd in a ſhort Time after: For upon the 24th Day of May the Arch-Biſhop dy'd, to the unexpreſſible Grief of all good Men, as being the moſt eminent Inſtance of Learning and Wiſdom, as well as Piety and Charity, that this Age had produc'd. After which the King more openly ſhew'd his rapacious Inclinations; always covetous, yet never frugal, and ſtill graſping and gathering, yet never filling his Coffers. And now diſcovering what before lay conceal'd, he immediately ſeiz'd the whole Revenues of the Archbiſhoprick into his own Exchequer, allowing only neceſſary Maintenance to the Monks, and kept that See vacant for almoſt four Years. He did the ſame by the See of Lincoln, and all other Churches and Abbies, as ſoon as they became void, which were never beſtow'd and fill'd up ſo long as he could ſqueeze any thing conſiderable out of them; and when he could get nothing more, as Eadmer tells us, he would then ſell an Abby ſo pillag'd to ſome Monk who would bid moſt for it. In ſhort he was the firſt King of England who ſhew'd his Succeſſors the dangerous Precedent of keeping the Biſhopricks and their Livings vacant, and receiving the Profits himſelf. Which Grievances were complain'd of to Pope Urban; but he being imploy'd in new and uncommon Deſigns, had not leiſure to endeavour a Redreſs of them.

Lanfranc dies.

Malmſb. Vitalis. II. King William having ſufficiently ſecur'd his own Dominions at home, now caſt his Eyes upon thoſe of his Brother Robert, and ſuddenly made a Deſcent into Normandy, as Scipio did into Africk, reſolving to revenge all former Injuries. And firſt he ſurpriz'd the Caſtles of St. Valery and Albermarle, with others upon the Sea-Coaſt; then preſſing forwards committed great Devaſtations in the Country. Robert, finding himſelf unprovided, and knowing the inſtable Fidelity of his Subjects, apply'd himſelf to Philip the French King, imploring his Aſſiſtance againſt his hoſtile Brother. Philip joining with him, was ſoon ſtopp'd in his Progreſs by a large Sum of Mony from King William; and ſo he return'd into his Country, with more Riches, and leſs Honour than he had before. Upon which King William became more and more ſucceſsful, and not only the Norman Nobility began to favour him, but alſo the Citizens of Roven the Metropolis, being brib'd by his Gifts and Promiſes, treated with him to betray the City, together with their ſloathful Duke, into his Hands. One Conon a rich Citizen was the chief Conſpirator, and had bargain'd with King William to receive his Forces into the City; but the whole Deſign being diſcover'd to the Duke, he immediately join'd with his younger Brother Henry, who upon the Account of ill Uſage from him, was now ſetting up an independent In-tereſt, and fortifying thoſe Towns that had been mortgag'd to him. Henry and his Followers threw themſelves into the City time enough to ſecure it, tho' with great Slaughter of the reſiſting Citizens; Conon the chief Traitor was taken, and for his Puniſhment by Henry's Order was carry'd up into a high Tower, and from thence by his own Hands thrown out of a Window.

A. D. 1091. Reg. 4/5.

This Conjunction put a ſtop to King William's Arms, but in the next Year he reſolv'd upon a ſecond Attempt, which being begun, was ſoon ended by a Reconciliation and a Peace between the two Brothers, upon theſe Conditions: Florent. Vitalis. Malmsb.

A Peace made between them.

'That the Duke ſhould yield to the King the County of Eu, and the Towns of Feſ-
'camp and Cherburgh, with all thoſe Caſtles which had revolted from him; in 'Conſideration of which the King ſhould reduce the Country of Maine to the 'Duke's Obedience, with other Caſtles in Normandy then in Rebellion: That 'the King ſhould reſtore to the Norman Noblemen all thoſe Lands they had
'loſt for their Adherance to the Duke, and to the Duke himſelf ſo much Land
'in England as was then agreed between them. Laſtly, if the Duke ſhould 'die without lawful Iſſue, the King ſhould be his Heir, as he alſo the King's,
'upon the ſame Terms. For the Performance of theſe Articles twelve Barons on both Sides took their Oaths in the Behalf of their reſpective Princes; and King William in this Affair ſhew'd many Marks of Bounty and Magnificence towards the Normans and Strangers that reſorted to him. But by this Treaty Prince Henry was quite left out and deſerted, who finding thoſe Towns abandon him, which in Juſtice ought to have aſſerted his Cauſe, betook himſelf to St. Michael's Mount as his laſt Retreat, from whence with his Soldiers he ravag'd the adjacent Country. To put a ſtop to him, his two Elder Brothers, now Confederates, join'd their Forces, and beſieg'd that ſtrong Fortreſs all the Lent, and loſt many Men with little Succeſs. During this remarkable Siege, the King riding alone ſome Diſtance from his Camp, ſaw ſeveral of the Enemy's Soldiers coming up to him; and truſting to his own Strength and Valour, boldly ingag'd them, but in the firſt Encounter his Horſe was ſlain under him, and himſelf thrown upon the Ground, with his Foot intangled in the Stirrup. Upon which Danger, and finding the Enemy ready to ſtrike, he cry'd out, Hold, Knave, I am the King of England! which ſo ſurpriz'd the Soldiers, that they immediately took him up with great Reſpect, and brought him another Horſe. The King ſpringing into the Saddle, briskly demanded Who was the Man that diſmounted him? and upon the Man's boldly ſhowing himſelf, he ſwore his uſual Oath, That hereafter he ſhould be his Knight, and he ſhould receive the juſt Reward of his Valour. In the mean Time Prince Henry was much diſtreſs'd for want of Water, and knowing Duke Robert to be of the milder Diſpoſition, ſent a Meſſenger to him deſiring That he might not be deny'd Water, but that he would ſubdue him by Force of Arms, and not by Thirſt. Upon which the Duke gave him liberty to ſupply himſelf; and being blam'd by his Brother William as impolitick, he reply'd, What ſhall I ſuffer my Brother to die with Thirſt; where ſhall we have another when he is gone? But the King deriding the Duke's eaſie Nature, quitted the Siege, and return'd into England. However the Fortreſs was at laſt ſurrender'd to the Duke, and Henry permitted to go where he thought fit, who for ſome Years wander'd from Place to Place with one Knight, a Chaplain, and three Servants or Eſquires. About the ſame Time Robert baniſh'd Edgar Etheling out of his Country, and the King depriv'd him of all the Lands that had been given him, who thereupon went into Scotland to King Malcolm his Brother-in-Law.

Not long after, King William by Promiſes ſo far prevail'd with Duke Robert, that he brought him over into England, and had his Company in a new Expedition made againſt Malcolm King of Scotland, who taking Advantage of the King's Abſence had invaded Northumberland. King William prepar'd both a great Fleet and a numerous Army, tho' much to the Loſs of either; for his Fleet was much ſhatter'd by Tempeſts, and many Men and Horſes periſh'd by Cold *Sax. An. Sim. Cold and Hunger in the barren Mountains. At length both Kings came to an Enterview, where by the means of Edgar Etheling a Peace was concluded upon theſe Conditions: 'Firſt, That Malcolm ſhould yield the King the ſame Obe- 'dience, as he had done to his Father King William: Secondly, That the King 'ſhould reſtore to Malcolm twelve Mannors, which he formerly held under his 'Father, and ſhould alſo pay him annually twelve Marks of Gold. In Conſi- deration of this good Office, the King was again reconcil'd to Prince Edgar; and thereupon both the Kings return'd home in Peace. But as theſe two Princes were made Friends, ſo much about the ſame Time the two Brothers again be- came Enemies: For Duke Robert, well perceiving the Subtlety of his Brother, and that he delay'd to perform the Covenants of the Treaty between them, went aboard his Veſſels two Days before Chriſtmaſs, and taking Edgar Etheling along with him, in great Diſpleaſure paſs'd over into Normandy.

A Peace con- cluded.

Chron. W. During the King's Abſence in the North there happen'd the total Conqueſt of all the Country of Glamorgan and Morgannie in South-Wales, upon this Oc- caſion. One Eneon, a popular Man, raiſing a Rebellion againſt Rees the Prince of South-Wales, drew over to his Side Jeſtyn Lord of Glamorgan and the neigh- bouring Parts, promiſing him to marry his Daughter. Jeſtyn finding their Fa- ction too weak without foreign Aſſiſtance, ſent Eneon into England, where he had ſo much Intereſt as to procure Aid againſt Prince Rees; and conferring with Robert Fitz-Hamon, a valiant Knight of the King's Bed-Chamber, he ſo far wrought upon his Martial Temper, that for a fix'd Salary he undertook the Ser- vice; and with twelve Knights, and a competent Number of Soldiers march'd into Wales, where joining with Jeſtyn, he in Battel kill'd Prince Rees, with Conon his Son. Robert having perform'd his Service, and deſigning to return, demanded his Pay according to Covenants, which Jeſtyn in ſome part deny'd, alledging that Eneon had exceeded the Bounds of his Commiſſion. Upon which ſuch Diſcord aroſe between theſe Friends, that it occaſion'd a total Breach, and Eneon thus touch'd in his Reputation, join'd with the Engliſh againſt his own Countrymen, and coming to a Battel, Jeſtyn, and moſt of his Welſh Followers were ſlain. Robert finding ſo great an Advantage, ſoon conquer'd and poſſeſs'd himſelf of the whole County of Glamorgan with its Appendages; of which he gave certain Caſtles and Mannors to the twelve Knights that aſſiſted him in this Expedition, as a Reward of their Service; ſome of whoſe Poſterity enjoy part of thoſe Lands to this Day. And this ſhews that the Ruin of the Princes of Wales proceeded more from their unnatural Diviſions, than from the Power of their Invaders.

Wales. Florent. In the following Year Prince Henry, who in a manner had been abandoned, began to recover himſelf, and gather Strength in Normandy, where he had the ſtrong Sea-Port Town of Damfront privately deliver'd into his Hands; and this he made a Place of Refuge 'till ſuch Time as he was reconcil'd to his Brother William, and ſent for into England. About the ſame Time King William march'd with an Army into the North, where he re-edify'd the ancient City and Caſtle of Carliſle, which had been deſtroy'd by the Danes, and lain in Ruins above two hundred Years; and alſo granted large Privileges to the Place, which it enjoys to this Day. In the ſame Year Remigius Biſhop of Dorcheſter, having in the laſt Reign remov'd his See to Lincoln, and there built a magnifi- cent Church, that City with the Country about it was challeng'd by Thomas Arch-Biſhop of York, as lying within his Dioceſe; which Claim the King pri- vately incourag'd, 'till at length upon Payment of a large Sum of Mony to the King, Remigius obtain'd of him to declare in his Favour, and to oblige all the Biſhops in England to repair to the Conſecration of the New Church. Alſo the ſame Year, John Biſhop of Wells, for a Sum of Mony paid to the King, had his Licenſe to tranſlate the Biſhop's See from Wells to Bath, ever ſince which this Biſhoprick has been known by both theſe Titles.

In the Beginning of the ſucceeding Year, the King fell dangerouſly ſick in Gloceſterſhire, ſo that moſt Perſons expected his Death; upon which all the Biſhops, Barons and Abbots, who came to wait on him, and take their laſt leaves, perſuaded him to Repentance, and not to let the vacant Biſhopricks out to Farm, as before, but to beſtow them upon Men of Worth. To which he readily yielded, and further made a Vow to God, That if he recover'd, he would abrogate all unjuſt Laws, and ordain better in their ſtead. In performance of which, he beſtow'd the Biſhoprick of Lincoln upon Robert Bloet his Counſellor, and the Arch-Biſhoprick of Canterbury upon Anſelm a Norman Abbot of great Worth and Piety. But Anſelm well knowing the Difference between the King's Diſpoſition and his own, was extreamly unwilling to accept of ſo great a Charge, 'till at length he was conſtrain'd by the Intreaties of the King, who ſeem'd very penitent, and the Perſuaſions of the Biſhops and Noblemen, who had a high Opinion of his Sanctity. Before his Conſecration he demanded ſeveral Things of the King, particularly to reſtore all the Lands belonging to the Church, which his Predeceſſor Lanfranc poſſeſs'd without Suit or Controverſie. But as the King grew better in Health, he was more unwilling to reſtore all Lands, but would have reſerv'd ſuch of the Church Lands, as after the Death of Lanfranc he had given to his Courtiers, and expected Anſelm's Conſent to their holding of them by Hereditary Right. But this Arch-Biſhop would by no means conſent, that the Church ſhould be in the leaſt endamag'd in its Lands and Rights; from whence aroſe the firſt Difference between the King and him, about his Dignity, Biſhoprick and Prelatſhip, which remain'd undetermin'd during this King's Life. And now the King being recover'd of his Sickneſs, relaps'd to his former Miſcarriages, and wholly alter'd and demoliſh'd whatever Good he had already done: For he commanded the Priſoners not yet releas'd to be kept more cloſely than before, and thoſe already diſcharg'd to be taken up: And all Things were reduc'd to the ſame or worſe State than before, and brought under the Management of thoſe who rather endeavour'd to ſubvert, than defend Juſtice, and who took more care to get Mony, than to correct Offences. None were ſo rich as Treaſurers and Collectors, none were ſo in favour as unconſcionable Lawyers, and none ſo rewarded as ſcandalous Promoters; ſo that many were oblig'd to quit the Nation, and ſeek their Fortunes in Foreign Countries.

In theſe troubleſom Times, Malcolm King of Scotland came to King William at Gloceſter, as before was appointed, for eſtabliſhing a firm Friendſhip between them; but William refus'd to admit him into his Preſence, unleſs he would do Homage to him in his own Court; which the other refuſing in any Place, but in the Confines of both Kingdoms, according to Cuſtom, a fatal War immediately broke out. Malcolm in a ſhort Time invaded England, and made great Devaſtations as far as Alnewick; but Robert Mowbray Earl of Northumberland, with a powerful Force unexpectedly ſet upon him near that Town, and not only overthrew his Army, but alſo kill'd both him and his Son Edward. The Scotch Hiſtorians ſay he was ſlain by Treachery, and that the virtuous Queen Margaret, hearing of the Death of her Husband and Son, ſunk down with Grief, and could not three Days ſurvive ſo great a Loſs. Tho' Malcolm left a Son behind him nam'd Edgar, yet the Nobility of that Kingdom aſſembling, unanimouſly elected his Brother Donald to be their King, and expell'd Edgar Etheling, with the Engliſh then ſetled in Scotland; who taking with them the Children of Malcolm, found a kind Reception in England. But Donald did not long enjoy his Kingdom; for Duncan, natural Son to the late King, being then in King William's Court as an Hoſtage, deſir'd to obtain his Aſſiſtance to gain his Father's Kingdom; and being furniſh'd with a powerful Army of Engliſh and Normans, he march'd againſt his Uncle Donald, who had newly invaded England. Coming to a Battel, he routed his Forces, and forc'd him to fly into the Weſtern Iſles; upon which he was crown'd King of Scotland. In the King William, having ſetled all Things in the North and Weſt to his Satisfaction, was now diſturb'd by his Brother Robert from the South, who charging him with Non-performance of Articles and Breach of Faith, occaſion'd a new War to break out between them. Upon which William in Mid-Lent paſs'd over into Normandy, where he had an Enterview with his Brother, about a Treaty of Peace, but could by no means come to an Agreement. However a ſecond Meeting was appointed by the Mediation of their common Friends in the Fields of Martius, where thoſe Barons who had formerly ſworn to ſee the Peace obſerv'd on both Sides, charg'd all the Blame upon the King, who yet would neither acknowledge his Fault, nor perform the Agreement; but inſtead of that committed new Acts of Hoſtility, and by the Power of Mony, Promiſes and the Sword, gain'd the Caſtle of Buers and ſeveral others, which he garriſon'd with his own Men. On the other Side the Duke, having obtain'd Aſſiſtance of the King of France, beſieg'd and took the Caſtle of Argenton, with eight hundred Men in it, whom he made Priſoners; and after that beſieg'd the Caſtle of Holme, 'till he forc'd Peverel the Governor, with all his Men to ſurrender at Diſcretion. Upon this great Succeſs, the King immediately ſent into England, and commanded twenty thouſand Men to be rais'd and tranſported to him with all Expedition; which being muſter'd at Haſtings, the King's Treaſurer, by his Order, told the Men, That each, upon the Payment of Ten Shillings, might be diſmiſs'd from this bad Service. By which Artifice the King had a conſiderable Sum of Mony ſent him into Normandy, which he moſt of all wanted; and with which he ſo far prevail'd upon the French King, as to cauſe him to withdraw his Troops; ſo that Duke Robert, who before was proceeding with great Succeſs, was now oblig'd to retire with no leſs Diſadvantage. A new War between the King and his Brother Robert Chron. W. Vitales, &c.

In the mean Time the Welſh made great Ravages and Incurſions in Cheſhire, Shropſhire, and other bordering Counties; inſomuch that King William was conſtrain'd to leave Normandy, and that War unfiniſh'd. And reconciling himſelf to his Brother Henry, he return'd into England, and with a great Army enter'd Wales by Way of Montgomery, which Caſtle he re-edify'd; but the Inhabitants kept ſo cloſe in the Straits of the Mountains, encompaſſed with Woods and Rivers, that the King could no ways moleſt them; ſo that loſing his Labour, together with many of his beſt Soldiers, he return'd back with Diſhonour. In the ſame Year he made a ſecond Expedition into Wales, but with no better Succeſs. A. D. 1095. Reg. 8/9.

A great Conſpiracy.

And about the ſame Time he was diſturb'd by a great Conſpiracy form'd againſt him by Robert de Mowbray Earl of Northumberland, and many other Norman Noblemen; of which the King having Notice, rais'd an Army and march'd againſt them; who underſtanding which Way he was to paſs, laid an Ambuſcade for him in a Wood, which was diſcover'd to him, and the Deſign prevented, by Gilbert de Tonebridge one of the chief Conſpirators. After which his Troops march'd on to Bambrough Caſtle which they beſieg'd, 'till at length Robert fell into their Hands, who was kept a Priſoner almoſt thirty Years. Roger Lacy had his Lands taken from him, and given to his Brother Hugh, a faithful Adherent of the King's; Hugh Earl of Cheſter was privately reprimanded, and gave three thouſand Pounds to be reſtor'd to Favour; as likewiſe the King receiv'd of many others great Sums of Mony, as Compoſitions for their Crimes. William Earl of Eu, being fully convicted, loſt both his Eyes and Genetals, but many others, by the Advice of the Council, the King ſpar'd out of Policy.

In

In the ſame Year the King was both diſturb'd and perplex'd by the Behaviour of Arch-Biſhop Anſelm, whoſe Perſon he hated, and whoſe Power he dreaded. For this Prelate would neither comply with his covetous nor ambitious Deſigns, but ſtrenuouſly oppos'd him in all Things that might endamage the Power and Privileges of the Church; and when the Popedom was in Conteſt between Urban and Clement, he acknowledg'd the former, contrary to the King's Inclinations, and to a fix'd Ordinance in his Father's Reign, That no Subject in England ſhould acknowledge any Pope without the King's Allowance. This occaſion'd Matters of great Conteſt in the Nation, and many State Intreagues betwen the King and the Court of Rome, in which the latter by pure Management prevail'd. But afterwards the King proceeding to violent Methods, the Arch-Biſhop became ſo uneaſie, that he deſir'd leave to repair to Rome, which at firſt was abſolutely deny'd him, tho' at length with Difficulty obtain'd; but with this fatal Conſequence, that all the Revenues of the Archbiſhoprick were ſeiz'd to the King's own Uſe. This and other Grievances being repreſented to Pope Urban, whom the King had now acknowledg'd, he openly in a Synod decreed that King William ſhould be Excommunicated; which Sentence was immediately revok'd by the Interceſſion of Anſelm himſelf. But the Pope afterwards finding King William obſtinate, and ſtill refuſing to reſtore the Arch-Biſhop, he became more reſolute in his Intentions, and gave the King notice that he would ſpare him no longer than the next Council Day. Notwithſtanding which, the King by ſecret Methods, Gifts and Promiſes, obtain'd ſo much Favour from the Pope, that Sentence never ſolemnly paſs'd againſt him: So that Anſelm having no Hopes of his Reſtoration, by the Conſent of the Pope retir'd to Lions, where he continu'd 'till after King William's Death.

But Pope Urban in theſe Times had greater Concerns to manage than the Excommunication of a ſingle Prince, and now proceeded to vaſt and unheard of Deſigns. Having aſſembled a Council at Clermont in France, chiefly by the Remonſtrances of a famous Hermit call'd Peter, who in the Holy-Land had been Witneſs of the Cruelties exercis'd by the Turks upon the Chriſtians, he by a zealous Harangue animated the Prelates then preſent to excite the Faithful to take up Arms for the Recovery of God's Country out of the Hands of thoſe barbarous Infidels. His Exhortations were ſo warm and moving, that they made ſtrong Impreſſions on all their Minds, and this uncommon Fervor in a ſhort Time ſo ſpread over all Europe, that incredible Numbers of all Qualities, and all Ages and Sexes, liſted themſelves in this Sacred Militia, bearing the Marks of red Croſſes upon their Garments, with this Motto, It is the Will of God. Theſe Cruſado's, and long Voyages, the Heat of which laſted for above two hundred Years, occaſion'd an infinite Expence of Blood and Treaſure, and prov'd the weakning of many Nations, the Ruin of the great Lords and Multitudes of the People, and the Eſtabliſhment and Encreaſe of the Power of the Popes. The chief of theſe extraordinary Adventurers were the famous Godfrey Duke of Bouillon and Lorrain, Hugh Brother to the King of France, Raymond Count of St. Giles, Robert Earl of Flanders, Baldwin of Hainault, and above two hundred other Lords and Princes. Among theſe was alſo Robert Duke of Normandy, who being fired with the Proſpect of this Expedition, ſent over Ambaſſadors to his Brother King William, deſiring that a firm Peace might be eſtabliſh'd between them, and that he would immediately lend him ten thouſand Marks of Silver, and take the Dutchy of Normandy for his Security for three Years, 'till the Mony ſhould be repaid. The King was highly pleas'd with this Propoſal, and finding the Nation already exhauſted by grievous Taxes and Impoſitions, he ſent to all the great Men of the Nation to furniſh him with this Sum: Inſomuch that the Biſhops, Abbots and Abbeſſes broke in pieces the very Gold and Silver Plate and Ornaments of their Churches, and the Earls, Barons and Sheriffs oppreſs'd their Knights and Tenants to raiſe the Mony. By this Means the King took Poſſeſſion

Sax. An. Hunting. &c. For King William was now more buſily employ'd againſt the Welſh, to oppoſe whom he march'd a third Time with a powerful Army; and tho' he paſs'd quite through the Country by the Guidance of ſome Deſerters, who ſhew'd him the ſecret Paſſes, and ſtay'd there from Midſummer to the End of July, yet the People retiring into their uſual Receſſes, he loſt more of his Men by Hunger and ill Diet, than he could kill or take of the Enemy. So that finding but little Proſpect of Glory or Profit, he return'd back without performing any Thing beſides the building of certain Caſtles in the Marches between England and Wales. About Michaelmaſs he ſent Edgar Etheling with a great Army into Scotland, who in a ſhort Time by his Valour expell'd Donald, who had again poſſeſs'd himſelf of the Throne, and plac'd his Nephew Edgar in his Room, who was the right Heir to the Crown, and accordingly did Homage to the King of England. All this Year the Nation ſuffer'd much by reaſon of the Scarcity of Proviſions, the Badneſs of the Seaſon, and the grievous Taxes for the rebuilding of London Bridge, which had lately been carry'd away by a ſtrange Inundation, for the Building of the new Walls about the Tower, and the noble Hall at Weſtminſter; which as they were Works of great Uſe, as well as Magnificence, requir'd immenſe Sums to finiſh them.

Sax. An. Chron. W. In part of this and the following Year King William continu'd in Normandy, where he reduc'd the City of Mans and a great Part of that Province to his Obedience. In the mean Time the Earls of Shrewsbury and Cheſter, with many of the Nobility, and a conſiderable Army, made a new Expedition into Wales, being incourag'd to it by ſome Lords of that Country. Their Forces and Correſpondence were ſo great, that the two Princes Griffyth and Cadogan, their main Oppoſers, took the Mountains for their Defence; ſo that the Earls found an eaſie Paſſage to the Coaſts over againſt the Iſle of Angleſey; where they built the Caſtle of Aberlhiennawc. After which Owen, chief Counſellor to the Princes, and their Father-in-Law, diſcover'd his Treaſon by going over with all his Forces to the Earls, with which he march'd into the Iſle of Angleſey, where the Earls joining with him, plunder'd the Iſle, and us'd intolerable Cruelties to the poor Inhabitants. Griffyth and Cadogan fled into Ireland for Safety; but Magnus Son to the King of Norway, who had lately conquer'd the Orchades and the Iſle of Man, coming thither with a few Ships, gave them no little Diſturbance, and ſhot the Earl of Shrewsbury dead with an Arrow, which was look'd upon as a juſt Reward for his Cruelties in this Iſle. At length Magnus retired, and the Earl of Cheſter with the Engliſh being ſenſible they could not keep the Iſland, left the Command of it to Owen, the Traitor who had invited them thither.

The King kept his Chriſtmaſs in Normandy, and returning into England a little before Whitſontide, kept that Feaſt in the new Hall at Weſtminſter, juſt finiſh'd; which when he firſt ſaw, and heard others admire it for its Grandeur, as being two hundred and ſeventy Foot long and ſeventy four in Breadth, he declar'd it ſcarce worthy the Name of a Bed-Chamber, in reſpect of what he intended to build. From thence he went down to hunt in the New Foreſt, where in the midſt of his Sport, a Meſſenger from Normandy inform'd him that the City of Mans was ſurpriz'd by Count Elias, and that the Caſtle without ſpeedy Succour was like to be ſurrender'd. and Succeſs.

In this Year the Chriſtians, after many admirable Toils and Acts of Valour, took the City of Jeruſalem by Storm, and put near forty thouſand Saracens to the Sword. After which they agreed to elect Robert Duke of Normandy to be King of that City and all Paleſtine; but he refuſing it out of a Proſpect of the Crown of England, it is obſerv'd by our Hiſtorians, that he never after proſper'd in any Thing he undertook; and upon his Denial, they elected the renowned Godfrey of Bouillon, who had done continual Wonders both by his Head and Arm. In the mean Time, as Vitales informs us, King William was forming vaſt Deſigns: For William Earl of Poictou, propoſing to make War in the Holy-Land; now offer'd the King to mortgage to him his Dutchy of Aquitain, with his other Territories for a large Sum of Mony which he wanted for that Expedition. The Propoſal being readily embrac'd by the King, he commanded a mighty Fleet to be prepared, and a great Army to accompany him out of England, that he might hinder his Brother Robert's Return into Normandy, take Poſſeſſion of Aquitain, and extend the Bounds of his Empire as far as the River Garonne. In order to which, his Royal Navy which was to carry over vaſt Sums of Gold and Silver, was now almoſt ready to ſet Sail; but 'till then the King to divert himſelf went in the Beginning of Auguſt to hunt in the New Foreſt, where Death put an end to all his aſpiring Projects; of which we have theſe Circumſtances. A Monk the Night before dream'd that he ſaw a Crucifix ſpurn the King to the Ground, and caus'd Fire and Smoke to come out of his Mouth; which being related to him in the Morning, he made a Jeſt of it, ſaying, The Monk wants Mony for his Dream; go give him a hundred Shillings, but bid him dream better hereafter. The King would not be diſſuaded from making Trial of it, but fortifying himſelf with Wine, he went to hunt in the Foreſt with his Brother Henry, and a few Followers; among whom was Walter Tyrrell, a French Knight, who was an expert Huntſman, and an excellent Archer. In the latter End of the Day the King ſhot at a Stag, and gave him a ſlight Wound; and while he was following him, with his Hand before his Eyes to defend them from the Sun, Walter ſhot in ſuch a Manner, that the Arrow by glancing hit the King full upon the Breaſt, who with one Groan fell to the Ground, and ſoon after dy'd without uttering a Word. Upon the Sight of this Walter immediately took Horſe and fled, without any to purſue him; for every Man's Thoughts were taken up with greater Matters. His Body was ſoon after thrown into a poor Collier's Cart, and through a Lane, where the Cart is ſaid to have fallen in pieces, was convey'd to the Biſhop's Palace at Wincheſter, where his Corps was the next Day bury'd in the Church under the Tower, in the Preſence of many Noblemen, but no real Mourners. Thus fell King William the Second, commonly call'd Rufus, in the forty fourth Year of his Age, after an active and vigorous Reign of twelve Years, ten Months, and twenty two Days; his Death happening on the ſecond Day of Auguſt.

The King's Deſigns.

It

Malmsb. &c. It is obſervable that this Prince was the Third of this Race, who in a few Years met with their Deaths in this Foreſt; as if Heav'n deſign'd to revenge upon the Children their Father's Sins, in deſtroying ſo many Churches and Villages to make them a Receptacle for wild Beaſts. But however it was, this Prince met with his Deſerts for his imitating and exceeding his Father in thoſe Actions which were moſt covetous, cruel and tyrannical; ſo that he may juſtly be rank'd among the worſt Kings that England ever had. He wanted the Piety, Chaſtity, Humanity and Wiſdom of his Father; yet ſeveral Qualities he poſſeſs'd were both valuable and admirable, as his Courage, Bravery, and Magnificence, in which he was ſo vigorous and daring, that he was never dejected in the greateſt Extremity, and very rarely fail'd of Succeſs. He was liberal to his Friends, and eſpecially to Soldiers, magnificent in his Retinue and Buildings, and expenſive in his Cloaths; as appears from the common Story of Breeches or Hoſe which he refus'd to wear becauſe they coſt but three Shillings, ordering his Chamberlain to bring thoſe of a Mark Price, who ſufficiently pleas'd him by bringing the ſame again, after the King's Price was ſet upon them. He was a Prince of little or no Faith, haughty, ſevere, covetous and prophane upon all Occaſions. When fifty Engliſh Gentlemen, who had been accus'd of hunting and killing Deer, had by the Trial of Fire-Ordeal eſcap'd Condemnation, he paſſionately declar'd, That he could not believe that God was a juſt Judge in ſuffering it. Notwithſtanding his ſevere and covetous Temper, there are Actions that ſhew he had ſometimes a ſenſe of Generoſity, Juſtice and Good Nature, particularly when a great Abby became vacant, and two rich and ambitious Monks came to purchaſe it of him, according to his Simonaical Methods, he obſerv'd a third Monk at a Diſtance, and asking him What he would give, and receiving Anſwer, That he would give nothing, and that it was againſt his Conſcience, he immediately ſwore his uſual Oath, That he alone deſerv'd it, and ſhould have it for nothing. This King's Revenues were in all Probability the ſame with his Father's, yet his Expences being greater, he rais'd more unreaſonable Taxes; and to augment his Revenues, he frequently kept ſeveral Biſhopricks and Abbies vacant, and took the Profits to himſelf; and at the Time of his Death he had in his Hands the Archbiſhoprick of Canterbury, the Biſhopricks of Wincheſter and Salisbury, and twelve rich Abbies. Yet he gave the new Church of St. Saviour's in Southwark to the Monks call'd Decharitate; and alſo founded an Hoſpital in York to the Honour of St. Peter.

His Character.

Moſt Writers obſerve that ſeveral Diſaſters fell out in this Reign, as in the ſecond Year a dreadful Earthquake happen'd; in the fourth a violent Lightning had ſtrange Effects upon the Abby of Winſcombe. Not long after a vaſt Tempeſt blew down ſix hundred Houſes in London, and carry'd away the Rooff of Bow Church after an unheard of manner. In the ninth Year a blazing Star appear'd with two Buſhes, and other Stars ſeem'd to ſhoot Darts at each other, to the Amazement of all Spectators. In the eleventh, a Well of Blood for fifteen Days together roſe out of the Ground at Finchamſted near Abington in Barkſhire. In the laſt of his Reign, the Sea breaking over its Banks, drown'd an innumerable Multitude of People in many Counties, and in Kent over-ran the Lands which formerly belong'd to the famous Earl Godwin, which are ſtill call'd Godwin's Sands, lying very dangerous for Sailors. Malmesbury and others alſo obſerve, That notwithſtanding the warlike Genius of this Age, there began to be a great Corruption of Manners among the young Noblemen, Gentlemen and Clergy in thoſe Times, who practis'd all the Luxury of Eating and Drinking, and ſhow'd ſo much Effeminacy in their Habits and Carriage, that they appear'd Men in nothing ſo much as their Attempts upon the Chaſtity of Women.

SECT. III.

The Reign of King HENRY the First.

Containing 35 Years, 3 Months, and 1 Day.

A. D. 1100. Reg. 1.

I. UPON the ſudden Death of King William, his younger Brother Henry, who from his Learning then uncommon to Princes had the Sirname of Beau-Clerk, found it no great Difficulty to aſcend the Throne of England, notwithſtanding the fair Pretenſions of his eldeſt Brother Robert. He was now about forty two Years of Age, of great and promiſing Abilities; and wanted not ſeveral Steps by which he might mount this high Station: Particularly, The general Diſlike of King William's ſevere curbing of the Natives; The great Diſtance and Careleſsneſs of his Brother Robert; His own Engliſh Birth, having both a King and a Queen to his Parents; His promiſing to abrogate all bad and rigorous Laws impos'd by his Father and Brother, the reſtoring the Clergy from Exile to their Livings; Remiſſion of all unjuſt Taxes, and due Puniſhments to the chief Promoters of them, upon which Account to ſatisfie the People he committed Ralph Biſhop of Durham, that exorbitant Oppreſſor, to the Tower. Then taking a ſolemn Oath, 'To keep all good and 'juſt Laws towards his People, and to remove all Oppreſſions and unjuſt Pra- 'ctices, both in Eccleſiaſtical and Secular Affairs, which had happen'd during 'his Brother's Reign, he was publickly crown'd by Maurice Biſhop of London, upon Sunday the fifth Day of Auguſt. His firſt Buſineſs was to put in execution what he had promis'd, honourably and wiſely beginning with the Regulation of his own Court, from whence he caſhier'd many nice and effeminate Perſons, making a Decree againſt his Courtiers Rapines and Adulteries, puniſhing the former with Death, and the latter with the Loſs of Eyes and other criminal Parts. Then he reſtor'd to the Engliſh the Uſe of thoſe Lights which his Father had prohibited, and confirm'd many Privileges to the Nation by a publick Charter under his broad Seal, which Matth. Paris has preſerv'd in his Hiſtory. The Subſtance of it is, 'Firſt, He confirms the Liberty of the Church 'from all Oppreſſions, or Reſervation of any of its Revenues upon Vacancies. 'Next, That the Heirs of the Nobility ſhould inherit their Father's Lands 'without Redemption from him, which Favour they were to afford to their 'Tenants. That the Gentry might have liberty to marry their Daughters and 'Kinſwomen, without the King's Licence, to any but his Enemies. That 'Widows ſhould have their Dowers, and not be compell'd to marry againſt their 'Will. That Mothers or neareſt Relations ſhould be Guardians to Minors. 'Next he appoints the Puniſhment of Coiners to be with Loſs of Limbs, and 'ordains a Meaſure the Length of his Arm to be the Standard of Commerce 'among his People. Laſtly he forgave all Debts due to the Crown, and all 'Murthers committed before his Coronation, with ſome other like Indulgences. 'But to the greateſt Satisfaction of the People, he confirm'd the Laws of King 'Edward. To this Charter all the chief Men of the Nation were Witneſſes; and by the King's Command Copies were tranſmitted to every County, and order'd to be kept in particular Monaſteries. Yet notwithſtanding this Care, ſcarce any of them were to be found in the Reign of King John, when the Conteſt about this Charter commenc'd between that King and the Barons.

His Charter of Liberties.

Shortly after the Coronation, the King diſpatch'd a Meſſenger to Arch-Biſhop Anſelm, then at Lyons, inviting him to return into England with all Speed, and in his Letters added his Prayers and Wiſhes for him, promiſing to ſubject himſelf and his Kingdom to his Council and Direction; and his Return prov'd highly to the Satisfaction of the Nation. To add to which, the King reſolv'd to to leave off his Miſtreſſes, and became a Suter to Edgar King of Scotland for his excellent Siſter Matilda, who was Daughter to Queen Margaret the Siſter of Edgar Etheling; by which means his Iſſue might be both of the Blood of the Engliſh Nation, and the Engliſh Kings. But in this he met with one great Obſtruction, which was her Education from her Infancy in a Monaſtery in Wilton among Nuns; and being veil'd like them, ſhe was thought by her Parents to have been dedicated to the Service of God. This was left to the ſole Determination of Arch-Biſhop Anſelm, but he declin'd that Office, without the Approbation of a Council; and accordingly he ſummon'd the Biſhops, Abbots, the Clergy and certain Noblemen to Lambeth, where ſhe acknowledg'd She had been veil'd, but againſt her Will, and took that Habit upon her to preſerve her Chaſtity from the Luſts of the Normans, according to the Example of many Matrons and Virgins, ſince King William ſubdu'd the Nation. Upon which Allegations and Proofs, by the Judgment of the whole Council ſhe had lawful Liberty of her Perſon allow'd her, and not long after, upon the Feaſt of St. Michael, the Marriage was ſolemniz'd between King Henry and this Lady, to the general Satisfaction of all Men.

A. D. 1101. Reg. 1/2.

In the mean Time Duke Robert, who had gain'd great Reputation in the Holy Land, and was newly return'd into his own Country, began to caſt an envious Eye upon his Brother Henry, and reſolv'd to attempt that Crown which he concluded to be his own Right. And being excited by Ralph Biſhop of Durham, who had eſcap'd out of Priſon into Normandy, and ſeveral others, who began to fear the vigorous and reſolute Temper of King Henry, he made all neceſſary Preparations for ſo great an Enterprize. The Report of this intended Invaſion, which diſturb'd the whole Nation, had various Effects upon Mens Minds, and divided the Nobility and great Men into Parties, ſo that the King was driven to great Uncertainties. As he continually ſuſpected their Conſtancy and Fidelity, ſo they no leſs dreaded his Authority and Power, being better ſatisfy'd with the more unactive Diſpoſition of his Brother Robert. Upon mature Deliberation it was reſolv'd that Security ſhould be given on both Sides, and Arch-Biſhop Anſelm was made Mediator between the King and them, who giving them his Hand on the King's Behalf, ſolemnly promis'd, That he would govern the whole Kingdom as long as he liv'd, by pious and juſt Laws, which at preſent gave them full Satisfaction. Yet when Duke Robert had put to Sea, many of the Engliſh Nation revolted, as alſo a conſiderable Part of the Fleet, ſo that he ſoon found a ſafe Landing at Portſmouth, and he did not a little rejoice at this fortunate Beginning, threatning his Brother with Revenge for all Wrongs, and condemning the Nobility for ſuffering him to be thus injur'd, while he for the common Good of Chriſtendom was imploy'd in the Holy War. On the other Side Henry us'd all Methods to defeat his Deſigns, and being ſenſible of the great Influence of the Arch-Biſhop he made new Promiſes of Obedience to him and the Apoſtolick See. Upon which Anſelm pathetically repreſented to the great Men and the whole Army the Scandal and Impiety of Mens violating their Faith once given to their Prince; which had ſuch a happy Effect upon them that they reſolv'd rather to part with their Lives than their Loyalty: And the Succeſs and Safety of King Henry was chiefly owing to the Fidelity and Induſtry of this Arch-Biſhop. For Robert being hereby defeated in the Confidence he repos'd in the Nobility, he by the Mediation of the chief Men of both Sides, concluded a Peace with his Brother, and made a fair Agreement. The Subſtance of which was, 'That in Conſideration Henry was born after his 'Father's Acquiſition of England, and was now unanimouſly crown'd King, he 'ſhould enjoy the ſame during Life, paying to Robert three thouſand Marks 'annually by way of Fealty, and reſtoring whatever he held in Normandy; 'and the Surviver ſhould be Heir to the other, if he dy'd without a Son: That 'all offending Perſons ſhould have their Honours and Lands reſtor'd to them. For the Confirmation and Performance of which, twelve chief Noblemen of either either Side took a ſolemn Oath, and the Armies were immediately disbanded; and Duke Robert was nobly entertain'd for the Space of ſix Months in the Court of his Brother Henry.

A. D. 1102. Reg. 2/3.

This Agreement prov'd a great Strengthning to the Deſigns of King Henry, but not long after a Flame broke out, which conſum'd the Parties that rais'd it, and brought the King to a more compleat Authority. Robert de Beleſme, Earl of Shrewsbury, Son to Roger Montgomery, an intrepid Youth, preſuming upon the Power of his Friends and Fortunes, fortify'd the Caſtles of Shrewsbury, Bridgeworth, Tickhill and Arundel, and joining with the diſaffected Welſh, made a formidable Inſurrection. Upon which the King with great Vigour and Reſolution march'd into thoſe Parts; againſt Arundel Caſtle he rais'd another of Wood, and took it; beſieg'd Bridgeworth, which immediately yielded, and Shrewsbury ſoon ſent him their Keys and Pledges of their Obedience. So that in a ſhort Time Beleſme, with the two Earls his Brothers, Roger and Arnulph, were conſtrain'd to leave England and their Eſtates, and retire into Normandy; where they rais'd vaſt Diſturbances for three Years together. Many Towns and Churches were burnt by their Means; and almoſt all Normandy ſtood up againſt this violent Earl of Shrewsbury; but they wanted a ſufficient Commander to quell the Power of ſo furious a Ravager. He was a Man of Parts and Subtlety, had a conſiderable Strength about him, and ſupported himſelf by his great Wealth, which he had treaſured up in thirty four ſtrong Caſtles, built for rebellious Deſigns.

Vitales. &c.

An Inſurrection in England.

It is quell'd.

Theſe Men were not more active and buſie abroad, than Arch-Biſhop Anſelm was at home, who being a Man of a ſtiff Reſolution, in a Synod at Weſtminſter, incurr'd the Hatred both of the King and the Clergy. For firſt he proceeded to excommunicate all marry'd Prieſts, when half the Clergy of the Nation were either marry'd, or the Sons of marry'd Prieſts; and next he inhibited all Lay-Men from hearing of their Maſſes. Upon which Huntington makes this Reflection, 'That however it might ſeem laudable to ſome, to others it appear'd 'dangerous; leſt while they affected a Purity above their Strength, they might 'fall into an Impurity of a greater Malignity. After this Succeſs, the Arch-Biſhop proceeded to cenſure and condemn thoſe Prelates and Eccleſiaſticks who had accepted their Inveſtitures from the King, which uſually was done by receiving a Paſtoral Staff and a Ring, an ancient Rite, teſtifying their Donation was from their Soveraign: For which free Proceedings, and for refuſing to conſecrate certain Biſhops advanc'd by the King, a great Conteſt aroſe between them; and the Arch-Biſhop thinking himſelf injur'd by the preſent growing Power, appeal'd to Pope Paſchall, and ſhortly after went in Perſon to Rome. The King alſo ſent his Ambaſſadors to the ſame Place, Herbert Biſhop of Norwich, with Robert Biſhop of Lichfield, both of his Privy-Council, and William Warelwaſt his Procurator, a Clergy Man of great Courage and Elocution; who in debating his Soveraign's Cauſe before the Pope and Cardinals, with a threatning Countenance declar'd, That the King his Maſter would ſooner part from his Kingdom, than loſe the Right of Inveſtiture of Churches. To whom the Pope ſharply reply'd, If that be his Reſolution, while Paſchall lives, he ſhall never enjoy them without Puniſhment, tho' it were to ſave his Head. Yet he granted the King ſome of his Father's Uſages, wholly prohibiting the Inveſtiture of Churches. This Conteſt aroſe ſo high, that for a while Anſelm, as in the laſt Reign, loſt his Archbiſhoprick, and the King was in great Danger of Excommunication. But after three Years, Matters were brought to an Accommodation; and upon the Pope's allowing that the Clergy might do Homage to the King, which had been before deny'd, the King was perſuaded to part with his Right of Inveſtitures; and all Vacancies being fill'd, both Parties reſted ſatisfy'd.

Great Conteſts between the King and the Arch-Biſhop..

At length they are accommodated.

During theſe Controverſies, King Henry was more ſucceſsful in relation to his Brother Robert; who coming into England, and being ſplendidly entertain'd, tain'd, out of Generosity, or by the Persuasions of Queen Matilda, remitted the Pension of three thousand Marks, due to him by Articles; tho' he was far less able to forbear, than the King to pay such a Sum. But when his Wants made him sensible of his Error, he openly exclaim'd against King Henry, as tho' he had impos'd upon his Generosity; and giving Ear and Credit to such as sought their Disunion, he gave his Brother all Occasions for a Rupture, who wanted no great Incitement to any Thing of that Nature. Besides this present Displeasure, Duke Robert had profusely wasted the Inheritance his Father had left him, which was the Dukedom of Normandy, having now scarce any Place left in his Dominions, but the City of Roven, with which also he would have parted, had not the Citizens deny'd their Consents. But the greatest Disobligation was the Duke's ready Receiving all the Traiterous Subjects of his Brother; for besides Robert Belesme and others, now William Earl of Mortaign in Normandy and of Cornwall in England, being deny'd the Earldom of Kent, which he claim'd as Heir to his Uncle Odo, in a great Discontent retir'd into Normandy, where besides his vigorous Assaults of the King's Castles and Soldiers, he much endanger'd the Possessions of Richard Earl of Chester, then a Child and the King's Ward. So that the Flames of War rais'd by these Seditions, seem to have been blown from England into Normandy, and to have set fire to the Territories of the English in that Country. Nor is it easie to declare, says Hoveden, what Miseries in the mean Time the Nation felt at home by the severe Taxes then laid upon it.

A. D. 1104. Reg. 4/5.

A second Breach between the King and Duke Robert.

Vitalis. Malmsb. Normandy was now in a great Confusion, and suffer'd extreamly from the Carelessness and Profuseness of Robert and his Followers; so that Malmesbury says, That as well for his Brother's Reputation, as for the Sufferings of Normandy, Henry could no longer endure that wicked Men should maintain their own Luxury with the Estates of the Poor, therefore he first admonish'd his Brother by gentle Words, To act like a Prince, and not like a Monk, nor to encourage Traitors to their Soveraign. But this not having its Effect, the King proceeded to open Force, and by large Distributions of Mony carry'd out of England, he won many of the Norman Nobility to revolt from their Lord, took the Town and Castle of Caen by Composition, and burnt Bayeux, with the beautiful Church of St Mary's, whereupon the Priories of Normandy yielded themselves to his Protection; by whose Example the Britains and those of Anjou did the like; so that their Castles and Forts were fill'd with King Henry's Garrisons, without any great Resistance from Duke Robert. Which done, the King return'd in a triumphant Manner into England, in the End of Autumn, in order to renew the War the next Campaign, being not able to finish his Conquests as yet, for want of Mony, which he went over to raise.

A. D. 1105. Reg. 5/6.

The King makes open War with him.

M. Paris. Vitalis. &c. Duke Robert now finding himself in a declining Condition, resolv'd to become a Mediator himself; and coming over into England in Person, after a more humble Manner than was agreeable to his Birth or Nature, he desir'd a Peace: Which being refus'd him, he return'd more exasperated than ever, threatning to be reveng'd of all Injuries. Matth. Paris tells us that the King upon this Occasion felt some Remorse of Conscience for his unkind Usage to his Brother, and usurping of his Kingdom, and also apprehended some Rebellion of his Subjects. But to secure himself in the Affections of all Men, he summon'd a grand Council or Parliament to London, where in a solemn Speech he protested against Duke Robert his Brother, Who for his insolent refusing the Kingdom of Jerusalem, was now justly forsaken of God; setting forth his uneasie and arrogant Temper, and Contempt of the English Nation, as also his own humble and peaceable Disposition, and continu'd Resolution to maintain all their Liberties and Privileges, and particularly the Sacred Laws of King Edward; assuring them That if he had but the Hearts and Affections of his English Subjects, he fear'd not the utmost Power of his Brother, and all his Normans. With these specious Promises he so gain'd upon their Inclinations, ons, that they declar'd, They would live and die with him againſt any Enemy whatſoever.

The King having obtain'd this Point, about the End of July paſs'd over into Normandy, with a powerful Army; and the principal Nobility of the Kingdom; and piercing into the Country he built a Fort near the Town of Tinchebray, with an Intention to ſtreighten it, and force it to ſurrender. But the Earl of Mortaign with ſome Forces in a ſhort Time reliev'd it, at which the King highly incens'd laid Siege to the Town; which oblig'd that Earl to beg of Duke Robert to come down to his Aſſiſtance, to which he readily yielded, and march'd with ſeveral Noblemen, and all the Forces he could poſſibly gather together. Tho' the King was more powerful in Horſe, yet the Duke had a greater Number of Foot, ſo that both Parties were willing to come to a general Battel, which was fought before this Town, with great Obſtinacy for a while, 'till at length the King's Horſe prevail'd, and the Duke's Army was totally routed, with no great Loſs to the Victors. In this Battel the King took the Duke Priſoner, the Earl of Mortaign, William Criſpin, William Ferrars, Robert Stuteville the Elder, with many other Norman Barons, as alſo four hundred Knights or Horſemen, and ten thouſand Foot; ſo that upon this great Victory all Normandy ſubmitted to the King, which verify'd his Father William's Prediction, That he ſhould exceed both his Brothers in Riches and Greatneſs. This memorable Battel was fought on Michaelmaſs Eve, about forty Years after that at Haſtings; and as the Norman Duke then ſubdu'd an Engliſh King, and gain'd his Kingdom, ſo now an Engliſh King, by the Aſſiſtance of his Engliſh Subjects, conquer'd Normandy, which for many Years after was held by the Kings of England. In this Battel Edgar Etheling was alſo taken Priſoner, who was immediately ſet at Liberty by the King; and having been often made the Sport and Paſtime of Fortune, he paſs'd the reſt of his Life in Peace and Retirement. As for Duke Robert and the Earl of Mortaign, the King ſent them Priſoners into England, the former to Cardiff Caſtle in Wales, and the latter to the Tower of London. The Duke continu'd a Priſoner for twenty ſix Years, all the reſt of his Life; but as for the Story of the King's ordering his Eyes to be put out, the Silence of the beſt Authors, and the Improbability of ſeveral Circumſtances in it, renders it of too little Credit to be rely'd on.

A. D. 1107. Reg. 7/8.

II. King Henry having eſtabliſh'd his Power, and finiſh'd all Foreign Conteſts, turn'd his Thoughts to the Regulation of Domeſtick Inconveniencies: And by the Advice of Arch-Biſhop Anſelm, and the Noblemen of his Kingdom, he redreſs'd ſeveral evil Practices, and began with his own Court. It was uſual in his Brother's Reign, for the Multitude which follow'd the Court to commit great Diſorders and Ravages without Control, and to behave themſelves rudely towards the Wives and Daughters of the Country People, ſo that they fled from their Habitations upon the Approach of the Court. For the Remedy of which, the King ordain'd by a publick Edict, That whoever was found guilty of theſe and the like Practices, ſhould loſe his Eyes, his Hands, Feet or other Members; which being executed upon ſome, deterr'd others from ſuch Offences. He alſo took notice of the great Miſchiefs ariſing from falſe and corrupt Mony, and decreed, That every falſe Coiner ſhould ſuffer Caſtration or the Loſs of his Eyes. And now being free from all Fear of Rivals, King Henry growing diſdainful, ſays M. Paris, refus'd to perform what he had ſo often promis'd to his Nobility, uſing haughty Words and Threats; for God had beſtow'd upon him three Bleſſings, Wiſdom, Victory and Riches, above any of his Predeceſſors: Yet, adds he, he ſhew'd himſelf unthankful to God; and, as others ſay, too regardleſs of his Clergy, in ſuffering Anſelm, newly reconcil'd to him, to tyrannize over them, and in a Synod to lay heavy Puniſhments upon the marry'd Prieſts, making no Difference between Matrimony and Fornication, and putting many from their Benefices, becauſe they refus'd to put put away their lawful Wives; from whence great Conteſts were rais'd, and grievous Sins committed both againſt God and Nature. In this Synod a Debate aroſe concerning the Largeneſs of the Dioceſe of Lincoln, and it was unanimouſly agreed to make another Biſhoprick out of it, and to fix the See at Ely. But tho' Anſelm wrot to the Pope concerning it, the Deſign was not finiſh'd in his Life-Time; yet not long after it was compleated, and Henry Biſhop of Bangor was made the firſt Biſhop of that Place.

Vitalis. Hunting. Eadmer. In the mean Time, Philip King of France dying, was ſucceeded by Lewis his Son, who ſoon ſhew'd himſelf no Friend to King Henry; for which Reaſon the King ſail'd into Normandy, where he made what Preparations were convenient againſt a ſuſpected Man. Here upon ſome freſh Jealouſie he commanded his Nephew William, Son to his Brother Robert, to be taken into Cuſtody; but the young Prince by means of his Tutor Elias made his Eſcape, and was carry'd to the Court of France, and to divers other Princes, who were ſolicited for Aid and Aſſiſtance in his Behalf, but all in vain; for tho' many of the Normans favour'd him, as a handſom Perſon and of good natural Parts, and were earneſt for his Advancement, yet neither Prince nor Subject dare preſume at that Time to make War againſt the Power of King Henry. The King having paſs'd his Winter in Normandy, return'd into England a little before Whitſontide, and held his Court with extraordinary Splendor at Weſtminſter; where the Ambaſſadors of the Emperor Henry the Fourth waited on him with a noble and magnificent Retinue, to deſire his Daughter Matilda in Marriage. The King conſented to the Propoſal, and the Articles were ſoon ſign'd; but the Princeſs her ſelf being very young, continu'd in England 'till the Year following, when ſhe was ſent over into Germany with the higheſt Pomp, and a vaſt Portion of ready Mony; for which three Shillings were laid upon every Hide of Land in England, which according to Dr. Brady's Computation amounted to 824850 Pounds of our preſent Mony. Before the Marriage was celebrated Arch-Biſhop Anſelm dy'd; a Prelate of great Learning and Strictneſs of Life, and ſo inviolable a Friend to Rome, that that See in Gratitude Canoniz'd him for a Saint. King Henry took the Archbiſhoprick and all its Appendages into his own Hands, and according to the evil Example of his Brother William, kept it vacant five Years. Upon his Death the Clergy had hopes of enjoying the Liberty of Matrimonial Society, but the King took Care to put that Eccleſiaſtical Ordinance in Execution; upon which, out of Fear, and in the Sight of Men, they behav'd themſelves accordingly; 'but, ſays Eadmer, if in ſe-'cret they acted otherwiſe, the Charge muſt fall on their own Heads; for, adds he, 'if God will judge Fornicators and Adulterers, certainly the Abuſers 'of their own Coſens, not to ſay their own Siſters and Daughters, ſhall never 'eſcape his Vengeance.

Hunting. Malmſb. Flores.

The King's Peace, which ſeem'd ſecure by his new Alliance with the Emperor, and his great Glory, began now to be envy'd, and his Brother's Misfortunes to be highly pity'd, both by ſome Engliſh as well as Normans. For Fulk Earl of Anjou both threaten'd Revenge, and by corrupting the Inhabitants, won the City of Conſtance from the King's Obedience. To ſtop whoſe Career Henry paſs'd over into Normandy, where he us'd great Severities, and put to Death Elias Earl of Maine, who held that Country againſt him; which ſo diſoblig'd Godfrey Earl of Gaunt, that he afterwards enter'd into that Earldom, and marrying the Daughter of Elias, kept that Country againſt all the Power of King Henry. But in the mean Time the King was imploy'd in a politick Project at home, in relation to many poor Flemmings, who came over into England both in his Father's and his own Reign, being forc'd hither by vaſt Inundations of the Sea in Flanders. By their coming in ſuch numerous Swarms, they became a Burthen to the Nation, upon which the King at firſt planted them in the waſte Parts of Northumberland; but finding they might be more ſerviceable for the reſtraining of the Welſh, whom he had lately ſubdu'd, he tranſplanted them with their Families into Wales, giving them all the Country of Rhos, lying about Pembroke and Haverford-Weſt, which before had been conquer'd from the Welſh Princes. The Deſcendents of theſe Flemmings have continu'd to this Day, being quite different from the native Britains or Welſhmen, both in Language and Manners; and being an induſtrious ſtout People, afterwards prov'd a ſure Defence againſt the Inſurrections of the Welſh, manifeſting the Excellency of the Roman Policy, in preſerving all new Conqueſts by Colonies.

After this King Henry return'd again into Normandy, where he met with great Diſturbances and Oppoſition; but in a ſhort Time he concluded a Peace with Fulk Earl of Anjou, and alſo honour'd him ſo far as to admit of his Son William's marrying the Earl's Daughter. But having got Robert de Beleſme into his Power, he ſent him into England to be kept cloſe Priſoner in Warham Caſtle, where he contiu'd all his Life; without being pity'd, as being a turbulent, faithleſs and cruel Man, as appears by his thruſting out the Eyes of his Godſon, a Child who was deliver'd to him as an Hoſtage by his Father. Thus King Henry having at laſt totally ſubdu'd Normandy, and made Peace with all his Neighbours beyond the Seas, return'd victorious into England, and govern'd this Kingdom and that Dukedom in great Tranquility for five Years enſuing.

A. D. 1114. Reg. 14/15. Church Vacancies fill'd up.

Eadmer. Chron. W.

III. The King now living in Peace and Proſperity, was prevail'd upon by the Pope's Admonitions, and the Prayers of many of his Subjects, to fill up the Archbiſhoprick of Canterbury, which had been vacant five Years. Accordingly he ſummon'd the Biſhops and chief Men to meet at Windſor, where upon the twenty fifth Day of April, Ralph Biſhop of Rocheſter was choſen Arch-Biſhop; and being ſo declar'd to the Multitude, they receiv'd it with the utmoſt Demonſtrations of Joy and Triumph. He was highly belov'd for his Affability and good Humour, and his Conſecration was celebrated with exceeding Pomp and Splendor; and afterwards when he was inveſted with his Pall from Rome, that Solemnity was attended by the Biſhops, Abbots and Nobility beſides infinite Throngs of People from all Parts. In the ſame Year Thurſtan, the King's Chaplain was made Arch-Biſhop of York, in the Room of Thomas deceas'd, and ſeveral other Vacancies in the Church were fill'd up; but, as Eadmer complains, with too great Partiality to the Normans, and Neglect to the Engliſh Nation. Tho' the King had Peace at home, yet this Year he met with great Provocations from the Welſh, by their Incurſions they made upon the Territories of Gilbert Strongbow Earl of Striguil, and Hugh Earl of Cheſter, ſter, who had been ſetled in thoſe Parts. Their Outrages were ſo great, that the King ſwore he would utterly deſtroy all the Men of North-Wales and Powiſland, and plant them with new Inhabitants; and immediately march'd towards the Country with a powerful Army, which he divided into three Parts. The firſt was led by Earl Gilbert againſt South-Wales; the ſecond by Alexander King of Scotland and the Earl of Cheſter, againſt North-Wales; and the third by the King himſelf, under whoſe Standard was the Flower of the Mid-land Counties. But the Welſh finding themſelves unable to withſtand ſo great a Power, had recourſe to their old Security the Woods and Mountains, where being follow'd with great Difficulty, many of them were ſlain, and the reſt ſubmitted to Terms to King Henry, who now as a Victor return'd in Triumph to London: Where his Satisfaction was heighten'd by the News of the Conſummation of the Marriage between the Emperor and his Daughter Matilda, who was likewiſe ſolemnly crown'd Empreſs at Ments, at the Age of fourteen.

Sax. An. Malmsb. &c. Not long after the King took ſhipping and went into Normandy, where after a long Stay, he caus'd all the chief Men of that Dukedom to ſwear Fealty to his Son William, as his lawful Succeſſor, being then about twelve Years of Age: From whence it became a Cuſtom afterwards for the Kings of England to make their Eldeſt Sons Dukes of Normandy. But this did not ſatisfie the King, who reſolving to ſecure the Succeſſion of the Crown to his own Family, in the following Year ſummon'd a great Council of all the Biſhops, Abbots and Nobility of the Kingdom at Salisbury on the twentieth Day of March; where all the chief Men, knowing the King's Intentions, readily did Homage, and ſwore Fealty to young William, 'That if he ſhould outlive his Father, they would 'lay aſide all other Claims, and put him in Poſſeſſion of the Crown and King-'dom, and faithfully ſerve him as King of England. From this Aſſembly ſeveral Writers have dated the Original of the high Court of Parliament in England: Some believe that there was nothing of that Nature before; Others that this was the Beginning of the Houſe of Commons; and others think that this Aſſembly was the firſt that had the Name of PARLIAMENT given to it. The firſt of theſe Opinions is undoubtedly falſe, the ſecond improbable, and the third uncertain.

Sax. An. Hunting. Eadmer. Malmsb. About the ſame Time King Henry gave Aſſiſtance to his Nephew Theobald Earl of Bleſſis, who upon ſome Diſpleaſure had taken up Arms againſt the King of France; which ſo inrag'd that Prince, that having join'd with Baldwin Earl of Flanders, and Fulk Earl of Anjou, he ſolemnly ſwore to diſpoſſeſs King Henry of all Normandy, and ſet up William, the Son of Duke Robert, in his room; who being neareſt of Right, many of the Norman Nobility, pitying the Misfortunes of the Father, join'd in the Deſign. King Henry was no leſs active and vigilant on the other Side, and levying a great Tax in the Nation, and joining with Theobald and the Earl of Bretaign, he made a notable Appearance in the Field. At which Time King Lewis, with the Earls of Flanders and Anjou, being enter'd Normandy, and hearing of the Approach and Power of King Henry, ſcarcely ſtaid one Night, but as Men without Heart or Courage return'd, and left the Country free to the Victor. So that all things ſeem'd well quieted for a Year, and now nothing diſturb'd the King's Peace but ſome little Troubles in Wales, and the uneaſie Expectation of the Pope's Legate, whom the King had expreſsly prohibited to enter England; and likewiſe the Death of his excellent Queen Matilda, which happen'd in the eighteenth Year of his Reign to the great Grief of the Nation, who highly eſteem'd her as well for her Family, as her Piety, Charity and Munificence.

Not long after the War was reviv'd between England and France, and King Lewis now enter'd Normandy with as much Heat, as he had formerly left it with Coldneſs, and made great Devaſtations in the Country; which King Henry for a while ſuffer'd, and declar'd to thoſe who ſeem'd to doubt his Courage, That he had learn'd from his valiant Father to conquer the Raſhneſs of the French by by Patience and Policy; and that a good King ſhould not be prodigal of the Blood of ſuch Subjects as his. In a ſhort Time after he found an Opportunity to ſignalize his Valour in a general Battel with the French, which was fought with great Obſtinacy for ſeveral Hours together. In the Beginning of which the firſt Battalion of the French broke the Ranks of the Norman Nobility, and preſſing forwards towards the King, put his Troops in Diſorder. But being now rouz'd, he ſoon rally'd his Men, and began a moſt bloody Conflict with Sword in Hand; in which, Criſpin a valiant Nobleman, aſſaulted the King, and ſtruck him twice upon the Head with ſuch Fury, that the impenetrable Helmet was beaten into his Head, with the Loſs of much Blood. But Henry feeling himſelf wounded, gather'd Strength with his Rage, and faſten'd ſo weighty a Blow upon his Adverſary, that he overthrew both him and his Horſe, and then took him Priſoner. By which brave Example his Soldiers fell on like Lions and Furies, and treated the French ſo rudely, that they ſoon betook themſelves to Flight. Many of the French Nobility were taken Priſoners, as likewiſe King Lewis's Standard was taken, which King Henry bought for twenty Marks, and kept it as a Token of the Victory, returning in Triumph to Roven.

King Henry gains a Signal Victory over him.

Before this War was finiſh'd, the Pope call'd a Council at Rheims, where the Engliſh Biſhops were permitted by the King to be preſent, but all Complaints were prohibited, and this Charge given them, Go ye, ſalute the Pope in my Name, and only hear his Apoſtolical Precepts, but bring none of his new Inventions into my Kingdom. In this Council great Complaints were made againſt King Henry, for the unjuſt Treatment of his Brother Robert and others. In order to accommodate all Matters, not long after, the Pope came into Normandy, and met the King at Giſors; where his Holineſs told him, That by the Law of God every Man ought to enjoy his own Right, and that it was his Deſire and that of the whole Council, that he ſhould ſet his Brother Robert at Liberty, and reſtore him and his Son William to their Dukedom. To which the King anſwer'd, That he did not take Normandy from his Brother, but only ſecur'd his Father's Inheritance, then given up to diſſolute Men and Robbers: That he was call'd into that Country by the Biſhops and Clergy, to prevent the Deſolation of the Church; and that what he did was not the Effect of Choice, but of the Perſuaſions and Invitations of the Inhabitants, to preſerve their Country from utter Ruin. With this Anſwer the Pope was ſatisfy'd, and approv'd of what had been done, declaring, That he had heard enough of the Duke and his Son. Malmesbury adds, that at this Interview the King was ſo liberal of his Preſents to the Pope and his Cardinals, that ever after they eſteem'd him as a moſt eloquent Orator, and all his Actions very juſtifiable: So that abandoning theſe unfortunate Princes, the Pope imploy'd his Abilities in making up a Peace between the two Kings, which was concluded in the following Year without any Exception or Difficulty, all Forts and Caſtles taken in the Wars being deliver'd up, and Priſoners on both Sides ſet at Liberty.

A. D. 1120. Reg. 20/21.

Upon the finiſhing the War, the King reſolv'd to return into England, from whence he had been abſent above four Years; and with a numerous Fleet and a noble Retinue, ſet Sail from Barfleur on the 26th Day of November, and landed in England the Day following. But Prince William, who now only wanted the Name of a King, commanded a new Ship to be prepar'd for himſelf, his Brothers and Siſters, with many of the young gay Nobility his Companions, who plying the Sailors with Wine, made them boaſt that they would out ſail the King's Ship, which had weigh'd Anchor before: And in the Night putting to Sea with a brisk and delightful Gale, they flew over the dancing Waves, with all the Teſtimonies of Mirth and Jollitry. But Heav'n deſigning to check the too great Felicities of King Henry, in the midſt of all their Pleaſures, the Ship ſuddenly ſtruck againſt a Rock not far from the Shore, which turn'd their Songs into diſmal Outcries, and caus'd every one to ſhift for his Life. Prince William immediately got into the Long-Boat with a few others, and might have eſcap'd, had not not his Tenderneſs to his natural Siſter Matilda occaſion'd him to hearken to her Cries and turn back to ſave her; which gave Opportunity to others to leap into the Boat in ſuch Numbers, that it preſently ſunk, ſo that not one of this noble Train eſcap'd but the meaneſt of the Company, who were ſav'd by ſwimming upon the Main-Maſt, and gave a full Relation of this Tragical Story. This was the moſt unfortunate Shipwreck that ever happen'd in our Seas, bringing an inconceivable Sorrow to the King and the whole Nation: For in it periſh'd William the Joy of his Father, and the Hope of the Nation; Richard his natural Brother, his Siſter Matilda Counteſs of Perche, Richard Earl of Cheſter, with his Lady Lucy, the King's Niece by his Siſter Adela, Otwell the Earl's Brother, the young Duke's Governor, divers of the King's great Officers of State, and ſeveral of the chief Nobility, to the Number of a hundred and ſixty Perſons; many of whom had made themſelves infamous by unnatural Impurities. As this was a terrible Inſtance of Divine Vengeance upon theſe Enemies to true Piety, ſo it was no leſs upon the great Norman Family; in which we find Oppreſſion puniſh'd with Diſappointment and Extinction, and its maſculine Line, which was rais'd by ſuch vaſt Care, Expence and Bloodſhed, now expiring in the third Inheritor. Which Judgment was ſuch a ſenſible Affliction to the King, that it occaſion'd ſome to report, That he was never ſeen to laugh after it.

However having in ſome meaſure overcome the Senſe of theſe Misfortunes, by the Advice of his great Council aſſembled at London, he marry'd Adeliza the beautiful Daughter of Geoffrey Duke of Lovain, in hopes of repairing his great Loſs by a new Iſſue; but in that he was deceiv'd in his Expectations, ſhe never proving with Child. And now all the Affairs of England and Normandy were in a peaceable Condition, only the Welſh would have no Reſt, for Griffyn Prince of North-Wales, being encourag'd by the Death of Richard Earl of Cheſter, ſent his Sons into Cheſhire, where they burnt two Caſtles, kill'd many Men, and made great Devaſtations. Upon which the King raiſing a powerful Army, march'd himſelf into Wales; and going with a ſmall Party a nearer Way through the Mountains and Straits, he was ſuddenly beſet in that diſadvantagious Place, and many of his Men kill'd by the Welſh Archers: Among whom one ſhot the King upon the Breaſt, which tho' it was repell'd by his Armor, ſo diſcourag'd him, that fearing the Glory he had gain'd in more famous Parts might be loſt in this wild Country, he ſoon came to a Parly, and then to a Peace; receiving from Prince Griffyn a thouſand Head of Cattle and Hoſtages, and leaving Lord Fitzwarren Lieutenant of the Marches, he return'd to England. Not long after Ralph Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury dy'd, a Perſon tho' of great Affability and good Nature, yet ſo exactly nice as to the Priviledges of the See, that in the great Feaſts when the King wore his Crown, he would not permit the King himſelf to put it on his Head, claiming the ſole Right of it himſelf. The Archbiſhoprick was not fill'd up 'till the following Year, when the King call'd a Council of all the Biſhops, Abbots and Nobility to Gloceſter, and order'd them to make choice of an Arch-Biſhop, and he would confirm the Election. After much Conteſt, William Corbet, a Benedictine Abbot of a new founded Abby, was elected and conſecrated by the Biſhop of London, and five other Biſhops; for Thurſtan Arch-Biſhop of York, refuſing to own his Superiority, was not allow'd to perform the Ceremony.

At the ſame Time England was extreamly troubled with Thieves, Robbers and Falſe Coiners; which together with the ſevere Taxes, and a great Famine, prov'd highly calamitous to the Nation. To remedy ſome of theſe Troubles, the King's Juſticiary in a publick Council order'd forty four Robbers to be hang'd up, and puniſh'd others with Loſs of Members: And afterwards at another Meeting at Wincheſter, many of the Corrupters of the Coin ſuffer'd by Caſtration and the Loſs of their right Hands; which Puniſhment did for the future more deter Men from committing that Crime, than the Fear of Death it ſelf.

In the King's Abſence, but not without his Licence, John de Crema, Cardinal and a Legate from Pope Honorius, came into England, to redreſs the great Abuſe, as it was term'd, of the Clergy's retaining the Society of their Wives. He was receiv'd with great Pomp and Magnificence, but with no great Satisfaction; and Gervaſe of Canterbury complains, That it was a Thing never heard of ſince the Time of Auguſtin, that it was an Innovation, a Scandal to England, and a Retrenchment of the Liberty of this ancient Kingdom, which had never been ſubject to a Legantine Power. However he held a general Synod at London, where he ſeverely envighed againſt the Marriage of Prieſts, declaring, That it was a horrid Sin for a Prieſt to riſe from the Bed of Luſt, and then to touch the Sacrament of the Body of Chriſt; yet the Night following, after he himſelf had celebrated Maſs, he was taken in Bed with a common Strumpet: Which, ſays Huntington, was too notorious to be deny'd, and too wicked to be conceal'd. So this hypocritical Cardinal was oblig'd to return with much more Shame than he came hither with Honour; and tho' by the Conſent of the Synod he made ſeveral Canons for the Reformation and Celebacy of the Clergy, they were not much regarded. 'Till ſome few Years after, in 1129, the King deſirous to ſettle the Celebacy of the Clergy, in a Synod call'd on purpoſe, through the Weakneſs of the Arch-Biſhop, as Paris expreſſes it, obtain'd Power to have the ſole Execution of this Law himſelf. But inſtead of wholly reſtraining the pretended Abuſe, he puniſh'd them in their Purſes, and receiving Sums from a great many of them, he permitted 'em to enjoy their Wives as formerly.

V. King Henry having enjoy'd his ſecond Queen near ſix Years with little Proſpect of Iſſue, became extreamly deſirous to leave the Crown to the Empreſs his Daughter Matilda, now lately a Widow, and ſo much belov'd by the Germans, that ſhe was deſir'd to reign over them, but was prevented by her Father in Hopes of the Crown of England. In order to effect this great Work, the King took his Daughter into England, and at Windſor ſummon'd a Grand Council or Parliament, conſiſting of all the chief Men of the Nation, beſides David King of Scotland. Here he perſuaded all the Biſhops, Abbots, Earls and Barons, to take a ſolemn Oath, 'That if he ſhould die without Iſſue Male, 'they would receive his Daughter Matilda for their Queen; as being his only 'lawful Heir, by whom they ſhould again be govern'd by the ancient Engliſh 'Royal Blood, from which he ſhew'd her to be deſcended. and the first of Lay Lords was Stephen Earl of Mortaign and Boloign, King Henry's Nephew by his Sister Adela, who was the first that violated his Oath. Then that he might strengthen her Interest by Foreign Alliances, he shortly after caus'd her to be marry'd to Jeoffry sirnam'd Plantagenet, Earl of Anjou, in the Room of his Father Fulk, who was now made King of Jerusalem. This Marriage was not highly pleasing to the Empress, and much less to several of the Nobility both of England and Normandy, who were disoblig'd for not being made privy to this Affair, and gave just Occasion for some to prognosticate that after the King's Death they would fall off from the Oath they had sworn to her. But the King did it out of a politick Design, to secure his Interest with the Earl of Anjou, against the growing Power of his Nephew William, who by the Assistance of the French King, had lately been put into Possession of the Earldom of Flanders; and being so nearly ally'd to the Crown, began to be formidable to King Henry.

The King by his Daughter's Marriage having made Anjou his own, to put a Stop to the Greatness of William, and the French King who supported him, from Normandy invaded France as far as Esparne, where for eight Days he remain'd as secure as in his own Dominions; and partly by Threats, and partly by Promises, he procur'd King Lewis to withdraw his Assistance from young William. Nor did he stop here, but taking Advantage of the cruel and covetous Temper of his Nephew, he caus'd many of his Subjects in Flanders to set up Theodorick Lantgrave of Alsatia against him, pretending a Title to the Earldom, so many Towns revolted, among which Alost was one, which William besieg'd; and having bravely routed the Forces of the Lantgrave who came to relieve it, and when the Castle was just ready to be surrender'd to him, he was by a Lance wounded near the Wrist, which immediately turning to a Gangrene, kill'd him within five Days after. He was a Man of great Courage, but to avoid his Father's Vice Prodigality, fell so far into the other Extream, that in the Belgick Histories he is sirnam'd Miser. In him expir'd all the Legitimate Issue of Duke Robert; but he had two natural Sons, Richard who was long before kill'd hunting in the New Forest, and William who was afterwards slain in the Holy-Land.

Malmsb. M. Paris. Dicet. After this we find no considerable Action of King Henry: In the thirtieth Year of his Reign, he took another Journey into Normandy, and met Pope Innocent at Chartres, where he acknowledg'd him for lawful Pope, notwithstanding he was then shut out of Rome, and Anacletus possess'd of that See; and at Roven he and his great Men made him many Presents. Having stay'd about a Year in Normandy the King return'd into England, and with him the Empress his Daughter, who had been lately parted from her Husband by reason of some private Contests that had happen'd between them. Not long after the King summon'd a grand Council or Parliament at Northampton, where the Clergy and Nobility all renew'd the Oath of Fealty which they had formerly taken to her; and then by their Advice, she was sent back to her Husband, who now desir'd her Company, and being joyfully receiv'd by him, she within less than two Years bore him a Son. In the thirty second Year of this Reign the King founded a Church and an Episcopal See at Carlisle, to which he laid the Counties of Cumberland, Westmorland and Part of Northumberland, and appointed Athulf his Confessor, then Abbot of St. Oswald's Abby, to be the first Bishop of it. The same Year was remarkable for nothing so much as the Burning down the greatest Part of London, which being then built almost all of Wood, was a Calamity very incident to that great City. As this was a Year of Sorrow to many, so the next was a Year of Joy to a great Part of the Nation, but especially to the King himself; and this was the Birth of a Son by the Empress Matilda, whose Name was Henry, which so pleas'd the King, that he summon'd the chief Men of his Kingdom with great Pomp, and again appointed his said Daughter and her Heirs to be his Successors, causing them

In the latter End of this Summer, the King having fill'd up ſeveral Vacancies in the Church, made his laſt Paſſage into Normandy. Upon the ſame Day he took Shipping, which was the third of Auguſt, there happen'd ſuch an extraordinary Eclipſe of the Sun, that Malmesbury tells us he himſelf ſaw many Stars near that Planet, which prov'd very frightful to moſt People; and that two Days after there was ſuch a dreadful Earthquake, that the Houſe where the Author ſate was lifted up by a treble Remove; to which others add, That out of the Clefts of the Earth aroſe Flames of Fire that could not be quench'd: Which divers judg'd to be the fatal Preſages of the Deaths of thoſe two Princes that not long after enſu'd. The firſt was that of Robert, the King's eldeſt Brother, who at a great Age dy'd in Caerdiff Caſtle in Wales, after twenty ſix Years Impriſonment; a Prince ſometime of great Courage and Reputation, who refus'd to receive a Kingdom gain'd partly by his own Sword; yet having been rebellious to his Father, and perfidious to his Brothers, as well as prodigal and careleſs, he loſt the Benefit of his Birth-Right, and met with a Reward but anſwerable to his Crimes. His Body was bury'd at Gloceſter, in the Cathedral Church, and in the Middle of the Quire; where his Tomb remains to this Day, with a carved Image of his Shape, as the Monument of a moſt unfortunate Man.

In the next Year he was follow'd by the King his Brother, who being a hunting in Normandy, and returning to the Caſtle of Lyons near Roven with a ſtrong Appetite, took a Surfeit by eating of Lampreys, which he much lov'd, but never could recover. Finding himſelf very ſick and declining, he ſent for Hugh Arch-Biſhop of Roven, being alſo attended by his natural Son Robert Earl of Gloceſter, William Earl of Warren, and ſeveral other Noblemen and great Commanders, who deſiring him to name his Succeſſor, he made anſwer, That he left all his Dominions whatſoever to his Daughter Matilda, by a lawful and perpetual Succeſſion; without mentioning her Husband, having been lately much diſoblig'd by ſeveral Affronts receiv'd from him. Then he commanded his Debts, and all Servants Wages to be paid; all Forfeitures and Fines to be remitted; all Exiles and ſeiz'd Eſtates to be reſtor'd; and directed his Son Robert, who had the Cuſtody of his Treaſury at Falais, to diſtribute no leſs than ſixty thouſand Pounds among his Servants and ſtipendiary Knights and Horſemen. And now having made his Will, and done all Things neceſſary for a Chriſtian Prince, after ſeven Days Sickneſs, he deceaſed on the ſecond Day of December, and in the ſeventy eighth Year of his Age; after a tumultuous, vigorous and proſperous Reign of thirty five Years, three Months, and one Day. His Body was embalm'd after a ſtrange and barbarous Manner, peculiar to thoſe Times, and carry'd into England, where it was honourably bury'd on Chriſtmaſs Day, in the Abby of Reading in Barkſhire, which he himſelf had founded and endow'd with large Revenues.

His Death.

This was the End of the great Henry the Firſt, under whoſe long Reign, the Nation ſcarcely felt any Foreign Invaſion or Domeſtick Inſurrection, except ſome inconſiderable Incurſions of the Welſh; by which continu'd Peace, during three Reigns, England became a Place of Refuge and a Sanctuary to the Afflicted and Diſtreſſed of Foreign Nations. This King added much to its Strength and Glory, notwithſtanding ſeveral ſevere Oppreſſions; defending the Land by numerous Garriſons, and building many Forts and Caſtles, beſides twenty five Towns and Cities; in all which he manifeſted his extraordinary Parts and Abilities. He has been celebrated by ſome for the three glorious Felicities of Wiſdom, Victory and Riches, and condemn'd by others for three notorious Vices, Avarice, Cruelty and Luſt; the firſt three being manifeſted in his obtaining, keeping and improving the Kingdom; and the laſt by his hard Taxes, his Severity to his Brother and others, and his numerous illegitimate Iſſue. to his Perſon, he was of a middle Stature, ſtrong and well jointed, corpulent, of fine Eyes, and an amiable Countenance: In his Humour he was affable, and of a pleaſant Converſation; and his Mind was inrich'd with many Virtues, being a Follower of Juſtice, a Lover of Religion, ſevere againſt Robbers, temperate in eating, and never drinking but for Thirſt, vigorous and valiant in Battel, yet very circumſpect, chuſing rather to win by Conduct than Effuſion of Blood; and by the Report of moſt Writers he exceeded all the Princes of his Age in Greatneſs and Magnificence. Whatſoever was wiſely and virtuouſly perform'd in his Government, is by theſe Writers chiefly attributed to his Education and Learning; in which his renowned Father was very careful, often declaring, That an unlearned King was but a crown'd Aſs. Upon which Account he often reſided at his new Palace at Oxford, both for the Converſation of learned Men, and the Vicinity of a Park he made at Woodſtock, which was the firſt known in England. His Works of Devotion appear from his Erection of the two Churches and Biſhopricks of Ely and Carliſle, the Abbies of Hide, Circeſter, Reading, and the Priory of Dunſtable. His Queen Matilda founded the Priory of the Holy Trinity within Algate in London, and the Hoſpital of St. Giles in the Fields; ſo that by himſelf, his Queen, and other devout Perſons, above twenty four religious Foundations were erected in this Reign. The Laws of this Prince, beſides his great Charter already mention'd, are publiſh'd by Lambert; tho' they are not accounted of any great Certainty. For the Price of Proviſions and the like in this Reign, Dr. Brady tells us, That Wheat for one Day's Subſiſtance of a hundred Men was valu'd at one Shilling; a Ram or Sheep at four Pence; and an Allowance of Hay and Provender for twenty Horſes one Day, four Pence; ſo that according to that Computation Mony was then near twenty Times the real Value, that it has been of late Years.

SECT. IV.

The Reign of King STEPHEN.

Containing 18 Years, 9 Months, and 17 Days.

Malmſb. &c.

I. THO' the Empreſs Matilda had Fealty ſworn to her during the Life of her Father, and Her and her Heirs ordain'd to be his Succeſſors in the Crown of England; yet ſo prevalent are the Charms of Ambition, and ſo weak the Aſſurances of the People, that all King Henry's Precautions were ſoon defeated; and principally by one who had appear'd moſt forward in taking the Oath, namely Stephen Earl of Boloign, Nephew to the late King by Adela his fourth Siſter, who was the third Son of Stephen Earl of Blois, who by the Favour of the King his Uncle was made Earl of Mortaign in Normandy. This Man having alſo many Lands and Honours in England, a great Intereſt upon the Account of his Perſonal Merit and his affable Behaviour, and a long Acquaintance with the Biſhops and Nobility, reſolv'd to take the Advantage of Matilda's Abſence, and ſet up his own Title. Accordingly he haſten'd with the utmoſt Expedition into England, where his Landing was attended by a moſt dreadful Tempeſt of Thunder, which was thought to portend thoſe Storms and Troubles it afterwards brought upon the Nation. The Inhabitants of Dover and Canterbury fortify'd themſelves againſt him, but London receiv'd him; where his Deſigns were much facilitated by his younger Brother Henry then Biſhop of Wincheſter, and a powerful Man in the State, who by his Intereſt prevail'd upon William Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, bury, the first Man who had sworn to the Empress: By whose Example many others were brought into the same dangerous Design, not fearing to affirm, That it was Baseness for so many noble Peers to be subject to a Woman. And to forward these bold Beginnings, Roger Bishop of Salisbury, the late King's Treasurer, protested, That they were all free from the Oath sworn to the Empress, because without the Consent of the Barons she had marry'd out of the Nation. But that which had the greatest Effect was the Testimony of Hugh Bigot, Steward to King Henry, who took a solemn Oath, That the King on his Death-Bed, upon some Displeasure to his Daughter, had disinherited her, and appointed his Nephew Stephen to be his Successor. These colourable Pretences so prevail'd upon the too credulous Arch-Bishop, and the Peers, that they consented to yield Allegiance to him; and upon the 26th of December, being St. Stephen's Day, he was crown'd at Westminster by the Arch-Bishop, with a small Appearance, being now about thirty one Years of Age.

He is crown'd King.

But since his Title was so precarious, before he was crown'd he made large Promises of reforming whatever was amiss in his Uncle's Reign, for which his Brother ingag'd his Faith; and at his Coronation he took an unusual Oath, chiefly consisting of these three Articles, 'First that he would never keep Bishop-'ricks vacant for his own Advantage, but immediately consent to a Canonical 'Election, and invest new Bishops in them. Secondly he would not retain the 'Woods of any Clerk or Lay Man in his Hands, upon the Account of their 'Hunting, as King Henry had done, to the great Vexation of many. Third-'ly he would for ever remit the Tribute of Danegelt, which his Predecessors 'had often rais'd. On the other side the Bishops took their Oath of Allegiance conditionally to obey him as King, so long as he should preserve the Church's Liberties, and the exact Discipline of it: Which Policy was also observ'd by the Lay Lords, as appears from Robert Earl of Gloucester, the late King's natural Son, who swore to be the true Liege Man of Stephen, so long as the King should preserve to him his Dignities, and keep all Covenants; upon which the King promis'd to reform all the hard Laws of his Predecessors, and give it under his Seal and Charter. Then seising upon the vast Treasure his Uncle had amass'd in the Castle of Winchester, which amounted to more than 100000 Marks, besides Plate and Jewels, he hasten'd to meet his Corps, now brought into England, and made a pompous Funeral at Reading, being attended by many of the Nobility. Shortly after he repaired to Oxford, where he sign'd and seal'd the Charter of Privileges he before promis'd; in the Preface of which he declares, 'That he obtain'd the Crown by the Election of the 'Clergy and People of England, and was confirm'd in the same by the present 'Pope Innocent. The Tenor of the rest was, That all Liberties, Customs, 'and Possessions granted to the Church, should be in full Force: That all Per-'sons and Causes Ecclesiastical should belong only to Ecclesiastical Judicature: 'That none but Clergy-Men should intermeddle with the Vacancies of Chur-'ches, or any Church-Man's Goods: That all bad Usages in the Land touch-'ing Forests, Exactions, and the like, should be abolish'd, and the ancient Laws 'restored. As Stephen well knew, that they had chosen him their King to obtain their own Designs; so Malmesbury observes, that he granted these Immunities rather to blind their Eyes, than to bind up his own Hands by such Parchment Chains.

His Charter.

This appeared in the second Year of his Reign, when William Arch-Bishop of Canterbury dy'd; at which Time he did not only keep the Archbishoprick vacant for above two Years, but finding that he had left vast Sums of Mony, and that he dy'd without a Will, he seiz'd all to his own Use, which tho' too customary, was contrary to his Charter. However the Beginnings of his Government were very peaceable; but by several Steps civil Discord began and increas'd to the infinite Damage of the whole Nation. And what in a great measure gave Birth to these Mischiefs was the King's own Indulgence, who tho' tho' he was advanc'd only by a Party of Men, unadviſedly gave leave to all the Nobility, many of whom were his Enemies, to build Caſtles upon their own Lands, inſomuch that above eleven hundred Places of Strength were erected in a ſhort Time; by which means they were put into a Condition to renounce their Obedience, when ever they thought it to their Advantage. The firſt Man who openly declar'd againſt him was Baldwin de Redvers, who fortify'd the City and Caſtle of Exeter; and at the ſame Time the Welſhmen, reſenting the Damages done by King Henry, began to revenge themſelves by the Slaughter of many of the Engliſh. To quell theſe Miſchiefs King Stephen march'd with a Body of Engliſh and Flemmings, and after a long and chargeable Siege, by Famine he reduc'd Baldwin and his Adherents; after which he baniſh'd him and his Family, but us'd ſuch Lenity towards the reſt, that it gave great Incouragement to all future Inſurrections. But in Wales his Affairs appear'd with another Fate, for at Cardigan a great Battel was fought, with ſuch Loſs and Slaughter of the Engliſh, that the Men were taken Priſoners by Women, and ſo many drown'd by the Fall of a Bridge over the Temd, that another Paſſage was made over the River by dead Carcaſſes. Nor was this all the Trouble King Stephen had; for about the ſame Time, many of the Engliſh out of Hatred to him, ſecretly invited David King of Scotland to revenge the Injuries done to the Empreſs Matilda; upon which he ſuddenly invaded the Frontiers, and took both Carliſle and Newcaſtle, which he fill'd with Garriſons. Againſt theſe King Stephen march'd with a powerful Army, and concerning this War there are divers Reports; yet all agree that in no long Time a Peace was concluded, by which David ſtill enjoy'd Carliſle, and his Son Henry the Earldom of Huntington, for which he did Homage to King Stephen; but his Father refus'd to do the ſame, alledging, That he had already given his Faith to the Empreſs Matilda.

Many Caſtles erected.

Sim. Dun. Malmsb. M. Paris. King Stephen returning in Peace, not long after fell into ſuch a dangerous Fit of a Lethargy, that his Death was commonly believ'd and reported, which occaſion'd great Troubles both in England and abroad; for by this his Friends were diſhearten'd with Fears, and his Oppoſers grew more bold in declaring for the Empreſs. Hugh Bigot, one of the firſt Promoters of his Intereſt, now fortify'd himſelf in the Caſtle of Norwich, and himſelf refus'd to deliver it to any but the King, and with great Unwillingneſs to him: In Wales, Owen and Cadwalader, the Sons of Prince Gryffith, made furious Ravages, and carry'd great Booties from the Engliſh: Likewiſe in Normandy there began new Inſurrections; for Geoffry Earl of Anjou, who in the Right of his Wife the Empreſs laid Claim to all, eaſily gain'd the Hearts and Endeavours of many to adhere to the true Heir, and poſſeſs'd himſelf of ſeveral Caſtles. But proceeding further, and entering upon the Territories of Talevaz, a Perſon of Note proſcrib'd by King Stephen, the Normans ſo diſlik'd that and ſome other of his Actions, that they ſent for Theobald Earl of Bevis, King Stephen's Elder Brother, offering him both their Dukedom, and their Swords and Lives to defend him in it. Theobald coming to Luxonia, Robert Earl of Gloceſter, who was always ready to diminiſh King Stephen's Power, deliver'd the County of Falaiſe to him upon Compoſition; having himſelf carry'd no ſmall Sums from thence out of King Henry's Treaſury, and carefully and ſecretly watching all Opportunities to advance the Title and Deſigns of the Empreſs.

The Troubles encreaſe.

Nubrigen. Malmsb. &c. King Stephen finding ſo many Diſturbances, prepar'd firſt to go into Normandy; at whoſe Approach, after ſome ſmall Attempts, the People diſtracted between Fear and Duty, ſoon yielded to his Power, and ſurrender'd all their Towns and Caſtles. This good Succeſs was much improv'd by a League made between him and Lewis King of France; upon the Aſſurance of which he created Euſtace his eldeſt Son Duke of Normandy, and order'd him to do Homage to the French King. Earl Theobald ſeeing himſelf thus abandon'd, now ſtorm'd at the Injuries done him, and being eldeſt Brother laid Claim both to Normandy and England; gland; but notwithſtanding his Rage and Threats, he at length came to a Compoſition, and renounc'd his Claim for a Penſion of two Thouſand Marks per Annum. Likewiſe Earl Geoffry, whoſe Title by his Wife was better than both, finding himſelf over-match'd by the King's Power, Wealth and Confederates, ſubmitted to Neceſſity, and for a Penſion of five thouſand Marks per Annum, ſuffer'd Stephen quietly to enjoy the Crown. Having remov'd theſe two great Obſtacles, he hop'd, to enjoy a peaceable Reign, when unexpected News was brought him, That England was in a Tumult, and that the factious Peers taking Advantage of his Abſence, were up in Arms againſt him. Upon this, with the utmoſt Expedition he took Shipping for England in the midſt of Winter, and even upon the Eve of Chriſt's Nativity beſieg'd, and afterwards took the Caſtle of Bedford, garriſon'd againſt him upon the Account of the Scots: About which Time David their King having enter'd Northumberland in the Behalf of Matilda, the ruder Sort of the Army too tragically reveng'd the Injuries of that Princeſs, by ripping up the Wombs of big-belly'd Women, and toſſing their Infants upon the Points of Spears, ſlaying the Prieſts at the Altar, and diſmembering the dead Bodies after a moſt inhuman manner.

He is call'd into England.

A. D. 1138. Reg. 3/4.

King Stephen us'd all Expedition againſt theſe Barbarians, declaring, That it was no Policy to give an Hour's Reſt to ſuch Enemies, and accordingly he march'd directly into Scotland, from whence, after a ſmall Revenge, he was haſtily recall'd into England, by a great Defection of the Nobility, who by his Example and Proceedings had been ſufficiently taught the Arts of Perjury. For theſe alledg'd that the King had violated his Oath concerning their Foreſts, and other Immunities of the Church and Common-wealth; but, as Malmesbury obſerves, theſe were but colourable Pretenſions to cover their private Reſentments for miſſing of ſuch Caſtles, Commands and Preferments as they expected; looking upon the King as ſo much oblig'd to them, as not to deny them any Thing. To put a ſtop to theſe endleſs Importunities, he ſometimes us'd Arguments, and at other times Promiſes and Rewards; but their Loyalty being built upon ſuch ignoble Foundations, could not be of any long Continuance. The chief of their Party was Robert Earl of Gloceſter, now chief Counſellor to the Empreſs, who finding theſe particular Diſlikes, and being excited by religious Men with the Fear of hazarding both his Reputation and future Happineſs by his Neglect, he ſent threatning Meſſages to King Stephen, charging him with the Breach of his Oath to his Soveraign Lady Matilda, and with drawing him and others into the like Perjury and Treaſon; upon which he declar'd Stephen an open Enemy to the State, and himſelf an open Enemy to Stephen. He ſoon ſtrengthen'd his Party by the Conjunction of many Noblemen, among whom Milo, High Conſtable to the King, revolted and became a great Aſſiſtant to his Proceedings. Robert took in the Caſtle of Briſtol, and ſecur'd that of Slede, and his Aſſociates did the like in other Places; for William Talbot garriſon'd the Caſtle of Hereford, William Lovel that of Carie, Paganell the Caſtle of Ludlow, William de Mount that of Duneſtor, Robert de Nichol the Caſtle of Warram, Euſtace Fitz-John the Caſtle of Meltune, William Fitz-Alain the Caſtle of Shrewsbury, and Wakelin the Caſtle of Doure. And thus thoſe Forts which were erected to defend the Crown, firſt offended the King. Some few of which as he recover'd he demoliſh'd; often ſwearing He would not ſo eaſily loſe his Crown, and admiring, What ſhould induce them, who had ſo readily advanc'd him, ſo ſpeedily to dethrone him. One freſh Motive to their Diſcontents was the King's ſeiſing on the Perſons and Lands of ſome great Men, on a bare Suſpicion of their Loyalty, and the extraordinary Favour he ſhew'd to William de Ypres and his Flemmings, whoſe Counſels he wholly follow'd. This laſt they interpreted as a Contempt of themſelves and their Nation; therefore out of Anger and Diſdain they ſent to the Empreſs, declaring, That within five Months ſhe ſhould have the Kingdom at Command, according to their Oaths made to her Father.

These Commotions working in the Bowels of the Kingdom, gave David of Scotland a fair Opportunity to attack the Borders of it, which he did with great Ravages and Desolation in Northumberland: Against whom a considerable Army was sent, under the Command of Thurstan Arch-Bishop of York, whom the King had made his Lieutenant in the North; but being detain'd by Sickness from the Field, he appointed Ralph Bishop of the Orchades for his General, whose invective Oration had an extraordinary Effect upon the Army; and absolving all who should die in the Battel, the English became absolutely fearless, and press'd forwards with so much Force and Fury, that the Scots soon abandon'd their King, who still stood bravely to his Arms, 'till his best Friends urg'd him to desist. But his Son Henry esteeming Honour more than Life and Safety, rush'd in among his retiring Soldiers, and with undaunted Courage persuading them to regard themselves and his Person restor'd the Battel for a while; 'till at length being overpower'd by the main Body of the English, he was constrain'd to quit the Field with great Loss and Damage. With the like happy Success King Stephen proceeded against his disobedient Barons, and won from them the Castles of Hereford, Gloceſter, Webley, Bristol, Dudley and Shrewsbury; by which he so much weaken'd the Power of Earl Robert, that he was oblig'd to fly into France, resolving to procure his Sister the Empress to come over into England. These Domestick Obstacles being remov'd, the King resolv'd to prosecute the War in the North which Thurstan had happily begun; and first gaining the Castle of Leids, he march'd into Scotland, where in a short Time a Peace was concluded between the two Kings: And Stephen returning thence, brought the valiant Prince Henry with him into England, and at the Siege of Ludlow Castle, that adventrous Youth was by the Besieg'd pluck'd from his Horse with an Iron Grapple, and had been taken, had not King Stephen with extraordinary Valour and Honour, recover'd him, and won the Castle. In the same Year, a Synod was call'd at Westminster by Alberic the Pope's Legate; where, by all the Bishops in England, Theobald, Abbot of Bec in Normandy, was elected and consecrated Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, to the general Satisfaction of the Nation, since that Archbishoprick had been vacant above two Years.

King Stephen is successful.

Malmsb. Vitalis.

II. King Stephen had now by his Valour and Vigilance rais'd himself to a high Pitch of Grandeur, and seem'd well establish'd in his Kingdom; but upon the Report of the Empress designing to come into England in Person, his Jealousie occasion'd him to commit an Error which gave him great Disturbance, and vastly weaken'd his Interest; and this was an unseasonable Breach between him and those Bishops who had set the Crown upon his Head, who were now too powerful to be crush'd at once. About this Time Roger Bishop of Salisbury had built two magnificent Castles, one at the Devises, another at Sherburn, beginning a third at Malmesbury, and a fourth at Salisbury; and likewise his Nephew Alexander Bishop of Lincoln had built a Castle at Newark, as he alledg'd, for the Safety and Dignity of his Bishoprick. Nigel Bishop of Ely, another Nephew of Bishop Roger, also imitated these in their Grandeur and Magnificence; so that these three seldom appear'd at the King's Court without vast Trains of armed Followers. All this rais'd great Envy among the Earls and Barons, who took occasion to infuse such jealous Thoughts into the King, that he judg'd himself unsafe 'till he had stripp'd them of their Power and Grandeur. He soon found an Opportunity in a grand Council held at Oxford, where the Retainers and Servants of the Bishop of Salisbury happen'd to contend with those of Alan Earl of Bretaign about securing of Lodgings, in which Contest many were wounded, and one Knight kill'd, but the Bishop's Men were Superior in the Conflict. The King taking advantage of this Riot, commanded the fore-mention'd Bishops to be conven'd, that they might satisfie the Court for their Servants Breach of the Peace, and the Satisfaction he requir'd, was no less than than the Delivering up their Caſtles into his Hands as a Security for their future Fidelity. They were willing to give Satisfaction; but upon debating whether they ſhould yield up their Caſtles, he commanded that they ſhould be kept cloſe Priſoners, to prevent their Eſcape. The Biſhop of Salisbury was carry'd unbound, and his Son Roger, the Chancellor of England whom he had by a Concubine, was carry'd in Fetters before the Caſtle of Deviſes, which Nigel Biſhop of Ely, who had eſcap'd thither from Oxford, held out againſt the King. By this ſevere Treatment the Caſtles of Sherburn, Salisbury and Malmesbury were ſurrender'd upon the firſt Summons; as was that of the Deviſes, after three Days Siege. His other Nephew the Biſhop of Lincoln purchas'd his Liberty by a ſpeedy ſurrender of Sleaford Caſtle into the King's Hands. In the Caſtles of Sherburn and the Deviſes the King found ſuch vaſt Quantities of ready Mony, that by ſending a great Part of it to Lewis King of France, he not only obtain'd his Friendſhip, but alſo his Siſter Conſtantia for his Son Prince Euſtace, tho' the Marriage was not conſummated 'till the following Year.

He ſeizes their Caſtles and their Treaſure.

This Act of the King's occaſion'd great Debates; Hugh Arch-Biſhop of Roven, and his Advocate, was of Opinion, That Biſhops might juſtly be depriv'd of thoſe Caſtles which were not built by the Allowance of the Canons; that they ought to be Evangeliſts of Peace, not Creators of ſuch Places as were Sanctuaries for their diſloyal Practices. The King's Brother, the Biſhop of Wincheſter and now the Pope's Legate, affirm'd, That if Biſhops tranſgreſs'd, they were not to be try'd in the King's Court, but to be judg'd by the Canons, nor to be depriv'd of any Thing but in a publick Synod; and immediately ſummon'd the King his Brother to appear in the Council he intended to hold at Wincheſter on the 29th Day of Auguſt. At which Day appear'd moſt of the Biſhops of England, with Theobald Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury; where the Legate, after producing the Pope's Commiſſion, in a Latin Speech aggravated the Fact of his Brother, in that he had ſeiz'd on the Perſons of the Biſhops, even under the Protection of his own Court; exhorting all preſent to conſult what was needful to be done in this Exigency, and declaring, that he would put the Decree of the Council in Execution, tho' it was with the Loſs of his Brother's Friendſhip, his own Eſtate, or his Life. The King not diſtruſting his Cauſe, ſent ſome of the Earls into the Synod, to know why he was conven'd thither, to whom the Legate anſwer'd, That he was guilty of ſuch a Crime as that Age never ſaw; and being himſelf a Chriſtian, he ought not to take it amiſs, if he was call'd by the Miniſters of Chriſt to make Satisfaction; therefore if his Brother would take his Advice, he would do wiſely to give an immediate Reaſon for this Action, or ſubmit to the Judgment of the Canons. Upon which Alberic de Ver, a great Lawyer, ſoon after carry'd the King's Anſwer, and in Defence of his Maſter, urg'd many Things againſt the Biſhops, as being Movers of Sedition, and Correſponders with the King's Enemies; That they were not ſeiz'd as Biſhops, but as the King's Servants; and that they themſelves ſurrender'd their Caſtles as a Compoſition for the Crimes they had committed. The Biſhop of Salisbury deny'd that he was the King's Servant, and threaten'd, That if he could not find Juſtice in this Synod, he would ſeek it in a higher Court. The Legate ſaid, That the Crimes of which the Biſhops ſtood accus'd, ought to be prov'd in the Synod, before they could be ſentenc'd; therefore the King ought firſt to reinveſt them in their Poſſeſſions, otherwiſe whilſt remaining diſſeiz'd, by the Law of Nations, they were not to plead. After many Allegations on both Sides, at the King's Requeſt, the Cauſe was adjourn'd to the next Day, and to the next after that, 'till the Arrival of the Arch-Biſhop of Roven; who granted, That the Biſhops might have Caſtles, if the Canons allow'd them; but ſtill urg'd the Neceſſity of the Times. To which Alberic de Ver added, That if they preſum'd to ſend any Biſhops or other Perſons, to the Court of Rome, contrary to the King's Will, and the Dignity of the Kingdom, their Return would be very difficult. By this they underſtood that the

the King would not abide by the Cenſure of the Canons, and therefore the Biſhops thought it beſt to forbear pronouncing it; firſt becauſe it would be a raſh Thing to excommunicate their Prince without the Knowledge of the Pope; ſecondly becauſe they found that the Soldiers were ready to revenge it: Upon which the Synod was diſſolv'd within three Days after it was call'd. Yet the Legate and Arch-Biſhop, according to their Duty, threw themſelves at the King's Feet, beſeeching him to be merciful to the Church and his own Soul, and to conſult his Reputation ſo as not to ſuffer a Breach to be made between the Secular and Eccleſiaſtical Governments.

But comes to no Determination.

Malmſb. Vitalis. &c. Theſe Diviſions between the King and the Biſhops occaſion'd many to rebel, and incourag'd the Empreſs to come over in Perſon, who with her Brother Robert landed at Arundel in September, with an inconſiderable Party of an hundred and forty Men; which Attempt is by Malmesbury compared to that of Julius Cæſar, who with one Legion began the Conqueſt of the Roman Empire. They were kindly receiv'd by Adeliſa the Queen Dowager, to whoſe Husband the Caſtle belong'd, and after a ſhort Refreſhment the Earl committing his Siſter to the Care of her Mother-in-Law, march'd through the Enemy's Country as far as Briſtol with only twelve Knights and Attendants. King Stephen was then imploy'd in the Siege of Marlburgh Caſtle, but hearing of a more dangerous Enemy, he ſoon remov'd, and march'd towards Arundel; upon whoſe Approach Queen Adeliſa, fearing her Caſtle ſhould be taken and her ſelf made a Priſoner, by a Meſſage to the King, declar'd, That ſhe was ready to take her Oath, That ſhe was not the Occaſion of the Landing of the Empreſs or her Adherents, nor had entertain'd them as his Enemies, but only as her near Relations and ancient Acquaintance. Upon which Meſſage Stephen by an uncommon Strain of Generoſity, caus'd the Empreſs, his great Rival, to be ſafely and honourably conducted to Briſtol; where ſhe remain'd for the Space of two Months, and then remov'd to Gloceſter; ſo that all thoſe Parts, even to the Borders of Wales, partly by Force, and partly through Inclination, before the End of this Year ſubmitted to the Empreſs.

The Empreſs Matilda arrives in England.

She goes to Gloceſter.

Malmſb. &c. And now began all the Miſeries of a Civil War, and we find nothing but taking and retaking of Towns and Caſtles, Plundering and Burning of Houſes and Churches, and all the Marks of Trouble and Deſolation. If any Earl or great Man injur'd or affronted another, both Parties frequently got together all their Knights that held of them, their other Tenants and poor Dependants, with all the Aſſiſtance of their Friends and Confederates, and burnt each others Caſtles and Houſes, deſtroy'd their Lands and Territories, and carry'd away the Inhabitants Priſoners. And now there were in England ſo many Tyrants, as there were Lords of Caſtles, every one pretending to coin Mony, and to exerciſe the Rights of Soveraignty; and to add to theſe Calamities, the King had with him great Numbers of Flemmings and Britains, who being accuſtom'd to live by Plundering, came into England to devour the Riches of the Land. In the mean Time Stephen perform'd all the Parts of a vigilant Commander, and cloſely beſieg'd Matilda and her Brother in Wallingford Caſtle; but finding great Difficulties, and little Proſpect of Succeſs, he caus'd a remarkable Tower of Wood to be there erected, which he well furniſh'd with Men and Ammunition, and then remov'd to the Siege of Malmesbury. At the ſame Time his Brother of Wincheſter, a valiant and politick Prelate, was no leſs induſtrious in his Behalf; for inviting ſeveral Noblemen to his Palace at Wincheſter, he detain'd them Priſoners, 'till he compell'd them to ſurrender their Forts and Caſtles to the King. In the mean Time Earl Robert took and plunder'd Worceſter; Ralph Painel, in favour of the Empreſs, took and burnt the Town of Nottingham; and Ranulph Earl of Cheſter, joining with Robert, whoſe Daughter he had marry'd, gave continual Annoyance to the King, tho' he had receiv'd great Honours from his Hands. The Empreſs her ſelf, the better to ſecure her own Perſon, and to give Acceſs to her Friends, took up her Quarters in Lincoln, and ſtored that great City with all Neceſſaries, in order for a long Abode.

But abandons it.

King Stephen, as vigilant as the other was politick, march'd directly and beſieg'd the City, where he had ſurpriz'd his greateſt Enemy, had ſhe not found Means to eſcape; ſo poſſeſſing himſelf of that Place, he reduc'd the whole Country to a peaceable Condition. Shortly after his Departure, Ranulph Earl of Cheſter with his Counteſs and Brother, coming to Lincoln to keep their Chriſtmaſs, the Citizens knowing the King's Jealouſies, ſent ſecret Intelligence to him, That if he would ſurprize both theſe Brothers, he had now a fair Opportunity. Upon which the King immediately after Chriſtmaſs march'd thither with great Expedition; and while they, thus circumvented, ſtood on their Guard in the Caſtle, the Earl eſcap'd, and begg'd the Aſſiſtance of the Empreſs to reſcue his Wife and Brother, who were now cloſely beſieg'd. Earl Robert upon this Intelligence immediately join'd with Ranulph, and gather'd all their Forces to relieve their Friends in Lincoln; where reſolutely wading through the River, upon Candlemaſs Day they appear'd in Order of Battel near the King's Camp. The King, tho' he was not ſtrong in Numbers, was ready to receive them, and divided his Army, which conſiſted much of Flemmings, Britains and Normans, into three Bodies; which Method was alſo obſerv'd by the Earl of Gloceſter. Before this fatal Battel began, both Ranulph and Robert made ſevere Invective Orations againſt the Nobility on the King's Side; which was anſwer'd by Baldwin-fitz-Gilbert, who was as ſevere upon thoſe of the Empreſs's Party. Upon which a dreadful Conteſt began on both Sides, and for a while with equal Succeſs; 'till in a ſhort Time the Flemmings and the King's Cavalry fled; whereupon the Earl of Cheſter charg'd the King's Body of Foot, in whoſe Strength he repos'd his greateſt Truſt; but they being overpower'd by the Horſe, began alſo to faint and fly, leaving the King inrag'd both at his Friends Cowardice and his Foes Succeſs. It was a very ſtrange Sight, ſays M. Paris, there to behold King Stephen, left almoſt alone in the Field, yet no Man daring to approach him, while grinding his Teeth and foaming like a furious Wild-Boar, with his Battel-Ax he drove whole Troops before him, to the eternal Renown of his Courage; ſo that if a hundred ſuch had been with him, a whole Army had been unable to have taken him Priſoner. Yet as he was ſingle, he held out, 'till firſt his Battel-Ax broke, and then his Sword flew in Pieces with the Force of his irreſiſtible Strokes; and being weaponleſs, he was beaten down upon his Knees by a large Stone from an unknown Hand, which being ſeen by a valiant Knight call'd William de Kains, he ran in and took hold on the King's Helmet; yet he refus'd to ſurrender himſelf to any but the Earl of Gloceſter, who being near was call'd to take him Priſoner. The Earl preſerv'd him from all Violence to his Perſon, and ſhortly after ſent him Priſoner to the Empreſs at Gloceſter; from whence he was ſent to Briſtol Caſtle; where for a while he was kept in honourable Cuſtody, but afterwards, either through Suſpicion or Hatred, he was inglorioufly fetter'd with Irons.

The Empreſs governs.

III. King Stephen now for a while loſt all the Marks of Soveraignty and Grandeur, and the Empreſs having ſecur'd her moſt formidable Oppoſer, triumph'd in her Fortune, and as the ſole Monarch of the Nation commanded in all Affairs, and diſpos'd of all Dignities and Offices according to her own Pleaſure. Yet ſtill ſhe did not alter her Title of Empreſs, or Queen of the Romans, as appears from her Broad-Seal; under which ſhe granted the Cuſtody of the Tower of London to Geoffry de Mandevil and his Heirs, making Covenants with him, That ſhe would not make Peace with the Citizens of London, without his Conſent, becauſe they were his mortal Enemies: But this Earl being afterwards accidentally apprehended in St. Albans, for his Liberty was oblig'd to ſurrender both the Tower of London and his other Caſtles to King Stephen. Upon this great Succeſs of the Empreſs, the State Men ſtood no longer for Stephen, phen, but their Faiths turning with their Fortunes, they all paid Allegiance to her; the Kentiſh Men only excepted, where Stephen's Queen Matilda, and William de Ypres, maintain'd his Cauſe to the utmoſt of their Powers. Nor was King Stephen diſappointed only of England, but alſo Normandy caſt off his Subjection; for Geoffry of Anjou, Husband to the Empreſs, having Intelligence of the late Victory, induc'd the Normans to join in his Party, by publiſhing the Captivity of Stephen, now unable to relieve them or himſelf; and David King of Scotland was not backwards in ſetting forth the Claim of the Empreſs, and under that Pretence ſeiz'd upon the County of Northumberland. Stephen daily declines.

Malmſb. &c. During theſe Tranſactions the Empreſs to eſtabliſh her Power repair'd to Wincheſter, where ſhe ſwore to the Biſhop, That if he and the Holy Church would receive her as their lawful Queen, he ſhould order and direct all the great Affairs of the Nation, and diſpoſe of all Biſhopricks and Abbies. This was alſo promis'd by the Earl of Gloceſter and ſeveral of the Nobility; upon which the Biſhop readily acknowledg'd her Queen of England, and with ſome of his Friends took an Oath, That as long as ſhe made good her Promiſes, they would be faithful to her. And the next Day ſhe was receiv'd into the Cathedral with a pompous Proceſſion, in Company with many Biſhops, Abbots, Barons and Knights; where the Legate curs'd thoſe who curs'd Her, and bleſs'd thoſe who bleſs'd Her; abſolving the Obedient, and excommunicating the reſt. From Wincheſter ſhe went with the Court to Wilton, where ſhe kept her Eaſter with a mighty Conflux of People; and was recogniz'd by Theobald Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury. Shortly after a General Synod of the Clergy was ſummon'd at Wincheſter under the Legate, who after private and ſeparate Conferences with the Biſhops, Abbots and Arch-Deacons, made a publick Speech, ſetting forth the Cauſe of this Aſſembly, which was to conſult of the Peace of the Country, inſiſting upon the flouriſhing State of the Kingdom under King Henry; who many Years ſince had receiv'd an Oath of England and Normandy, for the Succeſſion of his Daughter and her Iſſue: That ſhe delaying her Coming into England at the Time of his Death; for the Peace of the Nation his Brother was admitted to the Throne. Tho' he had been a Pledge between God and him That he ſhould honour the Church, and maintain righteous Laws; yet with Grief and Shame we could but mention his Misbehaviour: The Peace of the Nation was deſtroy'd, and no Puniſhment inflicted upon Criminals; Biſhops were impriſon'd, and oblig'd to ſurrender their Poſſeſſions; Abbies were ſold, and Churches pillag'd; the Counſel of Ill Men was follow'd, and the Advice of Good Men deſpis'd. That he had convened him before a Synod, but had gain'd nothing but Hatred; He ought indeed to love his Mortal Brother, but much more his Immortal Father: Therefore, added he, ſeeing God has exercis'd his Judgments, by letting him fall into the Hands of powerful Men, leſt the Kingdom ſhould be loſt for want of a Governor, I have call'd you hither by my Legantine Power. Yeſterday the Cauſe was propounded in private to the greateſt Part of the Clergy of England, to whom of Right it belongs to Elect and Ordain a King; and therefore, after invoking the Divine Aſſiſtance, we Elect Matilda Queen of England, the Daughter of the peaceable, glorious and incomparable King Henry. A Council called at Wincheſter, in which the Empreſs is declar'd Queen.

Ibid. All that were preſent aſſented, or by their Silence would not contradict what was done. The Legate alſo told them, That he had ſummon'd the Citizens of London, and expected them the next Day. Accordingly they came, and being brought into the Council, declar'd That they came from the Community of London, not to raiſe any Debates or Conteſts, but to petition that their Lord the King might be releas'd out of Priſon; which was the earneſt Deſire of all the Barons, and great Men lately receiv'd into their Community. The Legate anſwer'd at large, and with a Grace, That it became not the Londoners, who were eſteem'd as Noblemen in England, to join with ſuch Barons as had forſaken their King in Battel, render'd the holy Church contempti- ble, and favour'd them only for their own Advantage. Upon which a Chaplain of King Stephen's Queen, offer'd a Letter from her to the Legate, which becauſe he refus'd to communicate to the Aſſembly, the Chaplain with great Confidence read it himſelf, in which the Quen earneſtly begg'd of the Clergy, particularly the Biſhop of Wincheſter, her Lord's Brother, to reſtore him to the Kingdom, whom his wicked Subjects had caſt into Priſon. To which the Legate gave ſuch an Anſwer as he had given to the Londoners; who after a Conſultation, ſaid, They would communicate the Reſolution of the Council to their Fellow-Citizens, and comply with it as far as they could. This done, many of the King's Party were excommunicated, particularly William Martel, his Steward, whoſe Advice he had follow'd in many Things; and ſo after three Days Seſſion only, the Council was diſſolv'd. From Wilton the Empreſs went to Reading, where with a great Multitude, Robert D'oyly came and offer'd her the Caſtle of Oxford; which ſhe receiv'd with the Homage of that City, and the Country round about. From thence ſhe went to the famous Monaſtery of St. Albans, where many of the London Citizens met her, and treated about delivering the City to her; to which Place ſhe repaired, thinking her ſelf ſafe in the Company of ſo many Biſhops and Barons. At Weſtminſter he was receiv'd with a magnificent Proceſſion, and ſtay'd there ſome Days to give Directions and Orders about the State and Affairs of the Kingdom.

She comes to London.

The Empreſs thus eſtabliſh'd, all now eſteem'd her as Fortune's Darling, and beheld her as their only riſing Sun; and had her Diſcretion been equal to her Reſolution, ſhe might have reign'd many Years in Proſperity. For now the Priſon Walls had obſcur'd and defac'd all the Virtues and Favours of the unfortunate Stephen, whoſe ſorrowful Queen Matilda inceſſantly ſolicited the Empreſs in her Husband's Favour, deſiring his Liberty, but not his Crown, which ſhe ſhould freely enjoy; and thereupon offer'd many great Perſons for Pledges, who gave their Faith for him, That from thenceforward he ſhould devote himſelf to a religious Solitude, becoming either a Monk or a Pilgrim. All which ſhe rejected with great Haughtineſs, and with but little better Grace refus'd the Legate Biſhop of Wincheſter, when he only deſir'd that his Nephew Euſtace might enjoy his Father's Honours and Lands in Normandy. The Londoners likewiſe having lately acknowledg'd her for Queen, thought they might have whatever they deſired, and became Petitioners to her, That ſhe would mitigate the over hard Laws of her Father, and put thoſe of King Edward in full Force. This ſhe abſolutely deny'd; which being in an unſettled State, prov'd very impolitick and pernicious. For firſt Stephen's Queen Matilda ſent to her Son Euſtace, That their Suits muſt be obtain'd only by War; urging him to ſtrengthen his Party by the Aſſiſtance of the Kentiſh Men: Several of the Nobility alſo repin'd, that they were ſo ſlightly regarded, or rather rejected; and the Londoners inrag'd at this laſt Repulſe, endeavour'd to make the Empreſs their Priſoner, and ſo redeem Stephen, who had chiefly their Affections; but ſhe hearing of the Deſign, fled ſecretly in the Night, and retired to Oxford, which in all her Difficulties ſhe ever found true to her, out of Love both to her Cauſe, and the Memory of her Father. At the ſame Time the Biſhop of Wincheſter's high Mind not bearing the Denial of his Suit, upon ſecret Conferences with Stephen's Queen, by her ſorrowful Entreaties began to melt in his Affection towards the diſtreſſed King his Brother; and at length reſolv'd to aſſiſt him to the utmoſt, and abſolv'd all thoſe whom before he had excommunicated, alledging, That the Barons had kept their Faith with the Empreſs, but ſhe had done otherwiſe with them: And thinking it now Time to ſtand up for his Brother, he ſolicited the diſcontented Londoners in his favour, and ſtored the Caſtles of Waltham, Fernham and Wincheſter with Men and Ammunition.

at his Charge, having no Subſiſtance of her own; to requite which Fidelity and other Services, ſhe there created him Earl of Hereford. Having gather'd a conſiderable Force together, ſhe march'd directly to Wincheſter, accompany'd with her Uncle David King of Scotland, her Brother Robert, and many of the Nobility; and arriving at the City, ſhe ſent for the Biſhop, whoſe Intereſt ſhe much deſired, to come to her with all Speed. But he thinking it not ſafe, return'd an equivocal Anſwer, That he would prepare himſelf, as if he deſign'd to follow them; and ſo iſſuing privately out of the City immediately prepar'd himſelf to work her Ruin: For getting the Aſſiſtance of Queen Matilda and her Son Euſtace, the Londoners and William de Ypres, he made good his Party; himſelf and Friends remaining in the City, while the Empreſs and her Nobility defended themſelves in the Caſtle, without daring to go forth among ſo many Enemies. And ſhortly after, knowing the Citizens to be better affected to the Empreſs than himſelf, to gratifie his revengeful Temper, he commanded the City to be ſet on Fire, by which the great Nunnery, the Convent of St. Grimbald, above twenty Churches, and the greateſt Part of the City was conſum'd to Aſhes. Seven Weeks being ſpent in the Siege and Counter-Siege of the City and Caſtle, the Empreſs under great Troubles and Reſtraints, deſir'd to change her Quarters; and with no ſmall Difficulty march'd out with her Brother Earl Reginald, and many other Friends, beſides Earl Robert, who brought up the Reer with two hundred undaunted Followers. She was immediately follow'd by the King's Forces, and many of her Men ſlain and taken Priſoners; but ſhe by good Fortune eſcap'd to the Caſtle of Lutgurſhal, and from thence to the Deviſes; where finding that ſhe was ſtill in Danger, according to Brompton and others, ſhe was oblig'd to be carry'd to Gloceſter in a common Coffin or Herſe, like a dead Corps; in which ſhe had good Occaſion to reflect upon the Chains ſhe had put upon her Rival Stephen. But her Brother Earl Robert met with worſe Fortune, who while he was more careful in providing for her Safety than his own, was taken Priſoner, and brought back to Wincheſter, where he was preſented by the Biſhop to Queen Matilda, who committed him to the Cuſtody of William de Ypres, and for more Security ſent him to Rocheſter: But others taking Sanctuary in the Nunnery of Warwell, were burnt, together with the Place. Robert, ſtill undaunted in his Misfortunes, tho' he was tempted by Promiſes and urg'd by Threats to deſert his Siſter's Cauſe, yet nothing would prevail with him; nor would he enter into any Treaty for his own Releaſe, without her Conſent, or to her Prejudice. But within the Space of ſix Months, the King and he were both exchang'd upon equal Terms; ſo that each Party was left at liberty to purſue the War with as great Eagerneſs as ever.

Malmsb. Not long after the Biſhop of Wincheſter proceeded in his Deſign to ruin the Empreſs, and by his Legantine Authority ſummon'd a Synod to meet at Weſtminſter; where the Pope's Letters to him were openly read, in which he blam'd him for ſo little endeavouring to reſtore his Brother, exhorting him to uſe all Power both Eccleſiaſtical and Secular to effect it. King Stephen alſo in this Council complain'd, That his Subjects, to whom he had never deny'd Juſtice, had impriſon'd, and reproachfully treated him to his great Affliction. Upon which the Legate by his Rhetorick endeavour'd to juſtifie his own Proceedings, alledging, That he had receiv'd the Empreſs by Compulſion, not Choice; and when the King's Army was routed, and his Nobility fled, ſhe with her Adherents came to Wincheſter; and whatever Promiſes ſhe made there, ſhe had wilfully broke. He further urg'd, That ſhe and her Friends had contriv'd to deprive him both of his Dignity and Life, but God had defeated her Deſigns; and the King his Brother being now freed from his Impriſonment, he commanded them on the behalf of God and the Pope, that they would aſſiſt him with their whole Power, 'Who was anointed by the Will of the People, and 'Aſſent of the Apoſtolick See; and that he would excommunicate all Diſturbers of the publick Peace, that favour'd the Cauſe of the Empreſs. The Legate's Words were not very grateful to all the Clergy, tho' none reply'd, but out of Fear and Reverence kept ſilence; only one Lay-Meſſenger from the Empreſs boldly forbad the Legate, by the Fealty he had ſworn to the Empreſs, to act any Thing contrary to her Honour or Intereſt, adding, That ſhe came into England by his Invitation, and that her impriſoning the King was by his Approbation. All this, and much more, which he urg'd againſt the Legate with great Shapneſs, could not move him to return any Anſwer, or to ſhew any Paſſion, much leſs to deſiſt from his late Deſigns.

A. D. 1142. Reg. 7/8.

In the following Year Earl Robert, fearing the King's Power and his Siſter's Declenſion, went into Normandy to ſolicit her Husband Geoffry for her Aſſiſtance. But that Earl having Troubles with his own Nobility, and the Normans being ſcarcely brought to Subjection, thought it not convenient to leave his Country; therefore he only ſent ſome Forces with Robert, and with them his young Son Prince Henry into England. The Empreſs in his Abſence had ſtrongly fortify'd her ſelf in Oxford, whom King Stephen follow'd with an eager Purſuit, and won the Suburbs to the City Gates; and reſolving not to deſiſt 'till he had got her in his Poſſeſſion, he ſo cloſely beſieg'd her, that for two Months whatſoever Strength or Stratagem could perform on either Side was there put in practice. 'Till at length Want made the Beſieg'd think of a Surrender; upon which the Empreſs was once more forc'd to make uſe of Policy, and to take Advantage of the Sharpneſs of the Winter, when the River Thames was cover'd with Ice and Snow. Being reduc'd to Extremity, ſhe undertook a dangerous Attempt; for cloathing her ſelf, and a ſelect Company with white Linnen Garments, to deceive the Eyes of the Sentinels, ſhe iſſu'd ſecretly by Night out of a Poſtern Gate, and paſſing the frozen River ran on Foot through Ice, Snow, Ditches and Vallies for five Miles, as far as Abington, with the Snow ſtill driving in their Faces; and there taking Horſe, the ſame Night recover'd the Caſtle of Wallingford, to the great Joy and Admiration of that Garriſon. In the mean Time Earl Robert, and Prince Henry had beſieg'd and taken the Caſtle of Warham, hoping to divert the King from the Siege of Oxford; but ſoon after hearing of the ſtrange Eſcape of the Empreſs, he came with young Henry to his Mother, whoſe Sight made her forget the many Troubles ſhe had endur'd. Here Malmesbury, the moſt judicious and conſiderable of the Monkiſh Writers, concludes his Hiſtory, being patroniz'd by Robert Earl of Gloceſter.

A. D. 1143. Reg. 8/9, &c.

In the Beginning of the next Year, King Stephen was preſent at a Synod in London, which was held by the Legate Biſhop of Wincheſter, in which it was ordain'd, 'That whoever laid violent Hands upon one in Holy Orders, 'ſhould not be abſolv'd, but by the Pope himſelf, and then only in his Preſence. Which laſt Clauſe to a former Decree made in the Reign of King Henry, render'd the Perſons of all Eccleſiaſticks for the future inviolable. This was a moſt ſeaſonable Ordinance for the Clergy, for now daily Devaſtations and Outrages were committed in all Parts, and a diſmal Civil War was carry'd on for ſeveral Years in this Nation. Of this we have but a ſhort and ſlender Account: We find that Oxford was ſurrender'd to the King upon Conditions, and that Wilton was fired by Earl Robert. Then the Tower of London, with the Caſtles of Walden and Pleeſes, and afterwards that of Lincoln were yielded to Stephen; the Caſtles of Warham and Portland ſubmitted to the Empreſs: The Earls of Cheſter and Eſſex were ſurpriz'd by the King; and his Favourite William Martel was taken and impriſon'd by Robert. Thus about four Years paſs'd with Variety of Succeſs, and every Year on each Side produc'd freſh Calamities, to the infinite Damage of the whole Kingdom, and moſtly to the ſtrengthning and encreaſing King Stephen's Intereſt. For during this Time, the two famous Earls, Robert of Gloceſter, and Milo of Hereford, Men of great Abilities and unſhaken Fidelity to the Empreſs, both loſt their Lives, one by a Diſtemper, and the other by an Accident. The Empreſs leaves the Nation.

Hunting. Hoveden. Gervaſe. IV. Upon the Departure of the Empreſs, King Stephen began to take freſh Courage, and caus'd ſeveral of the Barons to ſwear Allegiance to his Son Euſtace; by which Compliment he ſuppos'd all Things had been ſecure on his Side. In the ſame Year he repair'd to Lincoln, and for a while kept his Court there; and to ſhew his Grandeur, wore his Crown at the Chriſtmaſs Solemnity, which no King before him durſt undertake to do in that City, being deterr'd by a certain ſuperſtitious Propheſie, foretelling Death, or ſome extraordinary Misfortune to any Prince who attempted it, which the King not regarding, is therefore by our Hiſtorians commended for his Courage. In this Year alſo, or the next, Pope Eugene in a Council held at Rheims, without the Conſent of the greateſt Part of his Cardinals, ſolemnly depriv'd William Arch-Biſhop of York, becauſe he had been nominated by the King before he was canonically elected, and the Chapter of York commanded to make a new Election, which fell upon Henry Murdac Abbot of the Monaſtery of Fountains; and William was oblig'd to retire to Henry Biſhop of Wincheſter, who maintain'd him 'till the Death of the ſaid Pope.

Gervaſ. Hunting. Hoveden. &c. While King Stephen thought himſelf ſecure in his Throne, Prince Henry, now about ſixteen Years of Age, reſolv'd to make one Attempt more for a Crown, and accordingly came over into England with a ſmall but ſelect Army; to whom were join'd the diſcontented Earl of Cheſter, Roger Son of the deceas'd Milo, with many Knights and valiant Men of the Engliſh. Henry ſoon march'd into the North, and met with his Coſen David King of Scotland, by whom he was moſt honourably receiv'd, and ſolemnly knighted. From that Time he ſought all Occaſion to provoke both Stephen and his Son Euſtace; and having ſetled ſome Affairs with his chief Counſellors for the Purſuit of his Deſigns in England, he return'd into Normandy, to tranſact ſome other Buſineſs that might be available to theſe Ends. Where he ſtay'd not long before his Father Geoffry dy'd, and left him in Poſſeſſion both of the Dukedom of Normandy and the Earldom of Anjou. And to add to his growing Greatneſs, in the eighteenth Year of his Age, he marry'd the fam'd Eleanor, Dutcheſs of Guienne and Aquitain, who had lately been divorc'd from Lewis King of France for Conſanguinity and Suſpicion of Adultery, after ſhe had born him two Daughters. Lewis now fearing Iſſue made by this Marriage, to the diſinheriting of his ſaid Daughters, was highly incens'd with Duke Henry; and Stephen alſo fearing his Greatneſs, having now the Provinces of Normandy, Anjou, Guienne, Aquitain and Poictou, both of them ſought all Methods to diminiſh his Power. Lewis with Prince Euſtace oppos'd him in foreign Parts, and Stephen in England; where to ſecure the Succeſſion, he endeavour'd to inveſt Prince Euſtace with the Engliſh Diadem, in order to cut off all Hopes from Duke Henry. And calling a grand Council at London, King Stephen commanded Theobald Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury to crown his Son Euſtace, which he abſolutely refus'd, alledging, That the Pope had forbidden him to crown him, whoſe Father had contrary to his Oath uſurp'd the Kingdom. At which Repulſe, the King ſhut up all the Biſhops with their Primate in one Houſe; but the latter made his Eſcape, and fled into Normandy, which intirely defeated the King's Deſigns. But to be reveng'd on him for this Diſappointment, he ſeiz'd on all his Lands and Poſſeſſions.

But Duke Henry, having put a ſtop to the Wars abroad, return'd into England with King Stephen haſtning to their Succour, encamp'd near the Enemy, and being ready to give Battel, the Winter Storms prevented him; but ſoon after, while the King at the Head of his Army was giving Orders for a Battel, his Horſe mounted thrice with his fore Legs, 'till at laſt he fell down backwards, to the great Hazard of the King's Perſon. Upon which William Earl of Arundel, a brave and eloquent Man, took occaſion to exhort the King To be warn'd by theſe ill Omens, and not to expect any Succeſs againſt the juſter Cauſe; aud that there were ſo many near Relations and Friends ſet againſt each other, that they could not engage without a great and unnatural Effuſion of Blood; therefore he ought to ſend Meſſengers to the Duke to treat of a Peace. Upon which Advice it was reſolv'd to come to a Parly, which was ſignify'd to Duke Henry; who being warm and ready for Battel, could hardly moderate his youthful Ardour; yet by the Importunity of his Friends he yielded to an Interview with the King near Wallingford, where the River Thames being narrow, they could diſcourſe together from the oppoſite Banks. After a long and private Conference, they both return'd to their Camps, and ſoon after agreed to a Ceſſation of all Hoſtilities.

But Euſtace the King's Son was highly diſoblig'd by this Treaty, which he knew would end to his Prejudice, and leaving the Court in a Paſſion, march'd into Cambridgeſhire, and then into Suffolk; where coming to the Abby of St. Edmund's-Bury, he was treated with all Reſpect, but not receiving Mony which he demanded for his Soldiers, he order'd them to ſeize upon all the Corn belonging to the Abby; but ſitting down to Dinner, upon the firſt Bit he eat, he fell into a Frenzy, and expir'd in a little Time. He was eighteen Years of Age, born to be never out of the Calamities of War, and was bury'd at Feverſham with his Mother Matilda, who deceas'd a little before, without any real Injoyment of a Crown. Stephen began to find the Puniſhments of Heav'n in theſe great Loſſes, and upon the expiring of the Truce, many fell from him, and many Caſtles were loſt, as Bertnell, Reading, Warwick, Stamford and others. And under theſe Afflictions he was more inclinable to a Peace, which was much promoted by Arch-Biſhop Theobald; and alſo Henry of Wincheſter, who by making his Brother King had brought ſuch Miſeries upon the Nation, now ſtrucken with Remorſe, contributed his utmoſt Aſſiſtance to this great Work. Upon which a grand Council was ſummon'd both by the King and Duke to meet at Wincheſter, conſiſting of all the great Men of either Party, who were joyfully receiv'd with a ſolemn Proceſſion; and there in the Preſence of infinite Multitudes the King led the Duke by the Hand, and then a Peace was concluded on theſe Conditions: 'Firſt that Stephen ſhould enjoy the Crown of England during Life: Secondly, upon his Deceaſe, Henry ſhould ſucceed him as his Lawful Heir. Then the King adopted the Duke for his Son, and at the ſame time pay'd him Reverence, and acknowledg'd him as a Father and Lord; and Earl William, the King's only ſurviving lawful Son, at his Father's Command did Homage to the Duke. After theſe Things were ſolemnly perform'd, and ratify'd by the mutual Oaths of the King, Biſhops and Temporal Lords, a firm Peace, which for many Years had been baniſh'd from the Nation, was happily reſtor'd. The Duke was receiv'd, with the King, at London, at Oxford, at Canterbury, and other Places, with all Demonſtrations of Joy; but the Duke's Pleaſures were interrupted by a Conſpiracy againſt his Perſon by certain Flemmings; but juſt upon the Execution, William the King's Son, who was concern'd in it, falling from his Horſe upon Burham Down, broke his Leg, and for Want of a Leader the Deſign fail'd. However it occaſion'd the Duke to take his final Leave of the King, and paſs over into Normandy, where after a Year's Abſence he was joyfully receiv'd by his Mother, Wife and all his Subjects.

Hunting, &c. King Stephen now had a fair Proſpect of reaping all the Pleaſures that a Crown in Peace could afford him, and accordingly us'd all laudable Methods for the repairing the Ruins of the Kingdom; but God thought fit to allow him but a ſhort Enjoyment of that Crown he ſo unjuſtly acquired, and after he had puniſh'd him with the Loſs of all Hopes of the Succeſſion in his Family, he took him out of this World upon the 25th Day of October, after a calamitous Reign of eighteen Years, nine Months, and ſeventeen Days. He was near fifty Years of Age, and dy'd of his old Diſtemper the Emroids, accompany'd with Iliack Pains, being bury'd by his Wife and Son at Feverſham in the Abby Church of that Monaſtery which he himſelf had founded. As to his Character he had undoubtedly many princely Qualities, as Valour, Affability, and Generoſity both to his Friends and Enemies; but at the ſame Time he was unmeaſurably ambitious, reſolving to be no Slave to his Word or Oath, which brought vaſt Calamities upon him and others. Yet he ſhew'd ſignal Marks of Devotion, particularly in the Founding the Abbies of Cogſhall in Eſſex, of Furneſs in Lancaſhire, Feverſham in Kent, and the Nunneries of Carew and Higham. Setting aſide his Ambition and unjuſt Title, he was an excellent Prince; none burthening their Subjects with fewer Taxes, nor governing with greater Clemency; and notwithſtanding the many Inſurrections, he is ſaid never to have put one Man to Death. The Cuſtom of holding the ſplendid Aſſemblies or Curiæ at the three great Feſtivals, which in the former Reign began to languiſh, by reaſon of the unſetled Times was now wholly laid aſide. Theſe Times of Confuſion alſo gave the Pope and Clergy great Opportunities to encroach upon the Regal Power, and to introduce new Laws, Uſages and Cuſtoms. Particularly the Pope's Canon Law was now firſt brought into the Nation; which was compil'd into a Code or Body by Gratian, and publiſh'd by Pope Eugene in the Year 1151. The Occaſion of bringing it hither was a great Conteſt between the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, and the Biſhop of Wincheſter; which brought over Lawyers from Rome, together with their Law, Vacarius being the firſt Profeſſor of it in Oxford.

I. THE Miſeries of the late Civil Wars had ſo conquer'd the Spirit of Ambition in the Land, that tho' Stephen left a Son behind him, who wanted not a conſiderable Intereſt, Duke Henry found an eaſie and uninterrupted Acceſſion to the Throne of England. Tho' he was a French Man by Birth, he came to the Crown neither unexpected, nor undeſired; for the Opinion of the Nation, and the Hopes conceiv'd of his future Government, had the Force to keep England in an intire Obedience above ſix Weeks without the Preſence of a King; whoſe Entrance, like that of the Soul into the Body, did immediately invigorate the whole Kingdom. He was ſoon after his Arrival ſolemnly crown'd King at Weſtminſter, together with Eleanor his Queen, by Theobald Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, on the nineteenth Day of December, with the loud Acclamations of all the People, being now about twenty one Years of Age. He was ſirnam'd Plantagenet, that is Planta Geneſta, or Broom Plant; and being Son of the Empreſs, who was Grand-Daughter to Queen Margaret the Siſter of Edgar Etheling, in him the Royal Line of the old Engliſh Saxons was reſtored. He was not only the neareſt Heir to the Crown, after his Mother's Deceaſe, but was alſo the moſt powerful Monarch that had hitherto ſate upon the Engliſh Throne; being, beſides England and Normandy, poſſeſs'd of a great Part of France before recited.

M. Paris. Hoveden. Gervaſe. In order to reſtore a ruinous and waſted Country, he began with demoliſhing ſeveral Caſtles, which had been the Neſts of Rebellion, and reſum'd others to his own Uſe; and likewiſe ſuch Lands and Eſtates as had been alienated from the Crown, as the unjuſt Reward of thoſe who withſtood his Title. Others write, that he promiſcuouſly reſum'd all ſuch Lands, as were by a ſet Number of Jurors found at any Time to have belong'd to the Crown. He reduc'd ſome Noblemen unduly created to a private Condition, and clear'd the Nation of Foreign Soldiers; eſpecially from the Flemmings, whoſe mercenary Swarms had been moſt burdenſome to the Land, and pernicious to his Cauſe. Then to preſerve good Government, he choſe a Body of Counſellors out of the moſt eminent of the Clergy and Laity; as Theobald Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, Thomas Becket, Arch-Deacon of the ſame See, whom he made Chancellor of England, as alſo John of Oxenford, with divers other Prelates; of the Laity he had Robert Earl of Leiceſter, chief Juſticiary of England, Richard de Lucie, Jocelin de Bailull, Alan de Nevile, and others; but in his Cabinet Council, he had his Mother the Empreſs, now one of the moſt experienc'd Ladies of the Age. Thus furniſh'd, he aſſembled a Council or Parliament at Wallingford, where he caus'd the whole Kingdom to ſwear to the Succeſſion of his two young Sons William and Henry, the former dying not long after; and here he confirm'd the Laws of St. Edward, and the ancient Cuſtoms of the Kingdom, and likewiſe granted a ſhort Charter of Liberties, which in Subſtance is a bare Confirmation of all that his Grand-father Henry I. had granted. Theſe hopeful Beginnings of ſo young a King were as grateful to the Quiet and Peaceable, as they were unpleaſant to the Wicked and Rapacious; who were now either forc'd to leave the Country, or put on the Appearance of Honeſty; by which Means all Men quietly enjoy'd the Fruits of a long deſired Peace.

Hoveden. M. Paris. &c. King Henry having ſetled his Affairs in England to his Satisfaction, haſten'd into France to King Lewis, where he did Homage to him for Normandy, Aquitain, Anjou, Main and Tourain; which were partly his own Patrimony, and partly the Inheritance of Eleanor his Queen. But his Brother Geoffry having a juſt Title to the Earldom of Anjou, by his Father's Will, held out that Country againſt him. Yet Henry, tho' he himſelf had ſworn to obey his Father's Will, never regarded it; but procuring Pope Adrian to diſpenſe with his Oath, by Force he unjuſtly diſpoſſeſs'd his Brother of all his Territories, and oblig'd him to accept of an Annuity of a thouſand Pounds Engliſh, and two thouſand more of Anjouvin Mony; which in the third Year was ended by the Death of Geoffry. After this Succeſs King Henry return'd into England, and at Cheſter he contracted a Friendſhip with Malcolm King of Scotland, upon the ſame Terms with his Grand-father Henry; upon which Malcolm ſurrender'd the City of Carliſle, Newcaſtle upon Tine, and that of Bamborough, and King Henry reſtored to him the Earldom of Huntington in England.

The King daily increas'd in Strength and Power; and yet the Welſh, a reſtleſs People, ſtill ventur'd to make frequent Incurſions into England, which occaſion'd Henry to raiſe a powerful Army to ſubdue them, and bring them to a peaceable Correſpondency. The Enemy truſting to the Security of their Woods and Mountains, retreated thither upon his Approach; and the Van of the King's Army marching in thoſe difficult Places, was intercepted by them, and a great Part of it cut in Pieces. Upon which Henry de Eſſex, the King's hereditary Standard-Bearer, threw down his Standard and fled, alſo reporting that the King was ſlain, which put the whole Army into a great Confuſion; but upon the King's ſudden Appearance it receiv'd new Vigour, rallied, and forc'd the Enemy to ſuch Terms as ſatisfy'd the King. He cut down their Woods, and made open Ways into their Country, had the Caſtle of Roelent, and all other Places ſurrender'd to him which they had taken from his Predeceſſors, and receiving the Homage and Fealty of their Nobles and great Men, he return'd in

But Henry de Eſſex for his Cowardice was charg'd with Treaſon by Robert de Montfort, a valiant Nobleman, and in a Trial by a ſingle Combate was vanquiſh'd, for which his Life was forfeited by Law; but the King ſpared it, and caus'd him to be ſhorn a Monk in the Abby of Reading, and ſeiz'd upon all his vaſt Eſtate. Not long after the King's third Son Richard was born in his Palace at Oxford, who afterwards ſucceeded his Father in the Kingdom. The Beginning of which Year the King ſpent in a Progreſs through England, and coming to the City of Lincoln, he caus'd himſelf to be again crown'd in a Suburb call'd Wickford, without the Walls, being deterr'd by ſome ſuperſtitious Propheſies from wearing the Crown in the City it ſelf, which tho' it had before been deſpis'd by King Stephen, yet this King could not free himſelf from thoſe vain Apprehenſions. In the following Year he and his Queen were again crown'd at Worceſter upon Eaſter Sunday; and coming to the Oblation, they there devoutly offer'd up their Crowns at the High-Altar, vowing never to wear them after, which they ſtrictly obſerv'd. After this we do not find many of our Kings to have worn their Crowns at the great Feſtivals as formerly.

After which King Henry, after a long Abſence from England, return'd with great Satisfaction, Honour and Reputation.

A. D. 1163. Reg. 9. The Riſe of Thomas Becket.

II. King Henry, in the midſt of his Proſperity and Grandeur, began now to be exceedingly diſturb'd and perplex'd, by a famous Conteſt between him and Thomas Becket; a Man of an aſpiring Temper, and invincible Reſolution, who by Birth was a Londoner, and by Profeſſion a Civilian. Being in holy Orders, he was made Arch-Deacon of Canterbury, and then advanc'd to be Lord Chancellor of England, in which high Station he carry'd himſelf like a Soveraign King; and in the late Wars between the Kings of England and France, beſides his own Retinue, he maintain'd ſeven hundred Knights or Horſe-men, and alſo twelve thouſand others of leſs Quality, with four thouſand mercenary Footmen for one Month; and tho' he was a Clerk, he tilted with a French Knight, diſmounted him, and gain'd his Horſe. Upon the Death of Theobald Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, tho' the Monks objected againſt Becket, as being a Courtier and a Soldier, yet in the Year 1162 the King gave him that Arch-Biſhoprick, partly in Reward of former Services, and partly in Hopes of greater to come. But immediately after his Conſecration, he not only reſign'd his Office of Chancellor, returning his Seal to the King, but alſo wholly chang'd his former Courſe of Life, put on a ſevere rigid Monk's Habit, liv'd an auſtere Life, alter'd and order'd his Family accordingly; and contrary to the King's Expectations, withdrew himſelf from his Obedience and Service,

Service, and oppos'd him in many Things. The grand Conteſt was concerning the Regal and Pontifical Authority, and was firſt diſputed upon the Account of the numerous Abuſes and Corruptions of the Church Men, who were then grown to a dangerous Height; of which Newburg, who liv'd in theſe Times, gives us this Account. It was declar'd in the King's Preſence, That the Clergy had committed above a hundred Murthers during his Reign, which highly provoking the King, he was ſomewhat too violent in puniſhing them; for which the Prelates ought to be blam'd, in giving ſo great an Occaſion. For whereas the Canons ordain'd, that Clerks for inferior, as well as heinous Offences, ſhould be degraded, and thouſands of ſuch were then in the Church, like much Chaff among a little good Corn; yet very few for many Years had been depriv'd. The Prelates, while they rather ſtrove to ſupport the Liberties and Dignities of the Clerks, than to puniſh and exterminate their Vices, thought they were ſerviceable to God and the Church, in protecting ſuch heinous Offenders from publick Puniſhment, whom by the Duty of their Places they ought to correct; by which Liberty and Impunity, they fear'd not God, whoſe Judgments they thought far diſtant, nor Men in Authority; ſince on the one Side their Prelates neglected to reform them, and on the other, they were by their Order exempt from Temporal Juriſdiction.

The Corruptions of the Church-Men.

Nubrigen. Hoveden. This being the State of the Church and Kingdom, in which ſome were ſo injur'd without Remedy, and others ſo injurious without Reſtraint, as if neither Sort were in the Condition of Subjects; the King, out of his Wiſdom and Zeal, took particular Care to revive the publick Diſcipline, and the Power of the ancient Laws, which thus lay neglected. To which End he had ſetled ſelect Miniſters of Juſtice in all Parts of the Land; and upon Complaints brought him of the Remiſsneſs, and other Defects of his Judges, he by his Princely Care apply'd Remedies, and puniſh'd the Delinquents. The like Remiſsneſs was complain'd of in his Eccleſiaſtical Judges; occaſion'd by a Murther, committed by a Prieſt of Sarum Dioceſe, whom the Arch-Biſhop order'd to be depriv'd and ſhut up in a Monaſtery, by which he was freed from a more deſerv'd Puniſhment, deſign'd by the King's Juſticiaries. With which, and ſome other like Affronts from the Arch-Biſhop, the King was highly diſpleas'd, as ſeeing all Things tend to the Ruin of Regal Government, which he deſired might be employ'd to the impartial Adminiſtration of Juſtice to all his Subjects. The Arch-Biſhop on the other Side, ſhew'd himſelf no leſs violent for the Immunities of his Clergy and See; and proceeded ſo far as to challenge from the Crown the Cuſtody of Rocheſter Caſtle and other Forts, which the King for the Security of his Kingdom had reſum'd into his own Hands. The Sum of the Controverſie between the Crown and the Mitre is thus deliver'd by Hoveden: The King expected That all ſuch of the Clergy as were taken in Robbery, Murther, Felony, and the like Crimes, ſhould be try'd and adjudg'd in his Temporal Courts, as Lay-Men were: Againſt which the Arch-Biſhop's Reſolution was, That all Clergy-Men ſo offending ſhould be try'd only in the Spiritual Courts, by Men of their own Order, and upon Conviction, ſhould at firſt only be depriv'd of their Office and Benefice; but after they were thus degraded, upon a freſh Offence, they ſhould be judg'd at the King's Pleaſure.

The King endeavours to reform them.

The Sum of the Controverſie.

Fitz-Steph. Nubrigen. &c. The King finding himſelf thus depriv'd of one Half of his Soveraignty, and that Becket could not be mollify'd either by the Remembrance of old Favours, or the Power of freſh Perſuaſions; notwithſtanding he reſolv'd to put nothing in Execution, but what was firſt ratify'd and confirm'd by his Biſhops, of whoſe ready Aſſent to all juſt Demands, he had no Reaſon to doubt. Therefore at an Aſſembly at Weſtminſter the King ſhew'd his Reſentments againſt the Arch-Biſhop's Behaviour, and took an Occaſion to eſtabliſh ſeveral Articles, which he call'd his Grand-father's Cuſtoms, much to the Detriment of the Papal and Eccleſiaſtical Authority. The Points in thoſe Ordinances, which the Arch-Biſhop condemn'd, and ſet down in his Letters to the Pope, and his own Suffragan Biſhops, were principally theſe: 1. That none ſhould appeal to the See of Rome for any Cauſe whatſoever, without the King's Licence. 2. That it ſhould not be lawful for any Arch-Biſhop or Biſhop to leave the Nation and go to the Pope, upon his Summons, without the King's Licence. 3. That no Biſhops ſhould excommunicate any one holding of the King in chief, or put any other of his Officers under Interdict, without his Licence. 4. That all criminal Clerks ſhould be try'd before ſecular Judges. 5. That the Laity, whether the King or others, ſhould hold Pleas of Churches, and Tithes, &c. Theſe Ordinances were peremptorily urg'd to the Arch-Biſhop and all the Biſhops, who anſwer'd, That they willingly conſented to them, ſaving in all Things their Order, and the Rights of the Church. This Anſwer highly diſpleaſing the King, caus'd him to remove ſuddenly to Woodſtock, to which Place the Biſhops follow'd him, earneſtly perſuading the Arch-Biſhop to comply, as they already had done. At firſt he was immoveable, but at length overcome by the Importunities of the Biſhops of Chicheſter and Hereford, he aſſented to acknowledge the King's Laws without that Saving Clauſe, which had given ſo much Offence. At which the King ſeem'd ſatisfy'd for the preſent; however he reſolv'd to have all their Conſents ratify'd in a grand Council of the whole Kingdom.

A. D. 1164. Reg. 10/11. To this End, that he might better aſſert the Rights of the Crown, he call'd a Parliament at Clarendon in Wiltſhire, where he propounded to the Biſhops and Secular Barons many ancient Regular Cuſtoms and Laws, which he expected the Biſhops to recognize, as the ancient Rights of the Crown; which Laws, being the ſame with thoſe before-mention'd, have commonly been call'd The Conſtitutions of Clarendon. All the Prelates gave a verbal Conſent to theſe, but being requir'd to put their Seals to them, the Arch-Biſhop utterly refus'd; yet at length the Earls of Cornwall and Leiceſter, with other Perſons of Quality by Tears, Importunities and Arguments perſuaded him to comply with the King's Pleaſure. So that both the Arch-Biſhop, and all the Biſhops conſented to theſe Laws, and recogniz'd them under their Seals; and the King afterwards ſent them to the Pope to be confirm'd, who not only rejected them, but utterly condemn'd them. Shortly after the Arch-Biſhop began to be ſeverely afflicted, and repented of this Act, making his Body ſuffer a hard Penance for it; and he thought it ſo heinous an Offence, and ſo great a Pollution, that he was not fit to ſay Maſs, or appear before the Altar; and therefore he ſuſpended himſelf from that Service, 'till by Confeſſion and Penance he obtain'd the Pope's Abſolution. During the Controverſie, the Pope being in France, ſent over Rotred Arch-Biſhop of Roven to compoſe theſe Differences; but the King would not hearken to him, unleſs the Pope would firſt conſent to confirm his Laws by his Bull. And when he ſaw he could not obtain it, he ſent two of his Chaplains to prevail with the Pope to conſtitute Roger Arch-Biſhop of York his Legate throughout England, ſo that he might confound and mortifie Becket. But neither did this Project ſucceed; for the Pope knowing that Becket's Cauſe was his own, would not be the Author of any Damage to ſo faithful a Servant; yet to gratifie the King, he granted by his Bull a ſlight Authority, which when the King ſaw was only ſuperficial and not effectual, he ſent it back again to the Pope by the ſame Perſon who brought it.

Fitz-Steph. &c.

Becket and the Biſhops comply with them.

Becket repents, and makes new Oppoſition.

When theſe Methods fail'd others were attempted, and the Arch-Biſhop having many Enemies, ſeveral Troubles were brought upon him in a ſhort Time. First, he was condemn'd in Damages for a Mannor, which John de Marſhall claim'd, notwithſtanding the Arch-Biſhop had enjoy'd it a long Time without Moleſtation. Next he was proſecuted at the King's Suit for five hundred Marks, which had been lent him in the Army at Thraloufe, and for another like Sum, which he borrow'd of a Jew upon the King's Security: Then he was proſecuted for all the Profits of the Archbiſhoprick of York, and other Biſhopricks and Abbies vacant during his Chancellorſhip: Beſides all he was in Parliament call'd call'd to an Account for thirty thouſand Pounds of the King's Mony formerly in his Hands. To theſe he reply'd, That ſince he had formerly accounted, and that the King's eldeſt Son, the Juſticiary of England, and all the Barons of the Exchequer had acquitted him of all Accounts, and that he ſhould come free from all Actions to the Archbiſhoprick, he therefore now would not anſwer as a Lay-Man. Which peremptory Refuſal of his was highly aggravated with divers Accuſations, particularly of Contempt towards the King, in denying to come to his Preſence, when commanded to appear before him; and tho' he made ſeveral Excuſes and Pretences, yet the Peers and the Biſhops condemn'd all his moveable Goods to the King's Mercy. And the Prelates perceiving that the King's Diſpleaſure tended to a further Severity, premoniſh'd him to ſubmit himſelf, Otherwiſe the Court intended to adjudge him a perjur'd Perſon, and a Traitor, for refuſing Temporal Allegiance to his Temporal Soveraign, according to his Oath. Still finding him immoveable, the Biſhops by joint Conſent adjudg'd him guilty of Perjury, and by the Mouth of the Biſhop of Chicheſter diſclaim'd all future Obedience to him as their Arch-Biſhop. The following Day, while the Biſhops and Peers were conſulting about ſome further Expedient, Becket, undaunted in his Deſigns, caus'd to be ſung before him at the Altar, The Princes ſit and ſpeak againſt me, and the Ungodly perſecute me, &c. And immediately taking his Silver Croſier in his Hands, he enter'd arm'd with it into the King's Preſence. At which the Arch-Biſhop of York ſeverely reprov'd him for this unpreſidented Action, declaring, That the King carry'd much the ſharper Weapon of the two, and adviſ'd him to lay down the Croſs. The Arch-Biſhop made Anſwer, That tho' the King's Weapon might kill the Body, yet his own could deſtroy the Soul, and ſend it to Hell. The King in a great Rage commanded his Peers to ſit in Judgment upon him, as a perjur'd Traitor; and accordingly they order'd him to be apprehended, and thrown into Priſon. The Earls of Cornwall and Leiceſter, citing him to hear his Sentence pronounc'd, he immediately appeal'd to the See of Rome, declaring them Incompetent Judges: Whereupon all reviling him with the Name of Traitor, he reply'd, That were it not for his Function, he would enter a Combat with them in the Field, and acquit himſelf both of Treaſon and Perjury; and upon that fled from the Court, and diſguiſing himſelf under the Name of Dereman, paſs'd over into Flanders.

He is declar'd a Traitor.

He leaves the Nation.

Hoveden. Gervaſe. The King on the other Side, to leave nothing unfiniſh'd, immediately diſpatch'd Gilbert Biſhop of London, and William Earl of Arundell to the French King, urging him Not to harbour one who had fled as a Traitor, but prevail'd not: For he on the contrary begg'd of the Pope, That as he lov'd the Roman Church, and the Happineſs of France, he would favour and ſupport the Cauſe of Thomas againſt King Henry. To this the Pope readily comply'd, upon which the King ſent an Ambaſſy to him of many great Perſons, as the Arch-Biſhop of York, the Biſhops of London, Wincheſter, and Chiceſter, John of Oxenford, the Earl of Arundell, and others, whoſe ſole Employment being by any Means to procure Diſgrace to Becket, their final Suit was, That his Holineſs would be pleas'd to ſend two Cardinals into England, fully to end the Controverſie: But the Pope deny'd it, holding it derogatory to his own abſolute Authority, declaring like God's Vice-gerent, It was his own Glory, which he would not give to another; but when the Arch-Biſhop was to be judged, he would judge him himſelf. But the great Reaſon, as Hoveden obſerves, was that he knew the King of England was rich and powerful, and that Legates might eaſily be corrupted, as being greater Lovers of Gold and Silver, than Juſtice and Equity. To which Gervaſe adds, That the Pope and Cardinals wiſely foreſaw, That if the Arch-Biſhop was ſupported in his Cauſe it would be a Preſident for others in the like Caſe to oppoſe Kings; but if it ſunk, no Biſhop for the future would dare to withſtand their Soveraign's Pleaſure, ſo that the Power of the Church would be ſhaken, and the Authority of the Pope cruſh'd.

The King proceeds against them,

The King being thus disappointed, and impatient of a Repulse, where his own Subject was a Party, thought the Indignity offer'd by the Pope insufferable, and to let him understand how he resented it, he directed his Writs to all the Sheriffs of England, commanding them to attach all such as offer'd to appeal to the Roman Court; together with the Fathers, Mothers, Brothers, Sisters, Nephews and Neices of all such of the Clergy as were with the Arch-Bishop, and to put them under Sureties; as also to seize the Revenues, Goods and Chattels of the said Clergy-Men. Again by other Letters to Gilbert Bishop of London he sequester'd all the Livings and Benefices, which within his Province belong'd to any of the Clergy who fled over to the Arch-Bishop; so that without his Leave, they might receive no Part of the Profits. Lastly he gave strict Orders to all his Justices, That if they found any Person with Letters or Mandates from the Pope or Arch-Bishop, containing any Interdict or Excommunication against the Nation, speedy Justice should be executed upon him, as a Traitor to the Kingdom. He also caus'd the Church of Canterbury and all the Arch-Bishop's Goods to be confiscated, grounding himself, as it is believ'd, upon the Judgment given against Becket at Northampton, notwithstanding that Sentence had been expresly null'd by the Pope's Bull. Nor was this all, for he banish'd all the Kindred of the Arch-Bishop, Men, Women, Children and Infants; and forbad that he should be any longer publickly mention'd, and pray'd for in the Church as Arch-Bishop of Canterbury. *M. Becket excommunicates great Numbers.

On the contrary Side, the Arch-Bishop, now in France, solemnly excommunicated all such as obey'd, promoted or defended the Regal Laws of Clarendon, and Richard de Lucie, Richard of Poictou, Jocelin de Bailleol, Alan de Nevil, and some others by Name; but being neither cited nor convicted, they appeal'd to the Pope. The King having notice, that Becket, after his publick Sermon on a great Festival, had threaten'd the like Sentence against his Royal Person, either to terrifie his Adversaries, or to revenge himself, got a powerful Army in Readiness, under a Pretence of subduing Wales. In the mean Time, John of Oxenford, the King's great Advocate, so far prevail'd with the Pope as to send two Legates a latere to reconcile the King and the Arch-Bishop; but after their Departure, the Pope fearing the Power and Riches of King Henry, sent Letters after them to put new Limits to their Authority. Upon the Appearance of these two Cardinals, Thomas refus'd to put his Cause to them, unless there was first plenary Restitution made to him and his Friends: But being advis'd by them to submit himself to the King, his Answer was, he would, Saving God's Honour, and the Churches Liberty; Saving his own Honour, and the Churches Possessions; and saving his own and his Friends Rights. Being afterwards demanded by them, Whether, for the Peace of God's Church, he would renounce the Archbishoprick, if the King would renounce his Ordinances; he answer'd, That the Proposal was unequal; since he could not renounce his Archbishoprick, without betraying the Honour of his Church; but the King was oblig'd both in Honour and Conscience to renounce those Ordinances. King Henry being inrag'd at so many Salvos, resolv'd to create new Troubles to the Arch-Bishop, who having been near two Years well maintain'd in the Abby of Pontigny, the King threaten'd that Abbot, That if he any longer shelter'd Becket, he would immediately banish all the Monks of his Order out of England. Upon which he was dismiss'd from the Monastery, and the French King took him to Sens with himself, under whose particular Protection he continu'd for about four Years; and prov'd a great Instigator of that King and the Earl of Flanders against the King of England. In which Year the King's youngest Son John was born, whom in Raillery his Father call'd Sans-Terre, as having no Lands setled upon him; tho' he afterwards obtain'd the Crown of England. *Hoveden. Soul. Still the Pope forgot not his faithful Servant Becket, but honour'd him with a Confirmation of all the Privileges and Powers, that any of his Predeceſſors ever enjoy'd, in Defiance, as it were, of the King's utmoſt Indignation. On the other Side the King ſent Letters into Germany, declaring his Intentions to renounce the preſent Pope Alexander, and join with the Emperor and the Anti-Pope, which ſtill made the Breach wider and more dangerous. In the mean Time Gilbert Biſhop of London, being commanded by the Pope to admoniſh the King to lay aſide all Cuſtoms and Ordinances prejudicial to the Church, and to reſtore the Arch-Biſhop, he obey'd him, and in his Anſwer he endeavour'd to perſuade his Holineſs to Moderation and a Connivance, not forgetting to juſtifie his Soveraign, particularly, 'That the King was ready to obey 'the ſacred Decrees of the Church, ſaving his own and his Kingdom's Dignity: 'That as to Appeals, he claim'd that Honour by the ancient Inſtitution of his 'Kingdom, namely, That no Clerk ſhould for a civil Action leave the ſame, 'till Juſtice could not be found in his Courts at home, and then he would 'hinder no Man. That he never baniſh'd the Arch-Biſhop, who might return 'at his Pleaſure, provided he obſerv'd thoſe ancient Cuſtoms, to which he 'bound himſelf by Oath. That the King thinks himſelf fully juſtify'd, in be-'ing willing to abide by the concurrent Judgment of the Church in his own 'Kingdom. Yet after great Heats and Factions, and ſeveral Acts of Hoſtility between the Kings of England and France, a Peace being concluded, Thomas preſented himſelf before the two Kings, where he was urg'd in the Preſence of both to ſubmit himſelf to King Henry without any further Reſervations; to which he ſeem'd ready to comply, only with this Reſtriction, Saving the Honour due to God. With which the King being exaſperated, declar'd to the French King, That ſuch were the ſubtle Evaſions of the Man, that whatſoever diſpleas'd him, he was wont to ſay was againſt the Honour of God: Adding further, That as there had been ſeveral Kings of England of leſs Power than My ſelf, and ſeveral Arch-Biſhops of Canterbury, Great and Holy Men; let him do what the greateſt and moſt holy of his Predeceſſors did to the leaſt of mine, and I will acquieſce. Upon which all agreed that the King had ſufficiently yielded; and King Lewis offended at Becket, ask'd him Whether he thought himſelf greater, or holier than St. Peter? And the Peers of both Nations accus'd him of great Arrogance, declaring, That he himſelf was the wilful Obſtacle of his own, and the Holy Church's Tranquility.

But in vain.

Gervaſ. M. Paris. When neither Mediations, Letters, Meſſages, or other Means would end the Controverſie, the Pope ſignify'd to the King, That he would no longer reſtrain the Arch-Biſhop from revenging his own and the Church's Injuries by the Sword of Cenſure; upon which the Arch-Biſhop excommunicated the Biſhop of London, and proceeded ſo far with others, that there were ſcarce enough left in the King's own Chappel and Preſence, to perform the uſual Service. The King highly offended at theſe Proceedings, incourag'd Biſhop Gilbert with moſt friendly Offers, to bear the Charges of proſecuting his Appeal againſt Becket; and likewiſe urg'd the Pope to ſend Legates to abſolve his excommunicated Subjects, and ſettle a Peace, or elſe he ſhould be compell'd to provide otherwiſe for his own Security and Honour. Thereupon two Cardinals were ſent to the King in France, in order to an Accommodation, but to little or no Effect. After that, by the Pope's Mediation, the two Kings of England and France met at Paris, whither the Arch-Biſhop repair'd, and yet no Peace enſu'd; becauſe the King refus'd Becket the Ceremony of the Kiſs of Peace, and would not ſatisfie any Thing under the Name of Reſtitution, as being againſt his Honour, ſince all Reſtitution imply'd an Injury committed. Yet as to the Matter of the Regal Cuſtoms, he freely offer'd to ſtand to the Judgment, not only of his own Divines, but alſo of thoſe of the Church of France; which being refus'd by the other, the King came off with much Advantage in the Opinion of the Auditors. And now ſeeing no Iſſue of of his tedious Diſturbances, and underſtanding that the Arch-Biſhop of Sens in Perſon had ſolicited the Pope to put the Kingdom of England under a general Interdict, he immediately ſent out his Edicts from Normandy into England, declaring, That whoever brought any Letters of Interdict from the Pope or Becket, ſhould immediately ſuffer as a Traitor to his King and Country. That no Clerk ſhould go out of the Land without a Paſsport from his Juſticiaries, and none return again without a Licence from the King himſelf. That none receive any Meſſage from the Pope, or Becket, nor make any Appeal to them, or hold any Plea by their Mandates. That if any Prelate, Clerk or Lay-Man obey a Sentence of Interdict, he and all his Relations ſhall be baniſh'd, and his Goods forfeited to the Crown. That all Clerks having Rents in England, ſhall return home within three Months, or loſe all their Revenues. That Peter-Pence be not paid to Rome, but reſerv'd. Thus, as Gervaſe laments, all from the Eldeſt to the Youngeſt, were forc'd to abjure Obedience to Pope Alexander, and Arch-Biſhop Becket.

The King provides againſt them.

A. D. 1170. Reg. 16/17.

After four Years Continuance in France, the King took Shipping for England, in which he narrowly eſcap'd a violent Storm, that deſtroy'd ſeveral of his beſt Veſſels, in one of which his chief Phyſician, and about four hundred Perſons were drowned. Shortly after Eaſter he held his Court at Windſor, where William King of the Scots, and David his Brother, and all the Biſhops and great Men of the Nation were preſent; when the King alſo appointed certain Earls, Abbots, Knights and Clerks to go as Commiſſioners throughout the Kingdom, to inquire into all ſorts of Frauds, Extortions, Miſcarriages and other Failures of Sheriffs, their Bailiffs, and other of the King's Officers. Which Inquiſition being finiſh'd, all Parties concern'd in it were commanded to appear before the King at London on the fourteenth Day of June, where at the ſame Time he held a grand Council of all the Biſhops, Abbots, Earls, Barons, Sheriffs, Bailiffs and Aldermen of England, who appear'd with their Sureties in no little Fear, not imagining the King's Deſigns. But when all were preſent, the King proceeded to an Act unknown to England, and to the Surprize of all Men, commanded his Son Henry to be anointed and crowned King, by the Conſent of the whole Aſſembly. The Ceremony was perform'd by the Arch-Biſhop of York, aſſiſted by the Biſhops of London and Durham; and the next Day he receiv'd the Fealties of the King of the Scots and his Brother, and of all the other Earls and Barons of the Kingdom. This Tranſaction was a Contempt of the Authority of Arch-Biſhop Becket, and likewiſe a Strengthning of the Regal Cuſtoms; but moſt of all it was the greateſt Security to the Succeſſion of the King's Iſſue, who was ſenſible that for want of this, the Nation could not be kept in their Duty to his Mother Matilda. Yet this new King Henry was far from being ſenſible of his Father's great Kindneſs and Truſt; tho' he in Honour to his Son, at the Coronation-Feaſt vouchſaf'd to carry up the firſt Diſh, congratulating him for having a greater Servitor than any Prince in the World. For when the Arch-Biſhop of York gravely told him, How much he was oblig'd to his Father for ſo ſignal a Favour; he haughtily reply'd, That it was no great Condeſcenſion in his Father, who was only the Son of an Earl, to perform that Service to Him, who was the Son of a King.

The King of France was highly diſoblig'd becauſe his Daughter Margaret was not crown'd with the young King her Husband; but that Matter was ſoon accommodated by the King's Paſſage into Normandy ſhortly after. Where, being weary'd out by the Pope's repeated Threatnings, which might have proved fatal to him, he reſolv'd to be reconcil'd to Arch-Biſhop Becket, who now had been puniſh'd with above ſix Years Exile. To that End he repair'd to Amboiſe near Tours, where he was met by moſt of the Biſhops and Noblemen of France; and on the ſecond Day, by the Mediation of King Lewis, and the Admonitions of Pope Alexander, the King receiv'd the Arch-Biſhop into his Grace

Grace and Favour, as well as all thoſe who were with him in Exile; promiſing entirely to reſtore to him all the Rights and Poſſeſſions of the Church of Canterbury, as he held them the Year before he left England. Which Concluſion the King ſignify'd to his Son in England; ſo that the great Controverſie between the King and the Arch-Biſhop ſeem'd to have been happily ended. But in a ſhort Time another great Miſchief aroſe; for the Arch-Biſhop being implacably inrag'd againſt thoſe Biſhops that had crown'd the new King, procur'd Letters from the Pope for the Suſpenſion of the Arch-Biſhop of York, and Biſhop of Durham; and for the Excommunication of the Biſhops of London, Exeter and Salisbury, who aſſiſted in the Coronation; and at his firſt Arrival he publiſh'd theſe Letters, to the great Diſturbance of the Nation; nor would he, at the young King's Requeſt, abſolve them but upon very hard Conditions.

The King and Becket reconcil'd.

Becket raiſes new Diſturbances.

Immediately upon this Publication, the ſuſpended and excommunicated Biſhops went over into Normandy to the King, and throwing themſelves at his Feet, complain'd, That he had made an unhappy Peace for them, ſince they and his moſt faithful Friends were thus unreaſonably treated: To which the Arch-Biſhop of York added, That as long as Thomas Becket was alive, it was impoſſible he ſhould enjoy happy Days, or a peaceable Kingdom. At which Words, the King, tranſported with Rage and Paſſion, inconſiderately cry'd out, I am a miſerable Man, who have fed ſo many ungrateful cowardly Servants, none of whom durſt vindicate me from the Injuries I ſuffer at the Hands of one Prieſt. Upon which unhappy Expreſſion, four of the King's Domeſtick Servants, remarkable for their Birth and Valour, Raynold Fitz-Urſe, William Tracy, Richard Brito and Hugh Morville, bound themſelves by a ſolemn Oath to revenge the King's Quarrel, and deſtroy the Arch-Biſhop. To that End they privately withdrew from the Court; and finding an eaſie Paſſage into England, they ſoon arriv'd at Canterbury. And coming into the Preſence of the Arch-Biſhop, who had lately ſhown himſelf with the utmoſt Pomp and Grandeur, they upbraided him with Obſtinacy and Arrogancy, and finding him immoveably reſolute as to his former Actions and Opinions, without the Warrant and Privacy of their Maſter, they proceeded firſt to threaten Force, and then to commit it; and that after an execrable Manner. Having put on Armor, to make themſelves more formidable, they enter'd the Arch-Biſhop's own Church, whither he had withdrawn himſelf to the High-Altar, while the Monks were at Divine Service; and there calling him Traitor and other opprobrious Names, they gave him many Wounds, and at length beat out his Brains, ſo that the Altar it ſelf was ſhamefully polluted with Blood and Gore. His paſſionate Behaviour in theſe laſt Moments; his couragious Meeting of Death; his devout committing the Cauſe of the Church and his own Soul to God and the Saints; the Place, the Time, the Manner, and all Things aggravate the Horror of the Fact, and cauſe Compaſſion and Opinion to be on his Side. The Aſſaſſinators having effected this audacious Deſign, afterwards conſidering the Hainouſneſs of their Crime, and doubting whether the King, tho' ſecretly pleaſed, would openly countenance ſo odious an Act, retired to the North of England; and being driven from thence, in a few Years dy'd miſerable Fugitives in Foreign Countries.

Becket murder'd.

This was the fatal Period of the famous Thomas Becket; a Perſon of a capacious Genius and ſingular Abilities, and of ſtrict Morals and great Auſterities; yet unhappily allay'd with exceeding Haughtineſs, Oſtentation and Popularity, which caus'd great Miſchiefs to the Nation. And tho' ſeveral have exalted him among the greateſt Saints and Martyrs, yet others have doubted whether he deſerv'd the Name of a good Man; and about fifty Years after a celebrated Queſtion was debated among the learned Doctors of the Univerſity of Paris, Whether Thomas was ſav'd or damn'd; the one Party declaring That he deſerv'd Death and Damnation for his Contumacy againſt the Miniſter of God his Soveraign, and the other aſſerting, That his many Miracles were a Sign of his Salvation; which was fairly alledg'd, had the Truth of them been as well prov'd, as reported. And indeed the Fame of them was exceeding great; which occaſion'd for him one of the richeſt and nobleſt Shrines in the World. He was not only canoniz'd, but alſo ſeveral Solemnities were ever after obſerv'd in his Memory, and a famous Jubilee kept every fifty Years at Canterbury. It is almoſt incredible what Multitudes of People flock'd to that City, upon the Time of the Solemnity; particularly in the Year 1420, Mr. Somner informs us that there were by Eſtimation a hundred thouſand Perſons, as Engliſh, Iriſh, Welſh, Scots, French, Normans, and other Foreigners, who came thither to procure the Health or Salvation of their Souls; for whom the Bailiffs of the City commanded the Citizens, Victuallers and Inn-keepers, to provide ſufficient Lodgings, and all other Conveniencies.

His Character.

III. King Henry was now freed from the greateſt Diſturber of his Repoſe, yet the News of this barbarous Murther, with all its heightning Circumſtances, gave him freſh Diſquiets, and new Troubles. For the King of France, the Earl of Blois, and the Arch-Biſhop of Sens ſent ſuch inflaming Letters to the Pope concerning this Parricide, that Henry found it extraordinary difficult to preſerve his Kingdom from a general Interdict, tho' he made uſe of his Power, Mony, and Proteſtations to ſubmit to the Judgement of ſuch Legates and Cardinals as his Holineſs ſhould ſend to inquire into the Fact. To divert himſelf in theſe melancholy Perplexities, the King reſolv'd to diſplay his Soveraignty, and more vigorouſly carry on that great Deſign of ſubduing the Kingdom of Ireland, which in part had been begun a Year or two before, and had been protected, and ſanctify'd by the Engliſh Pope Adrian in the Beginning of this Reign. It is very obſervable at this Time, that not only the Manners of that Nation were extreamly corrupted, but the Chriſtian Faith it ſelf was decay'd; Barbariſm over-running the one, and more than Superſtition the other: So that there were then all the uſual Forerunners of great Revolutions and Conqueſts. King Henry's Pretenſions to this Kingdom were an ancient Title, as well as the continu'd Injuries the Iriſh had committed by their Piracies, buying and ſelling Engliſh Captives, and uſing them like the worſt of Slaves: Which made the Iriſh Clergy confeſs, That it was nothing but their Deſerts, that their Land ſhould be transferr'd to that Nation which they had ſo cruelly treated. But the particular Occaſion of that Kingdom's Invaſion proceeded from thoſe conſtant Effects of Looſeneſs and Immorality, Factions and Diviſions among themſelves; which in no long Time ruin'd them, and brought them under the Subjection of other Maſters.

The King's Deſigns upon Ireland.

Ireland, beſides inferior Governors, was now under the Subjection of five Rulers, which our ancient Hiſtorians often call by the Name of Kings; one of whom was Dermot Prince of Leinſter, who from his Youth, and firſt Acceſſion to his Kingdom, had been a Tyrant and great Oppreſſor of his Subjects. To add to his Crimes, he took occaſion to corrupt and ſteal away the Wife of Orovic Prince of Meath; who being juſtly provok'd with this Indignity, gather'd what Forces he could procure, and gain'd the Aſſiſtance of Roderick Prince of Connaught, then chief Monarch of Ireland; by whoſe Power, and the Conjunction of many of his injur'd Subjects, after ſeveral Conflicts, he was diſpoſſeſs'd, and driven from his Dominions. Upon which, Dermot fled to King Henry, then in Aquitain, imploring his Protection and Aſſiſtance, and ſwearing to be his Vaſſal and Subject. The King, glad to find his former Deſigns thus promoted, entertain'd him very kindly; and tho' he could not as then furniſh him, being ingag'd in other great Affairs, yet he permitted ſuch of his Subjects as pleas'd to venture their Fortunes with him. With this Permiſſion Dermot repair'd to Wales, where he firſt prevail'd with Robert Fitz-Stephen, a Man

Cambrenſ. Dermot having thus ſucceeded in his Affairs, while his Friends in England prepar'd themſelves and their Forces, he ſail'd into his own Country, carrying with him the Promiſes of Confederates, and uſing all Methods to facilitate the Entrance of the Engliſh, by extolling their Civility and Piety, their Valour and Riches, and all other Qualifications that might move either their Love or their Fear. Not long after Fitz-Stephen with his Half Brother Fitz-Gerard, paſs'd the Sea with a ſmall Number of Soldiers, and landed at a Place near Waterford call'd by the Iriſh Bagg and Bunn, which ſignifies Holy, and therefore was interpreted as a happy Preſage of good Succeſs, of which this Time retains the Memory, At the Head of Bagg and Bunn, Ireland was loſt and won. The next Day Maurice de Pendergaſt, with other Soldiers and ſome Archers, in two Ships, arriv'd at the ſame Place; and joining with Fitz-Stephen's Forces, march'd to the City of Wexford, with Colours diſplay'd, and in ſuch a peculiar Form and Order, that tho' they were not above four hundred in Number, yet the Iriſh, unacquainted with ſuch unuſual Bravery, and overcome with Fear, ſoon ſurrender'd themſelves and the City of Wexford; which with the neighbouring Country was given by Dermot to Fitz-Stephen, as an Earneſt of greater Rewards. And here was planted the firſt Colony of the Engliſh, which, according to Speed and Daniel, has ever ſince continu'd, retaining a Sort of our ancient Attire, and much of our Language, proper only to that City and the neighbouring Parts, and by a diſtinct Denomination call'd Wexford Speech. The next Year new Supplies were ſent out of Wales, and upon Intelligence of good Succeſs, the Earl of Pembroke ſail'd to the Bay of Waterford, and landing with twelve hundred Men, ſoon took the Town, which was then call'd Porthlarge, and put all the Inhabitants to the Sword, partly to revenge their Infidelity to Dermot, but chiefly to give Terror to his Arms, and make Way for future Conqueſts. Here Dermot gave him his Daughter Eva in Marriage, with the Dowry of his Country, which, after his Wickedneſs had ruin'd, he liv'd not to ſee much longer, but dy'd miſerably; leaving the Stile of Nimgal, ſignifying the Strangers Friend, added to his Name in Memory of his unnatural abandoning his own Country. The Earl, after he had ſecur'd the new acquired Places, march'd with his ſmall Body of Forces into the Bowels of the Kingdom with no Oppoſition; and Roderick, who had aſſum'd the Title of the great Monarch of Ireland, confin'd himſelf to the Wilds and Faſtneſſes of Connaught. So that paſſing through the Country at his Pleaſure, he took what Pledges of Security he thought fit from the Inhabitants, and with as little Difficulty poſſeſs'd himſelf of the City of Dublin, the Metropolis of the whole Iſland. Thus Wales firſt gain'd us the Kingdom of Ireland, with a ſmall Force, and without a general Battel; a Thing almoſt incredible that a Country ſo populous, and of that Diſpoſition, ſhould do ſo little in its own Defence, and be ſo languid and remiſs, when their All was at ſtake: But this muſt be attributed to their great Diſuſe of military Diſcipline, their diſpirited Minds, and thoſe general Corruptions before-mention'd.

The King is jealous of them.

of the Adventurers were reduc'd to the loweſt Ebb, but were ſoon brought to a better Condition, by certain Mediators ſent to the King, who found him in Gloceſterſhire with an Army ready to accompany him into Ireland; where it was agreed, 'That the King ſhould have Dublin, with all the Sea-Coaſt Towns and 'Caſtles, and the reſt to remain in the Conquerors, to hold of the King and 'his Succeſſors, and ſo to continue under his Protection as Subjects; which Subjection the King thought they deſign'd to have renounc'd. Shortly after Michaelmaſs the King paſs'd over the Sea with a great Fleet and Army, and landed near Waterford upon the Eve of St. Luke; where a white Hart ſtarting out of a Buſh being immediately taken and preſented to him, it was interpreted as a happy Preſage of certain Succeſs. The next Day he march'd to Waterford, where he continu'd fifteen Days; to which Place came the Kings of Cork, Limerick, Oſſery, Meath, and all of any Power in Ireland, except Roderick, and voluntarily ſubmitted themſelves with all the Clergy, and took their Oaths of Fealty to him and the young King, and their Succeſſors for ever. So theſe divided Princes, holding no publick Council for the common Safety, rather than join thoſe Hands which had ſo often injur'd each other, fell all from themſelves, and with the ſame Emulation they had expreſs'd in Liberty, ſtrove who ſhould firſt receive the Yoke of Servitude from a Foreign Maſter.

He paſſes into Ireland in Perſon.

The Iriſh ſubmit.

From Waterford the King march'd to Dublin, where he receiv'd the Homage of Roderick the chief Monarch, and kept his Chriſtmaſs with great Pomp and Splendor, magnificently feaſting all his Kings and great Men of the Country, and ſetling the great Affairs of the Nation. And being mindful of his Duty to God, whilſt the Iſland was calm and ſilent by the Preſence of ſo great a Monarch, he caus'd all the Biſhops and the Clergy to aſſemble at Caſſel, and appointed a ſpecial Chaplain of his own, with the Arch-Deacon of Llandaff to be Aſſiſtants and Adviſers to them in the Reformation of Church Affairs, which were as much diſorder'd as the People. For tho' the Iriſh had been long ſince Chriſtians, it was now after a wild and mix'd Faſhion; and therefore according to his Promiſe made to the late Pope, and to do a pleaſing Work to him now in the Chair, it was decreed, 'That all Church Lands ſhould be free from the Ex-'action of ſecular Men; and that thenceforward, all Divine Things ſhould be 'order'd and us'd in every Part of Ireland, according to the Manner of the 'Church of England. For, ſays the Conſtitution, as Ireland has by God's Mercy obtain'd a Lord and King out of England, ſo it is fit that they ſhould receive from thence a better Form of Life and Manners than they had before. After this the King planted Garriſons in all convenient Places; and made Hugh Lacy Juſtice of all Ireland, giving him the Keeping of Dublin, confirming beſides by Charter to him and his Heirs the County of Meath to hold the ſame in Fee, for the Service of a hundred Knights. He made Robert Fitz-Bernard Governor of the Towns of Waterford and Wexford, which he took from Fitz-Stephen, the firſt Invader, with a Charge to build Caſtles in them; and to humble the Earl of Pembroke, and to level him with the reſt of his Subjects, he took all his Dependants from him, which by his Bounty he made his own. Thus it was but one Winter's Work to gain a Kingdom; which tho' thus eaſily won, it prov'd more difficult and chargeable to keep, becauſe the Proſecution of a full Eſtabliſhment, by reaſon of other Diverſions, was not for ſeveral Ages throughly accompliſh'd.

The King makes many Regulations in Ireland.

The Reduction of that Kingdom.

On Eaſter Monday the King ſet ſail for England, and from thence haſten'd into Normandy to meet the two Legates ſent by the Pope to enquire into the Murther of the late Arch-Biſhop Becket. Four Months were ſpent in debating the Matter, and at length, the King by his ſolemn Oath taken upon the Relicks of Saints, and the Holy Evangeliſts, in the Preſence of all the great Men of the Country, purg'd himſelf, of either commanding, or conſenting to the Murther; and declaring withal his infinite Sorrow for having by raſh Words in his Paſſion given occaſion for others to commit that Fact, and giving a further Oath to to perform enjoin'd Penances, he was by the Legates abſolv'd. The Conditions were theſe: 'Firſt, That he ſhould never oppoſe the Pope's Authority, ſo long as 'he was us'd as a Catholick King: Secondly, That all Appeals ſhould be freely 'made to the Pope in all Eccleſiaſtical Cauſes: Thirdly, That he ſhould undertake 'the Cruſado, and go to Jeruſalem for three Years; and if diverted by the Sara-'cens in Spain, maintain two hundred Soldiers for a Year in the Holy Land: 'Fourthly he ſhould freely reſtore all that were Exiles upon the late Arch-'Biſhop's Account: And fifthly aboliſh all Cuſtoms introduc'd in his 'Time to the Prejudice of the Church of Canterbury, or of any other Church 'in his Kingdom. And thus ended this vexatious Controverſie, by which the Pope eſtabliſh'd and enlarg'd his Eccleſiaſtical Power to a high Degree; ſo that the King's long Oppoſition, and the Murder of the Arch-Biſhop, as much added to his growing Authority, as unſucceſsful Rebellions do to the Power of Temporal Princes.

Hoveden. M. Paris. Higden. IV. When King Henry had, as he imagin'd, ſurmounted all Difficulties and Troubles, an unnatural Rebellion and Conſpiracy began to diſcloſe new Miſchiefs, which were ordain'd to exerciſe this wiſe and warlike Prince; being firſt begun in England during his Abſence in Ireland, and in a ſhort Time encreas'd to a dangerous Degree. One of the chief Fomenters of it was Queen Eleanor his Wife, violently inrag'd at the Injuries done to her Bed by her Huſband, who was immoderately addicted to Variety of Loves; more particularly he was captivated by the Charms of the beautiful Lady Roſamund Clifford, whom he kept at Woodſtock, ſome ſay in a Labyrinth, where the Queen found Means to end her Life. Beſides his Queen, his own Son Henry was another great Actor, whoſe Ambition tranſported him beyond all Reaſon and Duty; ſo that as M. Paris expreſſes it, God ſtirr'd up the King's own Bowels againſt himſelf. This Conſpiracy was juſtly formidable; for to theſe were added the King's two younger Sons Richard and Geoffry, whom their Mother perſuaded to join with the young King, the two Kings of France and Scotland, Philip Earl of Flanders, Matthew Earl of Bulloign, Theobald Earl of Blois, Hugh Earl of Cheſter, Robert Earl of Leiceſter, Hugh Bigot Earl of Norfolk, Roger Mowbray, and other Noblemen in great Numbers: So that they ſeem'd to want nothing but a good Cauſe; however they gave the moſt plauſible Turn to their Deſigns, and were pleas'd to repute the Father no King, becauſe he had crown'd his Son.

A. D. 1173. Reg. 19 20.

A great Faction and Conſpiracy againſt the King.

M. Paris. Hoveden. Walſing. Tho' nothing could be more afflicting than this unnatural War, yet the King proceeded with his uſual Vigour and Dexterity, and found great Numbers whoſe Hearts were inflam'd with Indignation at ſo much Injuſtice. The Particulars of the Wars would fill a Volume: At one Time Normandy, Guienne and Bretaigne were invaded by the Confederates in France, and at the ſame Time Cumberland by the Scots. But the King of England had Friends in all thoſe Parts, and hearing that Vernvil was beſieg'd by the French King in Perſon, and that the Place had agreed to ſurrender if not reliev'd by a certain Day, he began to exert his Power, and ſent a Meſſage to King Lewis, That if he did not leave Normandy immediately, he would come and viſit him at the appointed Day. Upon which, Lewis, who meant more to weaken him by Factions, than overpower him by Force, immediately rais'd the Siege, and abandon'd the Place with ſuch Precipitation, that he left all his Tents and warlike Proviſions behind him. And now King Henry beginning to ſhake his dreadful Sword, had many ſucceſsful Encounters, mixt with ſome Loſſes, tho' not great nor many, in reſpect of the Overthrows given to the Enemy. In Bretaign his Forces worſted Hugh Earl of Cheſter and Ralph de Foulgiers, and ſlew above fifteen hundred upon the Spot, taking theſe two Perſons Priſoners, with many others; and in England, Reynold Earl of Cornwall, and Richard de Lucie in a bloody Battel overthrew the inſolent Earl of Leiceſter, and enter'd the Town of Leiceſter by Force.

Upon which a great War inſues.

Force. Yet after these Advantages, the French King moving for a Parly, Henry the Father desirous to use the good Fortune of War only to reclaim his Rebels, was so willing to make Peace, that he seem'd to have out-gone Expectations in the Freeness of his Offers; but through the wicked Persuasions of some Persons, it prov'd ineffectual. Among these Incendiaries the Earl of Leicester was chief, who having match'd with a Lady no less haughty and ambitious than himself, proceeded so far as to affront the King in his Presence, in behalf of his young Master the Son, and likewise laid his Hand upon his Sword to have struck en him, but was stopp'd in that audacious Attempt. This Man with all Heat and Violence join'd with the young King the Son, not that he thought his Cause more just, but, as Walsingham tells us, because his Father, labouring to inlarge the Soveraign Power, sought to set his Foot upon the Necks of the Proud and Haughty.

But God, who thought fit to chastise the King, without delivering him into his Enemy's Hands, destroy'd those Hopes that mov'd the Sons to their unnatural Attempts; for not long after News was brought into Normandy, that his faithful Friends and Servants Richard de Lucie, and Humphrey de Bohun High-Constable of England, being assisted by the Earls of Cornwall, Gloucester and Arundell, near St. Edmund's Bury bravely ingag'd with the Earl of Leicester and his Flemmings, of whom above five thousand were slain, or taken; and among the Prisoners was the Earl himself and his Masculine Countess, who were shortly after sent over to the King in Normandy. Upon this great Victory, and other Advantages, King Lewis, apprehensive of Success, sought for six Months Truce, and had it granted. But because two great Men in England, the Earl of Norfolk and Roger Mowbray, still held out, and kept Leicester and other Places; tho' Geoffry, the King's natural Son and Bishop Elect of Lincoln, had taken two of Mowbray's Castles, and done great Service for his Lord and Father, the Enemy made no better use of the Truce than to breath, and repair their Losses. In the mean Time the King recover'd Xaintes from his violent Son Richard, and proceeded with that Expedition, that the French King said He seem'd not to go, but to fly. Yet before he could finish all in those Parts, the News from England oblig'd him to hasten into Normandy; where he met with Richard the Elect of Winchester, sent over by his Justiciaries of England, to lay before him the present dangerous State of the Nation. For Philip Earl of Flanders having sworn to invade England, in favour of young Henry, several Forces joining with the Earl of Norfolk, had taken and plunder'd the City of Norwich, and done other Damage, which gave great Incouragement to the young King and his Faction, and he and the Earl of Flanders were ready to come over with fresh Forces into England. Moreover, Robert Earl of Ferrars had suddenly enter'd Nottingham, burnt the Town, drove out the King's Garrison, and slew the Inhabitants; and being inrich'd with the Plunder, he retir'd to Leicester, to which Place Anketill Malorie had also brought two hundred Prisoners, taken at Northampton, which he had suddenly surpriz'd and taken with the Slaughter of a considerable Number of the Townsmen. So that the whole Kingdom stood wavering and in extream Peril; to add to which, William King of Scotland, a Principal in the Confederacy, invaded England, dividing his Forces into two Parts, himself wasting the Province of Northumberland, and Duncan a cruel Commander, destroying the Western Borders.

The King's Party gains Ground.

Yet still the King's Affairs are in an ill Condition.

A. D. 1174. Reg. $\frac{20}{21}$.

King Henry highly exasperated at these Transactions, left Normandy in as good a Condition as the Time would permit; and sending his own Queen Eleanor, and his Son's Queen Margaret, his Son John, the Earl of Leicester with his Countess, and many other Prisoners, and a powerful Army on board, he took shipping at Barfleur; where being detain'd by the Wind, he is said to have publickly pray'd, That if this Voyage was for the Peace of the Clergy and People of England, he might have a prosperous Wind, but if otherwise, he desir'd never never to ſet a Foot upon that Shore again. Which Prayer was ſucceeded by a freſh Gale of Wind, which in the ſame Day carry'd him ſafe to Southampton. From whence he took his Journey towards Canterbury, where the Remainder of his Penance enjoin'd him at his Abſolution was to be perform'd. For beſides the Conditions formerly mention'd, the Author of Becket's Life ſays, the Legates enjoin'd him ſome other Things ſecretly, which came not to our Knowledge; and the Legates in their own Letters write that he promis'd to do ſome Things voluntarily which were not fit for them to commit to Writing. And what they were Hoveden has told us: The King coming towards the Church where the late Arch-Biſhop was bury'd, cloath'd all in Woollen; went three Miles bare-footed, inſomuch that the very Ground where he walk'd was diſtain'd with the Quantity of Blood running from his tender Feet cut by the hard Stones. Nor was this the worſt, for after this, coming to the Sepulchre, and there proſtrating himſelf, he receiv'd Diſcipline by Rods on his bare Fleſh, at the Hands of the Biſhops, Prieſts, Abbots and Monks there preſent; ſo that we may eaſily believe Baronius and his Author, who acknowledge that he receiv'd eighty Laſhes. So he who in his Life-Time could only make him bow, after his Death brought him upon his Knees; and tho' he had then proſecuted him as a Traitor, he now ador'd him as a Saint and Martyr.

The King finiſhes his Penance for Becket's Murther.

M. Paris. Walſing. &c. Some of the Monks of that Age attribute the happy Succeſs which enſu'd, to the Reconciliation which King Henry thus made with God, for the Blood of his Servant Thomas; for it pleas'd Him to deliver his Enemy William King of the Scots into his Hand, about the very ſame Time, and alſo to drive back his diſobedient Son, the young King, into France; who being under Sail for England, his whole Fleet was diſpers'd, and a great Part of it loſt by a Storm. The King's other Actions 'till his next Return into Normandy, which was not long after, are by Walſingham comprehended in theſe few Words; he tam'd his Rebels, put his Enemies to Flight, and ſeiz'd on their Forts. And thus having in a manner miraculouſly quieted the Nation, he took with him the King of Scotland, the Earls of Leiceſter and Cheſter, with his other chief Priſoners, but leaving his ſeditious Wife behind him under ſtrict Cuſtody, he arriv'd with his Forces at Normandy. This being underſtood in the French and Confederate Army, which had beſieg'd Roven, King Lewis immediately broke up, and ſetting fire to all his Engines of War retreated in ſuch Haſte into France, that the Engliſh Soldiers took great Quantities of Baggage and Ammunition. Hoveden aſſures us, that as ſoon as Lewis heard the victorious Henry was near Roven, he firſt ſent away the weak and worſt of his Army, and then deceiving the Engliſh with a ſolemn Promiſe of returning the next Day, to negotiate a Peace with the King, departed with all the reſt; ſo that this Author aggravates the Diſhonour of the Retreat, with an open Breach of Faith.

His great Succeſſes after it.

Ibid. And here if we look upon the Grandeur and Felicity of this King, it will appear, That no Prince in thoſe Times was ſo oblig'd to Heav'n for the numerous Favours beſtow'd upon him. The King and all the Power of France were now flying at his Preſence, without one Blow given; the valiant King of Scotland was his Priſoner, and the chiefeſt of his Rebels under his Feet; England was ſecured, Scotland diſmay'd, Ireland retain'd, Wales ſubſervient to his Arms, Normandy in Poſſeſſion, and all the coaſting Regions of Bretaigne, Guienne, Gaſcony and others as far as the Borders of Spain, under his Dominions; and the Bleſſing of Peace ſhortly after enſuing upon his own Terms, made him like another Solomon to be ſought to by others. His Wiſdom and Magnificence being in ſuch high Credit through the Chriſtian World, that afterwards the Kings of Caſtile and Navarre choſe him ſole Arbitrator in a Conteſt between them, which he wiſely determin'd to both their Satisfactions; and then at one Time in his Palace at Weſtminſter were ſeen together the Ambaſſadors of the Emperor of Conſtantinople, the Emperor of Germany, the Arch-

His Grandeur.

Arch-Biſhop of Triers, the Duke of Saxony, and the Earl of Flanders, all in great Pomp and Splendor. Moreover he had the Government of France for a Time, the Kingdom of Jeruſalem offer'd to him but refus'd, and two of his Daughters marry'd to the two Kings of Caſtile and Sicily.

But to return, a Truce was firſt made between the three Kings, Lewis and the two Henry's; in which Richard, who ſtood out, was left to his Father's Proſecution, who after ſome Shows of Reſiſtances, and great Conflicts with himſelf, threw himſelf upon his Father's Mercy and Affection, and obtain'd full Pardon and Favour. A moſt fatherly and fortunate Act; for Richard, melted with this unexpected Goodneſs, never deſiſted 'till he had brought the young King to a final Atonement; and Arms being laid aſide, the chief Heads of the deſired Peace were theſe: 'That Henry the young King, with Richard and 'Geoffry his Brothers, freed from all Oaths of Confederation, ſhould return to 'a full Obedience of the King their Father. That the Priſoners on all ſides ſhould 'be ſet at Liberty without Ranſom; except the King of Scotland, the Earls of 'Leiceſter and Cheſter, and ſuch others as had compounded for their Ranſoms 'before the Beginning of this Treaty. That King Henry the Father ſhould take 'Security of Loyalty, either by Hoſtage or Oath of ſuch as were inlarg'd; and 'that King Henry the Son ſhould ratifie that Grant which his Father had made 'to his Son John, of ſome Caſtles and annual Revenues in England. As to the King of Scotland's Ranſom our Hiſtorians differ, but Hector Boetius, a Writer of that Nation, ſays it was an hundred thouſand Pounds Sterling, one Moiety in ready Coin, and the other at an appointed Time. Beſides which he was oblig'd to do Homage for all his Dominions, to the King of England. And for the Performance of all Articles, King Henry had a double Security; on the one Side the Scotch Biſhops ſwore to put their King and his Land under an Interdict, if he broke them; and on the other the King of Scotland deliver'd up the Caſtles of Edenborough, Rokesburgh, Berwick, Gedworth and Sterling. In the mean Time King Henry freed nine hundred ſixty nine Priſoners of War, and his Son above an hundred; and having happily eſtabliſh'd all Things, they prepar'd for England, where the joyful Letters concerning their Return had produc'd a longing Expectation in the Subjects. In their Journey homewards, their Confidence was ſuch upon this new Reconciliation, that one Room and one Table ſerv'd both, for whom before a whole Kingdom was not large enough. They landed at Portſmouth upon Friday the twenty ſixth Day of May, 1175.

A Peace concluded.

A. D. 1175. Reg. 21/22.

V. At this preſent Time the State and Face of England was like that of a ſerene Sky, and a calm Sea, no Blaſts, no raging Waves, no appearing Sign of Diſcontent; the better to continue which, King Henry the Father, accompany'd with the King his Son, omitted no Office of a juſt and prudent Governor, viſiting a great Part of his Kingdom in Perſon, conſulting, ordering and enacting ſuch Laws and Courſes, as might beſt eſtabliſh a laſting Peace. Upon which Account, at Weſtminſter, both the Kings were preſent at a Synod, in which Richard, lately choſen Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, publiſh'd ſeveral Canons and Decrees for the better Government of the Church of England. Among which, this laudable Order was eſpecially enacted both by the Authority of the King and Synod, 'That every Patron of a Benefice taking a Reward for 'any Preſentation, ſhould for ever loſe the Right of Patronage. And the ſame Kings not long after being at Woodſtock, in Accompliſhment of ſuch Holy Purpoſes, by the Advice of the Clergy provided Men to ſuch Biſhopricks, Abbies and principal Cures as were vacant; where King Henry the Father forgot not his faithful Friend John of Oxenford, whom he preferr'd to the See of Norwich. From hence coming to York, he eſtabliſh'd the Affairs of the North, and meeting with William King of Scotland, ſeveral Matters of Importance were treated between the two Kings: As likewiſe afterwards at Windſor, where the King had call'd a grand Council or Parliament; where, at the Suit of the Arch-

Arch-Biſhop of Tuam and other Ambaſſadors from Ireland, the chief Monarch Roderick, King of Connaught was receiv'd into Protection and Favour, and became a faithful Tributary. This King Henry choſe, rather than to fiſh with a Hook of Gold; for ſo a War againſt Ireland was accounted.

Hoveden. &c. In the following Year, the King held another Parliament at Northampton, where by the Advice of all, he divided the Kingdom into ſix Parts or Circuits, and for every Circuit conſtituted three Itinerant Juſtices, either Barons or Knights, cauſing them to ſwear upon the Holy Evangeliſts, to oblige all the King's Subjects inviolably to obſerve the Aſſizes or Ordinances of Clarendon, and renew'd at Northampton; which were principally againſt Murther, Theft, Robbery, Burnings of Houſes, and Cheats; which Facts if found by the Verdict of twelve Men, the Accuſed were to paſs the Trial of Water Ordeal, and if not acquitted, they were puniſh'd with Loſs of Limbs or Baniſhment, that Age holding the miſerable Life of a Malefactor of a greater Example than Death it ſelf. Theſe ſix Circuits were almoſt the ſame as they are at this Day, only Eſſex then belong'd to that of Norfolk, which Circuit alſo conſiſted of more Counties than at preſent, having the Addition of Hampſhire, Barkſhire and Oxfordſhire, which are now join'd with Herefordſhire, and the reſt of the Weſtern Counties. Yet about two or three Years after, for another Deſign, the King divided the whole Nation into four Circuits, aſſigning five Juſtices to each; not long after which, he appointed the famous Glanville to be chief Juſticiary of England, by whoſe Wiſdom and Advice the Laws of King Edward, which had been before confirm'd by King William the Firſt, were again renew'd. As this King took Care for the Security of his Subjects, ſo he took Care of his own, by cauſing the Walls and Caſtles of Leiceſter to be demoliſh'd, as likewiſe the Caſtles of Groby, Thresk, Maleſart, and the new Caſtle at Alverton, with thoſe of Framingham and Bungey in Suffolk, and indeed almoſt all the Caſtles of England and Normandy, that had been fortify'd againſt him in the late War.

A. D. 1176. Reg. 22 23.

He divides the Nation into ſix Circuits.

Trompt. Hoveden. &c. Not long after, King Henry in a grand Council made his youngeſt Son John King of Ireland, by Virtue of the Bull formerly granted him by Pope Adrian; by which Title no more was meant than Vice-Roy, or Feudotory King at the moſt, ſince King Henry himſelf was never otherwiſe ſtil'd than Lord of Ireland. In the ſame Year, the King inlarg'd his Dominions by a Purchace of the Province and Earldom of Marche in France; for which he gave fifteen thouſand Pounds of Anjou Mony, twenty Mules, and as many Palfreys. For four or five Years after, we find not many Tranſactions of Moment, beſides ſome few Regulations concerning the Coin, and ſome other Ordinances. Only in the Year 1179 the Fame of Thomas Becket became ſo celebrated abroad, that when the French King's Son fell dangerouſly ſick upon the Day of his deſign'd Coronation, his Father reſolv'd to come over into England on Pilgrimage to the Tomb of this new Saint, to implore his Aſſiſtance for the Recovery of his Health; or, as our Writers relate, was commanded by St. Thomas in a Dream ſo to do. However it was, it is certain that he came into England, attended by the Earl of Flanders, and divers other Princes and Noblemen; and was met by King Henry at Dover, and conducted to Canterbury, where he ſpent two Days in Prayers at Becket's Tomb, and offer'd a weighty Golden Cup, beſtowing alſo upon the Monks of that Church an annual Portion of an hundred Meaſures of Wine, to be deliver'd without Charge or Duty, and granting that whatever thoſe Monks ſhould buy for their own Uſe in his Kingdom, it ſhould be free from all Tolls and Cuſtoms. Upon his Return home he found his Son perfectly recover'd, by the Mediation of St. Thomas, as he and many others believ'd.

Hoveden. Walſing. &c. At length, after a conſiderable Calm, the young King diſcover'd freſh Alienations in his Mind againſt his Father; who diſſembling all, notwithſtanding arm'd himſelf upon the Defenſive, and encreas'd his Garriſons both in England and Normandy, which the ſooner reduc'd the Son within Bounds. But the old King, fearing an Union among his four warlike Sons might prove no better than a Conſpiracy againſt himſelf, is ſaid to have daily promoted Contention between them. However to divert the War from himſelf, he ſatisfy'd his Royal Son Henry with an Augmentation of a Maintenance of an hundred Pounds Anjouen per Diem for himſelf, and ten for his Wife the Queen. And whereas Alice, the French King's Daughter, who had been eſpous'd at three Years of Age to his ſecond Son Richard, and was now demanded from King Henry that Richard might enjoy her, the old King, who was juſtly ſuſpected to have deflower'd her, at that Time ſhifted off the Delivery of her Perſon, in ſuch a manner that a Peace was intirely hinder'd by it. But while the young King by his Father's Inſtigation endeavour'd to force his Brother Richard to do Homage to him for Aquitain, and the Father for the ſame Cauſe commanded his third Son Geoffry to be aſſiſting to his eldeſt Brother; while alſo the jealous Father out of his Sons Contentions ſought his own Safety, and in nouriſhing it had by the Treachery of the Sons been twice endanger'd, and at both Times miraculouſly preſerv'd; and while the young King by profound Diſſimulations plotted to reduce both his Father and Brother Richard to Subjection, at length the Hand of God, by taking away the young King at Martell, put an end to this infamous and intricate Contention. Tho' the Life of this Prince had been rebellious, yet his Death was not inglorious: For finding himſelf paſt Recovery, he deſir'd to ſee his Father, to obtain his Pardon, which his Father freely ſent, with a Ring as a Token of it, not thinking it ſafe to come in Perſon. Upon which he call'd the Biſhops, and other religious Men preſent, and firſt in private, and then in publick confeſs'd his heinous Sin in rebelling againſt ſo indulgent a Father; and after Abſolution, putting on Sackcloath, and a Rope about his Neck, he begg'd of the Biſhops to pull him out of the Bed on to a Couch made of Aſhes, where being laid, and receiving the Euchariſt, he expired, to the exceeding Grief of his Father, who mourn'd for him like David for his rebellious Son Abſolon. He dy'd in the twenty eighth Year of his Age, after he had born the Name and Title of King about thirteen; being a Prince of excellent natural Qualifications, but firſt ruin'd by his Father's Indulgence, and afterwards by his Severity; not allowing him to be what he himſelf had made him: So that this Prince tho' he was ſolemnly crown'd, yet he never actually reign'd; and his Name was never inſerted in the Catalogue of our Engliſh Kings. After his Death, his Wife Queen Margaret was ſent back into France, and the preſent King's ſurviving Sons were once again reduc'd to Obedience and Reconciliation, not any Enemy daring to appear againſt him.

Young King Henry dies.

VI. It might reaſonably have been imagin'd, That this active Prince ſhould have had Opportunity to end his Days in Peace and Glory; but it was otherwiſe ordain'd by Providence; and ſeveral Writers are of Opinion, that he was principally ſcourg'd, for being drawn by ſeeming Reaſons of State to lay aſide a holy Enterprize, which he had more than once oblig'd himſelf to undertake, and had now a freſh Occaſion offer'd. For Heraclius Patriarch of Jeruſalem, induc'd by the reſounding Fame of King Henry's Wiſdom, Riches and Valour, travell'd from thence into England; where at Clerkenwel by London, in a grand Aſſembly of the States purpoſely call'd, the King made known to them, That Pope Lucius had by pathetical Letters recommended to him the deplorable State of the Holy-Land, together with Heraclius the Patriarch. At the ſame Time Heraclius, there preſent, mov'd Compaſſion and Tears at the Relation of the tragical Afflictions of the Eaſtern World, and brought with him the Keys of the Places of Chriſt's Nativity, Paſſion and Reſurrection, of David's Tower and the Holy Sepulchre, together with the humble Offer of the Kingdom of Jeruſalem, as rightfully belonging to him, who was the Son of Geoffry Earl of Anjou, whoſe Brother Fulk was King of Jeruſalem. Nevertheleſs, the King, King, having formally adjured the Lords to adviſe him to what was moſt for his Soul's Health, it was thought fit to aid and promote the Cauſe with Mony, but not to employ his Perſon, nor the Perſon of any of his Sons, which was the Patriarch's laſt Requeſt; thereupon he utterly refus'd the ſaid Kingdom, and, according to our Authors, abandon'd as noble an Occaſion of immortal Renown, as ever any King of England had been offer'd. The Patriarch declar'd, That he had rather have ſuch a Man without the Mony, than the Mony without ſuch a Man; and ſo departed with great Sorrow and Concern, and not without ſome Imprecations againſt the King's Perſon. However the King gave leave to all his Subjects whatſoever to take the Croſs; upon which the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, ſeveral Biſhops, with many Earls, Barons and Knights of England, and the reſt of the King's Dominions, undertook the Cruſado.

Cambrenſ. &c. But King Henry's Mind was more fix'd upon ſetling the Eſtate of his already poſſeſs'd Kingdoms, and therefore ſent his Ambaſſadors to Pope Lucius, of whom he deſired many Grants; but the Pope being diſpleas'd at his Behaviour, deny'd all except one, which gave him leave to crown which of his Sons he pleas'd King of Ireland. This he not only confirm'd by his Bull, but as a Token of his Approbation and Satisfaction, he ſent the King a Crown of Peacock's Feathers interwoven with Gold; reſerving to the Roman See the Peter-Pence, and all other Rights and Privileges. Accordingly the King ſolemnly knighted his beloved Son John at Windſor, but deferring his Coronation, he ſent him over into Ireland, under the chief Directorſhip of our Author Giraldus Cambrenſis, being then near twenty Years of Age. He was ſolemnly receiv'd by the Arch-Biſhop of Dublin, and the chief of the State; but by reaſon of his Parſimony towards his Soldiers, he found it convenient to return the ſame Year without performing much, but not without waſting the greateſt Part of his Army by Skirmiſhes with the Iriſh. Tho' his Father gave him the Title of King, yet he was but Vice-Roy to him, and in his great Seal for that Kingdom, he is only ſtil'd Lord of Ireland.

The King ſends his Son John into Ireland.

Hoveden. &c. After a ſhort Calm, King Henry was again diſturb'd by his undutiful Sons, particularly the furious Earl Richard, who fortify'd himſelf againſt him in Poictou, and defeated Geoffry Earl of Bretaign; upon which he prepar'd a powerful Army againſt him, the Fame and Terror of which ſoon reduc'd Richard to Subjection, and by the Order of his Father he ſurrender'd the Earldom of Poictou to his Mother Eleanor, whoſe Inheritance it was. Not long after Heaven's Vengeance purſu'd the Diſobedience of the ſecond ſurviving Brother Geoffry, who in a publick Tournament at Paris, was trodden under the Horſes Feet, and miſerably cruſh'd to Death in the twenty eighth Year of his Age. So that the King ſaw half of his rebellious Male Iſſue extinct before him, and by Deaths as violent as their Diſpoſitions: The other two who ſurviv'd him, were no leſs miſerable in their Ends. About theſe Times, all Affairs between the French and Engliſh ſtood in an unſetled Poſture, ſometimes War, ſometimes Peace, and then War again; occaſion'd chiefly by King Philip's challenging the Guardianſhip of Arthur, the poſthumous Son and Heir of Geoffry Earl of Bretaign, which would by no Means agree with the Ambitious Temper of our King Henry. At length a two Years Truce was concluded, after which Earl Richard, contrary to his Father's Will, remain'd with the King of France; and ſuch a great Intimacy grew between them, that one Table and one Bed uſually ſerv'd for both. This extraordinary Amity rais'd the Jealouſie of King Henry, who ſeveral Times ſent for his Son out of France; but Richard pretending many Grievances, as the unjuſt Detenſion of Alice his Spouſe, the Fear of being diſinherited, and other Matters, again ſtood out againſt his Father, and after ſome Time again ſubmitted to him. Upon which King Philip again broke out into Arms: And while Affairs ſtood thus, the Weſtern World was fill'd with the afflicting News of the Loſs of Jeruſalem, and the Captivity of Guido the King of it, with an innumerable Number of Chriſtians beſides, whom Sultan Saladin had vanquiſh'd, to the great Grief and Diſhonour of all Chriſtendom.

A. D. 1188. Reg. 34, 35.

Upon this News, King Henry and King Philip met, for the Honour of God, and laying aſide their former Diſpleaſure, in the Preſence of William Arch-Biſhop of Tyre, took upon them the Badge of the Croſs as Soldiers of Chriſt; and the better to diſtinguiſh themſelves, it was agreed that the French ſhould wear red Croſſes, the Engliſh white, and the Flemmiſh green. And this Determination was ſeconded by all warlike Preparations, Levies of Mony, Inſtitution of martial Diſcipline, with great Privileges and Indulgences to all who ſhould undertake the War; notwithſtanding which all prov'd of little Effect. For a Breach of this honourable Confederacy aroſe through Richard's Means, who revenging himſelf upon ſome Rebels in Poictou, that could not bear his ſevere Government, it rais'd ſuch new Diſturbances, that at length both the Kings of England and France became Parties to the Conteſt; much againſt the Inclination of King Henry who ſeem'd now firmly reſolv'd to revenge the Cauſe of Chriſt upon Sultan Saladin; as appears from his Anſwer to the Petitioning Letter of the Patriarch of Antioch, in which he told him, That among other Princes, Himſelf and his Son, rejecting all the Pleaſures and Glories of this World, would by the Favour of God, ſpeedily viſit him in Perſon, with their whole Forces. And now the State of thoſe Parts requir'd it, Saladin having ſlain many of the Knights Templars, and Nobility, and above thirty thouſand Soldiers, beſides innumerable others in Cities and Towns by him ſubdu'd. Which ſo affected the Earls of Flanders, Blois, and other Princes, that when they were deſir'd to join with one of the two contending Kings, they made anſwer, That they would not, contrary to their Promiſe made to God, put on Armour againſt any Chriſtian, 'till they had diſcharg'd their Duties againſt Saladin. In the Treaties therefore between Henry and Philip, the Demands of the latter on the behalf of Richard were ſuch as Henry thought unſafe, which was that the Marriage between Richard and the Princeſs ſhould be conſummated, and all Subjects ſwear Fealty to him, while his Father was alive. Which Propoſitions being rejected by Henry, his Son immediately fell from him, and became a Homager to the King of France for Normandy and other Places. At a ſecond Treaty, ſet on foot by the Mediation of a Cardinal Legate, King Philip's Demands were harder than before, as that King Henry ſhould not only ſettle his Kingdom upon Richard, but likewiſe take his Son John with him into the Holy-Land; otherwiſe Richard ſhould ſtay behind, being jealous of his Brother's Favour with the Father. King Henry thought himſelf affronted at theſe Propoſitions, and diſdaining to be compell'd by any Man, both Parties betook themſelves to their Arms.

A. D. 1189. Reg. 35.

The unhappy Effect of this Conteſt was, that the mighty Monarch King Henry, being abandon'd by his former good Fortunes, was now diſgrac'd in his declining Age, ſuſtain'd many Loſſes by the Armies of King Philip and Richard, was driven out of Mans, his beloved Birth-Place, with the Burning of that City, and at length was conſtrain'd to yield to ſuch diſhonourable Conditions as Philip thought fit to propoſe, one of which was That he ſhould pay him twenty thouſand Marks in Silver. Hoveden tells us that at the Meeting of theſe two Kings, when the Sky was clear, a dreadful Flaſh of Lightning fell between them and parted them, and coming together again, it thunder'd more terribly, ſo that the old King had fallen off his Horſe, had not his Followers ſuſtain'd him; upon which he durſt not retard the Peace one Moment, but immediately ſubmitted; but to his unſpeakable Affliction, who had been ſo often us'd to give, and not to take Conditions. At his leaving of Mans, he in a violent Paſſion declar'd, That ſince Richard had taken that Place from him which he moſt lov'd in this World, he would deprive him of what ought to be moſt dear to a Child, which was his Heart. But after the Concluſion of the Peace, another another Thing touch'd him more nearly; for finding the Name of his beloved Son John in the Catalogue of the Confederates againſt him in that Action, overcome with Rage and Grief, he bitterly curs'd the Hour of his Birth, and ſolemnly laid God's Imprecations and his own upon both his Sons; which no Perſuaſions of the Biſhops could cauſe him to revoke: But falling dangerouſly ſick at Chinon, finding the Approaches of Death, he caus'd himſelf to be carry'd into the Church before the Altar, where after an humble Confeſſion and Sorrow for his Sins, and an Acknowledgment of the Juſtneſs of this laſt Misfortune, he expired. It is obſervable, that immediately after his Death, his Domeſticks, contrary to Decency and Humanity, rifled him of his Cloaths, and left him ſtript and naked. Nor muſt it be forgotten, That the violent Richard, now Heir of all, coming to meet his Father's Body, royally adorn'd for the Funeral, the Corps guſh'd forth Blood, as it were accuſing him of his unnatural Behaviour; at which Richard, touch'd with Remorſe, melted into Floods of Tears, in a moſt penitent Manner attending the Remains of his unfortunate Father to the Grave, which was at Fontevrand. He dy'd on the ſixth Day of July, and in the fifty ſixth Year of his Age, after a troubleſom and pompous Reign of thirty four Years, eight Months, and twelve Days.

He dies with Grief.

This was the End of the greateſt Potentate that had hitherto ſate upon the Engliſh Throne, and perhaps the greateſt that was then in the Chriſtian World; a Prince highly celebrated for his Abilities and Qualifications. He was of a robuſt ſound Conſtitution, of a ſanguin Complexion, and of a warm martial Diſpoſition. He had a ſtrong and penetrating Underſtanding, which he daily improv'd by Converſation and Study; was valiant and vigorous in War, and prudent and politick in Peace; magnificent in publick, frugal in private, generous to Strangers, and ſparing to his Domeſticks, ſevere to Oppoſers, and mild to all Compliers. But tho' he had many ſhining Virtues, yet he knew not how to ſet Bounds either to his Ambition or his Luſts; as to the former, he was wont to ſay, That the whole World was but ſufficient for one great Man; and the latter were ſo exorbitant as to occaſion the greateſt Calamities in his Reign. He was likewiſe covetous, and no ſtrict Obſerver of his Word; ſo that upon the whole, he had ſuch a Stock of Vices as well as Virtues, natural Perfections and Imperfections, ſo blended together, that he can neither be ſaid to be an exceeding good, nor an exceeding bad Prince; all which were accompany'd with the like Meaſures of good and ill Fortune. Vices in Princes, being more contagious than in private Perſons, ſeldom eſcape God's Vengeance in this World; ſo the Adulteries, and perhaps Inceſts, of this Prince met with their natural Puniſhment from the Fruit of his own Body, whoſe Diſobedience brought him in his latter Years to ſee the Reverſe of his former Fortunes, and all his Laurels to wither on a ſudden. Whereby we find that neither the Number of his Children, the Extent of his Dominions, nor all his eminent Qualities, could make his Proſperity durable; but for want of a Conqueſt over his Paſſions, and a Command over himſelf, he loſt that Empire he had obtain'd over others. Tho' this King never impos'd many Taxes, yet he is ſaid to have left behind him more than ninty thouſand Pounds in ready Coin, beſides Plate, Jewels, Houſhold Goods, and an ample Proviſion for a War. In this Reign the unhappy Diſtinction between the Names of Normans and Engliſh was in a great meaſure ended. And Doctor Hody tells us that in theſe Times, the King's Court of Juſtice was where the King himſelf reſided; and ſince the Courts were fix'd in Weſtminſter Hall, our Kings have ſometimes ſat there in Perſon, and not incognito, but openly, with their Crowns on their Heads, as they us'd formerly to ſit in the Curiæ held on the three great Feſtivals.

SECT. II.

The Reign of King RICHARD the First.

Containing nine Years, and nine Months.

A. D. 1189. Reg. 1.

I. KING Henry left two Sons behind him, Richard and John; and both theſe ſucceeded him in the Throne of England. The former was now about thirty one Years of Age, and obtain'd the Sirname of Coeur de Lion, or Lion's Heart; a violent and valiant Prince, who from his Father's Death, ſeem'd to have ſet his whole Heart upon the Re-advancement of the Croſs of Chriſt, lately ſo much diſhonour'd by the Infidels in Aſia. But firſt he took care to eſtabliſh his Affairs in Normandy, and his other Dominions in France; and then ſent Letters into England to ſet his Mother Queen Eleanor at Liberty, whom her Husband had made a Priſoner for twelve, or as others ſay, ſixteen Years; who now ſenſible of others Misfortunes by her own, perform'd many Acts of Mercy and Bounty to thoſe in the like Circumſtances. Yet Richard honourably baniſh'd all thoſe from his Preſence and Acquaintance who had abandon'd his Father, and rewarded many others who loyally ſtood for him againſt himſelf in the former Conteſts. And having in a ſhort Time ſetled all tranſmarine Affairs, he paſs'd over into England, intending to make a ſhort Stay there; as well to receive all the Rights of Soveraignty, as to take all proper Means and Methods to carry on his intended holy Expedition, together with Philip King of France, and ſeveral other Chriſtian Pontentates. Hoveden. Gervaſe.

Richard ſucceeds in the Throne.

Being ſafely arriv'd in England, he was by univerſal Conſent crown'd at Weſtminſter by Baldwin Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury; the Particulars of which Solemnity we have from Hoveden and Diceto, and which in Subſtance were thus. First the Arch-Biſhops of Canterbury, Roven, Triers, and Dublin, with the other Biſhops, Abbots and Clergy, cloath'd in rich Copes and Habits, with the Croſs, Holy-Water and Cenſers born before them, came to fetch Duke Richard at the Door of his Privy-Chamber, from whence they led him to the Abby-Church of Weſtminſter in a ſolemn Proceſſion. In the middle of the Biſhops and Clergy were four Barons, bearing golden Candleſticks and Tapers; and after them came Geoffry de Lucy with the Royal Cap, John the Marſhall with a maſſie Pair of golden Spurs, William Earl of Pembroke with the Royal Scepter and a golden Croſs at the End of it, and William Earl of Salisbury with the golden Rod and a Dove on the Top. Then came three other Earls, David Earl of Huntington, Brother to the King of the Scots, John Earl of Mortaign, Duke Richard's Brother, in the middle, and Robert Earl of Leiceſter; each bearing a large Sword upright in his Hand, with the Scabbards richly adorn'd with Gold. Theſe were follow'd by ſix Earls and Barons bearing a checker'd Table, with the Regalia upon it; and thoſe by William Mandevil Earl of Albermarle, bearing a large and rich Crown of Gold; after whom came Richard himſelf, between the Biſhops of Durham and Bath, under a Canopy of State born by four Barons. Then follow'd a noble Train of Earls, Barons, Knights and others as well of the Clergy as Laity, who in a pompous manner accompany'd him to the High-Altar, where ſolemnly laying his Hands upon the Holy Evangeliſts, and the Relicks of divers Saints, he took a formal Oath, 'To obſerve Peace, Ho-'nour and Reverence to Almighty God, his Church, and Miniſters, all the 'Days of his Life; That he would exerciſe Juſtice and Equity towards the 'People committed to his Charge; and that he would abrogate all evil Laws 'and unjuſt Cuſtoms, and make, keep and ſincerely maintain thoſe that were 'good and laudable. Then the Arch-Biſhop proceeded to anoint him in three Places, the Head, Breaſt and Arms, ſignifying by thoſe Unctions Glory, Fortitude, Hoveden. Diceto.

titude, and Wiſdom; and before he gave him the Crown he ſolemnly adjur'd him in the Name of the High God, Not to preſume to take this Dignity upon him, unleſs he reſolv'd inviolably to keep thoſe Vows and Oaths, he had juſt then made; to which the King anſwer'd, That by God's Grace he would faithfully perform them all. Upon which the Arch-Biſhop ſet the Crown upon his Head, deliver'd the Scepter into his right Hand, and plac'd the Rod-Royal in his left; in which manner he was led to his Throne, and after Maſs and the Offertory was over, to his Lodgings, in the ſame ſolemn Proceſſion. This in ſhort was the Form of the King's Coronation, which Solemnity was unfortunately polluted with the Blood of many Jews, tho' utterly againſt the King's Will, who preſſing into the Abby Church to ſee the Ceremony, were in a Tumult barbarouſly murder'd by the People.

Hoveden. Deviſes. Shortly after his Coronation, King Richard proceeded to all Kind of Methods for the Proſecution of the Holy-War, for which all his Father's vaſt Treaſure, and thoſe great Sums he extorted from Stephen Turnham his Treaſurer, were not thought ſufficient. Therefore he ſold many of his Manors and Caſtles to divers Perſons; as to Hugh Biſhop of Durham the Manor of Sadbery for ſix hundred Marks, and ſoon after the Earldom of Northumberland to be held with his Biſhoprick, with this Piece of Rallery upon it, He had made a young Earl of an old Biſhop; and this not ſatisfying his ambitious Temper, he beſides gave the King one thouſand Marks more to be one of his chief Juſticiaries in his Abſence. Beſides theſe the King ſold many other Manors and Lands to ſuch Biſhops and Abbots as would purchaſe them, they being then the chief mony'd Men in England; by which means he rais'd immenſe Sums towards his intended Expedition. He granted to William King of the Scots the Caſtles of Berwick and Roxborough for ten thouſand Marks, and releas'd him of thoſe Covenants made to his Father, as extorted from him when a Priſoner, only reſerving to himſelf ſuch Rights as had been allow'd by his Brother Malcolm to the former Kings of England. Moreover upon ſome Diſpleaſure he impriſon'd the great Lawyer Glanville, and forc'd him to purchaſe his Liberty at no leſs Sum than fifteen thouſand Pounds; and even his Favourite William Longchamp pay'd three thouſand Pounds to have the great Seal continu'd in his Cuſtody during the King's Abſence; and when he was queſtion'd why he ſold ſo many Places and Manors, he made Anſwer, That he would ſell London it ſelf, if he could find a good Chapman; ſo earneſtly intent he was upon this plauſible Enterprize. As for Men and Soldiers, the Prelates, Friars and other Preachers excited great Numbers by their various Exhortations in Pulpits and private Conferences, reſounding nothing but the Croſs and Paſſion of Jeſus Chriſt, calling upon the World to revenge his glorious Cauſe againſt all Pagans and Infidels.

The King prepares for the Holy War.

Gervaſe. Hoveden. M. Paris. The main Danger of the State in the King's Abſence was in his Brother John, of whoſe Ambition he had reaſon to be jealous, as knowing that his Father, not long before his Death, had deſign'd him his Succeſſor; therefore to conquer his aſpiring Thoughts with Bounty and Munificence, and to remove all Occaſions of Complaint, King Richard did in ſome Degree ſhare his Kingdom with him, inveſting him with ſix Earldoms, Cornwall, Dorſet, Somerſet, Nottingham, Derby and Lancaſter, beſides Caſtles, Honours, Manors, Foreſts, and Bounties, and finally with the Earldom of Gloceſter, and the Heireſs of that County for his Wife; tho' the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury forbad the Nuptials, alledging ſhe was within the Degrees of Conſanguinity. But leſt through ill Nature or Advice, Earl John ſhould make a wrong Uſe of theſe great Donations, he laid ſeveral Reſtraints upon him, and intruſted him with no Part of the Regal Power; but laid the main Burthen of the Government upon his Chancellor Longchamp, Biſhop of Ely, chief Juſticiary, and Legate to the See of Rome, who was now inveſted with whatſoever either King or Pope could grant for the Completion of his Authority. So that, as Paris ſays, he might well be ſtill'd Prince and Prieſt of England, as being the moſt powerful Subject for the

the Time, that had been known in the Nation; for tho' the King had join'd Hugh Biſhop of Durham with him in Commiſſion, for all the Parts beyond the Humber, yet Longchamp in a ſhort Time eaſily made himſelf ſole Juſticiary, and by his Authority ſilenc'd the Name and Endeavours of his Collegue. Thus the chief Command, and the Soveraign Power it ſelf was in the Chancellor as Vice-Roy, but for the Defence and Execution of his Juſtice, the King prudently aſſociated with his Juſticiaries, William Earl of Arundell, Hugh Bardolfe, William Marſhall, Geoffry Fitz-Peter, William Brimere, Robert de Whitfield, and Robert Fitz-Reinfield, all Men of Honour, Wiſdom and Authority. To compleat all, King Richard took care to provide for the Neighbourhood of Wales and Scotland; but tho' he did not ſo well ſucceed with Rees Prince of the former, yet William King of Scotland came to the King in England, and concluded a firm Alliance with him, which he religiouſly kept, in the greateſt Troubles of King Richard, to His and his Nation's Honour; and, as ſome write, ſent his Brother David with five thouſand Scots to ſerve him in the Holy War.

A. D. 1190. Reg. 1.

The Affairs of England being thus eſtabliſh'd, King Richard croſs'd the Seas to meet King Philip in France, according to Appointment, that from thence, with Minds and Forces united, they might ſet forwards under the Banner of the Croſs; which after ſome Stay, occaſion'd by the Death of Philip's Queen, they undertook upon theſe Chriſtian and Friendly Terms: 'That each ſhould 'preſerve the other's Honour, and bear Faith to him as to Life, Member and 'wordly Dignity: That neither ſhould fail the other in their Affairs; but the 'King of France ſhould help the King of England to defend his Land, as he 'would defend the City of Paris if beſieg'd; and the latter ſhould help the 'former to defend his, as he would defend the City of Roven if beſieg'd. This being committed to Writing, and then ratify'd by Oath, the two Kings ſent it to their Earls and Barons, who ſolemnly ſwore not to treſpaſs againſt their Fealty, nor ſtir up any War in either of the King's Dominions, during the Time of this extraordinary Pilgrimage; and on the other ſide the Arch-Biſhops and Biſhops firmly promis'd to execrate and excommunicate all ſuch as ſhould tranſgreſs this Agreement. Thus, after ſome neceſſary Delays, theſe two, the greateſt Monarchs of the Weſtern World, ſet forwards by Land, to the reputed publick Service of Chriſtianity, with ſuch Numbers as they themſelves thought moſt proper; which were ſo great, that having paſs'd the Rhone at Lions, and receiv'd ſome Loſs by the Breaking of the Bridge, they parted Company for meer Conveniency of travelling. Philip paſs'd over the Alps into Italy, and Richard to the Sea-Coaſt at Marſeilles, there to meet with his Royal Navy, which conſiſting of all the capital Ships of England and Normandy, and his other French Dominions, was appointed to attend at that Port. But the Fleet being not arriv'd, King Richard, impatient of Delays, after eight Days Continuance there, embark'd with the Attendance of twenty hired Gallies, and ten great Buſſes, and ſet Sail for Meſſina in Sicily, the Rendezvous of both the Kings and their Armies. In which Paſſage, occaſionally lying at Anchor at the Mouth of the Tiber, he was deſired by the Biſhop of Oſtia in the Pope's Name to make a Viſit to his Holineſs; but the King freely charg'd the Pope with Avarice and Simony in relation to ſome new advanc'd Biſhops in his Dominions, and therefore utterly refus'd to ſee Rome. Thus after ſeveral Accidents and Landings, hearing that his Navy was ſafe, he tarry'd for all, and after that, upon the twenty third Day of September, came to Anchor before the City of Meſſina, with ſo great a Shew of Power, and Noiſe of Warlike Inſtruments, and other Marks of Grandeur and Majeſty, in the Sight of Philip and his French, and of many other Nations there aſſembled, that it caus'd a Terror to the Inhabitants, and no ſmall Envy to his Confederates.

of Hatred or Policy had impriſon'd that Queen; but upon the Appearance of her Brother, he honourably ſent her to him, and yielded to ſeveral Articles, and to the Payment of large Sums of Mony. And now Fear wrought on both Sides; and Richard being among Strangers, and not fully ſure of the French, ſeiz'd upon a Fortreſs in the Iſland of a valiant People call'd Griffons, and after that by means of an extraordinary Tumult took the City of Meſſina it ſelf. From which Time the Spirit of Diſcord ſeems to have been ſown between the two Royal Adventurers; for King Richard, fluſh'd with Victory, diſplay'd his Banners, even in thoſe Parts of the City appointed for King Philip's Quarters, which gave great Offence to the other, and occaſion'd many warm Expreſſions. Yet at length by the Mediation of great Men on both Sides, the Conteſt was for the preſent adjuſted; and Richard order'd his Enſigns to be taken down, and then deliver'd the Cuſtody of the City to the Knights Hoſpitallers, and Templars, 'till all Things required from the King of Sicily were perform'd. After much Deliberation, in anſwer to King Richard's Demands, Tancred inſiſted That he had already paid to his Siſter, late Queen of the Iſland, large Sums of Mony in lieu of her Dowry or Jointure; and concerning the Legacies intended by his Predeceſſor King William, to the Father of King Richard, he was ready to ſatisfie him, as far as he ought according to the Cuſtoms of his Kingdom. But to appeaſe that Power he could not reſiſt, he gave to King Richard twenty thouſand Ounces of Gold, in Conſideration of his Siſter's Jointure; and further to be acquitted of all other Claims and Pretences, and likewiſe in Conſideration that Arthur Duke of Bretaign, Nephew and next Heir to King Richard, ſhould marry the Daughter of King Tancred, he paid a ſecond Sum of twenty thouſand Ounces more: After which, to purchace the Amity of King Richard and the Love of the Engliſh Nation, as alſo for the greater Aſſurance of Performance of Articles, he voluntarily added a third Sum of twenty thouſand Ounces, and afterwards four great Ships call'd Urſers, and fifteen Gallies. On the other Side King Richard, that he might not be wanting in any Thing which in Honour and Equity might be expected from him, beſides Letters Patents, he choſe unexceptionable Sureties upon Oath, as two Arch-Biſhops, two Biſhops, and no leſs than twenty Lords and great Men, whoſe Names are upon Record in Hoveden. And for a final Confirmation, he offer'd that Pope Clement ſhould undertake for the Performance of his Part of the ſaid Agreement; and accordingly wrot Letters to him upon that Subject, freely giving him leave, upon any Failure in him, to put all his Dominions under the ſevereſt Cenſures.

Tancred King of Sicily gives him large Sums

Hoveden. &c. The Peace being happily concluded, Tancred before he took leave of King Richard, diſcover'd to him a foul and diſhonourable Deſign of the French King, againſt his Perſon and Safety; which ſhortly after coming to be warmly debated between the two Kings, Philip charg'd Richard with inventing and promoting of Conteſts; and further added That unleſs Richard marry'd his Siſter Alice, according to the ancient Contract, he would be his irreconcilable Enemy. To which King Richard, being urg'd, return'd in Anſwer, That the Princeſs during her Abode in England, had a Child by his Father Henry, which he was ready to prove by many Witneſſes then preſent; ſo that he had far more Cauſe than a bare Suſpicion of Incontinency, to refuſe the Marriage. Upon this ungrateful Diſcovery, and upon certain new Conditions between the two Kings, Philip left the other at liberty to chuſe a Wife where he thought fit, and ſeem'd to be reconcil'd to him; yet ſtill Tancred's late Information rais'd ſuch a Diſtruſt and Jealouſie between 'em, that from thence forward they were never true Friends. Not long after, they both parted for the intended holy Expedition. But becauſe Examples of true Chriſtian Humility are too rare among Princes and Potentates, we muſt not paſs by that of this famous General King Richard, who about this Time, as Hoveden expreſſes it, being inſpir'd with Divine Grace and ſtudying to fit himſelf for this great Enterprize, felt ſuch a Compunction for his Sins, that he made a solemn Confession of all his Excesses before his Bishops, humbly imploring the Mercy of God, and the Absolution of his subordinate Ministers. Our Author adds that God respected him with the Eyes of Mercy, and gave him a penitent Heart, so that from thenceforward he prov'd a Man fearing God, and eschewing Evil. And now addicting his Mind to Contemplation, and the Honour of the Christian Church, whose Champion he was, he desir'd the Conference of a famous Visionary Abbot in Italy call'd Joachim, celebrated for his profound Knowledge of the Scriptures, and his prophetical Revelations. This Man preaching before the King upon the Apocalypse of St. John, concerning the coming of Antichrist, freely declar'd That Antichrist was then born, and in the City of Rome should be advanc'd to the Apostolick See, of whom the Apostle said, he should exalt himself above all that is call'd God; and that the seven Crowns were the Kings and Princes of the Earth who obey'd him. This, tho' accidental, administer'd sufficient Occasion for Reflexions; by reason Kings and Princes were suppos'd to be those Gods over whom Antichrist should exalt himself: For shortly after, Henry the Emperor together with his Empress Constantia, at their Coronation in St. Peter's Church stooping down to the Ground, receiv'd their Imperial Crowns from between the Feet of the Pope, with which he immediately struck them off their Heads; signifying by that Action, That he had Power to throw them out of their Dominions whenever he thought fit.

Richard is very penitent.

The same Day that Philip and the French Forces set Sail from Messina, Eleanor King Richard's Mother arriv'd with Berengaria his new intended Spouse, Daughter to Sanctius King of Navarre, whom he afterwards marry'd in Cyprus; but his Mother after a short Stay return'd by Rome into England, leaving the young Lady with Joan Queen Dowager of Sicily, both which accompany'd the King towards the Holy-Land, his whole Navy consisting of an hundred and fifty large Ships and fifty three Gallies, besides thirteen Busses, and many Tenders; but we do not find what Number of Soldiers were in the English Army. This Royal Navy, sailing between the Isles of Rhodes and Cyprus, was dispers'd by a terrible Storm, which turn'd much to the Honour and Advantage of King Richard, as giving him an Occasion of new Conquests. For two of the Vessels being cast away upon the Coasts of Cyprus, near the Port of Limezun, and the Ship that carry'd the Princess in great Danger; Isaac the King, or, as he was call'd, Emperor of that Island, barbarously rifled and imprison'd those Persons that escap'd, and would not permit the Ladies to enter the Harbour, tho' in great Distress: Which uncommon Inhumanity, neither Heav'n nor King Richard would forgive. For the said inhospitable Prince, having thrice refus'd to make Restitution of his unlawful Seisures and Prisoners, was soon after enter'd upon and invaded by the English, driven from the Coasts with great Dishonour and Slaughter, the City of Limezun left a Prey to the Victors, and himself beaten out of his Camp, and taken Prisoner. After an Escape made by him, his only Daughter and Heiress was forc'd to yield her self Prisoner, and lastly himself, despairing to be conceal'd, came of his own Accord, and was put into Fetters of Silver; upon which the whole Island, with all its People, Strength and Riches, became Subject to the King of England, and both Father and Daughter were led into Captivity. In this Island King Richard was honour'd by the Attendance of Guido King of Jerusalem, Geoffry his Brother, Raimund Prince of Antioch, Boemund his Son, and many other Princes, who offer'd him their Service; and here he finish'd the Nuptials of his beloved Lady Berengaria. Isaac was sent to Tripolis in Syria, his Daughter committed to the King's Sister and Queen, and the Island intrusted to Richard Camvile and Robert Turnham his Vice-Roys, with competent Forces and Provisions; and the Islanders were suffer'd to enjoy all such Laws and Liberties, as they held in the Reign of Manuel the Emperor of Constantinople.

II. During theſe proſperous Tranſactions abroad, the State of England ſuffer'd extreamly at home under the Government of Biſhop Longchamp the Chancellor, who arrogating to himſelf that Authority which belong'd to the reſt of the Commiſſioners in common, acted as he thought fit, and with that Inſolence deported himſelf, that he incurr'd the Hatred of the whole Kingdom, both Clergy and Laity. His Train was ſaid to be ſo great, and his Attendance ſo numerous, that whenever he lay in any religious Houſe but one Night, three Years Revenues would ſcarce recover the Charge. Beſides, being a Foreigner himſelf, and employing only Frenchmen about him, he render'd his Actions more inſupportable to the Engliſh: Inſomuch that the whole Clergy and Nobility oppos'd his Proceedings; and the King's Brother John taking Advantage of their Diſcontents, to render himſelf popular, and to make way for his deſign'd Uſurpation, join'd with the State againſt the Biſhop, as being the Perſon who had ever defeated his aſpiring Attempts; having a particular Eye upon him, as a moſt dangerous Man, in reſpect of the King's Charge and his own Safety. In a ſhort Time he found a fair Opportunity to ruin the Chancellor by means of Geoffry the Elect Arch-Biſhop of York, natural Son to the late King Henry, to whoſe Preferment in England King Richard was averſe, and therefore had confin'd him to Normandy during his Abſence, where after much Difficulty, he had obtain'd Power of the preſent Pope to be inveſted in the ſaid See. Longchamp being inform'd of this Perſon's Arrival, order'd him to be apprehended at Dover, where he was forcibly drawn out of the Church to which he had retir'd, and ignominiouſly dragg'd from the Altar to the Caſtle in his Pontifical Habit. Upon this Violence, Earl John commanded the Chancellor not only to releaſe him, but immediately to anſwer the Matter before the Aſſembly of the Biſhops and Nobility at St. Paul's; where they urg'd againſt him many heinous Actions, committed contrary to his Commiſſion, and the Good of the King and Kingdom. The Arch-Biſhop of Roven, and the Earl of Pembroke openly ſhew'd the King's Letters Patents, dated at Meſſina, by which they were made equal Commiſſioners with him in the Government of the Kingdom; in which notwithſtanding he would not ſuffer them to be concern'd, but according to his violent Methods govern all himſelf. Upon which he was by the Aſſembly formally depos'd from his Office, and the Arch-Biſhop of Roven put in his Place; as alſo the Tower of London, and Caſtle of Windſor were taken from him, and deliver'd to the Arch-Biſhop. Thus this great Officer, preſuming too much upon his own Power, was thrown down from his Seat, and forc'd to reſign his Legantine Croſs at Canterbury, and take up that for the Holy War; and endeavouring to eſcape privately over the Sea, he was in the Habit of a Woman, with a Web of Linnen Cloath under his Arm, taken upon the Shore at Dover, and opprobriouſly made a Spectacle to the People, and conducted with all Deriſion to the Caſtle. Whence after eight Days he was releas'd by Earl John, and permitted to purſue his intended Voyage; in which, being the Meſſenger of his own Uſage, he had the Advantage of his Adverſaries, and prevail'd againſt them with the Pope, who was highly diſpleas'd to find the Legantine Power ſo vilify'd. In the mean Time Earl John, with the Commiſſioners, confirm'd to the City of London their common Liberties, and caus'd the Citizens to ſwear Fealty to King Richard and his Heir; and if he dy'd without Iſſue, they were then to maintain Earl John as their Lord and King, againſt all Men whatſoever.

Thus forward was Earl John in his Attempts upon the Crown of his Brother King Richard, while he was paſſing into the Holy-Land with the Spoils and Treaſure of three noble Iſlands, England, Sicily and Cyprus, beſides Normandy, and other Parts of France; in which diſtant Country almoſt all was conſum'd, tho' to the great Renown of himſelf and Nation. And here, for the Reader's clearer Underſtanding of theſe Affairs, it will not be amiſs to take notice, That about ninety two Years ſince, Godfrey of Bouillon and his Aſſiſtants recover'd the City of Jeruſalem, with the Country of Paleſtine, and a great Part of Syria, out of the Hands of the Saracens, obtain'd the Kingdom, and reigning one Year dy'd, and left his Brother Baldwin to ſucceed him; who governing eighteen Years, left the Crown to another of that Name Baldwin de Borgo, who reign'd thirteen Years, and left a Daughter, and the Kingom in Diſpute. Fulk Earl of Anjou marrying this Daughter, enjoy'd the Kingdom eleven Years, and left two young Sons, Baldwin, who reign'd twenty four Years, and Almerick twelve; which laſt left the Kingdom to his Son Baldwin, who being ſickly and deſpairing of Iſſue, made his Siſter Sibill's Son Baldwin his Succeſſor, and committed the Charge of him, with the Adminiſtration of the Kingdom to Raynvond Earl of Tripoly, whom Guido de Luſignan, having marry'd the Widow Sibill, put from that Charge, uſurp'd the Government, and at length the Kingdom, not without Suſpicion of poiſoning the young King. Raynvond making War upon him, Guido imprudently drew in Sultan Saladin of Ægypt to his Aſſiſtance, who improving this Opportunity of inlarging his Dominions, ſoon deſtroy'd them both, with their Kingdom, and won the Cities of Acon, Azotus, Berytus, Aſcalon, and after one Months Siege, the City of Jeruſalem it ſelf, eighty eight Years after it had been conquer'd by the famous Godfrey of Bouillon.

A ſhort Account of the Cruſades.

To recover this ruinous State, the two great Kings of England and France came from far diſtant Countries, with Armies compos'd of different Nations and ſeveral Inclinations, as Engliſh, French, Italians, Germans, and others, againſt a mighty Prince of an united Power, within his own Territories, acquainted with the Manner of the Fights and the Nature of the Forces of the Chriſtians, and poſſeſs'd of the beſt Parts of the Country. And here they ſucceſſively ſat down before Acon or Ptolomais, defended by the Power of Saladin, which had been before beſieg'd by the Chriſtians for the Space of three Years, and had coſt the Lives of many worthy Princes and great Men of ſeveral Nations, whoſe Names are ſtill in the Records of Fame. And notwithſtanding all the Forces of theſe two Kings, the Garriſon held out four Months after, and then ſurrender'd upon theſe Articles. 1. That Saladin ſhould by a certain Day reſtore the Holy Croſs. 2. That he ſhould ſet free fifteen hundred Chriſtian Captives. 3. That the City, and all Things contain'd in it, ſhould remain to the Chriſtians. 4. That the Garriſon ſhould only have their Lives ſav'd, if theſe Conditions were perform'd. 5. That they ſhould pay twenty thouſand Pieces of Gold, towards the Charges of the two Kings. At their Entrance into the City, the Banners of Leopold Duke of Auſtria, being planted on the Walls, were with great Diſgrace taken down by the Command of King Richard, and thoſe of the two Kings erected; which highly incens'd the Duke, who immediately quitted the Service, and afterwards found Means to revenge himſelf. Beſides this, during the Siege, divers Marks of Jealouſie and Diſpleaſure appear'd between the Kings themſelves; and the Competition of Honour made the leaſt Diſproportion of it a Wound beyond Cure. And now that Article formerly concluded of equally dividing their Profits in the Expedition, came to be queſtion'd: The King of France claim'd half the Iſle of Cyprus, and the King of England half the Treaſure and Goods of the Earl of Flanders, which the other had lately ſeiz'd; and in this neither were ſatisfy'd. Then appear'd the two Pretenders to the Crown of Jeruſalem, Guido of Luſignan, and Conrade of Montferrat; the former pleading Poſſeſſion in right of his Wife Sibill, the King of England eſpous'd his Cauſe; and the King of France join'd with Conrade. Theſe Differences created continual Heart-burnings between 'em, and they were ſo much diſtemper'd by their own violent Heats, and the hot Contagion of the Country, that they fell into a moſt dangerous Sickneſs, which occaſion'd the intire Loſs of their Hair. But being recover'd, the French King reſolv'd to ſtay no longer, where he ſaw ſo little Probability of Honour or Advantage; and the rather becauſe by the Death of the Earl of Flanders he had an Opportunity of enlarging his his Dominions at home; therefore he ſent to King Richard for his Conſent to return home. Richard fearing to let an offended Lion looſe, would not grant it, 'till he had taken a ſolemn Oath, That he would protect his Dominions and People 'till his Return, and would do no Damage to them, nor ſuffer any to be done by others. The King of France returns home.

Winſauff. Hoveden. &c. The King of France thus leaving Acon, in the Caſtle of which King Richard's Queen and Siſter were lodg'd, and the Duke of Burgundy remaining behind with the French Army, and a great Part of his Maſter's Treaſure, King Richard the ſame Day ſet forwards upon a new Enterprize: For before, by reaſon of the Diſſention between the Kings which ſhould be greateſt, ſcarce any Thing proſper'd; and Richard had juſt Cauſe to complain in his Letters, That Philip to the great Reproach of himſelf and Kingdom, had diſhonourably forſaken his Purpoſe and Vow to God. When Saladin could by no Means obtain a longer Day for the Performance of the ſaid Articles of Compoſition, he barbarouſly cut off the Heads of all his Chriſtian Captives; in Revenge of which King Richard brought out his Mahometan Captives, to the Number of two thouſand ſeven hundred, and in the ſight of Saladin's Camp, caus'd them all to be beheaded; the Duke of Burgundy doing the ſame to near the ſame Number, by the Walls of Acon, only ſeven of the chief being preſerv'd alive by the Chriſtian Generals. King Richard vigorouſly proceeding in his new deſign'd Enterprize, march'd towards Joppa, in which he was furiouſly ſet upon by Saladin, who had juſt before put the Duke of Burgundy to flight, and ſlain the valiant Jaques de Avennes, who made a noble Reſiſtance with only a few in the Reer; but Richard encounter'd him with ſo much Courage and Bravery, that he conſtrain'd him to fly diſhonourably, with the Loſs of three thouſand of his choiceſt Soldiers. About this Time the King met with a remarkable Deliverance from the Hands of the Saracens: For one Day diverting himſelf with Hawking, attended by a ſmall Retinue, and being tired with the Exerciſe, he laid himſelf under a Tree to ſleep; of which a Party of the Enemy having notice, they laid an Ambuſcade, and ſent ſome of their Men to ſet upon the King, and provoke him to fight; which when they had done, by a feign'd Flight they drew him into their Ambuſh, and ſuddenly ſurrounded him and his Company. Here he had certainly been taken Priſoner, had not one of his Gentlemen nam'd William de Pratellis, out of an uncommon Piece of Generoſity, ſav'd him by cauſing himſelf to be taken in his ſtead, and crying out in the Saracen's Tongue, I am the King; upon which they all ſeiz'd upon him, while the King and divers of his Followers made their Eſcapes. Afterwards, the King in Conſideration of this noble Act, gave in Exchange for him ten of the greateſt Noblemen among his Priſoners; manifeſting the Eſteem he had for this brave Man, whom alone he valu'd at the Rate of ten Princes. King Richard defeats Saladin.

Winſauff. M. Paris. &c. Still King Richard vigorouſly purſu'd his Deſigns, and after ſeveral brave and important Actions, march'd up within ſight of Jeruſalem, where he skirmiſh'd with the Enemy, and overthrew the Convoy or Caravan of Saladin, which came richly laden from Babylon, and was guarded by ten thouſand Men; whom Richard valiantly attack'd with five thouſand ſelect Soldiers, put moſt of them to the Sword, took three thouſand Camels and four thouſand Horſes and Mules, and recover'd a noble Booty. After this, and many other great Exploits, as the Relief of Joppa, and the Repulſe of Saladin from that Place, the King, indefatigable in his brave Attempts, endeavouring to regain Jeruſalem and the City of Baruck, was abandon'd in that Enterprize by the Duke of Burgundy, who is vehemently ſuſpected to have been brib'd by Saladin: Upon which he began to hearken to the Knights Templars, and the chief of the Chriſtian Army, who perſuaded him not to refuſe Saladin's Offers for a Ceſſation of Arms; eſpecially conſidering that he deſign'd to return with greater Forces and Treaſure; that his preſent Power, by Diviſions, by Sickneſs and Encounters was much waſted and weaken'd; and that the dangerous State of his own Dominions, by reaſon A. reaſon of undue Practices at home, and the Deſigns of King Philip abroad, did now require his own Preſence. At length after ſome Struggles of Honour and Conſcience, the King concluded a Truce with Saladin for three Years upon theſe Conditions: 'Firſt that Aſcalon ſhould be demoliſh'd, and not fortify'd 'by either Party during the Truce; yet Joppa might be poſſeſs'd by the Chri-'ſtians, and all the Country then in the Chriſtians Hands, without Moleſtation 'from the Saracens. And then the Chriſtians ſhould have free Liberty to go 'in Pilgrimage to the Holy Sepulchre without Charge, and likewiſe have free 'Commerce through Saladin's Dominions. Upon Concluſion of the Treaty, King Richard let Saladin know, That when the Truce was ended, he would return again, and once more endeavour to recover the Holy-Land from his Dominions. To which Saladin is ſaid to have return'd this generous Anſwer, That he had ſo great an Eſteem for King Richard's Worth, that if it muſt be his Fate to loſe his Country, he had rather it ſhould be to him, than to any other Prince whatſoever. Thus this great Cruſade ended with little more Advantage than the taking of one ſingle City; and King Richard departed with the Diſpleaſure of having on one Side concluded a diſhonourable Truce, and on the other, with the Satisfaction of having beſtow'd two Kingdoms at his Departure, that of Jeruſalem upon the Count de Champaign his Nephew, and that of Cyprus, which he had conquer'd by his own Arms, upon Guido de Luſignan, in whoſe Houſe it continu'd two hundred and eighty Years.

He makes a three Years Truce with Saladin.

He leaves the Holy-Land.

Thus Richard having ſetled the Affairs of the Eaſt, and ſent away his Queen and Siſter, with the King of Cyprus's Daughter, under the Conduct of Stephen Turnham, he went on board a large Buſs at Acon, and ſet ſail in the Beginning of October for Corfu; where arriving in leſs than a Month, he continu'd his Voyage to Raguſa in the Gulf of Venice, and landing near that City, reſolv'd to go by Land through Sclavonia into Auſtria. Where when he arriv'd, tho' he and his Attendants, endeavouring to be unknown, had diſguis'd themſelves like Pilgrims with long Hair and Beards, yet they could not be long conceal'd, by reaſon of their extraordinary Expences; which was alſo confirm'd by the Rumours of the King's being ſomewhere in thoſe Parts. Richard had now reaſon to fear the Duke of Auſtria whom he had affronted at Acon, and becauſe he knew he had a ſecret Hatred towards him, by reaſon of the League he had made with Tancred King of Sicily, the Emperor's Competitor for that Kingdom; as alſo becauſe of the Aſſaſſination of Conrade Marqueſs of Montferrat his Kinſman, in which he ſuſpected King Richard to have been concern'd. Wherefore fearing to be taken Priſoner, Richard privately withdrew from his Retinue, committing the Charge of them to one of his principal Gentlemen that waited on him; and ſo taking Horſe with one ſingle Servant, he travell'd Day and Night 'till he arriv'd near the City of Vienna. But coming to a ſmall Village, and lying down on a Bed to repoſe himſelf, while his Servant went out to buy Proviſions, the Man was known by one belonging to the Duke of Auſtria; and being ſeiz'd and brought before him, after many Enquiries he was conſtrain'd to reveal where the King was. Upon which the Duke immediately ſent thither, and took him Priſoner as he lay aſleep; of which Prize the Duke was not a little joyful, having now an Opportunity not only of revenging himſelf for the Affront put upon him at the taking of Acon, but alſo of inriching himſelf by an extraordinary Ranſom, which he reſolv'd to have for him, before he gave him his Liberty. But ſhortly after the Emperor Henry VI. ſent to demand him, alledging, That the Duke being his Vaſſal, it belong'd to him to have the Cuſtody of the King's Perſon; whereupon the Duke, being promis'd a large ſhare of his Ranſom, deliver'd him into the Emperor's Hand, who kept him Priſoner about a Year. And thus this great Prince's unfortunate Expedition to the Holy-Land ended as inglorioufly, as it was at firſt magnanimouſly undertaken; having conſum'd therein all that mighty Treaſure left him by his Father, and all that he could draw from his Subjects, and others, by violent Extortions, plauſible Promiſes, or ſubtle Practices.

Hoveden. M. Paris. Gervaſe. III. The ſtrange News of King Richard's Impriſonment, after ſo much Valour ſhewn, flying through Europe, ſoon diſclos'd who were faithful or perfidious. His careful Mother and beſt Friends, overcome with Grief and Sorrow, put new Oaths to the Nation to be true to him, watch'd the Coaſts, provided for the Security of the State, and fortify'd all the Cities and chief Towns of the Kingdom. On the contrary Earl John, being by the cunning Inſinuations of his Brother's Foes, not only put in Hopes of his perpetual Bondage, but alſo incens'd againſt him for deſigning the Crown to his Nephew Arthur Duke of Bretaign, enter'd into an unbrotherly Attempt againſt his Soveraign; and after he had allur'd many Perſons by Promiſes, and fortify'd many Places in England, paſs'd the Sea, and enter'd into a League with the King of France, utterly to put his Nephew Arthur from the Hopes the Britains had conceiv'd of his Promotion. The Normans giving way to his diſloyal Practices, he ſwore Fealty to Philip King of France, and promis'd to marry his Siſter Alice, tho' diſhonour'd by his own Father, and for that Cauſe rejected by King Richard. Out of Normandy he poſted into England, ſoliciting both Peers and People, but met with a very loyal Reſiſtance; yet not ſo diſcourag'd, he labour'd to excite the Scots and Welſh to join in an Invaſion with him, for which end the French and Flemmings aſſur'd them that King Richard would never be ſet at Liberty: But ſtill William King of the Scots would never give Conſent or Countenance to ſuch diſhonourable Practices. In this dangerous Time the Valour and Loyalty of the City of Roven appear'd in a moſt exemplary Manner: For Philip coming before it with a powerful Army, ſolicited the Citizens by the moſt alluring Promiſes to revolt; upon which, ſetting open their Gates, they return'd no other Anſwer but That he might enter if he pleas'd. But this vain-glorious King, finding that the very Women and Virgins had poll'd their Heads like Men, and with the reſt of the Inhabitants poured melted Pitch and ſuch like Materials upon the Heads of the Beſiegers, he march'd away in great Confuſion.

Hoveden. Nubrigen. During theſe Diſturbances King Richard, formerly a Conqueror now a Priſoner, was brought into the Preſence of the Emperor in a publick Aſſembly of the Nobility; where the Emperor to terrifie him charg'd him with many Crimes, eſpecially the Aſſaſſination of the Marqueſs Conrade his Coſen. But the King knowing his own Innocency, anſwer'd all the Emperor's Allegations with ſo much Eloquence and Courage, that he not only gave full Satisfaction to all preſent, but mov'd the covetous Emperor to compaſſionate his Misfortunes, and to reverence his Perſon; but not to that Degree as to make him willing to diſcharge him without a great Ranſom. Not long after the King ſent Letters to the Arch-Biſhops, Biſhops, Earls, Barons, Clerks and Free-Tenants of England, wherein he deſired all the Clergy and Laity to raiſe ſuch a Sum as might procure him his Liberty. The Emperor wrot to the ſame Purpoſe, and the Pope, who threaten'd the Kingdom with an Interdict, unleſs the King were ſpeedily ſet free, alſo wrot to the King of France that he would anathematize his Kingdom, unleſs he forbore diſturbing Richard's Territories while he was a Priſoner. Upon the Receipt of the King's Letters, and upon their Authority, the Queen-Mother and the Lords Juſtices determined that all Clerks and Laicks ſhould contribute the fourth Part of their Revenues that Year for the Redemption of the King; and that they ſhould add ſo much more out of their moveable Goods, as their Soveraign might at his Return own it as an Obligation. To this they added twenty Shillings upon every Knight's Fee, and order'd That the Abbies of the Ceſtertians, and Houſes of the Order of Semplengham, ſhould contribute all their Wool of that Year, and that all the Gold and Silver in the Churches ſhould be brought out and deliver'd to that purpoſe. Thus a vaſt Sum was rais'd in England, and receiv'd by the Emperor's Envoys at London, in part of the King's Ranſom; and not long after the Emperor and King

King came to a final Agreement upon theſe Conditions. 1. 'That the King 'ſhould pay an hundred thouſand Marks to the Emperor, and fifty thouſand 'more to the Duke of Auſtria. 2. That the King ſhould marry his Nephew 'Arthur's Siſter to the Duke's Son, and deliver up the Captive King of Cyprus 'and his Daughter. 3. That the hundred thouſand Marks ſhould be brought 'into the Empire at the Peril of the King of England, and Hoſtages to be gi-'ven for the reſt. But to colour over this unprincely Extortion, the Emperor by a particular Charter gave to King Richard the Country of Provence in France with ſeveral other large Territories, containing five Archbiſhopricks, and thirty three Biſhopricks, which had been long out of the Emperor's Poſſeſſion; and crown'd him King of them all, and wrote magnificent Letters into England upon that Occaſion.

A. D. 1194. Reg. 5. Still King Philip us'd all Methods to hinder Richard of his Liberty, and finding that the Emperor and he were agreed, he ſent Meſſengers to Earl John, adviſing him To look to himſelf, for the Devil was now let looſe, and urg'd him to uſurp the Kingdom of England. Now when King Richard expected his Liberty at a general Diet held at Spires, where were preſent the three Arch-Biſhops of Mentz, Cologn and Saltzburg, the three Biſhops of Worms, Spires and Liege, the three Dukes of Suabia, Auſtria and Lovain, the Count Palatine of the Rhine, and ſeveral others, who had undertaken for the Emperor, whoſe Officers had already receiv'd the greateſt Part of the Ranſom; his Buſineſs was unfortunately obſtructed by the Arrival of Envoys from King Philip and Earl John, who offer'd fifty thouſand Marks from the King, and thirty thouſand from the Earl to the Emperor to keep Richard Priſoner 'till Michaelmaſs following; or if the Emperor thought fit, they would give him a thouſand Pounds a Month, as long as he ſhould keep him Priſoner; or elſe the King of France would give him an hundred thouſand Marks, and Earl John fifty thouſand to deliver him Priſoner into their Hands, or at leaſt to keep him one whole Year. Theſe great Proffers had ſuch an Effect upon the Emperor's corrupt Diſpoſition, that he immediately deferr'd the Day of ſetting Richard at Liberty, which almoſt reduc'd that Prince to Deſpair; but the above-nam'd Heads of the Empire, freely reprov'd the Emperor for his exceſſive Avarice, and his diſhonourable Treatment of a crown'd Head, and ſo far prevail'd, that upon the fourth Day of February, he was by the Arch-Biſhops of Mentz and Cologn reſtor'd after fifteen Months Impriſonment into the Hands of his Mother Queen Eleanor, who with all there preſent receiv'd him with Tears as well as Tranſports of Joy. Yet ſo prevalent is the Power of Mony, that ſome Writers report, that after this the Emperor repented of his Releaſe, and ſent Meſſengers after in order to ſeize him; but the King being inform'd of this Deſign, haſten'd on Shipboard, and happily landed at Sandwich on the thirteenth Day of March. In England he was receiv'd in a triumphant Manner; and coming near Rocheſter, Hubert the new Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, who had been with him at the Siege of Acon, met him in a pompous Solemnity; whom when the King ſaw, he immediately diſmounted, and having bow'd his Knee, fell upon the Earth, which in like Manner was done by the Arch-Biſhop, 'till at length both riſing up, run into each others Arms, with the higheſt Marks of Pleaſure and Satisfaction.

After much Difficulty, he is freed.

He arrives in England.

And here moſt Writers take Notice of the Vengeance of Heav'n upon the covetous Duke of Auſtria and the Emperor; that the former was puniſh'd with ſeveral Plagues and Calamities in his Country, of which he was ſo far from being ſenſible, that he preſs'd more earneſtly for the Payment of the reſt of King Richard's Ranſom, threatning the Hoſtages with Death, if it was not ſpeedily diſcharg'd. Upon which one of them call'd Baldwin de Betune, was by Conſent ſent over into England, to remind the King of his Articles; and he compaſſionating the Caſe of his Hoſtages, immediately diſpatch'd this Baldwin with his Niece Eleanor, to be marry'd to the Duke of Auſtria's Son; but before their Arrival Arrival the Duke by a Fall from his Horſe broke his Leg, and brought himſelf to a tedious and miſerable End. Finding his Death certain, in a penitent Manner he commanded the Hoſtages to be diſcharg'd, and the Remainder of the Mony to be remitted; to which his Son not being willing to comply, the Clergy of that Country would not permit the Duke's Body to be bury'd, 'till he had perform'd his Father's Will. As to the Emperor, he to carry on an evil Deſign, did afterwards remit ſome Part of the Ranſom; yet he was purſu'd by many Troubles, and by the Pope excommunicated upon King Richard's Account. At length falling into a great Fit of Sickneſs in Sicily, he ſent his Chancellor a Biſhop to King Richard, to deſire his Pardon, promiſing Reſtitution of what he had taken for his Ranſom: But before he could arrive and deliver his Meſſage, the Emperor dy'd under that Sentence at Meſſina. Nor were the King of England's Afflictions unprofitable to him; for they gave him Occaſion to reform his Life, taking home his Queen Berengaria, whoſe Society he had a long Time neglected, tho' ſhe was a virtuous, wiſe and beautiful Lady, who for the Love of him had ventur'd her Perſon with him through the World.

Hoveden. M. Paris. Nubrigen. IV. King Richard having happily recover'd both his Liberty and Kingdom, repair'd to the great Abby of St. Edmund's Bury, where in performance of his Vow he offer'd up the rich Imperial Standard, taken from Iſaac King of Cyprus. From thence he march'd into ſeveral Parts of the Nation, and took in by Surrender ſuch Caſtles as the Adherents of his Brother John had held out againſt him; but for Henry de Pomeroy, who had fortify'd St. Michael's Mount againſt him, finding that the King was certainly return'd, he dy'd with Grief and Fear. And now the forty Days of Summons being expired, which were allow'd to Earl John, Hugh Biſhop of Coventry, and others, for making their Appearance, to anſwer to ſuch hainous Crimes as were alledg'd againſt them; and they not appearing, John in particular was caſt by the Peers and States of England, and not only diſinherited of all his Lands he then held in England, but alſo of all Honours which he expected to enjoy after the King's Deceaſe: The Biſhop of Coventry and others met with Cenſures according to their Offences, and the Uſage of thoſe Times. After which King Richard proceeded to draw in Mony more voraciouſly than was agreeable to ſo great a Man; particularly by reſuming thoſe Crown Lands he had formerly ſold to others, pretending that they were only mortgag'd and not ſold outright; in which, ſays M. Paris, he is rather to be pardon'd than accus'd, ſince he then wanted a powerful Army againſt the French. But firſt of all to wipe away the Sorrow and Contumely of his late Reſtraint, he caus'd himſelf to be crown'd again at the City of Wincheſter; which Solemnity was honour'd by the Preſence of William King of the Scots, who bore the Sword before the King of England. From whence aroſe a great Affection between theſe two Princes; and Richard granted to the other, and his Succeſſors of Scotland, a fix'd Penſion, and ſeveral other Allowances and Princely Attendants, from the firſt Day of their Friendly Entrance into England 'till their Return. The King likewiſe caus'd a new Broad Seal to be made, requiring that all Charters granted under his former ſhould be confirm'd by this, which rais'd great Sums to the Exchequer; ſubſcribing ſuch renew'd Charters thus, This was the Tenor of our Charter under our firſt Seal, which becauſe it was loſt, and in the Time of our Captivity in the Power of another, we cauſe to be chang'd, &c. Some have obſerv'd, as Richard was the firſt Engliſh King who bore Arms on his Seals; ſo he was the firſt who carry'd in his Shield three Lions paſſant, born ever after for the Royal Arms of England.

The King having been about two Months in England, and at Dinner Time receiving News that Vernvil in Normandy was beſieg'd by the French King, Walſingham tells us, that the King ſwore he would never turn his Face 'till he had gotten over to the French Army; and accordingly caus'd the Wall to be

Nor was this King's Clemency leſs than his Courage, as appears from his Earl John reſtored. ready receiving Earl John into Favour, thorough the Mediation of his Mother Eleanor, and his generous ſaying to him, I wiſh I may as eaſily forget your Offence, as I doubt you will my Pardon of it. Afterwards he reſtor'd him to all his Honours and Poſſeſſions; and John was ſo mindful of the King's Admonition, that he ever after ſerv'd him faithfully and valiantly in all his Wars againſt the King of France.

After ſeveral Skirmiſhes, Burnings of Towns, Taking of Priſoners, and inferior Acts of Hoſtility, the two main Armies drew near to each other at Vendoſme; where early in a Morning King Philip ſent a Meſſage to our King, That he would give him a Viſit with his Army that Day; to which Richard return'd Anſwer He would expect him, and if he did not perform his Promiſe, he would the next Morning return his kind Intentions, and make the Viſit to him. Notwithſtanding this Overture, the French King thought fit to retire, which he did with ſuch Precipitation and Fear, that great Numbers of his Men were kill'd and taken Priſoners by the Engliſh, and all the Waggons and Baggage, with a great Treaſure fell into their Hands. The King's portable Chappel was alſo taken, and the Charters of all thoſe Vaſſals of the King of England who had confederated with King Philip and Earl John; to which Mezeray adds, that this Prince carrying with him the ancient Records of the Crown, they were all taken by the Engliſh, and loſt, to the great Damage of the King's Affairs, as well as the Hiſtory of thoſe Times. This Victory produc'd a Year's Truce; before the Expiration of which, King Philip, to ſave the Effuſion of Blood, by Ambaſſadors propos'd To decide the Controverſie between them by five ſelect Combatants on each Side, and the vanquiſh'd Party to ſubmit to the Terms agreed on before they began. To which Propoſal King Richard reply'd, That he well approv'd of it, provided the King of France would be the fifth Man on one Side, and he himſelf would be ſo on the other: Which Meſſage being carry'd to King Philip, he would not agree to it, ſo the Propoſal became ineffectual. As theſe Paſſages ſhew the Courage, ſo another ſhews the Piety of this Prince: About this Time he was admoniſh'd by a poor Hermit to remember the Subverſion of Sodom, and to abſtain from unlawful Luſts; which at firſt the King ſlighted, as coming from a deſpicable Perſon, but at length being viſited with a great Sickneſs, he ſent for ſeveral Religious Men, and freely confeſs'd himſelf guilty of that unnatural Impurity. And after his Recovery he betook himſelf to his Queen, became very charitable, and bountifully reliev'd the Poor at his Court, and reſtor'd all the Gold and Silver Veſſels which for his Ranſom had been taken from the Churches.

England infeſted with Robbers In the mean Time England was extreamly infeſted by Robbers, Thieves and Outlaws; for the ſuppreſſing of whom, Hubert Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, and chief Juſticiary of the Nation, was very diligent and ſerviceable. Among theſe we are told of a famous Man call'd Robin Hood, accompany'd with another call'd Little John, and a hundred ſtrong Bow-Men, who in Yorkſhire moleſted all Paſſengers upon the High-Way. Some ſay he was of a great Family, and made no leſs noble than an Earl for ſome conſiderable Service; but having waſted his Eſtate in riotous Courſes, Penury forc'd him to ſerve his Neceſſities in robbing others: Yet in this he was generouſly rapacious; for he never hurt either Man or Woman; ſpar'd the Poor, and made a Prey only of the Rich; 'till Proclamations being iſſu'd out againſt him, he fell ſick at a Nunnery in Yorkſhire call'd Birkleys, and deſiring to be let Blood, was betray'd and bled to Death. About the ſame Time the City of London was exceedingly afflicted by the ſeditious Behaviour of a Citizen, vulgarly call'd William Longbeard, who by his natural Eloquence, his popular Arts, and his Undertaking the Cauſe of the the Poor, had procur'd a mighty Veneration from great Numbers of the ordinary Sort. After ſeveral turbulent Practices, he rais'd ſuch a Tumult about a Tax, which he pretended was unequally laid, that in St. Paul's Church-Yard many were ſlain, and the whole City was in great Danger; 'till at length by the Care and Management of Arch-Biſhop Hubert, William and his chief Accomplices were forc'd to fly into Bow-Church, where they fortify'd themſelves for ſome time; but being driven out by Fire and Smoke, he and eight of his Companions were executed at Tyburn, and hung up in Chains, which put an end to the Sedition. A Sedition in London.

Hoveden. M. Paris. But to return to King Richard, and his Affairs beyond Sea, there paſs'd ſeveral Interchanges between the Engliſh and French, ſometimes of Wars with Plunderings and Devaſtations, and ſometimes of Truces with Interviews and Parlies; in one of which the Lady Alice, King Philip's Siſter, was reſtor'd according to the Treaty of Meſſina to her Brother, who immediately marry'd her to John Earl of Pontif. In the mean Time both the Kings ſought to augment the Number of their Friends; but King Richard by his Munificence, and other Methods, drew from the French King a great Party of his neareſt Neighbours, as Baldwin Earl of Flanders, Raimund Earl of Tholouſe, to whom King Richard gave his Siſter Joan Queen of Sicily. So that King Philip was oblig'd to truſt wholly to his own Power and Intereſt; for tho' he had lately marry'd the Siſter of the King of Denmark, purpoſely to uſe the Daniſh Shipping againſt the Engliſh; yet immediately after his Marriage, upon Pretence of Conſanguinity, ſhe was divorc'd, and the Benefit of the Alliance loſt. In one of theſe military Actions the Biſhop of Beauvais, who was alſo an Earl and of Royal Blood, was taken Priſoner by King Richard's Party; and being long detain'd in that Condition, he ſent Letters to the Pope complaining, That he was made Priſoner by the King of England, and loaded with Irons, contrary to his Order and Dignity. Upon which the Pope wrote to King Richard, expoſtulating with him, Why he detain'd his dear Brother and Son the Biſhop? The other in anſwer immediately ſent to the Pope the Biſhop's Armour in which he was taken, and likewiſe a Letter with this Paſſage in it, Holy Father, will you be pleas'd to ſee whether this is your Son's Coat, or not? Upon this the Pope return'd the Biſhop a long Letter to this Effect; 'That he had put on the Armour of a Soldier, inſtead of the Habit of a Prieſt: And tho' the King of France had been bound by Oath to do no Damage to the King of England's Dominions during his Pilgrimage, yet he had ſhamefully, againſt his Faith and Oath, taken his Towns and waſted his Territories; the Equity of whoſe Cauſe fought for him againſt the Arrogance and Injuries of the French King. That he, the Biſhop, was not only a imprudent Adviſer, but an inſolent Actor in this unlawful Conteſt: Concluding thus, That he could only ſupplicate the King of England in his Behalf, for in ſuch a Caſe he neither could, nor ought to command. The Biſhop finding no Aſſiſtance from the Pope, was conſtrain'd in the following Year to give ten thouſand Marks for his Liberty. Several Actions in France. Hoveden. M. Paris. Gervaſe. While theſe ſeveral Hoſtilities paſs'd between the Engliſh and the French, the King of England increas'd his Party by new Confederates, as Arthur Duke of Bretaign, the Duke of Lovain, with the Earls of Guienne, Bulloign, Perche and Blois, and ſeveral others; and Hoveden tells us of the French King's being three ſeveral Times in a ſhort Space repuls'd with Loſs and Diſhonour by King Richard; having alſo the Misfortune to loſe St. Omers, Air, and other Towns taken by Baldwin Earl of Flanders, beſides the Waſte of the French Dominions by ſeveral Invaſions. But the greateſt of the three Victories was the ſecond, which King Richard gain'd between Curcel and Giſors, where the King of France himſelf in great Hazard of his Life fell into the River Ept, the Bridge breaking under him with the Weight of the Multitudes that fled before the Engliſh Lion. This was a glorious Victory; for beſides a long Catalogue of great Names extant in Authors, there were taken above a hundred Knights with their A. D. 1198. Reg. 9/10. A great Victory over the French Horſes, Footmen without Number and other inferior Soldiers, two hundred great Horſe, of which one hundred and forty had Barbs and Capariſons arm'd with Iron. King Richard in his own Perſon did Wonders, and by the Force of his own Lance overthrew three valiant Knights, Matthew Monmorancy, Alan de Ruſci, and Fulk de Giberval, and took them Priſoners. The ancient Motto of DIEU ET MON DROIT is attributed firſt to this King, who in his Letters aſcrib'd this Victory not to himſelf but to God and his Right. The War continuing ſtill, many virtuous Men labour'd to make a final Agreement; and the new Pope Innocent, having proclaim'd a new Cruſado, ſent a Cardinal to reconcile the two mighty Kings of France and England. At length Articles of Peace were drawn up; but Richard, having the Advantage in the Field, was not in haſte to conclude them; therefore deferr'd it 'till his Return from Poictou, whither he went to chaſtiſe ſome Rebel Subjects, tho' ſome ſay he did then conclude the Peace. At this Enterview or Treaty, King Philip, the perpetual Sower of Diſcord, ſhew'd a Writing to King Richard, implying That his Brother John had come over to the French Party; upon which Richard in a great Paſſion, order'd him to be diſſeiz'd of all his Territories. Which when Earl John underſtood, and the Reaſon of it, he immediately ſent two Knights to the French Court, who bravely undertook to defend his Honour and Innocence againſt all Accuſers; but when neither that King, nor any other would undertake the Cauſe, King Richard for the future put more Confidence in his Brother, and gave leſs Credit to the French King's Inſinuations.

A Treaty between the two Kings.

Not long after this Treaty the King's Avarice was the Occaſion of his Death; for Vidomar Vicount of Limoſin, having found a great Treaſure of Gold in his Land, ſent a large Part of it to the King; but not being content with that, he demanded the whole as Treaſure Trove, and his Prerogative. The Vicount not yielding, the King in a Rage march'd with a ſtrong Army, and beſieg'd his Caſtle of Chaluz, in which he ſuppos'd the Treaſure was hid: But tho' the Knights and others in the Caſtle went out to him, and offer'd to ſurrender it, provided they might have their Lives, Limbs and Arms, yet the King would not conſent, but ſwore he would take the Caſtle and hang every Man; at which the Knights return'd much confounded, reſolving to defend themſelves to the utmoſt. Upon the ſame Day, the King taking a view of the Caſtle, a certain Croſs-Bow Man ſhot at him from the Wall, and gave him a deſperate Wound in the Shoulder, joining to the Neck; upon which he immediately return'd to his Quarters, and order'd Marchade and his Army never to leave ſtorming the Caſtle 'till they took it, and then to hang up every Man, except him who had wounded him. The King was put into the Hands of an unskilful Surgeon, who as he ſtrove to pull out the Arrow, left the Head in the Fleſh, which he ſo grievouſly mangled, that it turn'd to a Gangreen; and lying thus eleven Days in great Torment, and finding no Hopes of Recovery, he by his Will bequeath'd England and all his other Dominions to Earl John his Brother; leaving him three Parts of his Treaſure, and the fourth to be divided between his Servants and the Poor. A little before his Death, after great Devotion, he caus'd Bertram, who had given him his Death's Wound, to be brought before him, demanding of him What Injury he had done him, that he ſhould kill him? To whom the other roughly reply'd, That he had kill'd his Father and his two Brothers with his own Hand, and was endeavouring to kill him, therefore he might take what Revenge he pleas'd; He was willing to endure any Torments, ſince he had ſlain him who had done ſo much Miſchief in the World. The King, notwithſtanding this deſperate Anſwer, caus'd him to be ſet free, and not only gave him his Life, but a hundred Shillings beſides; but Marchade, after the King's Death, caus'd him to be flead alive, and hang'd. The King deceas'd upon the ſixth Day of April, and the forty firſt Year of his Age, after a magnificent and tumultuous Reign of nine Years and nine Months. His Body was interr'd at Fonteverard at the Feet of his Father, his Heart at Roven, and his Bowels Bowels at Charron in Poictou, as he had appointed himſelf, declaring That he had diſpos'd of the firſt to teſtifie his Repentance, for offending his Father; by the ſecond he ſhew'd his Eſteem for his valiant and loyal Normans; and by the third, the ſmall Value he had for the inconſtant and diſaffected Poictovins.

This was the fatal End of the bold and magnanimous Richard, from his Qualities ſirnam'd Cœur-de-Lion; a Prince who had ſomewhat of the Fierceneſs and Brutality, as well as Courage and Bravery of that Creature; whoſe Diſloyalty to his Father was puniſh'd with innumerable Troubles in his Reign, and whoſe voracious Temper met with Death it ſelf. As to his Perſon he was very tall, of a fair and comely Viſage, his Eyes blue and ſparkling with Fire, his Hair between red and yellow, his Limbs ſtrait, of a noble and majeſtick Mein, that ſeem'd worthy of Empire. His Courage and Proweſs was great beyond Exception; and ſo formidable to the Saracens, that it is ſaid they were wont to ſtill their crying Children, by telling them, That King Richard was coming for them; but withal he was fearleſs, violent and impetuous. He was very witty and eloquent, but with too great a Mixture of Pride and Arrogance; magnificent and liberal to exceſs, which occaſion'd him at other times to be as covetous and rapacious. He was noted for Pride, Avarice and Luxury, which were call'd his three Daughters; and being once urg'd to part with them, he in Rallery declar'd, He would diſpoſe of the firſt to the Templars, the ſecond to the Monks, and the third to the Prelates. Tho' he had many noble Qualifications, yet England ſuffer'd ſeverely under his Government, through the conſtant Occaſions he had for Mony, and the great Rapacity of his Juſticiaries, during his Abſence from England, where he never ſpent above eight Months of his whole Reign; ſo that his Subjects felt all the Inconveniences of his Courage, without being much the better for that, or his other good Qualities in Time of Peace. It is obſervable, that he who had reviv'd the Uſe of that fatal Engine, the Croſs-Bow, and had himſelf diſpatch'd ſo many with it, now himſelf periſh'd by the ſame Inſtrument. In this King's Reign the City of London began firſt to receive the Form and State of a Common-wealth, and to be divided into Companies and Corporations as at this Day.

SECT. III.

The Reign of King JOHN.

Containing 17 Years, 7 Months, and 13 Days.

Hoveden. I. THE valiant King Richard being thus ſuddenly remov'd, Earl John his ſole ſurviving Brother, now about thirty three Years of Age, immediately us'd all his Intereſt with Hubert Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, and others of the Nobility, to preſerve the Peace of England 'till he could come over; and with all Expedition went to Chinon in Tourain to ſecure his Brother's Treaſure, then in Cuſtody of Robert de Turnham, who upon his Arrival deliver'd it up to him, together with the ſtrong Caſtles of Chinon and Saumur. But his Affairs did not ſo well ſucceed in other Parts; for the Provinces of Anjou, Tourain and Main, in a general Aſſembly of their chief Men firmly adher'd to his Nephew Arthur, Duke of Bretaign, as their Soveraign Lord, declaring it to be the Cuſtom of thoſe Territories to prefer the Elder Brother's Son before the Younger Brother. In Compliance to which Determination, all the Towns in thoſe Provinces were ſurrender'd to Arthur's Uſe, except ſome few which Earl John had ſecur'd at firſt: Upon which the Lady Conſtance, ſtance, Mother to young Arthur, carry'd him to the City of Tours, and deliver'd him in the thirteenth Year of his Age to the Cuſtody of the French King, who ſent him to be educated with his Son Lewis at Paris; and at the ſame Time poſſeſs'd himſelf of all his ſtrong Places and Caſtles, reſolving to make the young Heir ſubſervient to his ambitious Deſigns. Which unwelcome News caus'd Earl John immediately to march with a ſtrong Force into the Province of Main; where he ſoon took the City of Mans, and to ſhow his Revenge, and to be a Terror to other Places, he demoliſh'd the Walls of the City and Caſtle, with all the Store-Houſes, and carry'd away the Citizens Priſoners, becauſe contrary to their Fealty ſworn to him, they had receiv'd Arthur for their Lord. From thence he went to Roven in Normandy, where on the twenty fifth Day of April, in the Cathedral Church he was girt with the Sword of the Dutchy of Normandy, and a Coronet adorn'd with golden Roſes was put upon his Head by the Arch-Biſhop of that City; after which, in the Preſence of the Clergy and Laity, he took an Oath upon the Holy Goſpels and Relicks of the Saints, 'To preſerve the Holy Church, with all her Privileges, and Dignities, 'to adminiſter true Juſtice, to abrogate evil Laws, and to ordain ſuch as 'were good.

John made Duke of Normandy.

While theſe Affairs were tranſacting beyond Sea, Hubert Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, and William the Earl-Marſhal, caus'd all the Free-Men of the Kingdom of England, both of Cities and Boroughs, as alſo the Earls, Barons and Free-Tenants, to ſwear Fealty to John the Son of King Henry againſt all Men: Yet ſtill all the Biſhops, Earls and Barons who had Caſtles, fortify'd and ſtor'd them with Victuals and Ammunition; being either not well ſatisfy'd with Earl John's Title, or elſe ſuſpecting the Effects of his changeable and imperious Humour. Upon Notice of this, the Arch-Biſhop, with the Earl-Marſhal and chief Juſticiary met at Northampton, and there ſummon'd thoſe of the Nobility they moſt ſuſpected, whom they ſatisfy'd by aſſuring them, That Earl John would certainly reſtore to every one their Right; upon which Condition or Agreement, the Earls and Barons renew'd their Oaths of Fealty to John, and engag'd to ſerve him faithfully againſt all Oppoſers. In the mean Time the Earl, now lately become a Duke, reſolv'd to take Poſſeſſion of the Crown of England, and landing in Suſſex on the twenty fifth Day of May, he immediately came up to London in order to his Coronation, where appear'd a noble Concourſe of Biſhops, Earls and Barons, who in moſt ſolemn Proceſſion attended him to the Abby Church in Weſtminſter. Here before the Solemnity was perform'd, Hubert Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, having requir'd the Attention of his Audience, according to M. Paris made this Speech. No Man has a Right to ſucceed in this Kingdom, unleſs, after ſeeking the Holy Spirit, he be firſt unanimouſly elected for the Excellency of his Manners by the general Body of the Kingdom, and anointed King after the Example of Saul, whom God ſet over his People, tho' he was neither a King's Son, nor deſcended of Royal Blood; and after him David the Son of Jeſſe; the one becauſe he was valiant and brave, the other becauſe he was pious and humble; ſo that he who ſurpaſs'd others in Valour and Virtue, might exceed them in Dignity and Power. Therefore if any one of the Family of the deceas'd King excels the reſt, we ought moſt readily to conſent to his Election; and this we ſpeak in favour of the noble Duke John here preſent, Brother to our illuſtrious King Richard, who dy'd without Iſſue of his Body: This Duke being prudent and valiant, as well in reſpect of his Merits as of his Royal Blood, with the Invocation of the Holy Spirit, we do unanimouſly elect King.

The Arch-Biſhop's Speech.

Here our Author obſerves, that the Arch-Biſhop was a Man of a deep Foreſight, and ſo eminent for Conſtancy and Wiſdom, that none durſt diſpute what he ſaid, knowing that he had not without good Cauſe thus determin'd the Matter; with which Speech Duke John and the reſt acquieſc'd, and all unanimouſly electing and receiving him for their King, cry'd out, Long may the King live!

But

But the Arch-Biſhop being afterwards ask'd why he made ſuch a Speech, anſwer'd, That he was fully aſſur'd by certain remarkable Preſages, that King John would bring the Kingdom and Crown into great Confuſion; therefore to put ſome Reſtraint upon his Temper, he had affirm'd, That he ought to come in by Election, and not by Hereditary Succeſſion. This Election being over, the Arch-Biſhop plac'd the Crown upon the King's Head with the uſual Ceremonies, notwithſtanding the Biſhop of Durham appeal'd againſt it, becauſe of the Abſence of the Arch-Biſhop of York. Then the Coronation Oath was adminiſter'd, conſiſting of theſe three Heads, 'That he would cheriſh the Holy 'Church, and all the Clergy, and preſerve her from the Violence of her Ene- 'mies; That all evil Laws being abrogated, he would eſtabliſh ſuch as were 'good; That he would exerciſe true Juſtice throughout the Kingdom of England: And he was further adjured by the Arch-Biſhop, That he ſhould not preſume to undertake this Dignity, unleſs he reſolv'd to fulfil what he had now ſworn; to which he anſwer'd, That he would by the Aſſiſtance of God obſerve all thoſe Things he had promis'd; and on the next Day, having receiv'd the Homage and Fealties of the Nobility, he went to pay his Devotion at St. Alban's Shrine. On the ſame Day, to reward thoſe who had lifted him into the Throne, he made William Mareſchal and Geoffry Fitz-Peter, Earls of Pembroke and Eſſex, and the Arch-Biſhop Lord High Chancellor of England; who ſeeming to glory in this Addition of Honour, was told by the Lord Bardulf, That the Height of the Archiepiſcopal Dignity was ſuch, that it was ever reputed a great Advancement for a Chancellor to be made an Arch-Biſhop, but none for an Arch-Biſhop to be made a Chancellor.

M. Paris. Hoveden. The King's Enemies now found Opportunities to diſturb his Affairs abroad, while he was ſetling thoſe at home; for the French King eaſily ſurpriz'd the City of Eureux in Normandy, and recover'd the County of Main, while the Britains regain'd the City of Angiers, with many other ſtrong Places. The News of which caus'd King John, after ſetling ſome Preliminaries with the Scotch King, to haſten into Normandy, where his Army was ſo much encreas'd by Friends and Volunteers, that King Philip was content to accept of a Truce for fifty Days; upon the expiring of which an Interview was agreed on to eſtabliſh a laſting Peace. But for ſecuring his Deſigns, Philip the very Day before the Meeting, knighted Earl Arthur, and receiving his Homage for Bretaigne, Normandy, Anjou, Poictou, Tourain, and Main, faithfully promis'd to yield him all Aſſiſtance for the acquiring thoſe Territories. On the other ſide King John ſtrengthen'd himſelf with the Alliance and Homage of Philip Earl of Flanders; and after the ſixteenth Day of Auguſt treated with the French King two Days by Commiſſioners, and on the third in Perſon, between the Towns of Butivant and Gaillon. At this Treaty Philip demanded all the Norman Veuxin for himſelf, alledging, That Geoffry, Father to King Henry II. had given it to Lewis the late King of France, for his Aſſiſtance in gaining Normandy from King Stephen; and further demanded, that Poictou, Anjou, Tourain and Main might be deliver'd to Earl Arthur; and made divers other unreaſonable Demands, to which the King of England could not in Honour condeſcend, ſo that their intended Amities ended in more hoſtile Defiances. But Philip's Demands for young Arthur were only Compliments to that Earl, as his own Words diſcover'd, when being afterwards ask'd Why he entertain'd ſuch an Averſion to King John, who had never injur'd him, his Anſwer was, Becauſe he had poſſeſs'd himſelf of Normandy, and the other Territories, without firſt asking him Leave, or offering Homage to him: So much did King Philip now aſſume to himſelf, above what any of his Predeceſſors had done before.

The King of France ſets up Earl Arthur againſt him.

Hoveden. M. Paris. The Flames on both Sides breaking out the ſtronger for being ſo much ſtifled, many Earls and Barons of France who formerly adhered to King Richard, now became Homagers to King John, ſwearing never to return to King Philip without out his Conſent, and he ſwearing never to make Peace without including them in the Articles. In the Heat of the Conteſts, a chief Adherent of the Earl of Flanders, being Biſhop Elect of Cambray, fell into the Hands of the French King, and at the ſame Time Philip Biſhop of Beauvois was detain'd Priſoner by King John; and neither of theſe Kings being willing to releaſe their miter'd Champions, Peter of Capua the Pope's Legate interdicted France for the one, and Normandy for the other. Yet King John obtain'd the Favour of the Pope to require ſix thouſand Marks from his Prize, with an Oath never to bear Arms againſt Chriſtians. In October the King of France ſeiz'd the Caſtle of Balun, and demoliſh'd it; which was highly reſented by Earl Arthur's General William de la Roche, who expoſtulating with him, as being contrary to Covenants with his Maſter, Philip ſcornfully reply'd, That his Lord Arthur's Diſlike ſhould not hinder him from doing what he thought fit with ſuch Places as he had taken; and then went and beſieg'd Lavardin: But hearing the King of England was coming to relieve it, he left the Siege, and march'd to Mans; King John follow'd him, and he alſo quitted that Place. In the mean Time, Earl Arthur's General finding that his Maſter was only made a Mask for Philip's Ambition, by Subtelty got him out of his Cuſtody, and reconcil'd him to his Uncle King John, to whom he alſo deliver'd the City of Mans, of which he was Governor. Yet ſtill this Deſign prov'd unſucceſsful, for ſome of Philip's Party infus'd ſuch needleſs Terrors of Impriſonment into Arthur and his Mother, that being overcome with jealous Apprehenſions, they fled together with many other Noblemen, to the City of Angiers, and from thence return'd again to the King of France, ſo that Arthur being neither ſure to John nor Philip, was now in danger of being cruſh'd between both thoſe powerful Monarchs.

The Breach between theſe two Kings ſeem'd the more dangerous, becauſe King John's Nephew Otho, juſt now advanc'd to the Empire, promis'd him great Aſſiſtance, if he would defer making Peace with the French King. Yet ſtill Peter, the Pope's Legate, who had formerly procur'd a five Years Truce between King Richard and Philip, by his aſſiduous Mediation ſo far prevail'd, that the ſame Truce ſhould continue 'till the Feaſt of St. Hillary. After which King John through his Weakneſs was led into a diſadvantagious and diſhonourable Treaty, in which it was agreed, That Lewis the French King's Son ſhould marry King John's Niece Blanche, Daughter to Alphonſo King of Caſtile; that King John ſhould give for her Dowry the City and County of Eureux, with ſeveral ſtrong Places in Normandy, beſides thirty thouſand Marks of Silver; ſwearing alſo not to aſſiſt his Nephew Otho either with Men or Mony towards his Eſtabliſhment in the Empire; and further promiſing, if he dy'd without Iſſue, to leave to Lewis all the Territories he held in France. All which Articles were formally engroſs'd, and afterwards finally concluded about Midſummer, between Butavant and Gulatun, two Caſtles belonging to either King; when the Places were actually ſurrender'd to King Philip, the Lady Blanche marry'd to his Son Lewis, and Earl Arthur yielded up, and made a Servant and Homager to King John for his own Dominions, whom yet his Uncle was ſatisfy'd to leave with King Philip, who had only ſupported him for his own Advantage. In theſe Matters King John prov'd more firm to King Philip, than either Philip to him, or he himſelf to Otho the Emperor, who ſending his two Brothers Henry and William, to demand ſome Territories, with ſuch Treaſure and Jewels as King Richard had given him by Will, King John deny'd all, only in Regard of his Oath he had ſworn to Philip, that he would yield no Aſſiſtance to the Emperor. And further, to preſerve a moſt intire Amity with Philip, by his Advice he divorc'd his Wife Aviſe, upon Pretence of Conſanguinity, and marry'd Iſabell, Heireſs to Aymer Earl of Engoleſme, a beautiful young Lady, but contracted to the Earl of Marche, who afterwards prov'd a dangerous and implacable Enemy to him.

A Treaty between them.

II. This

Hoveden. Wendov. &c.

II. This Agreement with Philip, who now acknowledg'd King John right-ful Heir to his Brother Richard, gave him Leave and Opportunity to reduce all Oppoſers in his tranſmarine Dominions, and ſoon after to return and inſpect the Affairs of his Kingdom of England, from which he had been ſomewhat too long abſent. Yet in the Heat of the foreign Imployments, he on occaſion had recourſe thither to ſettle his State Affairs and Crown Revenues, to enact Laws for Trade and Commerce, to raiſe a Tax for his Niece's great Dowry, and mi- Taxes rais'd. litary Occaſions; which Tax, being three Shillings upon every Plough-Land, occaſion'd great Heats and Prejudices, tho' it was the only Subſidy ſince his coming to the Crown: And this chiefly by the Means of his natural Brother Geoffry Arch-Biſhop of York, who being ſwell'd with the Greatneſs of his Family and Preferment, directly forbad the Collectors to come within his Precincts; and being alſo requir'd by the King to attend him in France, to conclude the Peace and celebrate the Nuptials of his Niece, he undutifully deny'd his Service. The King juſtly mov'd with theſe diſloyal Actions, caus'd all his Temporalties to be ſeiz'd by his Sheriff, whom the Arch-Biſhop ſolemnly excommunicated, offer'd Violence to the King's Officers, and proceeded ſo far as to interdict the whole Province of York. Notwithſtanding this, not long after, upon the King's Return, and Geoffry's Submiſſion, he was reſtor'd to Favour at a very ſolemn Time, which was at the Coronation of King John's Queen Iſabella, with whom the King himſelf was a ſecond Time formally crow- The King crowned a ſecond Time. ned at Weſtminſter by Hubert Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury.

Hoveden. &c.

This Solemnity being over the King reſolv'd to end a depending Controverſie between him and William King of Scotland, who had claim'd the Counties of Northumberland and Cumberland as his ancient Right of Inheritance; and accordingly he ſent an honourable Embaſſie of ſeveral of the Nobility to conduct him ſafely to the City of Lincoln, where both Kings met upon the twenty firſt He goes to Lincoln. Day of November, with all the Marks of Civility and Courteſie. The next Day to promote his Temporal Affairs by ſpiritual Devotions, King John, tho' diſſuaded by the ominous Pretenſions of ſome about him, undauntedly enter'd the Cathedral Church, and there offer'd a Golden Chalice on St. John's Altar, which, according to our Author, no King before him durſt do. Theſe Devotions ended, the two Kings with great Pomp and Magnificence aſcending that high Hill on the North Side of the City, ſince call'd Bore-Hill, ſwore Amity Treats with the King of Scotland. and faithful Alliance upon the Croſier of Arch-Biſhop Hubert, in the Preſence of three Arch-Biſhops, thirteen Biſhops, the King of South-Wales, with a Multitude of Engliſh, Scotch, French and Iriſh Nobility. This Spectacle ſo ſplendid to the Beholders was ſucceeded by another no leſs honourable to King John, occaſion'd by the Arrival of the Corps of the pious Prelate Hugh Biſhop of Lincoln, a Perſon ſo juſtly honour'd by his Majeſty, that when his Body was brought to the Gates of Lincoln, he and all his Regal Train went forth to meet it: And to ſhow his Reſpect and Humility, he with the two Kings and their Allies bore the Coffin upon their Shoulders, from whom the great Peers receiv'd it, and carry'd it to the Entrance of the Cathedral, whence the three Arch-Biſhops and Biſhops convey'd it to the Quire, and interr'd it the next Day with all anſwerable Solemnities. Nor did the King reſt here in ſhowing his Reſpect and Kindneſs to Eccleſiaſticks; when twelve Abbots of the Ciſtertian Order, whoſe whole Society had highly offended him in refuſing the late Tax, now came to Lincoln, and all proſtrate at his Feet begg'd his Mercy and the Removal of the Puniſhments laid upon them; this Sight of theſe venerable Suppliants ſo affected his Heart, that he fell at their Feet, deſir'd their Forgiveneſs, reſtor'd them to his Favour, and after that founded an Abby for their Order in Hampſhire call'd Beaulieu, deſigning to be enſhrin'd there himſelf, and making it a Refuge and Aſylum for the greateſt Offenders.

The first Breaches between the King and Clergy.

Notwithstanding all outward Kindness and Obligations, a dangerous Breach now began to be open'd between the King and the Clergy, occasion'd by the increasing Power of the latter, who being supported by the mighty Authority of the Pope, insisted upon Exemption from Regal Commands, and daily retrench'd the Royal Prerogative. This he found in a short Time; for when he came to nominate a Successor to Hugh Bishop of Lincoln, according to the Usage of his Ancestors, he was with peremptory Affronts withstood by the Canons of that Church, who as long as they had the Pope in their Interest, little regarded the Commands of their Prince. Likewise Hubert Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, being now disappointed, and repenting that he had advanc'd John to the Crown, as Legate to the Pope held a general Synod of all the Bishops and Clergy at Westminster, notwithstanding the positive Prohibition of the King's chief Justiciary; which is one of the first Examples of that independant Power, the Arch-Bishops and other Legates from the Pope, ever after usurp'd 'till the Reformation, of holding Ecclesiastical Synods, and making Canons by their sole Authority, without the King's Licence or Confirmation. Nor did Hubert cease here, but shortly after endeavour'd to outvy with his Soveraign in Magnificence; for understanding that the King design'd to keep the Feast of Christmass with his Queen at Guilford with great Pomp and Solemnity; he, whose Palace usually for Splendor, Attendants, and Entertainments exceeded that of some Princes, thought this a proper Time to manifest his great State and small Regard to his King's Favour, by equalling his own Sumptuous Preparations to his, with his rich Habits and munificent Gifts bestow'd upon his Attendants at Canterbury. The King mov'd with no small Indignation, concluded this Prelate had too much Riches, or too little Discretion; and therefore to diminish the one, and add to the other, after a Journey into the North to raise Mony, he resolv'd to go to Canterbury, and keep his Easter at the Charge of Hubert the Rich. Here he encreas'd that great Expence with a greater, which was his and his Queen's solemn crowning again on Easter Day, in the Cathedral Church; where in lieu of the Expence, Hubert had the Honour to set the Crown upon the King's Head, but not the Favour to sit near his Heart.

A. D. 1201. Reg. 2/3.

The King crown'd a third Time.

The first Breaches between the King and the Lay Peers.

Such were the first Contests between the King and the Clergy, which afterwards broke out into a more dangerous Flame; which the Lay Peers were so far from extinguishing, that they made it fiercer than before. For misliking either his Title or his Temper, they resolv'd upon the first Opportunity to shew their Resentments; which happen'd in a short Time after his last Coronation, when the King had occasion for their Service against the Poictovins in France, who had rebell'd and besieg'd their Governors in their Castles. The King having summon'd them to appear with their Arms at Portsmouth by Whitsontide, the whole Body of the Nobility held a solemn Assembly at Leicester, and after a formal Consultation, sent this Message to the King, That they would not go over with him, unless he would first restore to them their ancient Rights. Which so provok'd the King, that instead of complying with their Demands, by the precipitate Advice of some, he impolitickly demanded of them their Castles as Pledges of their Fidelity, particularly he took the Castle Beavoir into his Hands, with the Children of some of them. Yet it appears that most of them were at last prevail'd upon to go with him, and being assembled at Portsmouth, he took Mony of the greatest Part of them to be excus'd, and permitted them to return home; M. Paris says it was two Marks out of each Knight's Fee. In the mean Time the King sent William Earl of Pembroke, and Roger Lacy, with two distinct Bodies of Men into Normandy, to repel the Enemy on the Borders of that Province; and also intrusted Hubert de Burgh his Chamberlain with another Body to defend the Borders of England and Wales. And that he might give no Cause of Discontent to the Clergy, and prevent all Obstructions in raising of Mony, he fully reconcil'd himself to Geoffry Arch-Bishop of York, restor'd all his Manors, and by a Charter confirm'd all the Privileges and Immunities nities of that Church. Having ſetled his Affairs in England, he paſs'd over into France, where King Philip agreed to a perſonal but private Parly; in which each gave and receiv'd ſuch reciprocal Marks of Satisfaction, that not only the former Bonds of Amity ſeem'd inviolable, but were alſo more ſtrengthen'd with a new Aſſociation, wherein ſeveral great Peers were made Sureties under Hand and Seal, with this Condition, that when either of the Kings broke the Articles, all his cautionary Lords ſhould be freed from their Allegiance, and join with the other. And that the World might take notice of their combin'd Friendſhip, they both agreed to contribute the fortieth Part of their whole Crown Revenues to the Holy Wars; ſending their Letters throughout their Dominions, to incourage all their Nobles and People to follow their Examples. With theſe Intercourſes and other Compliments, three Days were ſpent between them; and King Philip the further to inſinuate himſelf into the other's good Opinion, deſir'd the Favour of his Company, firſt to St. Denis's Palace, where he enter'd with a pompous Proceſſion of the Clergy, and was royally lodg'd by King Philip; and the next Day he enter'd Paris, where he was receiv'd with very noble Preſents from the City, and great Applauſes of all Sorts, to ſee ſuch Marks of Affection between two ſuch great Princes, ſo lately mortal Enemies. Here the French King betaking himſelf to a more private Manſion, left his own Palace to honour and accommodate the King of England; and after ſome Days Continuance in magnificent Diverſions and Entertainments, King John royally attended out of the City, took his leave of King Philip, with ſuch Signs of mutual Satisfaction, that nothing could have appear'd more laſting than their Alliance and Amity.

A new Treaty between the Kings of England and France.

Hoveden. Wendov. M. Paris. But theſe fair Proſpects prov'd but of a ſhort Continuance; for while King John was paſſing his Chriſtmaſs at Argenton, in the beloved Company of his fair Iſabell, Hugh Earl of Marche, to whom that Lady was firſt promis'd, inflam'd with Love and Revenge, perſuaded ſeveral of the Poictovin Nobility, That he was unworthy to be a King, who had thus injur'd him, and was ready to do the like by any of them. Upon which young Arthur's Hopes, which were grown cold, were now rekindled by theſe Incendiaries; the Britains, then faſcinated with his ominous Name, reſolv'd to raiſe him to the higheſt Pitch of Grandeur; and King Philip who ſecretly hated King John, and continually graſp'd at his French Territories, deſign'd not to be backwards in their Aſſiſtance. Thus Earl Hugh out of Love, Duke Arthur out of Ambition, King Philip out of Avarice, and all out of Hatred, were conſpiring King John's Ruin; while he himſelf was furtheſt from Suſpicion, when neareſt the Danger. But the Miſchiefs were ſoon diſclos'd in a ſecond Interview between the two Kings, near the Caſtle of Guleton; where Philip forgetting all former Compacts, and pretending ſome imaginary Wrongs, peremptorily requir'd John immediately to reſtore all his tranſmarine Dominions to Arthur Duke of Bretaign; otherwiſe, as Soveraign Lord of thoſe Countries, which John held by Homage, he expreſly cited him to appear perſonally at Paris fifteen Days after Eaſter, there to anſwer what ſhould be laid to his Charge, and to abide the Judgment of the Court. King John, amaz'd at this ſtrange Propoſal and Alteration, diſdain'd both his Citation and Commands, as unworthy for England's King to accept, or the French to offer. After this, we are told that King John for his Non-appearance was actually adjudg'd by the Peers of France to loſe his Territories in the Continent; however it is certain that upon his Refuſal of the French King's Demands, that Prince immediately invaded the King of England's Territories, firſt levelling the ſtrong Caſtle of Butavant, and then taking the Town of Ougi, with the Caſtle of Lymis, and many other Places. He alſo beſieg'd the Caſtle of Radford eight Days, but hearing of King John's Approach, he retir'd, and turn'd all his Forces againſt Gorney, where breaking down the Head of a large Pool above the Town, a great Part of the Walls were overthrown by the violent Fall of the Water, ſo that the Garriſon retiring, the King took the Town without any conſiderable Oppoſition.

A. D. 1202. Reg. 2/3.

Hoſtilities begin.

After theſe Advantages, Philip returning to Paris, appointed certain Tutors or Governors for Duke Arthur, and aſſign'd him two hundred Horſemen for his Guard, who were order'd to march with him into Poictou, to reduce thoſe Parts; but as he was marching thither in a mighty military Pomp, he was inform'd that the old Queen Eleanor was in Mirabel, which was but a weak Garriſon. Therefore knowing the Advantage of ſuch a Prize, he turn'd all his Forces thither, and inveſted the Place, ſoon forcing the outward Caſtle to ſurrender: But the Queen and ſome of the principal Soldiers retiring into a ſtrong inward Tower, there made a valiant Defence. This occaſion'd almoſt all the Noblemen and Knights of Poictou, and principally the Earl of Marche, King John's inveterate Enemy, to come to Duke Arthur's Aſſiſtance; ſo that they all together made a powerful Army, and reduc'd the Queen to great Straits. This being underſtood by her Son King John, he march'd with the utmoſt Expedition, Day and Night, and arriv'd ſooner than could be expected. The Effect of his Appearance was, that the French and Poictovins left the Siege to give him Battel, which prov'd highly ſucceſsful to King John, who after a great Slaughter put them to flight, and ſo cloſely preſs'd upon them, that he enter'd the outward Caſtle with them, where the Conflict was ſoon ended by the Valour and Bravery of the Engliſh. This was a glorious Victory, by the gaining of which two hundred French Knights were taken Priſoners, with Duke Arthur himſelf, the Earl of Marche, and moſt of the Nobility of Poictou and Anjou; who being put into Fetters, were ignominiouſly ſent away in Carts, ſome into Normandy, and others into England, there to be kept cloſe Priſoners. Duke Arthur was ſent to Falaiſe, and kept under a ſtrong Guard; and his Siſter Eleanor, call'd the Beauty of Bretaign, was committed to Briſtol Caſtle, where ſhe liv'd near forty Years with very honourable Uſage. King John returning his Thanks to Heav'n, ſent his Letters to all his Nobility in England, inciting them to render all Praiſe to God for ſo wonderful a Work, and ſo gracious Aſſiſtance; and the French King who had for fifteen Days batter'd the Walls of the Caſtle of Arches, was ſo confounded at this News, that he immediately rais'd the Siege, and return'd to Paris, without any further Action that Year.

M. Paris. Æmilius. &c.

King John obtains a great Victory.

Duke Arthur made Priſoner.

Shortly after this Victory, King John going to Falaiſe, caus'd his Nephew Arthur to be brought before him, us'd many kind Expreſſions to him, and promis'd him great Honours, if he would totally relinquiſh the King of France, and adhere to him as his Lord and Uncle. But notwithſtanding he now lay at his Mercy, he anſwer'd him diſdainfully, and with plain Threats demanded the Kingdom of England, and all the Dominions enjoy'd by King Richard, as his Right by Inheritance, adding by an Oath, That he ſhould never enjoy Peace 'till he had reſtor'd them. King John inrag'd at theſe high and unexpected Demands, immediately ſent him to Roven to be kept in ſtricter Cuſtody than before in the new Tower, under the Care of Robert de Viepont. Some Writers affirm, that before he was brought to Roven, the Nobility of Bretaign and Anjou ſhew'd ſo much Zeal for him, that the King's Friends adviſ'd him to deprive him of his Eyes and Genitals, to render him uncapable of Government or Procreation, to which cruel Propoſal he conſented, but was diſappointed by the three Perſons deſign'd to be Agents in it: One of whom, out of a publick Experiment ſpread a Report of his Death, which inſtead of appeaſing, rais'd new and greater Exaſperations among the Inhabitants of Bretaign and Anjou. Upon which the King, to prevent future Diſturbances, remov'd him to a ſafer Priſon at Roven; where in a ſhort Time he quite diſappear'd, and was never ſeen after; but by what Means, there is ſtill a great Uncertainty. All ſuppoſe and believe it was by a violent Death; and the King's Friends reported, that endeavouring to make his eſcape out of the Priſon, he was accidentally drown'd in the River Seyne, upon which the Caſtle ſtood: But moſt Writers preſs hard upon the Memory of John, and ſay that by his Orders he was privately and baſely baſely murder'd; and ſome more expreſly tell us, that he himſelf came ſecretly in a Boat by Night, and cauſing his Nephew to be brought before him, without all Pity ſlew him with his own Sword, and caus'd his Body to be thrown into the Seyne ſome Leagues below the Town. But of this black and difficult Affair, we can ſay nothing poſitively.

M. Paris. Æmilius. III. King John being now freed from his Rival, for his better Security, caus'd himſelf to be a fourth Time crown'd at Canterbury, on the fourteenth Day of April, by Hubert the Arch-Biſhop; but upon his Return into Normandy, he ſoon found that it was but an Introduction to greater Troubles than ever. For the Report of the Murder was ſoon ſpread in all Parts, to the great blackning of the King's Name; for tho' very few could know how the young Prince came by his Death, yet all had too much reaſon to conclude that it could not have been brought about without the King's Orders. Upon which the Lady Conſtance, Mother to the Deceas'd, repair'd to King Philip, and made violent Complaints of the unheard of Barbarity of King John; which caus'd Philip to aſſemble all his Peers and Nobility, who immediately ſummon'd King John, as Duke of Normandy, to appear before them, and anſwer this Accuſation, at an appointed Day. King John readily ſent Euſtace Biſhop of Ely and Hubert de Burgh, as his Ambaſſadors, to let that King know, That he would willingly appear at his Court, provided he might have ſafe Conduct for his Going and Returning; to which Philip anſwer'd with a ſtern Look, He may come in Peace; but when the Biſhop ask'd, Whether he might return ſo, his only Anſwer was, Yes, if the Sentence of his Peers would permit him. The Ambaſſadors ſtill inſiſting upon a ſafe Conduct for their Maſter, King Philip in a Rage ſwore by all the Saints of France, That it ſhould not be otherwiſe than the Judgment of his Court. Then the Biſhop began to lay open the Dangers that might happen to his Maſter by his Appearance, and now urg'd, That the Duke of Normandy could not attend his Court, ſince the ſame Perſon was alſo King of England; and the Baronage of that Nation would not permit it, tho' he himſelf ſhould conſent to it, ſince there was ſo much Danger either of his Death or Impriſonment. To which the King reply'd, Pray, my Lord Biſhop, what is that to me? It is well known that the Duke of Normandy is my Vaſſal, and if he thought fit to conquer England, and ſo acquire a higher Title, ought his Soveraign Lord to loſe any Thing by that? No Anſwer being given to this, and King John not appearing at the appointed Time, the Court proceeded to condemn him for Treaſon and Murther, and P. Æmilius has recorded the Sentence to this Effect, 'That John Duke of Normandy, being un-'mindful of his Oath to Philip his Lord, had murder'd his elder Brother's Son, 'an Homager to that Crown, within the Soveraignty of France; whereupon 'he is judg'd a Traitor, and as an Enemy to the Crown of France, to forfeit 'all his Dominions which he held by Homage, and that Re-entry be made by 'Force of Arms. Thus by a partial and undue Sentence, the King and Peers of France, at a Time whilſt they were in open Hoſtility with King John, condemn'd him, tho' abſent, unhear'd, without either confeſſing, or being convicted of the Crime, and without any legal or equitable Cognizance of it.

The King crown'd a fourth Time.

M. Paris. However the French being then very powerful, ſoon began to put this Sentence in Execution, while King John, free from the Noiſe and Thoughts of War, feaſted magnificently with his Queen at Caen, and lay in Bed with her every Day 'till Noon. At the ſame Time the French King took many of his Caſtles, kept the ſtrongeſt, and demoliſh'd the reſt; and when King John was told what the Enemy had done, he only reply'd, Let him alone, whatever he takes now, I will ſoon recover again. But when the Engliſh Earls and Noblemen heard this, and obſerv'd his inſuperable Sloath, they begg'd leave to return home; and ſo left but a very few Knights or military Men to tarry with him in Normandy. In the mean Time, Hugh de Gourney ſurrender'd the ſtrong Caſtle Caſtle of Montfort to the French King, with the entire Honour belonging to it, while King John continu'd ſecurely at Roven; inſomuch that the People ſaid, Sure he was inchanted, being ſtill as pleaſant and unconcern'd as if nothing had befallen him. The French King ſtill proceeded further, and with a powerful Army ſat down before the ſtrong Fortreſs of Ruil, within the Territory of Roven; and Fitz-Water and De Quincy, in whoſe Cuſtody it was, ſhamefully deliver'd up that important Place, as ſoon as he appear'd before it. But King Philip abhorring their Cowardice, generouſly commanded them to be kept cloſe Priſoners, and to be loaded with Fetters, 'till they could pay their Ranſoms. Normandy, and the King's other Dominions being thus left naked and defenceleſs, the French King paſs'd through divers Provinces without any Oppoſition, and reduc'd ſeveral Caſtles to his Obedience. He alſo about that Time beſieg'd that ſtrong Caſtle on the Rock of Andeli on Seyne, which King Richard had built from the Ground, and call'd it Caſtle Galliard; but that being defended by the admirable Valour and Fidelity of Roger de Lacy, King Philip could gain ſo little Advantage againſt it, that he was forc'd to turn his Siege into a Blockade: In which Juncture ſome Normans revolted from the King of England, while others outwardly adher'd to him.

He returns into England.

King John at length ſeeing his own Weakneſs, and that he was left without any Forces, took ſhipping, and landed at Portſmouth on the ſixth Day of December; and immediately after his Arrival he turn'd his Reſentments againſt his Earls and Barons, alledging, That they had deſerted, and left him among his Enemies beyond Sea, and through their Neglect he had loſt his Caſtles and Territories there; wherefore by way of Puniſhment he forcibly took from them the ſeventh Part of their Moveables. Neither did he ſpare in this Tax even the Conventual or Parochial Churches, for, as Paris tells us, he had ſuch as ſeverely executed his Rapines, viz. Hubert Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, upon the Clergy, and Fitz-Peter the Juſticiary, upon the Laity, who ſpared no Perſon in this Impoſition. At the ſame Time the French King taking advantage of King John's Abſence, march'd with a ſtrong Force before ſeveral other Cities and Caſtles of his Dominions, politickly declaring to the Inhabitants, That King John had cowardly deſerted them, and he being chief Lord over thoſe Countries, ſtood oblig'd in that caſe to preſerve the Fee from Injury and Damage; therefore he amicably requir'd them to receive him for their Soveraign, ſince they had no other: But if they refus'd this fair Propoſal, and after Reſiſtance were ſubdu'd, he declar'd by an Oath, he would either hang or flea them all alive. At length, after many Diſputes and Conſultations, they unanimouſly conſented to give Hoſtages for one Year's Truce; and if the King of England reliev'd them not within that Time, they would recognize him for their Lord, and ſurrender their Cities and Caſtles to him. Yet, as Trivet better informs us, many of the chief Cities of Normandy, as Falaiſe, Conſtance, Bayeux, and others, being by Force or Treachery ſoon reduc'd to the French King's Power, King John had nothing left there, beſides the City of Roven.

A. D. 1204. Reg. 5. 6.

Upon the ſecond of January, King John and all the great Men of England met in a grand Council or Parliament at Oxford; where was granted to the King a military Aid of two Marks and a half of every Knight's Fee; nor did Biſhops, Abbots, or Eccleſiaſticks depart without promiſing the ſame. But notwithſtanding this great Aid, we do not find that he made any better uſe of it than to ſpend it in an unactive and luxurious Life. However he found it convenient after Midlent to ſend the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, with the Biſhops of Ely and Norwich, and the Earl-Marſhal and the Earl of Leiceſter, as Ambaſſadors to the King of France, to ſound his Inclinations to a Peace, and to propoſe ſome new Terms of Agreement, if he would receive them. But King Philip, ſwell'd with his former Succeſſes, would agree to none of them; but finding that Duke Arthur was really dead, he demanded Eleanor his Siſter to be given in Marriage to his younger Son, with all the Territories in France, deſigning deſigning to make a further Advantage of her, as the true Heireſs to the Crown of England. But this being thought an unreaſonable Demand, the Embaſſie became ineffectual. About the ſame Time King Philip ſent a valiant Champion to juſtifie by Combate before the States of England, what his Maſter had done in France againſt their King; and tho' it was not thought fit to hazard a Title of that Moment on the Arms and Fortune of one Man, yet it was reſolv'd that this bold Challenger ſhould not paſs unanſwer'd. Accordingly the King fix'd on John Curvy, Earl of Ulſter, now a Priſoner in the Tower, a Man of a Gigantick Body and undaunted Fierceneſs, who when the King ask'd him Whether he would combate in his Cauſe, anſwer'd No, not in thy Cauſe, nor for thy Sake, but for the Kingdom's Right I will fight to the laſt Moment of Life. While with vaſt Eating he repair'd his decay'd Limbs and Nerves, the French Champion hearing of his exceſſive Feeding, and his proportionable Strength, and dreading him as a Monſter of Nature, he retir'd ſecretly into Spain, not daring to viſit France again. Of this Earl Curvy we are further aſſur'd, that afterwards when the two Kings met upon a Truce in France, King Philip hearing he was in the Engliſh Camp, deſir'd King John to let him ſee ſome Experiment of his fam'd Strength. Whereupon an Helmet of excellent Proof, full fac'd with Mail, was ſet upon a wooden Block; when the Earl firſt looking round with a moſt dreadful Aſpect, lift up his mighty Sword, and cleft ſo deep through the Steel into the knotty Wood, that none preſent but himſelf could draw it out again, which he did with Eaſe. Then being ask'd by the King, Why he look'd ſo fiercely before he ſtruck, he anſwer'd, That if he had fail'd of his Blow, he then reſolv'd to have kill'd them all, both Kings, and other Spectators. Both Kings made him large Preſents, and John freely reſtor'd him to his Earldom of Ulſter.

M. Paris, &c. But what King Philip could not perform by one Champion in England, he effected in Normandy by many, where after great Succeſs he took the chief City of Roven, by the Surrender of the Citizens, and that after a long Siege, and merely for want of ſending them timely Aſſiſtance. It was ſurrender'd upon honourable Terms and divers advantagious Articles, the chief of which were, That the City ſhould enjoy all its ancient Franchiſes and Privileges; but as Mezeray well obſerves, This Precaution prov'd as feeble againſt abſolute Power, as Paper is againſt Iron; for as ſoon as he became Maſter of it, he utterly demoliſh'd all its noble Walls, and forbad them ever to be built again. After this the Caſtle on the Rock of Andeli was taken, partly by undermining, and partly by Famine, after it had been beſieg'd almoſt a Year; but before the Enemy could enter, when they had ſcarce Proviſions left for one Meal, the valiant Governor Roger Lacy, ſcorning to make Conditions for himſelf, and reſolving to make the Prize as dear as poſſible to the Enemy, he couragiouſly with Sword in Hand, together with divers of his brave Companions mounting their Horſes, ſally'd out, and killing great Numbers of the French, maintain'd a noble Fight, before they were taken. After the Surrender of the Caſtle, Roger was carry'd into France; yet for the great Courage and Bravery he ſhew'd in the Defence of it, the King commanded that he ſhould be Priſoner at large; this Prince having ſo much Generoſity as to make a wide Diſtinction between this gallant Man, and ſuch Cowards as Fitz-Water and De Quincy, before-mention'd; and indeed this unfortunate Gentleman was worthy to have ſerv'd a better and more vigilant Maſter. Not long after, the French King having taken the Caſtles of Arches and Vernevil, became compleat Maſter of all Normandy. And thus was that Dukedom, the nobleſt Jewel in the Engliſh Diadem, which had been diſmember'd from France for three hundred and twenty Years, and govern'd by twelve ſucceſſive Dukes of the Norman Race, now torn from it, and made ſubject to another Maſter; ingloriouſly to him who loſt it, unjuſtly by him who got it, and in a great Meaſure perfidiouſly by ſuch as ſhould, and might have kept it.

Roven ſurrender'd to the French.

All Normandy loſt from England.

Nor-

Normandy was not the only Country that was loſt, for almoſt all the reſt of the tranſmarine Dominions ſuſtain'd the ſame Fate: And the Cities and Caſtles ſubject to the King of England, being now reduc'd to great Streights, ſent over to let him know their Condition, That the Time of the Truce was almoſt expir'd, and that they muſt either deliver up their Fortreſſes, or ſuffer their Hoſtages to be deſtroy'd. Whereupon the King anſwer'd their Meſſengers, That they muſt expect no Aſſiſtance from him, and therefore they might act as they thought fit. Thus for want of Relief, likewiſe all Main, Tourain, Anjou and Poictou, came under the Dominion of the French King, except Rochel, Toarz and Niors; and thus was King John treated by the ſame Perſon, with whom he had ſo perfidiouſly join'd againſt his own Father and Brother. Yet ſtill the King ſpent his Time with his Queen wholly in Pleaſures, as if in her he had enjoy'd all the World; only Trivet does in ſome degree excuſe him, alledging, That King John diſcourag'd by ſo many Diſaſters, could not raiſe an Army ſufficient either to defend his Territories, or to recover what was loſt; for his own Subjects being now generally diſcontented, refus'd to fight for him, and ſo he learnt by unhappy Experience, That all the real Power of Princes conſiſts in the Love of their People. About this Time the King's Mother, Queen Eleanor, dy'd very aged, a Princeſs of an high and active Spirit, who had been Wife to two mighty Kings, and Mother to three; who after ſhe had met with all the Viciſſitudes of Fortune, liv'd juſt long enough to ſee moſt of her own hereditary Dominions loſt to a prevailing Conqueror.

A. D. 1205. Reg. 6/7.

IV. King John, being reduc'd to ſmaller Dominions than any of his Predeceſſors ſince the Norman Conqueſt, began now to be ſenſible of his Foreign Diſhonours, and his Domeſtick Affronts; and by the Advice of his beſt Friends, he gather'd together a powerful Army and a mighty Navy, reſolving to revenge his Wrongs, and repair his Loſſes. But all his Deſigns were ſuddenly blaſted, chiefly by the means of the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury and the Earl of Pembroke, who, when he was ready to take Shipping at Portſmouth, came to him and diſſuaded him from this Expedition; alledging many Inconveniencies and Miſchiefs, uſing many Intreaties, and likewiſe threatning to detain him by Force. At length being overcome by their Importunities, he by their Advice ſent his Brother the Earl of Salisbury with a conſiderable Force to Rochelle, whither his natural Son Geoffry had been ſent before, and ſo diſmiſs'd the greateſt Part of his Noblemen and Knights; who having been put to vaſt Charges, in Expectation of an honourable Campain, ſolemnly curs'd the Authors of this Advice; and more eſpecially the Mariners, who to the Number of fourteen thouſand, for this Deſign brought their Ships from the utmoſt Parts of the Kingdom. As this prov'd a ſevere Diſappointment to many, ſo moſt of all to the King himſelf, who being reſtleſs and uneaſie, put to Sea with a ſmall Force; but after two or three Days wafting backwards and forwards, he found it convenient to return and land at Warham in Dorſetſhire. Immediately after he extorted a vaſt Sum of Mony from his Earls, Barons, Knights and Clergy, for refuſing to follow him beyond Sea to recover his loſt Dominions: Which was the ſecond Time he had rais'd Mony upon the Nation without the People's Conſent; and was one of thoſe Grievances which afterwards caus'd the Barons to take up Arms againſt him, and one of the particular Heads provided againſt by his great Charter.

Arch-Biſhop Hubert's Death.

About the ſame Time Arch-Biſhop Hubert dy'd, and the King in Perſon at Canterbury ſeiz'd upon all his Wealth and Poſſeſſions, ſhewing himſelf highly ſatisfy'd, That he was freed from him whom he ſuſpected to have held private Intelligence with the French King, declaring, That he was never a King 'till now, by reaſon of Hubert's preſumptuous croſſing his Royal Reſolutions, as of late he did. But this Joy and Expectation of happier Days, was ſoon ſtifled and bury'd in the ſame Tomb with the Arch-Biſhop; out of whoſe Aſhes ſuch a Fire-

M. Paris. &c.

Fire-brand was produc'd, as exceedingly inflam'd and embroil'd the Affairs of King John, and the whole Nation. For immediately after his Death, the junior Monks of Canterbury, too little valuing a declining King, and too much eſteeming a rewarding Pope, proceeded to an unprecedented Action, and at Midnight choſe Reginald, the Sub-Prior of their Convent, for their Arch-Biſhop, without the leaſt Knowledge of the King. And obliging of him to the ſtricteſt Secrecy, they ſent him away to Rome with the utmoſt Expedition, not doubting but his Holineſs out of Intereſt would confirm their Election. But this vain-glorious Monk, being got into Flanders, divulg'd the Secret in all Parts, declar'd himſelf Arch-Biſhop, and ſhew'd the Inſtrument of the Convent under their Seal: Of which when the reſt had notice, and that he had broke his Oath of Secrecy, they were highly incens'd, and to prevent the King's juſt Diſpleaſure, they now ſubmitted themſelves to his Majeſty, humbly deſiring his Licence to chuſe a new Arch-Biſhop. This was freely granted by the King, but with this Intimation, That if they would chuſe John Gray, Biſhop of Norwich, they would do him an acceptable Piece of Service; upon which the Monks unanimouſly choſe him in due Form, and the King and he went immediately to Canterbury, where the next Day the Prior in the Preſence of them and the Convent, declar'd the ſaid John duly elected Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury. After which the Monks plac'd him with great Solemnity in the Archiepiſcopal Throne; and the King with no leſs Ceremony put him in Poſſeſſion of the Temporalties belonging to the Archbiſhoprick, to the general Satisfaction of all Men.

which was the Beginning of King John's Troubles.

M. Paris. Thus the King's Affairs ſeem'd to ſucceed well in England, and not worſe in France, where his Majeſty landed with a powerful Army at Rochell. Upon which the Poictovins, glad of his Arrival, came in chearfully to him, and promis'd their Aſſiſtance; and after he had ſubdu'd a conſiderable Part of Poictou, he ſat down before the ſtrong Caſtle of Mont-Auban, and battering it fifteen Days with his Engines, took it on the firſt of Auguſt, which Place Charles the Great could not take with a ſeven Years Siege. Upon this Succeſs the King wrote to his Juſtices, Biſhops and Nobility of England, how many great illuſtrious Priſoners, and what Horſe and Arms, and what innumerable Spoils he had taken. But the religious Perſons of thoſe Parts mediating between the two Kings, they procur'd a two Years Truce; and ſo King John return'd into England, ſoon loſing all the Advantages he had gain'd. And now his Troubles began to fall heavy upon him from the Pope, who by his Artifices endeavour'd to make both the late Elections void; miſliking the Abilities of Reginald, as well as the Principles of Gray. When the King ſent ſome of the Monks of Canterbury to Rome, to obtain the Pope's Confirmation of Gray, at the ſame Time the Suffragan Biſhops of that Province, alſo ſent their Proctors to Rome, who highly complain'd to the Pope, That the Monks had preſum'd to chuſe an Arch-Biſhop without them, when they of common Right and ancient Cuſtom ought to have been preſent, and have join'd to the Election; for which they alledg'd divers Decrees and Precedents, produc'd Witneſſes and Teſtimonials, That the Biſhops together with the Monks had choſen three Arch-Biſhops. The Monks on the other ſide affirm'd, That by ancient and allow'd Cuſtom, and by ſpecial Privilege of divers Popes, they us'd to make Elections without the Biſhops, which they offer'd to prove by ſufficient Witneſſes: And thus the Proceſs continu'd 'till the following Year.

M. Paris. Wendov. In the mean Time King John proceeded by his grand Council to raiſe a new Tax of the thirteenth Part of all Mens Moveables; but while he endeavour'd for theſe Sinews of War, he more and more loſt the Bands of Peace, the Hearts of his People. And hence aroſe the Beginnings of a miſerable Breach between the King and his Subjects, being both out of Proportion, and disjointed in thoſe juſt Ligaments of Command and Obedience that ſhould hold them together; the reducing of which into due Form and Order, coſt many Years Toil, and more noble Blood, than all the foreign Wars ſince the Conqueſt. One of the greateſt Incendiaries was Geoffry Arch-Biſhop of York, who ſolemnly execrating all the King's Receivers within his Province, fled ſecretly out of the Land. In theſe violent Proceedings the Clergy have been blam'd by ſome Writers who were even Enemies to King John; eſpecially ſince they patiently permitted Florentinus the Pope's Legate, not long before to carry away vaſt Sums from them to his Maſter's Coffers at Rome. Yet ſtill theſe Domeſtick Troubles took away nothing from the King's Care, nor his good Hopes, which were much encreas'd by the Preſence of his Nephew the Emperor Otho; who in Perſon arriving in England to project for his own and his Uncle's Wars, was with great Joy met by the King, and conducted through London by Night, where all the City was ſeen in her Glory, and the Streets adorn'd with the richeſt Hangings, beautified with the Luſtre of pendant Crowns, and ſhining Lamps. After ſome Days Continuance, and magnificent Entertainments, the Emperor departed, not unfurniſh'd with Helps to carry on his Wars.

In the mean Time the Troubles and Miſchiefs began now to ſhow themſelves from the See of Rome; where at length there was a ſolemn Hearing before the Pope concerning the double Election at Canterbury. After which, thoſe who ſtood for Reginald the Sub-Prior, preſented him to his Holineſs, as being firſt and duly elected, while the other Party offer'd to prove the firſt Election void, as being made by Night without the King's Conſent, and chief Part of the Convent; ſo that after long Diſputes, the Pope proceeded to an unprecedented Action, and publickly judg'd both theſe Perſons Uncanonical; and by the Advice of his Cardinals null'd them both, abſolutely forbidding either Party to enter upon the Archiepiſcopal Dignity. And to eſtabliſh his Intereſt and Power at once, he nominated Stephen Langton, an Engliſhman and Cardinal, for their Arch-Biſhop, urging the Monks to chuſe him: At firſt they alledg'd, That they could make no Canonical Election, without the Conſent of the King and their Convent; but the Pope reply'd, That they had in themſelves the full Power of the Church of Canterbury; and that in Elections at the Apoſtolick See, the Conſent of Princes was not expected; and then he commanded all preſent, by vertue of their Obedience, and upon pain of a Curſe, to chuſe him Arch-Biſhop, whom he had appointed for their Father and Paſtor. Upon this poſitive Command, the Monks, dreading the Pope's unbounded Power, all except one Elias de Brantfield, with great Reluctance gave their Conſents; and ſo Cardinal Langton was conſecrated Arch-Biſhop by the Pope himſelf at Viterbo, on the ſeventeenth Day of June, contrary to common Law and Equity.

Cæſhal. Windov.

The Pope nominates a new Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury.

The Pope being ſenſible that King John would deeply reſent this arbitrary Proceeding, ſent over his Nuntio with four extraordinary Rings, ſet with rich Stones of four different Colours; and alſo a ſubtle inſinuating Letter, ſetting forth the wonderful Miſteries contain'd in the Roundneſs of the Rings, and their various Colours, which ſignify'd, as he ſaid, the four cardinal Virtues, with ſeveral Divine Graces; and concluding with an earneſt Exhortation to follow each of thoſe Virtues thus ſignify'd. Yet the Pope would not rely upon the King's good Pleaſure, but alſo politickly wrot other Letters, in which he exhorted the King to receive and acknowledge Stephen Langton, a Native of his own Kingdom, and a Cardinal well ſkill'd in all Sorts of Learning, ſince his exemplary Life and Converſation would be of great Advantage both to his Body and Soul. But ſtill to ſecure all, he alſo ſent his peremptory Command to the Prior and Monks, to receive and obey him as their Arch-Biſhop, as well in Temporals as Spirituals. The King receiving his Letters, and hearing of all Proceedings, in a great Rage charg'd the Monks of Canterbury with Treaſon; remonſtrating, That in Prejudice to his Prerogative, they had firſt choſen their Sub-Prior without a Licence, and then to make ſome feign'd Amends, elected the Biſhop of Norwich; and that tho' their Journey to Rome was at his own Expence, yet, as an Aggravation to their firſt Offence, they had preſum'd to chuſe Stephen Langton his declared Enemy, and had caus'd him to be conſecrated Arch-Biſhop. For which cauſe the King, in the Heat of his Fury, ſent two two cruel and ill-natur'd Knights, with ſome other Officers, to drive the Monks of Canterbury out of England, as Criminals of the higheſt Nature: And theſe, in purſuance of the King's Orders, entering the Monaſtery with drawn Swords, commanded the Prior and Monks, in the Name of the King, immediately to depart out of the Nation, or elſe they would certainly burn them, and their Monaſtery together. The Monks being greatly terrify'd, without further Conſideration left their Monaſtery, and all their Goods to be confiſcated; and paſſing into Flanders, were kindly receiv'd in the Abby of St. Bertin, and in other adjoining Monaſteries.

M. Paris. &c. King John, not thus ſatisfy'd, ſent Meſſengers to the Pope with expoſtulary Letters, ſetting forth, the Injury done him in vacating the Election of the Biſhop of Norwich, and conſecrating Stephen Langton without his Conſent; a Perſon wholly unknown to him, educated in France, and a Correſpondent of his open Enemies; all this to the Prejudice and Subverſion of the Rights and Prerogatives of his Crown: Declaring he would immutably ſtand by the Election of the Biſhop of Norwich; remembring him, That Rome receiv'd more Profit from England, than from all the Tranſalpine Regions; and threatning, if he could not have a favourable Hearing at Rome, he would preclude all Perſons from paſſing thither, by ſhutting up his Ports: For ſince he had Arch-Biſhops, Biſhops and Prelates, abounding in Learning, in his own Dominions, if he were forc'd to it, he would neither ſeek for Juſtice nor Judgment in foreign Countries. To which the Pope, after ſome Reſpite, return'd a cunning and plauſible Anſwer, in which he firſt mildly blam'd the King for giving ſo rough an Anſwer to his humble and obliging Letters, and next juſtify'd the Election of Cardinal Langton, as one who had long ſtudy'd in the Univerſity of Paris, and had merited to be made a Doctor both in the liberal Arts, and Theology: Further aſſuring him, That tho' at Elections made at the Apoſtolick See, the Conſent of Princes was not requiſite, yet notwithſtanding, two Monks had been ſpecially deputed to gain his Aſſent; but being detain'd at Dover, they were not able to perform what was enjoin'd them. Then juſtifying the Election as agreeable to the Canons of the ancient Fathers, he concluded with a threatning Advice, That ſince his Father and Brother had abjur'd that evil Cuſtom, he ought to ſubmit to his good Pleaſure, which would be much for his Honour, and not to reſiſt God and the Church in this Cauſe, for which that bleſſed Martyr and glorious Arch-Biſhop Thomas Becket had ſhed his Blood.

M. Paris. Theſe laſt were terrible Words to a King whoſe Father had been ſo great a Sufferer; which were ſucceeded by a new Command from the Pope to the Biſhops of London, Ely and Worceſter, to argue the Affair with the King, and if they found him contumacious, to declare that his Kingdom ſhould be interdicted; and if he ſtill perſiſted, that his Holineſs would lay a heavier Hand upon him. Upon which theſe Biſhops immediately repairing to the King, entreated him with Tears to recall the Arch-Biſhop and Monks to their Church, and honour and love them with perfect Charity, that he might avoid the Scandal of the Interdict; but while they were proceeding in their Speech, the King, ſenſible of theſe numerous Indignities, fell into a violent Paſſion, and by a ſolemn Oath declar'd, That if any ſhould preſume to interdict his Territories, he would ſend all the Prelates and Clergy of England to the Pope, and confiſcate their Goods; and if he found any Romans within his Dominions, he would deprive them of their Eyes and Noſes, and ſend them to Rome, that they might be diſtinguiſh'd from thoſe of other Nations: And he further commanded the Biſhops immediately to depart his Preſence, as they valu'd their preſent Safeties. The King was further provok'd by the Behaviour of Simon Langton, who about the ſame Time, before divers Biſhops, adviſ'd him to receive his Brother Stephen as Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury; and when the King ſpoke to him of preſerving his Royal Dignity in this Affair, he inſolently re-ply'd, That he could do nothing in his Majesty's Behalf, unless he would wholly throw himself upon his Brother's Mercy. The above-mention'd Bishops, finding no Signs of Compliance, abandon'd the King, and on the twenty second Day of March, they solemnly interdicted the whole Kingdom of England and Dominion of Wales, in Obedience to the Pope's Commands; upon which there was a Cessation of all Divine Service, except Confession, Baptism of Infants, and Administration of the Eucharist to dying Persons; so that the Bodies of the Dead were carry'd out of the Cities and Towns, and without any Ceremony like Beasts were tumbled into Pits and Ditches.

The Pope interdicts the whole Kingdom.

The King fearing the Consequence of the Interdict, and his Subjects Hatred, proceeded to violent Methods, sent to his Sheriffs and other Ministers, and commanded with dreadful Threats all Prelates and their inferior Clergy forthwith to depart the Kingdom, and repair to the Pope, requiring him to do the King Justice for this Injury. He also put all Bishopricks, Abbies and Priories under the Custody of Lay-Men, commanding all the Church Rents to be confiscated, and their Goods to be seiz'd: The Concubines of the Priests and Clerks throughout England were imprison'd by the King's Officers, and forc'd to pay great Compositions for their Liberty: The Monks and Men in Orders, while travelling upon the Road, were thrown off their Horses, and robb'd and abus'd by the King's Soldiers: Also the Relations of the Arch-Bishop and those Bishops who pronounc'd the Interdict, were by the King's Command rifled of their Goods, and cast into Prison. Yet notwithstanding all these Evils, M. Paris tells us, 'That the foresaid Bishops remain'd beyond Sea, living in all manner 'of Delights, not opposing themselves as a Wall of Defence for the Lord's 'House; but when they saw the Wolf coming, they left their Sheep and fled. After these general Seisures, the King in a short Time restor'd the Lands and Goods of all such Ecclesiasticks as celebrated Divine Service, administer'd the Sacraments, and refus'd to obey the Interdict; but retain'd the Estates of all the rest. And for the Security of such as obey'd him, he issu'd out his Precept, that no Man against his Peace should abuse them either in Word or Deed; which if they did, they should if pursu'd be hang'd upon the next Tree. But these were all immediately condemn'd by the See of Rome: And this was the present State of the Clergy of England; such as oblig'd the King were suspended by the Pope, and such as obey'd the Pope were depriv'd by the King.

A. D. 1209. Reg. 10 11.

Such irregular Proceedings in the King, and such Perplexities in the People could not but occasion great Hatred and Murmurings; therefore to prevent the Effects of such Discontents, the King requir'd of his Nobility new Oaths of Allegiance, and Pledges of such as he most suspected, as also Homage of all Freeholders, even from twelve Years of Age, all whom he dismiss'd with the Ceremony of a Kiss of Peace. Misdoubting also the Pope's further Intent to absolve his Subjects from their due Allegiance, after the Example of his Father Henry, he gather'd together a powerful Army for all Exigencies. The Terror of which he first display'd in the North, being disoblig'd at William King of Scotland, for receiving some Out-laws fled out of England, and for marrying his Daughter to the Earl of Boloigne without his Consent. But upon his Approach to the Borders of Scotland, King William desir'd Peace, and by the Mediation of Friends to both Nations, they made up the Breach upon these Terms, That the King of the Scots should pay King John eleven thousand Marks of Silver, and that his two Daughters should be deliver'd as Pledges for the Security of the Peace between them. The Dread of the King's Power pass'd so swiftly out of the North into the West, that upon his Return, the Princes of Wales, and others, rich and poor, came to him at Woodstock to do him Homage. But all these Ties of Allegiance were in Danger of being dissolv'd by a new Sentence from Rome of an Excommunication of the King's Person, with strict Injunction for all Men to abandon his Presence: Which being sent to be pronounc'd by the Bishops and Prelates in England, all of them for Fear or Favour of the King,

M. Paris. Westmins.

The King excommunicated by the Pope.

King, neglected the Pope's Commands, and let the Apoſtolick Proceſs eſcape without Execution. However the Sentence was ſo well known, that it became the Subject of all Mens Diſcourſe; particularly of Geoffry Arch-Deacon of Norwich, who in the Exchequer declar'd to his Aſſociate, That it was not ſafe for benefic'd Men to continue in the Service of an excommunicated King, and ſo retir'd without leave. For which the King commanded him to be put in Irons in a cloſe Priſon, and a leaden Cope to be put upon him, the Preſſure of which much haſten'd his Death: But the greater and wiſer Sort, both of the Nobility and others, continu'd their Attendance on the King's Court and Perſon, without Regard of the Cenſure.

Ann. Wib. M. Paris. In the mean Time the King, raiſing great Sums of Mony, to ſhow his Power, with a mighty Army paſs'd over into Ireland, which Country had been too long neglected; and arriving at Dublin, he was there met with more than twenty petty Kings and Princes of that Country, who dreading his Arms, paid him Homage and Fealty. All the neighbouring Parts readily ſubmitted; but to the reſt, the King march'd with his Forces, took many ſtrong Places from the Enemy, ſubdu'd the Province of Connaught, and took Cuthol the King Priſoner. Having reduc'd all Parts, be impriſon'd the Engliſh Fugitives, took Pledges both of the Engliſh and Iriſh Inhabitants, puniſh'd Malefactors with Death, turbulent Perſons with Ranſoms, eſtabliſh'd all their Laws, Coin and Officers according to the Engliſh Form, and deputed a wiſe and upright Governor over them, the Biſhop of Norwich, Competitor to Cardinal Langton. Thus he eſtabliſh'd on that barbarous Iſland ſuch an exact and well order'd Face of Government, as was its Stay in thoſe tumultuous Times, and a Pattern for more peaceful Ages to imitate; by which ſpeedy Conqueſt and Reformation, he juſtly merited the Title given him of Lord of Ireland. As he was ſucceſsful in theſe Parts, ſo was he no leſs in Wales, both in this and the following Year: For after he return'd from Ireland, and laid ſuch vaſt Fines upon the Eccleſiaſticks as amounted to a hundred thouſand Pounds Sterling, he with a powerful Army march'd into the farthermoſt Parts of Wales, as far as Snowdun; ſo that the petty Princes, and Nobles ſubmitted without any Oppoſition. Then to ſecure their future Subjection, he took twenty eight Hoſtages of them, and ſo return'd in Triumph, as Conqueror of Wales.

which Kingdom he happily reduces.

M. Paris. &c. V. The Nation had now laid under an Interdict near three Years and an half, which prov'd highly dangerous to the King, as well as intolerably grievous to the People. So that at length the King finding the Pope inflexible, and inſenſible of the Burden of ſo many Chriſtians, he began to relent and recede from his former Reſolutions, hoping to ſettle his own and Subjects Tranquility, tho' with great Indignity to himſelf. In his Return from Wales, he was met at Northampton by two Nuntio's from the Pope, Pandolf a Sub-Deacon, and Durand a Knight Templar, who were ſent purpoſely into England to make Peace between the King and the Eccleſiaſticks. Being met together, after a long Debate, the King freely aſſur'd them, That the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, and the Monks, and all the proſcrib'd Biſhops might return in Peace and Security to their own Palaces; and that the Holy Church ſhould have all the Franchiſes it enjoy'd in the Reign of Edward the Confeſſor. But becauſe the King would not, or indeed could not, make full Satisfaction for the Goods of the Arch-Biſhop and Biſhops formerly confiſcated, and for the Damages they had ſuſtain'd, the Treaty became wholly ineffectual, and the Nuntio's return'd into France. But before they departed, they denounc'd that Execration againſt the King's Perſon, which the Biſhops had wholly declin'd, and ſo incens'd the Pope againſt him, that in the latter end of the Year, he proceeded to greater Contumelies than ever, and abſolv'd all his Subjects, High and Low, from their Faith and Obedience to him; ſtrictly enjoining all Perſons under pain of Excommunication, to avoid him in Private and Publick, at his Table, Council, and and common Converſation. For, as our Author tells us, the King had at the Time of the Interdict, divers Councellors about him, as well of the Clergy as Laity, whom he names; who ſtriving to pleaſe him in all Things, were ſuppos'd not to adviſe him according to Law or Reaſon, but his own Humour.

A. D. 1212. Reg. 13/14.

Notwithſtanding theſe ſtrict Prohibitions, in Lent following the King had a noble Feaſt in Clarkenwell, where he knighted Prince Alexander, only Son and Heir to the King of the Scots, who return'd home with the Applauſe and Congratulations of both Kingdoms. Not long after, the Welſh having made ſeveral hoſtile Incurſions and Devaſtations in England, the King highly provok'd, levy'd a great Army, reſolving to ravage all Wales, and extirpate the Inhabitants; and for a preſent Revenge he hang'd up all the twenty eight Hoſtages deliver'd to him the Year before. But in this, as in moſt other Actions, he met with unexpected Obſtructions; for being ready for his Expedition, he receiv'd Letters from the King of the Scots and others of a Traiterous Conſpiracy form'd againſt him, which at firſt he ſlighted, and march'd forward to Cheſter. But there receiving Letters again to the ſame Effect, that he ſhould either be ſlain by his Noblemen, or deliver'd up to his Enemies, and now underſtanding that the great Men of England thought themſelves diſcharg'd from their Obedience to him, he disbanded his Army and return'd to London. From whence he diſpatch'd Commiſſioners to all ſuſpected Perſons of Quality, obliging them to ſend Pledges of their Fidelity; upon which many out of Fear ſent their Sons, Nephews and neareſt Relations, to appeaſe his Indignation; but Euſtace de Veſcie, and Robert Fitz-Walter, being accus'd of Treaſon, fled one into Scotland, and the other into France. Theſe Defections were much promoted by the pretended Predictions of one Peter a Hermite of Wakefield in Yorkſhire, who propheſy'd that by the next Aſcention Day, John ſhould no longer be King. As the King took care to ſecure this Perſon, ſo he was not backwards in any ſevere Methods with others: And here our Author M. Paris adds, That being a Prince of inſatiable Luſt and Cruelty, he had now highly provok'd divers of the Nobility by debauching of their Wives and Daughters, by baniſhing their Relations, or by reducing them to Poverty by his illegal Exactions; ſo that he had made himſelf almoſt as many Enemies as there were Noblemen in the Kingdom. He further adds, That when they knew themſelves to be abſolv'd from their Fidelity by the Pope, they rejoic'd exceedingly; and if common Fame might be credited, they had each of them ſign'd and ſeal'd a certain Charter which they had ſent to the French King, aſſuring him he might ſafely come into England, obtain the Kingdom, and be crown'd with Honour.

M. Paris. Windov.

The King marches toward Wales, but in vain.

The Nobility highly diſoblig'd by him.

Theſe were proper Times for the Pope to make his utmoſt Advantage; who being both inflexible and inſatiable, now reſolv'd to effect his Deſigns, tho' with the Confuſion of Chriſtendom. A fair Opportunity was now offer'd him by the humble Supplications of Arch-Biſhop Langton, the Biſhops of London and Ely, That he would vouchſafe, out of his pious Compaſſion, to ſupport the Engliſh Church, then at the Point of Ruin. Upon which Pope Innocent by the Advice of his Cardinals and others, reſolv'd to diſplay his utmoſt Power, and by a ſolemn Sentence decreed, That King John ſhould be intirely depos'd from his Kingdom, and that his Holineſs ſhould provide a more worthy Perſon to ſucceed him. Accordingly he wrote to Philip King of France, requiring him To put this Sentence in Execution; promiſing him, To grant him Remiſſion of all his Sins, together with the Kingdom of England in perpetual Right, when once he had dethron'd the preſent Poſſeſſor. That he might not be wanting in any Thing, he wrote to the Potentates, Knights and Warriors of divers Nations, exciting them To ſign themſelves with the Croſs, to follow the King of France as their General in this Expedition againſt King John, and endeavour to vindicate the Injury done to the Catholick Church: Decreeing further, That whoever contributed either Mony, or other Aſſiſtance, towards the ſubduing of this contumacious King, ſhould be ſecure not only in their Goods and Perſons, but alſo alſo as to their Souls, through the Prayers of the Church; and they ſhould enjoy the ſame Privileges with thoſe who viſited the Sepulchre of our Lord. With this ample Commiſſion, the Pope ſent Pandolf his Nuntio with the Engliſh Biſhops for England; firſt giving them Inſtructions, that every Thing ſhould be punctually put in Execution, according to his Order. The Legate having ask'd him privately, What he ſhoud do, if King John repented and made Satisfaction to God and the Romiſh Church; the Pope thereupon preſcrib'd certain Conditions of Peace, to which if the King would aſſent, he might yet obtain the Favour of the Apoſtolick See.

M. Paris. The French King likewiſe receiving from the Arch-Biſhop and his Aſſociates the Apoſtolick Sentence, became very fond of that Imployment, to which his own ancient Malignity, and the Diſloyalty of the Engliſh Barons had prompted him; both which he was now willing to mask with the ſpecious Pretext of Juſtice and Devotion. Under which Colours he ſummon'd all his Dukes, Earls, Barons, Knights and Soldiers to appear at Roven upon pain of the higheſt Puniſhments; ſo that in a ſhort Time he had a mighty Army at that City, as well as a powerful Navy at the Mouth of the River Seyne. A Preparation ſo formidable could not be long hidden from King John, who meeting with an Oppoſition both domeſtick and foreign, redoubled his Care, and immediately commanded all his Officers both for Sea and Land, under the ſevereſt Penalties, to prepare both a Navy and an Army ſufficient to give a check to ſuch a powerful Invaſion. By which Means ſuch infinite Multitudes throng'd to Dover, and other Harbours, that the Commanders, for want of Proviſions, diſmiſſing the reſt, encamp'd at Barham-Downs only with ſixty thouſand ſelect and valiant Men; who, as our Author obſerves, had they been hearty and unanimous, no Prince in the World could have withſtood the King of England; ſo well appointed were his Forces by Land, and ſo well prepared were his Fleets by Sea. But the great Misfortune was, That the Clergy were incens'd againſt him by reaſon of the Interdict, and the Power he exercis'd over them; and the Laity no leſs, for his Taxes, and Arbitrary Proceedings. A. D. 1213. Reg. 14/15. who prepares to obtain it.

M. Paris. Wendov. &c. While both Shores of the Sea were overſpread with the Armies of the two great Kings, the one waiting for the Enemy, and the other for fair Winds and more Forces, Pandolf the Pope's Legate, obtaining a ſafe Conduct from King John, arriv'd at Dover to put thoſe ſecret Inſtructions in execution, which his Maſter had expreſly preſcrib'd. He there repreſented to the uneaſie King the great Miſchiefs he was to expect from that vaſt Fleet and Army the King of France had compleatly furniſh'd for the entire Conqueſt of his Kingdom; in which all the Biſhops, Clergy and others, unjuſtly baniſh'd the Land, were reſolv'd to come over; and which was ſtill more dangerous, the French King had receiv'd Charters and Aſſurances from moſt of the great Men of England, that they were ready to become his Subjects: Therefore his only Security remaining was penitently to ſubmit to the Apoſtolick See, under which Shelter, he might be ſafe from this impending Storm. Theſe Straits and Difficulties were undoubtedly very dreadful to a diſhearten'd Prince, who ſaw ſo many mortal Enemies abroad to attack him, and ſo few faithful Friends at Home to defend him; which drove him into this melancholy Apprehenſion, that his wavering Nobility would either abandon him in the Field, or betray him to the Sword of his Enemies. Thus thinking it better to yield to the Times, with an Aſſurance of his Crown and the Pope's Favour, than deſperately to hazard the Loſs of all, he reſolv'd to redeem his Safety on ſuch Conditions as Neceſſity and the Pope now laid upon him; and at length with a bleeding Heart, and a Flood of Tears, he ſubmitted to the Form of Peace as it was ready drawn up by the Pope, in which he took a ſolemn Oath, 'To obey the Commands of his Holi- 'neſs in all Things for which he had been excommunicated, and to make full 'Reſtitution, for all Things which had been taken from the Clergy or Laity 'by reaſon of the Interdict or depending Conteſt, for which he was to lay down 'eight

'eight thouſand Pounds in part; and to pardon and receive into Favour not 'only the proſcribed Biſhops, but alſo the Prior and Monks of Canterbury, and 'all other Clerks or Laicks concern'd in it. That he would confirm theſe 'Things by his Letters Patents, and cauſe as many Biſhops and Barons, as 'ſhould be choſen by the Arch-Biſhop and Biſhops, to ſwear, and give their 'Letters Patents for the Security of the Peace. And that if he, or any other 'by his Order ſhould violate this Agreement, then thoſe Biſhops or Barons, on 'behalf of the Church, ſhould adhere to the Pope's Commands againſt them, 'and that he would for ever loſe the Cuſtody of vacant Churches. Next that 'he would ſend all theſe Letters of Security, for the Performance of all, to the 'Arch-Biſhop and Biſhops before their Return into England. Finally that he 'would utterly diſclaim his Right to out-law any Clergy-Man, or any Lay-Man, 'ſo far as it related to this Matter.

As the King ſwore to obey the Commands of the Pope in all Things relating to this Conteſt, ſo he ſoon found with a more afflicting Dejection of Mind what theſe Commands were; for his Crimes were accounted ſo great againſt God and the Church, that there could be no Expiation without a Reſignation of his Crown. Accordingly two Days after, which was the Period of the Hermit's Prophecy, King John at Dover, by the Commands of the Pope preordain'd at Rome, taking off his Crown from his Head, humbly ſurrender'd it into the Pope's Hands by his Attorney Pandolf; at whoſe Feet he alſo laid his Scepter, Robe, Sword, Ring, and all the Royal Enſigns. After which he ſubſcrib'd to another Charter, Whereby he reſign'd his Kingdoms to the Pope, profeſſing he did it neither out of Fear, or Conſtraint, but of his own free Will, and in the Common Council of his Barons, as having no other Way to make Satisfaction to God and the Church for his Offence; and that thenceforward he would hold his Crown as a Feudatary of the Church of Rome paying an annual Penſion of a Thouſand Marks for both the Kingdoms of England and Ireland. And if he or any of his Succeſſors deny'd Submiſſion, without Repentance, he ſhould forfeit his Right to the Kingdom. Whereupon the King in the Preſence of all did Homage to the Pope, as his ſupreme Lord, repreſented by Pandolf, in the moſt ſubmiſſive and abject Manner; and delivering ſome Mony as an earneſt of his Subjection, the Legate proudly trod it under his Feet, to manifeſt his Maſter's Greatneſs. That theſe Things were tranſacted in the Preſence of ſome Peers, who gave no Conſent to them, appears by Henry Arch-Biſhop of Dublin, the chief Man in that Aſſembly, who both inwardly griev'd at it, and openly diſclaim'd againſt it.

Mat. Paris. &c.

He reſigns his Dominions to the Pope.

V. King John had now debas'd himſelf to a lower Degree than any King before him, which render'd him the Object of the Nation's Contempt, as well as Hatred: And while he was parting with his Crown to the Pope, King Philip was buſily preparing his Head to wear it, and his Fleets and Armies to win it. Upon which the Legate, after five Days Poſſeſſion, re-deliver'd the Crown, but not releas'd the Cenſures 'till all Conditions were perform'd, and then haſtned into France; where he immediately exhorted King Philip to disband his Forces and deſiſt from the deſign'd Expedition againſt King John, who was now an obedient and reconcil'd Son to the Church. King Philip, who like the Pope regarded John's Kingdom more than his Repentance, was highly incens'd at this Propoſal, alleging, That he had already expended more than ſixty thouſand Pounds in his Preparations, and had undertaken the Enterprize by the ſpecial Commands of his Holineſs, and for the Remiſſion of his Sins; therefore no new Cenſures ſhould deter him from his Deſigns. In which Reſolution calling a Council of his Nobles and Feudataries, all join'd with him except Ferrand Earl of Flanders, who freely declar'd That the Expedition was both unjuſt and impracticable, and that the King ought rather to think of reſtoring the tranſmarine Countries he unjuſtly detain'd, than of invading a Country to which which he had no Right at all; and therefore he abſolutely refus'd his Aſſiſtance. This occaſion'd the French King to direct the Courſe of his Arms, firſt againſt this Earl, to prevent future Inconveniencies from him; and accordingly commanded his grand Fleet to ſail towards Flanders; whilſt he by Land endeavour'd to ſubdue that Country. King John having Intelligence of his Friend's Diſtreſs, immediately ſent out his Navy under the Conduct of three brave Commanders, his natural Brother the Earl of Salisbury, the Duke of Holland, and the Earl of Bulloign; who happily ſurprizing the French Fleet at the Port of Damme, took three hundred of them loaden with Proviſions, Arms and other valuable Things, and burnt and ſunk above a hundred more; ſo that the French King was ſo greatly diſappointed, that he ſhortly after return'd to Paris.

M. Paris. King John ſwoln with this Succeſs, was now elevated with the Hopes of regaining all his loſt Countries, and the more becauſe he had the Promiſe of Aſſiſtance both from the Emperor and the Earl of Flanders; and to this End he gather'd a powerful Army to Portſmouth. But in the midſt of this hopeful Proſpect, he met with his uſual Diſappointment; for being ready to take Shipping, the great Men and Barons directly deny'd their Attendance, unleſs he was firſt abſolv'd from his Excommunication; which had been deferr'd 'till the Arrival of the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury. Upon which the King immediately ſent over an honourable Embaſſie, and Letters of ſafe Conduct to the Arch-Biſhop and the reſt of the Exiles, to return and receive Satisfaction according to the Articles with the Legate. Accordingly the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, the Biſhops of London, Ely, Lincoln and Hereford, with the other Clerks and Laicks then in Baniſhment by reaſon of the Interdict, arriv'd at Dover on the ſixteenth Day of July, and went to wait on the King at Wincheſter; who hearing of their Coming, went forth to meet them, and throwing himſelf at the Feet of the Biſhops, with a Flood of Tears beſeech'd them to have pity on him and the Kingdom of England. Upon which, ſeeing his great Humility, they lifted him from the Ground, and with Tears likewiſe led him to the Chapter-Houſe at Wincheſter, where before he was abſolv'd, he took an Oath, 'That 'he would to the utmoſt of his Power love, defend and maintain the Holy 'Church; That he would re-eſtabliſh the good Laws of his Anceſtors, eſpeci- 'ally thoſe of King Edward, and deſtroy ſuch as were wicked; That he would 'judge all his Subjects according to the juſt Judgment of his Court, and re- 'ſtore to every Man his Right. He alſo ſwore, That he would make full Sa- 'tisfaction to all concern'd in the Interdict, for what had been taken from 'them, and that before next Eaſter; or elſe his Sentence of Excommunication was to be renew'd. Moreover he ſwore Fealty and Obedience 'to Pope Inno-'cent, and his Catholick Succeſſors, as it was contain'd in his late Charter. Then the Arch-Biſhop, abſolving him, carry'd him into the Church, and there celebrated Maſs; from whence the Prelate went and din'd at the ſame Table with the King, to the general Joy and Satisfaction of the People.

King John abſolv'd from his Excommunication.

Ibid. The King now began to entertain freſh Hopes of Succeſs abroad, and accordingly repair'd again to Portſmouth in order to paſs into France; but as ill Fortune generally attended him, ſo he was again diſappointed by his great Men, Knights, and ſuch as held by Military Tenure, who complain'd That they had attended ſo long for this Expedition, that all their Mony was ſpent; and unleſs he would furniſh them out of his own Treaſury, they could not go with him. The King refuſing this, took Shipping himſelf with his private Family, and after three Days arriv'd at Jerſey, while his Lords and great Men return'd home; ſo that ſeeing himſelf deſerted, he ſail'd back to England, without any further Progreſs in this Deſign. But being highly incens'd, at his Return he rais'd a powerful Force to chaſtize them whom he accounted as Rebels to the Performance of their wonted Duty and Service; but while he was marching to reduce them, the new Arch-Biſhop ſtopp'd him at Northampton, declaring

He is diſappointed by his Nobility.

That to make War againſt any Perſon, without the Judgment of his Court, was a Violation of his late Oath. Upon which the King anſwer'd in a violent Tone That he would not lay aſide the Buſineſs of his Kingdom for one Clerk, who had nothing to do with Lay-Matters; and the next Morning march'd towards Nottingham. The Arch-Biſhop follow'd him, and threatned, That unleſs he immediately deſiſted, he would anathematize all thoſe, beſides himſelf, that took up Arms againſt any Man before the Relaxation of the Interdict; by which means he caus'd the King to give over proſecuting the Barons by Force, and by his Aſſiduity obtain'd a competent Day for them to anſwer in his Court.

Upon the twenty fifth Day of Auguſt, a Council or Synod met at London to compoſe all Differences between the King and the Barons; at which Time the Biſhops, Abbots, Deans, and ſeveral Barons, being aſſembled in St. Paul's Church, Arch-Biſhop Stephen, after an Indulgence granted to Churches to chant over their publick Prayers with a low Voice, drew ſome of the chief Men aſide, and reminded them, That when he abſolv'd the King, he caus'd him to ſwear 'That he would aboliſh all unjuſt Laws, and eſtabliſh ſuch as were good 'throughout the Kingdom: And further inform'd them, He had found a Charter of King Henry the Firſt, by which, if they thought fit, they might aſſert their ancient Liberties ſo long loſt. Then producing the Charter it ſelf, which we have already mention'd in the firſt Year of that King's Reign, he caus'd it to be read publickly before them, where it was receiv'd with great Joy and Satisfaction; and all ſwore in the Preſence of the Arch-Biſhop, That upon a convenient Opportunity, They would contend even to Death it ſelf for thoſe Liberties. On the other ſide the Arch-Biſhop promis'd them his faithful and utmoſt Aſſiſtance; and ſo the Confederacy being firmly concluded, the Conference or Parliament was diſſolved: This being the firſt League or Confederacy made by the Barons of England of the Norman Extract againſt the King, in Defence of their ancient Rights and Liberties. This was ſhortly after ſucceeded by the Death of Geoffry Fitz-Peter, Juſticiary of England, who had been the chief Stay and Support of the Kingdom; yet his Death was ſo pleaſing to his Soveraign, that upon the News of it he ſwore That now at length he was King of England, and with great Joy ſaid to ſome Lords about him, When this Man comes to Hell let him ſalute the Arch-Biſhop Hubert, whom certainly he will find there. And from this Time he took upon him a more abſolute Power of contradicting his Oaths and Contracts, and of ſetting himſelf free from the Agreement he had lately made.

M. Paris.

The Nobility ſtand up for the Privileges of the Nation.

And now finding his Nobility and others to bear hard upon him, he began to take Shelter under the Power of the See of Rome, whoſe Intereſt it was at preſent to vindicate all his Actions. To put an end to his Troubles, he was now viſited by a Legate from his Holineſs of a higher Form than Pandolf, which was Nicolas Biſhop of Tuſculum, and a Cardinal, who arriv'd at London about Michaelmaſs in a ſolemn and pompous Manner. The open and profeſs'd Deſign of his Coming was to relax the Interdict, in order to which he firſt endeavour'd to reconcile the King and Prelates upon Covenants of Reſtitution; towards which, tho' the King offer'd a hundred thouſand Marks, yet the Prelates, condemning the Legate of Partiality for approving it, choſe rather to ſuffer the whole Land to groan under the Burden of the Interdict, than to recede from any Part of their covetous Demands. This gave a fair Occaſion to the Pope's Agent to diſcover to the King the more ſecret and principal Cauſe of his Embaſſie, which was for effecting a more valid and unexceptionable Conveyance of his Kingdoms to the Roman See; for which he alledg'd, That the King could never be ſecure and eaſie, but under the powerful Protection of the Apoſtolick Wings. King John finding himſelf ſurrounded with Difficulties, and that he had created many Enemies, at length ſervily comply'd; and having a ſolemn Aſſembly in the Cathedral Church of St. Paul's, he before the great Altar,

The King ſeeks for Shelter from the Pope, tar, in the Sight of the Clergy and Laity, renew'd his infamous Subjection of the Crown and Kingdom of England, with the Lordſhip or Dominion of Ireland to the Pope; and the King's Charter, which was formerly ſeal'd with Wax, and deliver'd to Pandolf, was now ſeal'd with Gold, and deliver'd to the Legate, for the Uſe of the Pope and the Roman Church. At the ſame Time, we are told That the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury ſtept forth, and in the Name of the whole Clergy and Kingdom, boldly and ſolemnly preſented at the ſame Altar his Appeal and Proteſtation againſt that Charter, as execrable to the whole World. and confirms his Reſignation to him.

Ibid. As the Arch-Biſhop now began to ſet himſelf againſt the Intereſt of the Pope, formerly his great Benefactor, ſo the Pope eaſily found Means to revenge himſelf, by ordering his Legate to fill up all the Vacancies in the Church, contrary to his Will and Conſent. And when he made a formal Appeal to the See of Rome againſt his Legate, for not only diſpoſing of all Spiritual Dignities to ſuch as were Favourites to the King, but alſo to his own Italians, and Kinſmen, tho' abſent, unknown, inſufficient, unworthy, yea and to ſome unborn; he could meet with no Redreſs. For the Legate had before ſent Pandolf to Rome, where he did not a little blaſt the Credit of the Arch-Biſhop with the Pope, and ſo much extoll'd the King that he affirm'd, That he never heard of a more humble and modeſt Prince, ſo that he obtain'd great Favour with his Holineſs: And tho' Simon Langton, Brother to the Arch-Biſhop, was purpoſely ſent to oppoſe Pandolf, yet ſince he now brought over the King's Charters, containing the Subjection and Tribute of his Kingdoms, Simon could not be heard in what he offer'd againſt him. Pandolf alſo affirm'd, That the Arch-Biſhop and Biſhops were too rigid and covetous in their exacting Reſtitution; and that they had beyond all Equity depreſs'd the King himſelf, and the Liberties of the Kingdom. All which Allegations occaſion'd the Pope to haſten the Relaxation of the Interdict, contrary to the Deſire and Expectations of ſome Men; and the Conditions were that the King only ſhould pay forty thouſand Marks in all, and by ſeveral Portions, in lieu of all Reſtitution whatſoever. Which being agreed and eſtabliſh'd, the Legate on the twenty ninth Day of June publickly releas'd the Sentence of Interdict, after it had continu'd ſix Years, three Months, and fourteen Days. For this extraordinary Benefit Te Deum was ſolemnly ſung by the Clergy; and the whole Nation highly rejoic'd, that they were now reſtor'd to the free and publick Exerciſe of religious Duties. But as to Matters of Reſtitution, none but the rich Biſhops and ſome Abbies receiv'd any Benefit, while the poorer Monaſteries, and inferior Clergy, receiv'd no Satisfaction for all their Loſſes.

Great Abuſes from the Pope's Legate.

The Interdict, after ſix Years, is releas'd.

M. Paris. Æmilius. In the mean Time King John, having paſs'd into France, was once more trying his Fortunes in that Country; and entering Poictou, his Succeſs was ſo great, that he ſoon ſubdu'd the greateſt Part of it, which gave great Hopes that his other Provinces would follow. From whence he preſs'd with the like Victories into Bretaign; but being juſt ready to give Battel to Lewis the Dauphine, his ever faithleſs Poictovins ſuddenly forſook him, and oblig'd him to abandon his Deſign. But the greateſt Blow to his Hopes was the total Defeat of his Confederate Otho the Emperor, at the famous Battel of Bovines, where Philip ſtrucken from his Horſe by the Earl of Boloign, had there with his Life ended the Conteſt, had not a faithful Soldier cover'd him with his own Body; who thereupon recover'd his Footing, and gain'd ſuch an effectual Victory, that no Prince was for the future able to withſtand him. This melancholy News oblig'd King John to deſire a five Years Truce of the French King, by which all Things and Perſons were to remain in the ſame State as they were in at the Time of the Ratification. This being concluded, King John return'd into England on the nineteenth Day of October, after ſome Advantages gain'd: And this was the laſt Expedition that ever he made into Foreign Parts.

King John's laſt Expedition in Foreign Parts.

VII. King John, tho' he had neither retriev'd his Honour, nor recover'd his Territories, now ſeem'd to have ſurmounted thoſe Difficulties, as might have made him eaſie the reſt of his Reign; but his former Carriage had laid ſuch a Foundation for Diſcontents, that inſtead of Reſt, he ſoon found himſelf plung'd into greater Troubles and Misfortunes than ever he had felt before. For about the Time of his Return, the Earls and Barons, under a Pretence of a Pilgrimage, met at St. Edmund's Bury, where after long and private Conſultations, the Charter of King Henry I. was produc'd, which they had lately receiv'd from the Arch-Biſhop, containing, as our Author ſays, the Laws and Liberties that King Edward had granted to the Holy Engliſh Church, and the great Men of the Kingdom, with ſome other Liberties added by King Henry himſelf. Here they took a ſolemn Oath at the High Altar, That if the King refus'd to grant them their demanded Liberties, they would withdraw their Obedience, and make War upon him, 'till he ſhould by a ſeal'd Charter reconfirm them: And further they agreed to go after Chriſtmaſs and demand his Confirmation of the ſaid Liberties, and in the mean Time to provide themſelves with Horſe and Arms, that no Compulſion might be wanting, if Occaſion ſo requir'd. Accordingly at the appointed Time they repair'd to the King at London, all in very pompous military Accoutrements, where they deſir'd, That the Laws and Liberties of King Edward, with other Privileges granted to the Kingdom and Church of England, might be confirm'd, as they were contain'd in the Charters of Henry the Firſt: Further alledging, That at the Time of his Abſolution, he promis'd by his Oath to obſerve thoſe very Laws and Liberties. The King ſtartled at their Demands, and dreading their Preparations, calmly deſir'd Time 'till the Cloſe of Eaſter to return them a poſitive Anſwer, and ſo ſatisfie them for the preſent: But the better to ſecure himſelf, he immediately caus'd all Perſons to renew their Homages, and to ſwear Allegiance to him againſt all others; and further took upon him the Cruſado, that he might be more ſafe under the Protection of that Badge; but ſtill without Effect. For in Eaſter Week, the great Men met at Stanford, conſiſting of moſt of the Nobility of England, and making up a powerful Army, in which were no leſs than two thouſand Knights, beſides other Horſe and Foot, arm'd with divers Weapons; and Arch-Biſhop Langton was their principal, tho' private Adviſer. At the ſame Time the King at Oxford expected their coming thither; but hearing of their Numbers and Preparations, he ſent ſome of his chief Courtiers to know of them What Laws and Liberties they deſir'd. Upon which the Confederate Earls and Barons deliver'd them a Schedule, containing principally the ancient Cuſtoms of the Kingdom; declaring, That if the King would not immediately grant and confirm them under his Seal, they would compel him by ſeiſing his Caſtles and Poſſeſſions. Upon the ſight of theſe, the King falling into a violent Paſſion, ask'd Why the Barons did not with theſe Exactions demand his Kingdom? Declaring That they were all fooliſh and groundleſs, and with a ſolemn Oath proteſted, That he would never grant ſuch Liberties as would make himſelf a Slave.

The King rejects their Propoſals.

The Beginning of the Barons Wars.

Thus began an unhappy War, call'd the Barons War, occaſion'd by the Nobilities poſitive inſiſting, and the King's obſtinate refuſing to confirm the Laws of King Edward, and the Liberties and Privileges of other preceding Kings, as the Author of the Annals of Waverly judiciouſly obſerves. To which he adds, That thoſe Laws had been much corrupted and infring'd, during this King's Father's Reign; but chiefly in his own, who had diſpoſſeſs'd ſeveral great Men without any Judgment of their Peers, condemn'd others to cruel Deaths, and violated their Wives and Daughters, inſomuch that his tyrannical Will ſtood inſtead of a Law. The Barons having defy'd the King, and renounc'd their late Homage, choſe the Lord Fitz-Water for their General, calling him The Marſhal of the Army of God, and of the Holy Church; and immediately mediately march'd to Northampton, and beſieg'd the Caſtle fifteen Days, but without Succeſs. Upon which they rais'd the Siege, and went to Bedford Caſtle, where they were kindly receiv'd by the Maſter William Beauchamp. Here receiving ſecret Intelligence that they might now poſſeſs themſelves of the City of London, they immediately march'd to Ware, and on the twenty fourth Day of May, early in the Morning enter'd the City at Algate, by the Favour of ſome of the rich Citizens. Having obtain'd this great Advantage, they beſieg'd the Tower, and by their threatning Letters to all Oppoſers ſoon caus'd a very great Defection, in all Parts both among the Commonalty as well as the Gentry. The King for a while kept himſelf upon the Defenſive, but now ſeeing himſelf deſerted, and fearing they would ſeize his Caſtles, he ſent the Earl of Pembroke and other faithful Meſſengers to them, to let them know he would grant them the Laws and Liberties they deſir'd, allowing them to appoint a Day and a Place to meet and conclude this Affair. This is ſuppos'd to have been a deceitful Meſſage on the King's Part, yet the Barons were tranſported with it, and joyfully appointed the King to meet him on the fifteenth Day of June, in a Meadow between Staines and Windſor call'd Runnemede; which ſignifies the Mead of Council, becauſe from ancient Times Treaties for the Peace of the Kingdom had been often held there.

The King complies.

M. Paris, &c. In this Place the King appear'd with the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, and other Biſhops, with ſome few Lords; but on the Barons Side the Nobility were not eaſily to be number'd: So that the King finding himſelf much over-power'd, without any ſeeming Difficulty granted them the Laws and Liberties in two Charters, becauſe being ſo many, they could not be contain'd in one Schedule. The firſt and chief is call'd Charta Communium Libertatum, or Magna Charta, the Charter of Liberty or the Great Charter; and the ſecond Charta Foreſta, the Charter of the Liberties of the Foreſt. In the great Charter, among other Matters it was decreed, 'That the Common Pleas ſhould not follow the Court, 'but ſhould be fix'd in one certain Place: That Itinerant Juſtices ſhould be ſent 'through every County once a Year, to hold Aſſizes in each County; together 'with the Knights of the reſpective Diviſions; and ſuch Things as they could 'not determine in the proper Counties, ſhould be determin'd in ſome other 'Place in their Circuit; and if any Difficulty aroſe, ſo as they could not deter-'mine it, it ſhould be referr'd to the Juſtices of the King's Bench. That Earls 'and Barons ſhould not be amerc'd but by their Peers: That no Tax ſhould be 'rais'd without the Conſent of the Parliament, excepting only for the Redemp-'tion of the King's Perſon, if Neceſſity requir'd it, or for Knighting his eldeſt 'Son, or for the Marriage of his eldeſt Daughter: In either of which three Ca-'ſes he might levy a moderate Tax by his own Authority. If on other Occa-'ſions he wanted a Subſidy, the Arch-Biſhops, Biſhops, Abbots, Earls, and 'greater Barons ſhould be ſummon'd ſingly by different Writs; and all others 'in general who held of the King in Capite, ſhould be ſummon'd by the She-'riffs and Bailiffs, to meet at a certain Day and Place; and that the Summons 'ſhould be iſſu'd out forty Days at leaſt before the Time of Meeting; and in the 'Writ of Summons, the Cauſe of their being ſummon'd ſhould be ſpecify'd. 'And becauſe not only the King, but his great Men uſually tax'd their Sub-'jects at Pleaſure, it was alſo provided, that no Perſon whatſoever ſhould tax 'his free Tenants, except only in the three fore-mention'd Caſes. The King not only ſign'd this Charter, but ſwore to it; and by the Charter it ſelf twenty five Barons were appointed to be choſen by the whole Baronage, to take care upon Oath to ſee it well obſerv'd. To any four of which all Perſons might complain of any Breach of it, and they were to admoniſh the King of it; and if the Grievance were not redreſs'd within forty Days after, then thoſe four Barons were to refer the Matter to the whole Body: For whom it was lawful, together with the Commons of the Land, to take Poſſeſſion of the King's Caſtles and Poſſeſſions, and to oppreſs him all manner of Ways, ſaving only his own Perſon, Magna Charta, &c. confirm'd by the King.

Twenty five Perſons appointed for Security.

Perſon, and the Perſons of his Queen and Children, 'till according to their Will the Grievance was redreſs'd: And all Perſons on ſuch an Occaſion were allow'd to take an Oath of Fidelity to the Barons. And to confirm all, the King ſent his Letters Patents to all the Sheriffs of England, commanding them to oblige Perſons of all Conditions within their Interdictions to ſwear, That they would obſerve theſe Laws, and, if Need requires, to compel the King alſo to obſerve them.

All Things now ſeem'd to be in a quiet and ſetled Condition, and all Men rejoic'd, hoping that God had touch'd the King's Heart, and that England ſhould now be freed from the Servitude which had ſo long afflicted it: But all theſe Affairs in a ſhort Time prov'd contrary to Expectation; for the King's mercenary Soldiers, deſiring War more than Peace, were by their Leaders continually whiſpering in his Ears, That he was now no longer a King, but the Scorn of other Princes; and that it was more elegible to be no King, than ſuch a one as he. By daily adding freſh Fewel to the Flame, the King at length quite alienated his Affection from his own natural Subjects, and confided wholly in Theſe; ſo that in a little Time he became very reſerv'd and melancholy, often walking alone, and giving divers Signs of inward Rage and Diſcontent. Then giving Orders to the Governors of his Caſtles to fortifie, Man and victual them, he privately retir'd to the Iſle of Wight, where he began to pull off his Mask, and reſolv'd both by the Spiritual as well as Temporal Sword, to free himſelf from his Obligations. To begin with the former, he ſent Pandolf with others to the Pope, that he might by his Apoſtolick Authority make void what the Barons had done, and fruſtrate all their Deſigns; and for the latter, he ſent ſome Biſhops and Noblemen to all the neighbouring Nations, to procure foreign Aſſiſtance, promiſing large Poſſeſſions and Sums of Mony to ſuch as would arm themſelves in his Cauſe; and if it were needful, they might make Deeds of Gift to ſuch as were willing to come, for the greater Security of their military Stipends. For near three Months the King continu'd privately in the Iſland, without any Court or Regal Appearance, ſometimes plying about the Sea-Coaſts, and converſing only with Seamen; which gave Occaſion for ſtrange and various Reports, as that he was turn'd a Fiſherman, ſometimes a Merchant, and other Times a Pirate; tho' he only waited for the Return of his Meſſengers from Rome, and the Arrival of his mercenary Forces.

M. Paris. &c.

The King relapſes, and retires to the Iſle of Wight.

At Rome he met with what Succeſs he could deſire, where all the Tranſactions with the Barons were fully repreſented to the Pope, and the Charter of Liberties ſhown him in writing: Which when he had carefully perus'd, he with a furious Look cry'd out, What! do the Barons of England endeavour to dethrone a King, who has taken upon him the Holy Croſs, and is under the Protection of the Apoſtolick See; and would they force him to transfer the Dominions of the Roman Church to Others? By St. Peter, this Injury muſt not paſs unpuniſh'd. Then debating the Matter with the Cardinals, he by a definitive Sentence damn'd and caſſated for ever the Charter of Liberties, and ſent the King a Bull containing that Sentence at large. As the King was ſucceſsful at Rome, ſo he met with fair Proſpects from his Foreign Aſſiſtance, conſiſting of very numerous Troops drawn from Poictou, Gaſcony, Brabant, Flanders and other Parts; all deſperate Adventurers, whoſe miſerable Fortunes at home, eaſily drew them to any Miſchiefs abroad. Theſe were to be rewarded with large Poſſeſſions in England, if they ſucceeded againſt the King's Subjects; and had not Hugh de Boves, at his ſetting forth from Calice with forty Thouſand Men, Women and Children, been by a ſudden Tempeſt all drown'd in the Sea, King John had made an univerſal Conqueſt of his own Kingdom, far more miſerable than that by the Normans.

Magna Charta condemn'd by the Pope.

However with theſe Forces he began the Siege of Rocheſter Caſtle, which held out ſo long, that when he took it, he would have hang'd all the Men in it, had not Savery de Malleon diſſuaded him from ſuch a cruel Attempt. After which which he began to meet with greater Succeſs; for dividing his great Army into two Parts, with the one he march'd Northwards, where he victoriouſly ſubdu'd all Places, while the Earl of Salisbury with the other Foreigners did the ſame Southwards. At which Time all Things were in a deplorable State; and in the greateſt Confuſion; Fathers ſet againſt their Sons, Brother againſt Brother, Kinſmen and Allies againſt their neareſt Friends, attacking, ſurprizing, purſuing, burning, ravaging, tormenting and murdering; all the Kingdom by the Combuſtion of ſo univerſal a War, becoming like a general Shambles, or Place of infernal Deſolation. And now it appear'd ſtrange that thoſe Barons, and their adhering Impugners of the King, whoſe Pretext formerly was, that they durſt not obey the King becauſe of the Papal Curſe, being now themſelves by vertue of the ſame commanded to obey and aſſiſt him, could without any Scruple contemn both it and him, pretending it concern'd them not, becauſe not particularly nam'd. And the Arch-Biſhop himſelf, who had made the World believe, that the Pope's Cenſure, and his own too, were ſufficient to deprive the King of all Soveraign Command, now being in Name, and under the ſame Penalty, requir'd by the Pope to denounce the ſame againſt the King's Oppoſers, he without any regard to it told the Meſſengers, He would not do it for any Cauſe whatſoever, 'till he had conferr'd with his Holineſs in Perſon. For which Contempt, Pandolf and the Biſhop of Wincheſter, ſolemnly denouncing the Curſe themſelves againſt the Barons, did likewiſe ſuſpend him from all Epiſcopal Authority. Shortly after the Arch-Biſhop was oblig'd to appear at Rome in a grand Council, where the Pope excommunicated all, either French or Engliſh, who oppos'd King John; and here he was accus'd and convict of Treaſon againſt the King, and of Contempt againſt the Pope and Church's Cenſures. For which the Pope fully reſolving to depoſe him from his See and Dignity, by the Cardinals earneſt Interceſſion for him, he was intreated to uſe him ſomewhat milder; but yet by a publick Sentence he confirm'd his Suſpenſion, and commanded by his Letters all Suffragan Biſhops to withdraw their Obedience from him. And for a further Revenge, whereas Simon Langton, his Brother, had by his Procurement been elected into the See of York, the Pope not only vacated his Election, and made him incapable of any Epiſcopal Dignity, but alſo plac'd in that See Walter Gray, a true Friend to King John, and a profeſs'd Enemy to the Family of the Langtons.

The Pope joins with him.

M. Paris. Caxtonſhal. To ſecure the Roman Power, not long after the Pope proceeded to excommunicate all the diſloyal Barons by Name, and interdicted all their Lands, together with the City of London, where they had their chief Reſidence: Which tho' it gave a dangerous Blow to their Faction, yet ſtill ſtanding upon their Guard at London, they ſo little regarded theſe Cenſures, that they decreed That neither themſelves nor the Citizens ſhould obſerve them, nor the Prelates denounce them, alledging That they were obtain'd by falſe Suggeſtions, and therefore not valid; That it did not belong to the Pope to direct and govern in Lay-Matters, ſince St. Peter only receiv'd an Eccleſiaſtical Power from our Saviour: Why therefore ſhould they be govern'd by the Avarice and Ambition of the Roman Biſhops? Who are rather the Succeſſors of Conſtantine; without reſembling St. Peter either in their Piety or Authority. While they were thus complaining, and daily declining, King John rang'd through all Parts with his cruel Mercenaries, who, as M. Paris aſſures us, ſpar'd neither Age nor Sex, ſuffering none to eſcape their Barbarities: And he further relates, That they took Prieſts from the very Altar, with the conſecrated Hoſts in their Hands, and then wounded, tortur'd and robb'd them; and that to extort Mony from Perſons of all Conditions, they hang'd ſome by the Privities, others by the Legs and Feet, ſome by their Arms, Hands or Thumbs, injecting Salt and Vinegar into their Eyes; and others they laid upon Trivets and Grid-irons over burning Coals, and then put their parch'd Bodies under Ice to cool them: So that now all Commerce ceas'd, and no Markets were held but in Cœmitaries and Church-Yards.

A. D. 1216. Reg. 17 18.

Great Cruelties by the King's Army of Mercenaries.

The

The Barons finding their Eſtates given to Strangers, their Wives and Daughters violated, and their Fortunes ruin'd, began now to curſe the Pope, who had formerly moſt ſhamefully encourag'd them to withſtand their Soveraign; and to recover all, they reſolv'd upon a deſperate Project, agreeable to their former Actions, which was to deliver the Kingdom of England into the Hands of Lewis the Dauphine of France. Accordingly they ſent ſome of their chief Friends to France with their Letters of Allegiance, to implore King Philip's Favour for ſending his Son, and his Son's, for the Acceptance of the Crown; and upon the Delivery of twenty five Engliſh Hoſtages, they receiv'd a preſent Supply of French Soldiers, with the Promiſe of the ſpeedy Arrival of their new Soveraign. The Pope having Intelligence of the Deſigns of the French King, immediately ſent his Legate Cardinal Wallo with his Apoſtolick Commands to King Philip to prevent his Son from entring St. Peter's Patrimony, denouncing the great Curſe againſt all Men combining with the excommunicated Barons. To which Philip return'd anſwer, That England was no Patrimony of St. Peter's, for John having been convict of Treaſon againſt his Brother Richard, was never a lawful King; or if he were ſuch, he now ſtood condemn'd for the Death of his Nephew Arthur: That no King could diſpoſe of his Kingdom without the Aſſent of the Barons, who are bound to defend it; and if the Pope would inſiſt upon this Error, it would prove a pernicious Example to all Civil States. Then all the great Men of France unanimouſly declar'd, They would maintain this Point even to Death, That no King or Potentate, by his ſingle Authority, had power to give away, or transfer his Kingdom, and thereby enſlave his Nobility. At the ſame Time Lewis begg'd of his Father, Not to hinder him of that which he had not given him, and for which he was reſolv'd to ſpend his Blood; and would ſooner chuſe Excommunication, than falſifie his Promiſe to the Engliſh Barons.

The Barons ſend for the Dauphine of France

The Pope oppoſes the Deſign in vain.

M. Paris. &c.

With this ſlender Reſpect and Scorn to his Holineſs, the Legate ſeeing ſuch ſtern Looks, and fearing ſome Miſchief retir'd in haſte; and Lewis as ſpeedily ſet forwards for England, with his Fleet of ſix hundred Ships and eighty Boats, with which arriving firſt at the Iſle of Thanet, and afterwards at Sandwich, the Barons came thither and join'd with him. Whereupon thinking it Wiſdom firſt to arm himſelf againſt Spiritual Weapons, he immediately wrot a plauſible Letter to Alexander Abbot of Canterbury, who was to denounce the Pope's Curſe againſt him, 'in which he laid before him his Title to the Crown which 'John had forfeited; Firſt by Treaſon in King Richard's Reign; Secondly be-'cauſe his attaining the Crown was by pure Election: Thirdly becauſe he was 'ſolemnly condemn'd by the French Peers for the Death of Duke Arthur: 'Fourthly for violating his Oath in enthralling the Kingdom to the Pope, in 'wronging the Clergy, and oppreſſing the Laity. That therefore the Right was 'devolv'd to Lewis the Dauphine; Firſt by Inheritance of his Wife, who was 'Niece to King John, and Secondly by the Election of the Nobility. Theſe ſpecious Pretences had no Effect upon Alexander, who forthwith denounc'd the Sentence of Excommunication againſt Lewis and his mighty Army, and cloſely adhered to his Soveraign, notwithſtanding all the Threats and Promiſes us'd by Lewis to win him to his Side.

His Pretenſions.

In the mean Time King John lay at Dover with his Army, which conſiſting of Strangers, he durſt not attempt to hinder the Landing of the French, leſt his Men ſhould deſert to Lewis; from whence he went to Guilford, and ſo on to Wincheſter; whilſt Lewis himſelf, finding no Army to oppoſe him, in a ſhort Time ſubdu'd Rocheſter, and all the Country, except Dover Caſtle. Then coming up to London, he was met by the Barons with all the outward Demonſtrations of Joy and Triumph, receiving at the ſame Time Homages from them and the Citizens; and he likewiſe ſwore upon the Holy Evangeliſts That he would reſtore to all of them all good Laws, and their loſt Inheritances. At the ſame Time he made Simon Langton his Chancellor, who being inrag'd at the the Pope's hindering him of the Archbiſhoprick of York, did now perſuade Prince Lewis with all the Barons and Citizens to be preſent at Divine Service, notwithſtanding the Interdict, and Wallo's excommunicating both Lewis and him by Name: So that when once the Clergy and People became unanimous, the Pope's Cenſures were of little or no Effect. Lewis's Homagers daily increaſing, he left London, and in no long Time made himſelf Maſter of moſt of Kent, Suſſex and Hampſhire, with almoſt all the Southern Parts of England; but not without Reſiſtance in ſeveral Places: Particularly at Odiam Caſtle, where but thirteen Engliſh Men, not only oppos'd Lewis and his whole Army for fifteen Days, but alſo ſallying out took every Man his Priſoner, and at length with great Admiration of the French, and honourable Conditions ſurrender'd the Caſtle. In the Time of theſe Hoſtilities Alexander King of the Scots came to wait upon Lewis at Dover, and did him Homage for the Lands he held in England; and on the other Side He, as well as the Barons, ſwore, That they would never make Peace with King John, without the King of the Scots Conſent. Dover, with a few other Caſtles only now ſtood out; where while Lewis us'd incredible Toil and Expence in a furious but ineffectual Siege, and his Confederates were employ'd in the ſame manner at Windſor; King John and his mighty Army, breaking forth with a ſudden Violence, like a furious Tempeſt over-run many Counties, to the Ruin and Deſtruction of the Barons Caſtles, Houſes, Lands and Poſſeſſions in all Parts. and is very ſucceſsful.

M. Paris. Wendov. The Barons were now under great Troubles and Afflictions, to ſee their native Country by their own Wilfulneſs thus horribly ravag'd, and their Goods and Eſtates plunder'd and ruin'd by the King's Forces; and what added to their Grief was to find that their faithful Services, in this their faithleſs Adherence, not ſo reſpected by Lewis, as he and their own vain Hopes had promis'd them, whilſt he conferr'd upon his own French Men only all thoſe Territories and Caſtles he conquer'd. But their greateſt Affliction was what they accidentally learnt from the Viſcount de Melun, a French Nobleman, who being in his laſt Sickneſs at London, generouſly ſent to thoſe Barons that were there for the Security of the City, and declar'd to them That he was extreamly griev'd for the impending Ruin that was falling upon them, of which they had no Knowledge; Particularly That Prince Lewis with ſixteen Earls and Barons of France had ſworn, That when he had conquer'd England, and was crown'd, he would for ever baniſh all Thoſe who fought for him againſt King John, as Traitors to the Realm, and deſtroy their Poſterity; and that they might not doubt the Truth of it, he affirm'd it upon the Word of a dying Man, and as he hop'd for Salvation, that he was one of theſe who had taken that Oath; yet he deſir'd them to be ſecret, and provide for their Safety as well as they could; preſently after which he expired. This being whiſper'd among the Nobility, prov'd a terrible Alarm to them, both as to their Security and their Conſciences; eſpecially when they found themſelves thus ſtigmatiz'd with the odious Character of Traitors by a foreign Prince, and under the Sentence of Excommunication from the Apoſtolick Authority. Some of theſe reflecting upon their miſerable Condition, thought of returning to their old Obedience; but others were afraid they had ſo highly provok'd the King, that he would never accept of their Return; yet no leſs than forty of the Barons took a Reſolution to quit Prince Lewis, and ſent their humble Submiſſion of Obedience to him a little before his Death. Several of the Barons relent.

M. Paris. &c. In the mean Time the unfortunate King kept himſelf in perpetual Motion and Action, ſometimes in the Weſt, and other Times in the Eaſt and North; whilſt Lyn in Norfolk ſerv'd as a Place of Retreat or Defence for all the King's Friends in thoſe Parts, and there he alſo ſecur'd his Treaſure, Crown, and all his portable Regalia. After many Motions and Traverſes, eſpecially in Lincolnſhire, in October he arriv'd at Lyn, where he was receiv'd with great Joy and many Preſents; in return of which he granted the Town large Immunities, and a Mayor, and gave his own Sword to be carry'd before him, with a Silver Cup gilt, which are ſtill to be ſeen. Shortly after the King paſſing from thence to Lincolnſhire, and marching over the great Marſh between Norfolk and that County, he and his whole Army were in Danger of being loſt by the Quick-ſands and Flowing in of the Tide; but all his Wagons, Carts, Sumpter Horſes, with their Lading, and all his Treaſure, precious Veſſels, ſacred Relicks, and his Regalia were ſwallow'd up in the Mouth of the River Welland; which M. Paris Hyperbolically deſcribes by the Earth opening in the midſt of the Floods, and plunging them into the Abyſs. The King got ſafe that Night to Swines-head Abby, and there lodg'd; but through exceſſive Grief for the Loſs of his Carriages and Treaſure, he fell into a Feaver, which he heighten'd by eating Peaches, and drinking new Ale or Bracket. The next Morning he remov'd from thence, but not being able to ride, he was carry'd in a Litter to Sleaford Caſtle; from whence he proceeded in the like Manner as far as Newark, where finding his Feaver increaſing, and a Flux beginning, he by his Teſtament appointed Henry his eldeſt Son, then a Child, to ſucceed him, devoutly confeſs'd his Sins, forgave his Enemies, and receiv'd the Euchariſt; and after three Days Continuance in that Place, he dy'd on the eighteenth of October, and fifty firſt Year of his Age, after a troubleſome and unfortunate Reign of ſeventeen Years, ſeven Months and thirteen Days. His Body, according to his Order, was bury'd in the Cathedral Church at Worceſter, but with little Funeral Pomp; and his Tomb, with his Image upon it, is ſtill to be ſeen in the Choir of that Church.

The King loſes his Baggage in the Sea.

He dies with Grief.

This is the moſt authentick Account of the Death of this unfortunate Prince; but as to the vulgar Story of his being poiſon'd by a Monk in Swines-head Abby, that is no where mention'd by the ancient Writers, and ſo differently by thoſe more modern, and with ſuch improbable Circumſtances, that we cannot think it worthy to trouble the Reader with it. His chief Misfortunes were the natural Puniſhments of his Crimes, particularly his Ingratitude and Treaſon againſt his Father, and his treacherous as well as traiterous Practices againſt his Brother, which purſu'd him ſo cloſe, that he was not only chaſtis'd by diſloyal Subjects, and an ambitious Pope, but alſo loſt more Territories in a few Years than all his Succeſſors ever did in thrice that Space of Time. He indeed met with extraordinary Hardſhips, both from abroad and at home; and theſe often put him upon exorbitant and illegal Practices, which ſtill added to his own and the Nation's Misfortunes. Yet if he had met with a leſs uſurping Pope, a leſs potent King, and a leſs turbulent Nobility to have manag'd, and alſo leſs envenom'd Writers to have tranſmitted his Story, he might have made a Figure of no ſmall Renown in the World. His Nature and Fortune did never well agree; for he naturally lov'd Eaſe, yet his Fortune was ever to be in Action: He was faithleſs, cruel and violent; neither fit for Proſperity nor Adverſity, for the one made him inſolent and the other dejected; ſo that a middle Fortune would have beſt ſuited with his Temper. He was extreamly greedy of Mony, which tho' it was got with great Noiſe, was uſually ſpent in Silence; and was very intemperate in his Pleaſures, in his Luſts exceeding his Father, and not ſparing the Wives of the greateſt Noblemen. He was extreamly variable, ſometimes very religious, as appears by his founding ſeveral Monaſteries, and other Acts of Devotion; and at other Times ſcarce a Chriſtian, as appears from ſo many profane Sayings related of him. And indeed the Monks have blacken'd his Memory with ſeveral ſtrange Stories; as that he counterfeited the Biſhop's Seals, and writ abroad That all Engliſhmen were become Infidels and Apoſtates, and therefore ſuch ſhould come to ſubdue them, and take their Poſſeſſions; and at another Time That he offer'd his Kingdom to a Mooriſh King, and promis'd to embrace the Mahometan Religion: Of which theſe and ſeveral others are juſtly ſuſpected by all judicious Writers.

His Character.

This

This King by his great and arbitrary Taxes was a ſevere Oppreſſor, yet in ſeveral Reſpects he was no bad Governor: For he was the firſt or chiefeſt who appointed thoſe excellent Forms of Civil Government in London, and moſt Cities and Incorporate Towns in England, and endow'd them with the greateſt Immunities; the Firſt who caus'd Sterling Mony to be here coin'd; the Firſt who ordain'd the honourable Ceremonies in the Creation of Earls; the Firſt who ſetled the Rates and Meaſures for Wine, Bread, Cloth, and ſuch like Neceſſaries; the Firſt who gave to the Cinque Ports the Privileges and Cuſtoms they now enjoy; and the Firſt who planted Engliſh Laws and Officers in Ireland, enlarging the Royal Stile with Lord of that Country, making by this ſome Amends for his Loſſes in France. In this Reign we find the Prices of ſeveral Commodites; particularly that Wheat at the higheſt was once ſix Shillings the Quarter, and eighteen Pence at the loweſt Rate. The Price of Wines was once fix'd thus; Rochell Wine at twenty Shillings the Tun, the Wine of Anjou at twenty four Shillings the Tun; and no other French Wines at above twenty five Shillings the Tun, unleſs it was ſome of extraordinary Goodneſs, which might be ſold at twenty ſix Shillings and eight Pence the Tun.

SECT. IV.

The Reign of King HENRY the Third.

Containing 56 Years, 1 Month, and 4 Days.

M. Paris. &c.

I. THE unexpected Deceaſe of King John prov'd of ſingular Advantage to young Prince Henry his Son, to whom the Affections of moſt of the Nobility, Clergy and People were inclin'd, both upon the Account of the dying Words of the Viſcount Melun, and alſo the preſent Inſolence of the French. Therefore as ſoon as the Earls, Biſhops and Barons, who remain'd firm to the late King, could conveniently meet, they all at the Summons of the Earl-Marſhal aſſembled at Gloceſter, whither the Earl brought Prince Henry, then not ten Years of Age; and having plac'd him in the midſt, he made a Speech to the Aſſembly, beginning with Behold our King! and after a ſhort Pauſe thus proceeded, Altho' we have perſecuted the Father of this Child, and that perhaps juſtly, for his male Adminiſtration, yet ſince his Son is innocent of his Father's Crimes, and ſince, according to the Scriptures, 'the 'Son ought not to bear the Iniquity of the Father, we muſt have pity upon the tender Years of this innocent Prince. And foraſmuch as he is the King's eldeſt Son, and ought to be our Lord and Succeſſor in the Kingdom, let us unanimouſly appoint him our King and Governor; and expel Lewis and his Followers, and ſo take away the Reproach of our Nation by breaking the Yoke of that unjuſt Servitude. This Propoſal was at firſt oppos'd by the Earl of Gloceſter, but in a ſhort Time all agreed as if they had been divinely inſpir'd, crying, Let him, let him be made King! and immediately appointed the Feaſt of St. Simon and Jude for his Coronation. At which Time, being eight Days after King John's Death, Wallo the Pope's Legate, ſeveral Earls, Biſhops, Barons, Abbots and Priors, with a great Multitude of others, aſſembled at Gloceſter to advance Prince Henry to the Crown of England; tho' he was not the neareſt Heir, for Eleanor, Siſter to Arthur Duke of Bretaign, was ſtill alive, but kept cloſe Priſoner in the Caſtle of Briſtol. All Things being ready for the Solemnity, Wallo with the reſt brought him in Proceſſion into the Cathedral Church, and placing him before the high Altar, laying his Hands upon the Holy Young Henry crown'd at Gloceſter.

Holy Goſpels and Relicks of Saints, he ſwore this ſolemn Oath, 'That he 'would honour God, and yield Peace and Reverence to the Holy Church, and 'all its Clerks, all the Days of his Life; That he would adminiſter true Ju-'ſtice to the People; That he would aboliſh all bad Laws and ill Cuſtoms, if 'any were in the Kingdom, and would obſerve, and cauſe to be obſerv'd all ſuch 'as were good. Then being over-aw'd he did Homage to the Church of Rome, and to Pope Innocent, for the Kingdoms of England and Ireland, and faithfully engag'd to pay the thouſand Marks yearly to the See of Rome, which his Father King John had granted to it. After which the two Biſhops of Wincheſter and Bath, anointed and crown'd him King, with the uſual Solemnities; only for want of a Crown, which King John had loſt in the Sea, he was crown'd with a plain Circle, or Chaplet of Gold.

The Speedineſs of this Royal Ceremony was not greater than the Neceſſities of the State requir'd; for his Enemy Prince Lewis had ſtill London at his Devotion, and many potent Earls, Barons, and valiant Male-contents, ſubject to his Command, who had taken a ſolemn Oath Never to acknowledge any of the Sons of the late King John. The young King on the other Side was ſurrounded with many Difficulties, as want of Years, want of Mony, and many others; to prevent which the great Earl-Marſhal of Pembroke was by the unanimous Conſent of Prelates and Peers made Guardian of the King's Perſon, and Vice-Governor of the Kingdom. Upon which, Letters were iſſu'd out in the King's Name to all ſuch as had Command in the Republick, with many Promiſes of Reward and Favour, which in moſt Places were obey'd; the Prejudices againſt the late King being in a great Meaſure bury'd with him in the Grave: And they were much incourag'd when they ſaw that Prince Lewis and all his Party were every Sunday and Holy-Day declar'd Excommunicated by the Pope's Legate. Prince Lewis, who had beſieg'd the valiant Hubert de Burgo in Dover Caſtle, perceiving that King John's Death was no ways advantagious to him, rais'd the Siege, and enter'd London, where he might beſt provide for his declining Condition. Having the Tower deliver'd into his Hands, he remov'd and inveſted Hertford Caſtle, which after the Slaughter of many of the French, ſurrender'd upon honourable Terms. Robert Fitz-Water claim'd the Cuſtody of this Place, as belonging to him by ancient Right; upon which the Frenchmen declar'd, That thoſe Engliſh were never to be truſted, who had been Traitors to their own Maſter; yet Prince Lewis gave him a dilatory Promiſe, That when he had totally ſubdu'd the Kingdom, every Man ſhould have his Rights reſtor'd. The Caſtle of Berkhamſted, under Waleran a German Commander, deſpairing of Relief, was likewiſe ſurrender'd, which like other Places was fill'd with a French Garriſon; which rais'd great Jealouſies, and much weaken'd the Affections of thoſe who had invited him into the Nation. His next March was to St. Albans, where he requir'd the Abbot to do him Homage, which he abſolutely refus'd, Unleſs he was firſt releas'd from the Homage to King Henry; which Anſwer inraging the Prince, the Abbot was conſtrain'd to compound for eighty Marks of Silver, to ſpare the noble Monaſtery and Town, 'till Candlemaſs next.

The Dauphine's Endeavours.

A. D. 1217. Reg. 1/2. But theſe inteſtine Cauſes, for which the Barons had call'd in Lewis, failing by the Death of King John, and the Inſolence and Vanity of the French occaſioning new Reaſons of Averſion, were all ſtrong Motives to diſpoſe the Minds of the Engliſh to return to due Obedience; yet finding themſelves bound in Honour, not to leave him to the Mercy of King Henry, when upon their Oaths and Hoſtages he had thrown himſelf upon them, they now deſir'd his Abſence, but not his Deſtruction. The better to effect their Deſigns, a Ceſſation from Hoſtilities was propounded and concluded between the King and Prince Lewis; to which the latter readily inclin'd, becauſe he had Intelligence from Rome that the Curſe which Wallo had denounc'd againſt him, would ſhortly be confirm'd by the Pope, unleſs he ſpeedily left England. As this Truce gave Lewis liberty to fail back to France for new Supplies from his Father, who much desir'd to confer with him; so his Absence gave Opportunity to the English to consult more freely concerning their Safety; that from that Time, Lewis was never so deep in their Affections, and immediately lost many Lords and others, who again shew'd themselves true Englishmen.

M. Paris. W. Covent. Prince Lewis upon his speedy Return out of France, resolving to make as speedy a Dispatch, sent out of London his Army of more than twenty thousand Men, designing not only to relieve Mont-Sorrel in Leicestershire, besieg'd by the King's Forces, but also to subdue the adjacent Country. The March of his Army, which after the Relief of Mont-Sorrel went as far as Lincoln, was very odious and grievous to the Country, consisting of the Scum and vilest of the French, who wanting Cloaths for themselves, caus'd many to go naked to supply their Wants, and put others to cruel Tortures to force them to excessive Ransoms. The Earl of Pembroke, Governor of the King, by the Advice of Wallo and the Bishop of Wincheſter, resolving to put the Cause upon God and the Fortune of the Field, repair'd with his Charge to Newark, where the general Assembly for that Service was appointed. The whole Army rested there for some Days, which they spent in Devotions and receiving the Eucharist, humbling themselves before the offended Majesty of Heav'n; and all being prepar'd, now resolv'd either to return victorious, or to die in Defence of their Country, their Soveraign's Rights, and their own Liberties, all which seem'd to lye at stake. To give them the greater Spirit and Vigor, Wallo with extraordinary Solemnity execrated Lewis and all his Coadjutors; and thus the Army march'd towards Lincoln, where Lewis's Forces had besieg'd the Castle; but the King himself was left eight Miles from the City, at Stow, with Wallo and a strong Guard, there without peril of his Person to attend God's Pleasure in the Event of this Action.

The Dauphine's Army does much Damage.

M. Paris. Upon their Approach, if the Advice of some had been follow'd, the French Army had issu'd out of the City, and given them Battel in the open Field; but the French General, the Earl of Perch, thinking the King's Army to be greater than it was, by reason the Ensigns were doubled, and so much added to the Appearance, oppos'd that Design, shut up the City Gates, and us'd his utmost Endeavours to gain the Castle. Upon which the Governor of the Castle let in Faukes de Brent, with a considerable Force through a Postern Gate; while the Earl of Pembroke with the rest of the Army storm'd the City in another Place, where couragiously entring, those in the Castle sally'd out upon the Flank of the Enemy, and together with the other with great Slaughter dispers'd and defeated the French Party. The Earl of Perch being surrounded with the Royalists, and refusing to take Quarter of any English Traitor, as he call'd them, was slain, with many other of his Countrymen. In this Conflict the Force of natural Propension was very apparent; for notwithstanding the fierce Resolutions of the King's Soldiers, when they saw the Faces of their Kinsmen, Friends and Countrymen on the other Side, they began to relent, and most of their Revenge fell upon the Horses, and not the Riders, whom they only endeavour'd to take Prisoners. The Pursuit was but coldly follow'd upon the flying Barons, otherwise scarce a Man could have escap'd; in which notwithstanding the chiefest Barons were taken Prisoners, with about four hundred Knights, besides Esquires and ordinary Soldiers, and a vast Number of the Townsmen. Such as escap'd the Fight were not past Danger; for the Country People set upon them as they fled, and kill'd great Numbers, so that almost all the Footmen were destroy'd before they could reach to London. The whole Riches of the vanquish'd Army, and of the whole City of Lincoln became the Booty and Spoil of the King's Soldiers, so that this Victory was afterwards call'd by the Name of Lewis-Fair; and because the Clergy were excommunicated, the Pope's Legate order'd them not to spare the Churches, nor the Cathedral it self; the vast Riches belonging to which may be conceiv'd by that of the Precentor, who complain'd that he had lost eleven thousand Marks for his share. The

The Marſhal of France, the Caſtellan of Arras, and about two hundred Knights got ſafe into London, but were but coldly receiv'd by Prince Lewis, who charg'd upon their Cowardice the Loſs of all the reſt. The Fear of being taken Priſoner juſtly encreaſing, he us'd all Means to fortifie London, and diſpatch'd Meſſengers into France for more Succours and Supplies; while the vigilant Earl of Pembroke endeavour'd to ſtraiten him as much as poſſible. In the mean Time, by the Diligence of the Lady Blanch, Wife to Prince Lewis, Euſtace, who from a traiterous Monk became a Demoniack, was now got to Sea with a large Supply both of Men and Ammunition bound for London; but Heav'n was no better pleas'd with theſe, than with the other Mercenaries at Lincoln. For the Engliſh Navy gaining the Wind of the French, ſunk ſeveral of their Ships by running forceably againſt them with the Iron Brows or Beaks of their Gallies; uſing at the ſame Time unſlak'd Lime in Duſt or Powder, which being thrown on their Enemies Faces, perfectly blinded 'em. Thus were Lewis's Hopes for any preſent Succours abſolutely defeated; nor durſt the French from that Time engage with the Engliſh in a Sea-Fight. Euſtace himſelf, after a long Search, was found and drawn out from the Bottom of a Pump, and at Dover had his Head cut off; tho' ſome ſay he was ſlain by Richard a natural Son to King John. The News of which Succeſs being brought to the King, did not more elevate him, than it wounded Lewis; for the Loſs was not only great as to Men, but alſo in all ſorts of Riches and Proviſions.

The Dauphine declines.

To give no Reſt to the Prince's declining Fortunes, the Earl of Pembroke with a powerful Army beſieg'd him in the City of London, as well by Water as Land; endeavouring to force him by Famine to ſurrender the Place. At length Matters came to a Capitulation; and in an Iſlet in the River Thames, not far from Stanes, King Henry, Wallo the Legate, William Marſhall, and the Earl of Pembroke met with Lewis and the Barons, to finiſh the Treaty: For Lewis had promis'd to yield to the Legate and the Earl in any Thing that was not diſhonourable. The Articles which the Prince ſwore to were theſe: 'Firſt he 'and the Barons, and his other Aſſociates, ſhould ſtand to the Judgment of the 'Church, and for the future be obedient to the Pope and the Roman See; That 'he ſhould forthwith depart the Kingdom, and never return with a Purpoſe of 'doing Harm. Secondly, That he would endeavour what he could to induce 'his Father to reſtore to King Henry all his Rights beyond the Seas. Thirdly, If 'his Father refus'd to do it, he himſelf would perform it, if ever he came to 'the Crown; and that at preſent, he would immediately deliver to the King all 'thoſe Caſtles and Territories he had poſſeſs'd in England during this War. On the other Side the King, the Legate and the Earl ſwore, 'Firſt, That the 'King ſhould reſtore to the Barons, and others, all their Rights and Inheri-'tances, with all the Liberties formerly demanded of his Father King John. 'Secondly, That none ſhould ſuffer Damage or Reproach for taking part on 'either Side. Thirdly, All Priſoners ſhould be releas'd on both Sides without 'Ranſom. Whereupon Prince Lewis with his Adherents was formally abſolv'd from the Sentence of Excommunication by Wallo, and ſo all Parties ran into mutual Embraces, and parted with the Kiſs of Peace. The Welſh, who had join'd with the Barons, were excluded this Treaty, and ſo were left to the King's Mercy. Thus Lewis, having been firſt forc'd to borrow five thouſand Pounds of the Londoners to diſcharge his Debts, was in a manner driven out of England, above two Years after his firſt Arrival, having for the moſt part been a receiv'd King; and was more likely to have made a Conqueſt of this Kingdom by the Arms of others, than the Norman that made Way with his own, had not the ſupream Diſpoſer otherwiſe diverted it. Such Effects proceeded from the Violence of an unruly King, and the Deſpair of an oppreſs'd People; who now, notwithſtanding the Miſmanagement of the Father, willingly embrac'd the Son, being naturally inclin'd to love and obey their Princes.

II. The Kingdom of England was now purg'd from all Foreign Incumbrances, but was not immediately freed from thoſe Troubles and Inconveniencies that naturally ſucceed all inteſtine Convulſions. For divers Perſons of Note, preſuming upon their former Services to the State, or fearing that if full Juſtice took place they muſt loſe much of what they gain'd, began to ſhow themſelves very violent and audacious in their Behaviour. The chief of theſe were William Earl of Albemarle, Faukes de Brent with his Soldiers, Robert de Vipont, with ſeveral others, who having had the Caſtles and Poſſeſſions of certain Biſhops and great Men, either to keep in Truſt, or by the Iniquity of the Times converted to their Uſes, did ſtill detain them, both againſt the Claims of the Legal Owners, and the King's expreſs Prohibition. Among others, Robert de Gaugy defended the Caſtle of Newark, then belonging to the Biſhop of Lincoln, againſt the King's Army, commanded by the great Marſhal Earl of Pembroke, and continu'd obſtinate for eight Days, and would not ſurrender, 'till by the Mediation of Friends, the Biſhop paid down an hundred Pounds. After a conſiderable Time, Peace being throughly reſtor'd and eſtabliſh'd in the Nation, Itinerant Juſtices were ſent through all Counties to revive the ancient Laws, and to cauſe the late Charter of King John to be ſtrictly obſerv'd; and then the valiant Hubert de Burgo was made Juſticiary of England. In all the beſt Regulations and Eſtabliſhments, the noble Earl of Pembroke was principally concern'd, who daily made it his Buſineſs to ſettle all Things with the greateſt Quietneſs and Security. The greater was his Loſs both to the King and State by his Death, which happen'd about the Middle of May; and his Body was bury'd in the Temple Church at London, where his Portraiture in a Coat of Mail is ſtill to be ſeen in the middle of the Round. He was a great Commander in War, and no leſs prudent Counſellor in Peace, leaving behind him five Sons and five Daughters; his Sons were ſucceſſively Earls of Pembroke, and dy'd without Iſſue; his Daughters were all advanc'd to great and noble Matches. Upon his Death, Peter Biſhop of Wincheſter was made Protector, and Governor of the King's Perſon, who for ſome Time rul'd with the ſame Moderation.

The King, now in a ſetled and calm Condition, reſolv'd to be crown'd a ſecond Time; which was perform'd by Stephen Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury at Weſtminſter, with the Confluence of all the Prelates, Peers and People: This Ceremony was renew'd, becauſe the former Coronation at Gloceſter was not ſo ſolemnly perform'd, by reaſon of the Turbulency of the Times, and the Want of a Crown of Gold. About the ſame Time the new Building of the Abby-Church of Weſtminſter, then call'd the Chappel of St. Mary, was begun; of which the King himſelf laid the firſt Stone, as if he deſign'd to conſecrate his future Actions to the Glory of God. Alſo the Body of Thomas Becket, once Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, was tranſlated out of its Stone Coffin, in the Vault where it was firſt interr'd, into a rich Shrine made of Gold, and beſet with Jewels, at the Charge of the then Arch-Biſhop. The King and Pope's Legate were preſent, with almoſt all the Biſhops, Abbots, Priors, Earls, Barons and Clergy of the Kingdom, as likewiſe an infinite Multitude of common People, from France and other foreign Parts. The ſplendid Entertainment which the Arch-Biſhop gave the whole Company, is related in the Manuſcript Chronicle of Dunſtable in very high and hyperbolical Terms, as equalling, or even exceeding all ever known in the World before.

Parliament, ſeiz'd on the Caſtle of Fotheringay, and committed many other outragious Acts, in Contempt of the King, and to the Breach of the publick Peace. Many others in ſeveral Places follow'd his pernicious Example; yet at length the Earl coming in under the Conduct of Walter Arch-Biſhop of York, was at the Interceſſion of the Legate Pandolf pardon'd; and the like dangerous Clemency was extended towards his Accomplices and Followers, whom the King, in reſpect of former Services, ſet free without Puniſhment or Ranſom. What Occaſion there was for ſeverer Proceedings, may eaſily be diſcern'd from the Number of Caſtles and large Poſſeſſions that Faukes de Brent, Philip de Marc, and others detain'd, without any other Right than what the Iniquity of the late Tumults had given them. It was no ſmall Addition to the Troubles of theſe Times, that Lewellyn, King of the Welſh, deſiring to free their Marches from the Engliſh Power, roſe up in Arms, and laid Siege to the Caſtle of Buelt, which invited King Henry to march thither with a ſufficient Army; but the Work was made eaſie, and ſoon concluded by the voluntary Departure of all the Enemy's Forces. Theſe Appearances of ſucceeding Diſturbances mov'd the King to think of ſtrengthning himſelf with faithful Alliances; and not long after, Alexander King of the Scots came to York, where he had met the King in the preceding Year, and there marry'd the Lady Joan, King Henry's Siſter; and at the ſame Time Hugo de Borgo, in the Preſence of both the Kings, and by the Advice of each Kingdom, marry'd the Lady Margaret, Siſter to the King of the Scots.

A. D. 1222. Reg. 6, 7.

In theſe unſetled Times, the Condition both of the Church and State ſeem to have much Reſemblance, every Man daring to attempt in either, what his own Audaciouſneſs would ſuggeſt, or others Connivency permit: But Arch-Biſhop Stephen now became very diligent in his Councils and Synods, in which by his own Authority he ſummon'd both Clergy and Laity, and by which he regulated many Inconveniencies as to both. At a Synod he held at Oxford, an execrable Impoſtor was conven'd before him, who had made upon his Body certain Marks or Wounds like thoſe of Jeſus Chriſt, whom he blaſphemouſly pretended to be. Being brought before Him and the Biſhops, he was by them condemn'd to be immured 'till Death between four Walls; as was alſo an infamous Woman, who call'd her ſelf Mary the Mother of our Lord. As to the publick State, many inſolent Actions were committed againſt the King's Authority and Peace of the Nation, eſpecially by Conſtantine Fitz-Arnulf, a ſeditious Citizen of London, who by means of a Wreſtling-Match between the Inhabitants of London and Weſtminſter, raiſed a popular Tumult, and attempted to ſet up Prince Lewis; in the Heat of which he cry'd out, Mount Joy, Mount Joy, God for us, and our Lord Lewis! Tho' the Lord Mayor, a diſcreet Perſon, earneſtly perſuaded all to their Duties, yet Conſtantine had render'd the People incapable of good Advice, by the ſeditious Proclamations he had publiſh'd. The Noiſe of the Sedition increaſing, Hubert the chief Juſticiary, with ſome freſh Troops enter'd the Tower, whither he commanded the principal Men of the City to appear before him, who eaſily threw off the Blame from themſelves upon Conſtantine. But he, as reſolute in his Anſwer, as deſperate in the Sedition, publickly declar'd That they had done no leſs than they ought, and that they would ſtand by it: Upon which the reſt being diſmiſs'd, he and his Nephew with a third Perſon, were condemn'd to be hang'd the next Morning; and tho' he offer'd fifteen thouſand Pounds for his Life, yet he could not eſcape the Hand of Juſtice. It is believ'd that he rely'd wholly upon the Articles and Oath between the King and Prince Lewis, that the Friends of the latter ſhould not be moleſted; and upon this Occaſion Lewis afterwards deny'd Reſtitution of ſuch Things, as the Articles mention'd, pretending that Henry had by this firſt Act broken his Faith, and by that vacated the whole Contract. This Execution being done without Noiſe, or the Citizens Privacy, the Juſticiary, accompany'd with Faukes de Brent and his armed Troops, enter'd ter'd London, and apprehended ſuch others as were culpable; and for a Terror to the reſt caus'd their Hands or Feet to be cut off, and then ſet at Liberty. The King depos'd all the Magiſtrates, but when he found that only the meaner Sort were intereſs'd in this Diſorder, he was ſoon reconcil'd to the City; tho' the Citizens were not ſo ſoon reconcil'd to his Miniſters, who had puniſh'd ſo many, according to their Deſerts, but not according to due Form of Law.

M. Paris, &c. This Seditious Beginning might have occaſion'd far more dangerous Proceedings, had not the King by a moderate Behaviour, and a patient Connivence of ſome particular Indignities, prevented a general Diſquiet. For the Barons, ſtill viewing their long deſir'd Liberties, and requiring a Confirmation of them by the King, who had ſworn to them at the Concluſion of the Peace with Prince Lewis; William Briwere, one of the King's Council, gave this Anſwer, That the Liberties they deſired were violently extorted, therefore ought not to be obſerv'd. The Arch-Biſhop enrag'd at this Anſwer, told him, If he lov'd the King, he would not hinder the Peace of the Kingdom; upon which the King prudently reply'd, That he had bound himſelf by Oath to obſerve their Liberties, and what he had ſworn to ſhould be obſerv'd. To confirm which he immediately iſſu'd out his Letters to all the Sheriffs of the Kingdom, to make Enquiry by the Oaths of twelve Legal Men in every County What were the Liberties of England in the Time of King Henry his Grand-father, and to ſend a Return to London fifteen Days after Eaſter; by which Act all Men hop'd to ſee a Concluſion of thoſe unhappy Conteſts which had ſo long diſturb'd the Nation. But this only prov'd an uſual Shift of Prolongation, ſo that the Buſineſs was deferr'd for that Time, to the greater Vexation of that ſucceeding; for during this long Reign, this put the King to the greateſt Inconveniencies, made him ill belov'd of his People, always oppos'd in his Deſigns, and far a leſs King, only by ſtriving to be more than he really was.

M. Paris. Wendov. In the mean Time the King conceiv'd new Hopes from the News of the Death of Philip the French King, that formidable Enemy to England; and immediately ſent Arch-Biſhop Stephen with three other Biſhops to Lewis, now crowned King, to demand the Reſtitution of Normandy, with all his other tranſmarine Dominions, according to his Oath made when he left England. To which this new King anſwer'd, That he was juſtly poſſeſs'd of Normandy, and thoſe other Dominions, as he was ready to make appear to King Henry, if he would come to his Court and make his Claim: Adding, That the King of England had violated his Oath in laying a grievous Ranſom upon thoſe he had taken at Lincoln; and likewiſe thoſe Liberties, for which the War was began, and to which he had ſolemnly ſworn at his Departure, were not obſerv'd. Upon this, the Ambaſſadors perceiving they could obtain no other Anſwer, return'd into England, without any further Advantage. The King now finding himſelf was unable to recover thoſe Dominions abroad, or to maintain his own Royal State at home, reſolv'd to reſume thoſe Crown Lands, which the Unſetledneſs of former Times, had thrown into the Poſſeſſion of private Hands: Which was principally by the Advice of Arch-Biſhop Stephen, and the chief Juſticiary Hubert, now made Earl of Kent, who by that means drew upon themſelves no ſmall Loads of Envy and Hatred. Tho' ſuch Recoveries as theſe might be no leſs neceſſary than reaſonable, yet becauſe the intereſs'd Perſons were ſo numerous, they wiſely made uſe of all Supports that either Religion or human Policy could afford them. In order to effect it, a Bull was procur'd from the Pope by which the King was declar'd to be of Age, and at liberty to govern by himſelf, and to chuſe his own Council; and all Men were commanded, upon pain of Eccleſiaſtical Cenſures, to reſtore all ſuch Poſſeſſions as againſt the Laws and the King's Will they detain'd from him. This drove the intereſs'd Party to a Reſolution of taking up Arms, firſt meeting for that purpoſe at Leiceſter, where the Earl of Cheſter and his Confederates conſulted how to remove the chief Juſticiary, whoſe predominant Grandeur was not by them to be endur'd, and how to retain thoſe Caſtles and Poſſeſſions demanded. But upon Notice, that if they did not immediately deliver all they unjuſtly detain'd, they ſhould be excommunicated by Name, and underſtanding the King's Forces were ſuperior to theirs, they came to the King at Northampton, and ſurrender'd all that belong'd to the Crown into his Poſſeſſion; but did not lay down their high Diſpleaſure, becauſe at their Petition the King would not remove his chief Juſticiary, the great Object of their Envy.

The King of France declares War againſt King Henry.

M. Paris, Walſing. &c.

Lewis King of France being incourag'd by theſe Domeſtick Diſſentions, declared War againſt King Henry upon this Pretence, That whereas Aquitain was held of the Crown of France by Homage, the King of England, being not hinder'd by Sickneſs, or any other Occaſion, had neither appear'd at the Coronation of King Lewis, nor excus'd himſelf by his Ambaſſadors. In proſecution of which Pretence, he beſieg'd and took the important City of Rochelle, with ſome other Places, and likewiſe worſted Savary de Maleon, King Henry's Lieutenant in Aquitain; which occaſion'd the Loſs of the reſt of Poictou of which the King was poſſeſs'd. With this he loſt the Service of the ſaid Savary, a valiant Commander, who for ſome Indignity offer'd him by the Earl of Salisbury, who was ſent to inſpect his Actions, ſuddenly turn'd to the French, among whom he had great Credit and Preferment. King Henry concern'd at theſe Diſadvantages, reſolv'd to have recourſe to the general Aid of his People, to recover all his Loſſes; but while he held a Parliament for that purpoſe, the whole Aſſembly was ſuddenly diſturb'd with the great Complaints of an inſufferable Outrage. For Henry de Braibrock, an itinerant Judge, who with others held the Aſſiſes at Dunſtable, was forcibly taken and impriſon'd in Bedford Caſtle by the Order of Faukes de Brent, who was inrag'd at him for giving no leſs than thirty Verdicts againſt him upon Trials for Land. The Judge's Wife by her Tears ſo mov'd the whole Parliament to Pity and Indignation, that all other Buſineſs laid aſide, the Clergy as well as Laity forthwith attended the King to the Siege of the Caſtle. Faukes himſelf flying into Wales, there to increaſe his Power, left his Brother Lieutenant in the Caſtle, with a deſperate Body of Men, with Proviſions and Ammunition ſufficient for a whole Year. Yet after two Months Siege, the Caſtle was taken, the Judge ſet at Liberty, the Lieutenant and the whole Garriſon hang'd, and the noble Pile quite deſtroy'd, as an Example to others who in due Time would not ſubmit themſelves to their Soveraign. Faukes now finding his Caſtle ruin'd and his Eſtate confiſcated, by the Procurement of the Biſhop of Coventry, came to the King at Bedford, and falling at his Feet, implor'd Mercy for his former good Services; but all that he could obtain was only the Favour of Baniſhment. At the Time appointed for his Departure, he with Tears deſir'd the Earl of Warren, who was to ſee him take Shipping, That he would commend him to the King, and let him know, as an important Secret, That all the Troubles he had rais'd in the Nation were purely by the Inſtigation of the Barons.

Faukes de Brent raiſes a Sedition.

He is baniſh'd.

A. D. 1225. Reg. 9/10.

The interrupted Counſels of Parliaments, and Deſigns of the King for regaining his foreign Territories, were now reaſſum'd; yet the King could not obtain ſo much as a Fifteenth upon Moveables, without firſt promiſing That he would again confirm the long deſir'd Liberties of the Nation. And being oblig'd by his urgent Neceſſities, he ſign'd and ſeal'd many Charters, one directed to each County in England; and two to every County that had Foreſts, one concerning the Common Liberties, the other concerning the Liberties of the Foreſts. By the Aſſiſtance of this new Tax, Richard Earl of Cornwall the King's Brother, and William Earl of Salisbury his Uncle, with ſixty Knights and a conſiderable Force were ſent into Gaſcony in the Spring; where they ſafely arriv'd at Bourdeaux, and were honourably entertain'd. Their ſeaſonable Arrival had good Effects, for it confirm'd the Well-diſpos'd, ſetled the Irreſolute, and reduc'd much which had been taken away by the French. Hugh Earl of Marche, coming by the French King's Directions to remove Earl Richard chard and the Engliſh from the Siege of Riol, was with all his Forces intercepted by an Ambuſcade, and defeated with no ſmall Loſs of Men, Ammunition and Carriages. At length both Sides were contented to pauſe for a Time without any Treaty, and the Engliſh held Aquitain, notwithſtanding all their Force and Practices. But William Longſpee, the King's Uncle, did not long ſurvive theſe good Services; but returning into England upon the Affairs of State, ſoon ended his Days at the Caſtle of Salisbury, with the greateſt Marks of Humility and Piety. He was bury'd in the newly built Cathedral in that City, where his Monument is ſtill to be ſeen; he was a virtuous and gallant Man, and the ſole ſurviving Iſſue of King Henry the Second. A. D. 1226. Reg. 10/11. William Longſpee dies.

M. Paris. About theſe Times the Pope ſent abroad into the World his Nuntio's and Emiſſaries, with a Deſign to ſettle a Contribution to the See of Rome, out of all the Cathedral and Conventual Churches in Chriſtendom: For which he alledg'd, That it was to wipe away from that See the ancient Scandal of Avarice and Bribery, which had been occaſion'd only by its great Poverty; and this might eaſily be prevented, if out of every Cathedral Church two Prebendaries, and out of every Monaſtery two Monks Portions, were ſet apart for that purpoſe. But neither the Meſſenger nor the Meſſage found any Incouragement in England; for the Pope's Agent Otto, by the Procurement of Arch-Biſhop Stephen, receiv'd Letters from Rome commanding him immediately to return: Otto inrag'd at this unexpected Revocation, threw the Pope's Letters into the Fire, yet durſt not diſobey the Contents. And whereas the Propoſal it ſelf had been debated and examin'd to the utmoſt, both here and in France, and judg'd to contain ſuch an univerſal Oppreſſion, as might cauſe a general Defection from the Church of Rome; the King in preſence of his Prelates and Peers return'd this frugal Anſwer, That ſince what his Holineſs requir'd was a Concern of the Univerſal Church, he was ready to follow the Example of other Kingdoms, and therefore would firſt ſee what they did: With which Anſwer the Aſſembly was diſmiſs'd. The Pope's Deſigns in England.

M. Paris, &c. This Difficulty ſo avoided, the King was earneſtly inclin'd to make a Voyage in Perſon to the Aſſiſtance of his Brother Earl Richard who proceeded in the Affair of Gaſcony; which tho' by the Departure of the late Earl of Salisbury, it receiv'd ſome Damage, yet by the Valour and Conduct of other worthy Perſons, it ſtill did proſper. His Intention and Deſire was ſomewhat retarded by the Arrival of Letters from France, which declar'd his Brother's Health, and the good Succeſs of his Affairs; and others add by the Advice of a famous Aſtrologer, who foretold that King Lewis ſhould not prevail. But what moſt prevented his Voyage was the expreſs Orders of the Pope, who poſitively prohibited him from making any Attempts in France at that Time, leſt he ſhould divert the pious Deſigns of King Lewis, whom he had lately ingag'd in a Cruſado againſt the Count of Tholouſe and his Subjects, as being all infected with the then accounted Hereſie of the Albigenſes. Againſt theſe ſuppos'd Hereticks King Lewis ſpent a Month in the Siege of Avignon, where he ſuſtain'd exceeding Loſſes, by a terrible Plague which deſtroy'd his Army, by a ſtrange Kind of venomous Flies that diſpatch'd great Numbers of his Men, and by a ſudden Inundation which laid a great Part of his Camp under Water; and laſt of all he is thought to have been poiſon'd by an unchaſt Rival of his Bed the Earl of Champaign. And this was the end of Lewis, the great Enemy of the Engliſh Nation, who was ſucceeded by his Son Lewis, the ninth of that Name, and a Minor, who was afterwards canoniz'd for a Saint. The Death of Lewis King of France.

M. Paris. Wendov. III. The Death of the French King, with the ſeveral Diſcontents and Factions under his Succeſſor, but twelve Years of Age, gave new Hopes to King Henry that now the Time was come, when he might recover thoſe ancient Inheritances which his Fore-Fathers held in France. Upon which Account he ſent the Arch-Biſhop of York, with others, to the chief Men of Normandy, A. D. 1227. Reg. 11/12.

Anjou and Poictou, inviting them by large Promiſes to acknowledge King Henry for their natural Lord; but before their Arrival, the young King, by his Mother's Means, had made Peace, and receiv'd the Homages of theſe Barons, ſo that the Deſign prov'd of no Effect. In the Abſence of his Miniſters, the King was buſily employ'd in raiſing what Mony he could; and while he was endeavouring to recover what was loſt, he much endanger'd what he retain'd. He began with the Citizens of London, from whom he extorted five thouſand Marks, becauſe they had formerly granted the like Sum to Prince Lewis. And to proceed as he had begun, at a Parliament at Oxford, he there declar'd himſelf of full Age, and That he would take the Management of publick Affairs into his own Hands: Accordingly, by the Advice of Hubert his Juſticiary, he remov'd his Guardian the Biſhop of Wincheſter from his Court. At the ſame Time, and by the ſame Advice, he cancell'd and vacated all the Charters of Liberties and Foreſts, which for two Years had been obſerv'd throughout the Kingdom, declaring, That what had been then done, was in his Minority, when he had no Power of his own Perſon or Seal, upon which Account it was all invalid. Theſe unjuſtifiable Proceedings occaſion'd great Diſcontents and Murmurings, all accuſing the Juſticiary, and accounting him the Author of all, becauſe the King was wholly govern'd by him. Shortly after, the Religious Orders, and all others had notice, That if they would enjoy their Privileges, they muſt renew their Charters, otherwiſe they ſhould be of no Advantage to them; and what they were to pay for ſuch Renewals, was left to the Diſcretion of the Juſticiary. Thus, as it is uſual, the whole Nation paid for the King's changing his Miniſtry.

The King declares himſelf of Age, and cancels the Charters.

Hubert being lately advanc'd to the Earldom of Kent, the Envy and Hatred of the Nobility encreas'd, eſpecially upon the Return of the King's Brother Richard Earl of Cornwall, who had ſeiz'd upon a certain Manor, then in Poſſeſſion of one Waleran a German, to whom King John had formerly granted it, which he alledg'd was Part of his Earldom of Cornwall. Upon which the King directed his Letters to his Brother, commanding him forthwith to reſtore the Manor he had taken from Waleran; which occaſion'd the Earl to come in Perſon and plead his Right before the King, offering to ſtand to the Judgment of his Court, and of the Peers of the Realm. At the naming of the Peers, the King and Juſticiary, ſuſpecting his Intentions, in a great Paſſion commanded him, Either to reſtore the Manor, or for ever leave the Kingdom; to which the Earl reply'd, That he would neither part from the one, nor leave the other, without the Judgment of his Peers, and immediately haſten'd to his own Habitation. And hearing that Hubert adviſ'd the King to ſecure him, he took Poſt for Marleburg, where meeting with William Mareſchal the young Earl of Pembroke, and the Earl of Cheſter, he enter'd into a ſtrict Confederacy with them. Then marching to Stamford, they were met there by the Earls of Gloceſter, of Warren, of Hereford, of Warwick, and of Ferrars, with many Barons, and a great Multitude of armed Men; whoſe Force was ſo formidable, that they thought fit to ſend a bold Meſſage to the King requiring him To make immediate Satisfaction to his Brother Earl Richard, for the Injury he had done him, which they imputed wholly to the Juſticiary; and alſo to reſtore thoſe Charters he had cancell'd at Oxford, which if he refus'd, they would compel him by their Arms to make them competent Satisfaction. The King terrify'd by his Father's Example, appointed them to meet him at Northampton, where upon the Lord's reſolute Demands, he ſetled ſuch large Allowances and Poſſeſſions upon his Brother, that every one departed well pleas'd, without debating the Affair of the Charters, which at that Time might have occaſion'd the greateſt Miſchiefs to the Kingdom.

The Nobility confederate againſt the King.

A. D. 1228. Reg. 12/13. This Danger was not a little increas'd by the Inſurrections of the Welſh: The King had given the Caſtle of Montgomery to his Favourite Hubert, the Garriſon of which Place, by the Aſſiſtance of the Country People, endeavour'd to to make a Way through an adjacent Wood more paſſable and ſecure for Travellers; but while they were cutting down the Thickets, the Welſh ſuddenly ſet upon them, kill'd ſome, and forc'd the reſt to retire into the Caſtle, and immediately inveſted it. Upon which the King and his Juſticiary came ſpeedily, and rais'd the Siege; and then march'd towards the Wood, and there clear'd all by great Labour and Burning, ſo far as a Receptacle of the Welſh, by them call'd Criddy, which he commanded to be ſet on Fire; but the Juſticiary finding it to be of an impregnable Situation, adviſ'd him to erect a Caſtle in that Place. Yet during the Time of its Building, the Workmen were daily interrupted by the Enemy, and ſeveral of them kill'd. At the ſame Time the King finding ſo great a Scarcity of Proviſions, and ſo many of his own Men Friends to Lewellyn, that he was oblig'd to make a diſadvantagious Peace, of which the chief Article was, That this Caſtle ſhould be demoliſh'd, and Lewellyn ſhould pay three thouſand Marks towards his Charges; upon which he return'd home with little Honour, having left William de Branſe, a noble Baron, behind him Priſoner.

The King goes againſt the Welſh.

M. Paris, &c. In the ſame Year dy'd Arch-Biſhop Langton, a Man of great Spirit and of little Dependence, who had been the main Promoter of the Nation's Liberties. The Convent of Canterbury elected Walter de Hemeſham to ſucceed him; but both the King and the Suffragan Biſhops refus'd him upon ſeveral Accounts; ſo that the Matter was brought to Rome to be determin'd by the Pope. After long Delays, the Pope promoted Richard de Grant, Chancellor of the Church of Lincoln, to the Archbiſhoprick, by his own ſole Authority; and the King and the Biſhops, contrary to all Expectation, in a ſhort Time obey'd the Pope's Commands, and ſubmitted to the whole Proceeding. This was a new Incroachment, and the firſt Arch-Biſhop the Pope ever preſum'd to nominate, without a previous Election by the Convent, or the Biſhops. Having obtain'd this Advantage, the Pope ſent one Stephen his Chaplain into England to collect the Tenths lately promis'd to the See of Rome; which Affair was propos'd in a full Parliament at Weſtminſter, where the King by his Silence ſeem'd to give Conſent to the Pope's Demands. But the Earls, Barons, and all the Laity ſtifly reſolv'd not to oblige their Baronies and Lay-Fees to the Court of Rome; and had compounded with the Legate for a certain Sum, had they not been betray'd by Stephen de Segrave, who ſo ſubtlely order'd the Affair, that he obtain'd his Demands. The Prelates and Clergy, after a long Deliberation, and no ſmall Reluctancy, conſented, leſt they ſhould incur the Sentence of Excommunication. Then Stephen ſhew'd them the Pope's Letter and his Commiſſion to collect the Tenths out of all Profits whatſoever, without any Deduction either for Debts or Expences; and becauſe the Matter requir'd Speed, he gave notice to the Prelates that they ſhould immediately pay down the Mony, and afterwards levy it upon every Perſon by Way of Tax; which Exaction prov'd ſo burdenſom, that they were forc'd to ſell or pawn their Veſtments, Chalices, and other holy Veſſels belonging to their Churches. Beſides he exacted the Tenths of the Autumnal Fruits of the Earth, while they were yet growing, none daring to refuſe him beſides the Earl of Cheſter; and for the more ſpeedy raiſing of the Mony, he brought along with him certain voracious Uſurers, who ſupply'd the Indigent with Mony, which they were compell'd to borrow, tho' by that Means they were irrecoverably ruin'd.

A. D. 1229. Reg. 13 14.

The Pope oppreſſes the Nation.

M. Paris, Æmilius, &c. Yet in theſe burthenſom Times, on Michaelmaſs Day the King caus'd the whole Nobility of England to meet at Portſmouth with ſuch a numerous Army of Horſe and Foot as none of his Predeceſſors had ever rais'd, reſolving to paſs over the Sea to recover thoſe Dominions his Father had loſt: But being ready to embark, there was not Shipping ſufficient to tranſport half the Number; which ſo inrag'd the King, that turning to Hubert his Juſticiary, he call'd him Old Traitor, and openly charg'd him with Receiving a Bribe of five thouſand Marks from the Queen of France to put a ſtop to this Deſign; and and proceeded ſo far as to run at him with his drawn Sword, but the Earl of Cheſter and others interpoſing, ſav'd the King from ſo foul a Diſhonour, who ſhortly after receiv'd him into Favour again. The whole Army ſoon broke up upon the Arrival of a great Man out of Bretaign, a principal Confederate with the Engliſh, who by alledging the unſeaſonable Time of the Year, and other

He lands in Bretaign. without great Prejudice to an obſervant Reader, it might be all omitted. Much certainly was not done: King Henry's Deſign was to have march'd through Bretaign, where many acknowledg'd him, into Poictou; and, as ſome write, he did ſo, and receiv'd Homage in Gaſcony. To hinder this Paſſage, the King of France lay with a ſtrong Army at Angers; while Fulk Pagunell, a Norman Peer, with ſixty valiant Knights, perſuaded the King of England, That it was eaſie for him to reduce Normandy to his Obedience; but Hubert had other Thoughts, and diverted the King from that Enterprize. The Normans therefore made an unfortunate Journey, for they not only miſs'd of their Hopes, but for their Conſpiring were diſpoſſeſs'd at home by King Lewis. But whether it were by Loſs in Battel, or otherwiſe, this is agreed on, that after the waſting of infinite Sums of Mony, and a great Diminution of the Soldiers Numbers, Returns without Succeſs. the King of England return'd without accompliſhing his Deſigns; leaving for the Defence of Bretaign the three great Earls of Cheſter, Pembroke and Albermarle, with Forces ſufficient for the Service.

It is not improbable that the dangerous Rebellion of the Iriſh haſten'd his M. Paris. &c. Return; for the King of Connaught and his Subjects, ſeeing the King and the Earl of Pembroke, who had large Poſſeſſions in thoſe Parts, wholly taken up with the Affairs of France, had furiouſly ſet upon King Henry's Soldiers and People, with Hopes of utterly expelling them out of the Nation. But all their Projects prov'd fatal to themſelves, and the Engliſh Forces marching againſt them, kill'd no leſs than twenty thouſand, and took their King Priſoner. Not

When the Biſhops and Prelates heard of it, they ſolemnly excommunicated that Prince, with all his Adherents and Abettors; and the King having rais'd an Army at Oxford, march'd in Perſon to ſuppreſs them, but not without great Loſs on his Side. As to the Affairs of France, by the Wiſdom of Queen Blanch, and Mediation of the Arch-Biſhop of Rheims and the Earl of Bulloign on one Part, and the Earls of Bretaign and Cheſter on

About the ſame Time the Pope had a freſh Opportunity of exerciſing his Au- *M. Paris. But when the Monks went to Rome to obtain his Confirmation, the Pope underſtanding that he was a great Courtier, gave them this Anſwer, That if the Perſon they choſe was promoted to that Dignity, he would concur with the King and Kingdom to throw off that Subjection to the See of Rome, to which King John had long ſince ſubmitted it; therefore he abſolutely vacated the Election, and commanded the Monks To chuſe one who would be faithful and devoted to the Roman Church. elected Edmund of Abington, a Man more agreeable to the Roman Palate. The King ſeeing the great Emperor Frederick, even at this Time while he was winning the Kingdom of Jeruſalem from Infidels, in his Abſence ſo inhumanly depos'd from his Empire by the Pope, upon a private Reſentment; no wonder, if in this his unripe Years, and diſtracted Government, he fear'd to draw upon himſelf ſo mercileſs an Enemy. How little theſe Roman Incroachments were lik'd in the Nation, appears from the Actions of ſeveral Perſons of Quality and others this Year, who took up Arms and forceably enter'd the Barns and Houſes of the Roman or Italian Clergy-Men that were benefic'd in England, and carry'd away, and diſtributed their Corn and Goods among the Poor. The King ſubmits.

M. Paris. And now the great Hubert, Earl of Kent and chief Juſticiary of England, after he had enjoy'd the greateſt Favour of two Kings, ſeem'd to have run the Stage of his beſt Fortunes. For the King, upon freſh Inroads of the Welſh, being adviſ'd by the Biſhop of Wincheſter and other Counſellors, to put an end at once to the Inroads of that Nation, he complain'd, That according to his Treaſurers Accounts, his Revenues would ſcarcely afford him Proviſions and Cloaths, and the uſual Alms, much leſs any Thing for warlike Expeditions. To which they reply'd, That he impoveriſh'd himſelf by alienating the Honours, Wardſhips and vacant Dignities which ought to come into the Exchequer, ſo that he had only the Name without the Revenues of a King; but his Predeceſſors, who took due Care of their Treaſury, abounded both in Wealth and Glory. The King took this Hint, and immediately call'd his Sheriffs and Bailiffs to an Account, and whoever was convicted of Fraud, was remov'd from his Office, and oblig'd to pay the whole into the Exchequer with Intereſt. He alſo remov'd Ranulph Breton Treaſurer of his Chamber from his Office, and fin'd him a thouſand Pounds; and by the Advice of the Biſhop of Wincheſter, his Nephew Peter de Rivaux, a Poictovin, was plac'd in his Room; by which Means the King's Coffers were for a while plentifully ſupply'd. The King in Wants.

M. Paris. Wendov. Theſe were but Preparatives to a further Scrutiny intended againſt Earl Hubert, who by the Inſtigation of the ſame Biſhop, was now remov'd from being Juſticiary, and was ſucceeded by Stephen Segrave, a common Knight. Shortly after, the King being highly incens'd againſt the Earl, requir'd him to give a ſtrict Account of ſuch Monies and other Revenues, that had ever paſſed through his Hands, ſince he was firſt made Juſticiary. To this Hubert anſwer'd, That he had King John's Charter, by which he was diſcharg'd of all Accounts, who having ſo often experienc'd his Fidelity, would receive no Account from him. The Biſhop of Wincheſter reply'd, That the Charter was not valid, after King John's Death, and no ways hinder'd the preſent King from exacting an Account from him. And to this was added, That he had been guilty of ſeveral Treaſonable Practices, and had given treacherous Advice to the King, to the Prejudice both of him and his Kingdom; to all which the King requir'd him to anſwer, and ſtand to the Judgment of the Court. Hubert finding himſelf abandon'd by his chief Supporter, deſir'd an appointed Day to give in his Anſwer, which was with great Difficulty obtain'd; and being now deſerted by all his Friends, except the Arch-Biſhop of Dublin, his Enemies daily encreas'd, and many other falſe or improbable Crimes were laid to his Charge; as That he had procur'd the late Earls of Salisbury and Pembroke, Faukes de Brent, and Richard Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury to be poiſon'd; and That he had gain'd the King's Affection by Sorcery and Witchcraft. Others accus'd him of Injuſtice, Rapine and Extortion; and the Londoners enter'd their Complaint againſt him for formerly condemning their Fellow-Citizen Conſtantine to be hang'd without Legal Proceſs. All which Crimes were ſo highly aggravated before the King, that he proceeded to an unuſual Method, and caus'd it to be proclaim'd throughout the City of London, That whatſoever Perſon had any Complaint againſt Earl Hubert, ſhould come to the King, and he ſhould have Juſtice done him. Hubert de Burgo declines. Great Accuſations againſt him.

On

On the fourteenth Day of September, the King held a grand Aſſembly of the Prelates and Peers, where Hubert was conven'd to anſwer to the Articles exhibited againſt him; but the Earl fearing the King would put him to ſome ignominious Death, took Sanctuary in the Priory Church of Merton in Surry, and durſt not appear 'till the King ſhould be of a milder Temper. Upon which the King in a great Rage ſent to the Mayor of London, to force him from thence, and to bring him either dead or alive: The Londoners, glad of this Opportunity, upon ringing of a common Bell, gather'd together to the Number of twenty thouſand; but ſome of the moſt diſcreet Citizens, dreading ſuch Tumults, repair'd to the Biſhop of Wincheſter's Houſe in Southwark, and deſir'd his Advice, who told them, That whatever were the Conſequence, they muſt execute the King's Precept. At the ſame Time the Earl of Cheſter ſuggeſted to the King, That if theſe Tumultuous Proceedings were countenanc'd, it would occaſion dangerous Seditions at other Times; and that it would be a great Reproach to him in foreign Countries, when they heard he thus treated his former Favourites: Which ſo prevail'd upon him, that he immediately diſpatch'd Meſſengers, and revok'd his firſt Precept. After this, the King being a little molify'd, the Arch-Biſhop of Dublin obtain'd the Favour that Earl Hubert might have a longer Time allow'd him to give in his Anſwer. During which Space, Hubert thinking himſelf ſecure by the King's Letters Patents, deſign'd a Viſit to his Counteſs, then at St. Edmund's Bury; but when the King was inform'd of it, he ſent a Knight with three hundred Soldiers to apprehend him, and bring him Priſoner to London. Upon which Hubert fled into a Chappel at Brentwood in Eſſex, and for his Protection took the Croſs in one Hand, and the Hoſt from the Altar in the other; both which they wrung out of his Hands, and without Reſpect to the Place violently dragg'd him forth; and chaining his Feet under his Horſe's Belly, they brought him in a moſt opprobrious Manner to London, and immediately committed him to the Tower.

Upon this Uſage, the Biſhop of London haſtily went to the King, and ſeverely rebuk'd him for this Violation of the Sanctuary, declaring, That if he did not immediately ſet Hubert at Liberty, and ſend him back to the Chappel from whence he was taken, he would excommunicate all that were concern'd in the Fact. The King being terrify'd, acknowledg'd his Error, and ſent him back to the ſame Chappel; but at the ſame Time ſent to the Sheriffs of Hertford and Eſſex, upon pain of Death, to go in Perſon with the Powers of both Counties, and ſurround the Chappel, to prevent Hubert's Eſcape, or his being ſupply'd with Suſtenance. Upon this the Arch-Biſhop of Dublin, his only true Friend, ſupplicated the King with Tears to know his Pleaſure concerning him; and the King offer'd him the Choice of three Things, either for ever to abjure the Kingdom, to be condemn'd to perpetual Impriſonment, or to confeſs himſelf a Traitor. But Hubert would chuſe none of them, being conſcious to himſelf that he did not deſerve ſo ſevere a Treatment, tho' he was willing to quit the Nation for a Time. Yet rather than be ſtarv'd, he at length yielded himſelf to the Sheriffs, who brought him in Chains to London, and made him a ſecond Time Priſoner in the Tower. The Arch-Biſhop of Dublin us'd all Methods to molifie the King's Heart, but no Sacrifice could appeaſe his Anger, but that of the Earl's Hoard of Gold and other Treaſure, then lodg'd with the Knights Templars, who refus'd to deliver it without Hubert's expreſs Order. Hubert readily ſubmitted himſelf and all that he had to the King's Pleaſure; ſo that all his chief Wealth and Riches were deliver'd to the King's Poſſeſſion. His Enemies hearing of his great Treaſure, took a further Advantage, and accus'd him of Fraud and Rapine, urging that he might be put to Death: To whom the King reply'd, That Hubert had faithfully ſerv'd his Uncle King Richard, and the King his Father, and if he had done otherwiſe towards him, he ſhould never be put to Death; for he had rather appear too merciful than too cruel, to one who had ſo often preſerv'd his Predeceſſors and himſelf in great Dangers.

Shortly after, the King's Brother Richard, with the Earls of Warren, Pembroke and Ferrars, became Sureties for his future Behaviour; after which he was ſent Priſoner to the Caſtle of Deviſes, under the Cuſtody of four Knights of theirs, where he appointed Laurence, a Clerk of St. Albans, to be Steward of the Lands granted him, who had been a faithful Friend, and a great Comfort to him in all his Afflictions.

IV. King Henry being wholly freed from the Influence of Hubert his former Juſticiary, now fell into the Hands of Peter de Rupibus Biſhop of Winchester, and his Kinſman Peter de Rivaulx; ſo that the Management of all publick Affairs was committed to them. The former, that he might govern at his own Pleaſure, procur'd the King to remove the Engliſh from their Places and Offices, and in their Rooms to ſubſtitute Poictovins and Bretaignes; who being invited into England, came over to the Number of two thouſand Knights and Eſquires, and were all plac'd in ſeveral Caſtles in Garriſon; and to them the eaſie King committed the Wardſhips of the young Nobility, which afterwards were much degenerated by their ignoble Marriages with Foreigners. When the Earl of Pembroke found that all Ranks of Men were alike oppreſs'd, and the Laws manifeſtly violated, he as a Lover of Juſtice, with ſome other great Men went boldly to the King, and openly remonſtrated, That by pernicious Councils he had call'd in Poictovins and other Foreigners, to the great Oppreſſion of his native Subjects, and the Breach of their Laws and Liberties; wherefore they humbly beſought him to regulate theſe Diſorders in the Government, otherwiſe his Nobility would withdraw themſelves from his Councils, ſo long as he made uſe of Strangers. To whom the Biſhop of Winchester ſharply reply'd, That the King might call in whomſoever he pleas'd for the Defence of his Crown, and that in ſuch Numbers as were ſufficient to reduce his proud and rebellious Subjects to Obedience. Upon this ſevere Anſwer, the Earl and the reſt retired from the Court, and promis'd faithfully to aſſiſt and ſupport each other to the laſt Drop of their Blood.

Foreigners called into England.

The Nobility diſcontented.

Ibid. The People, naturally inclining to doubt the worſt upon ſuch Diviſions, had their Fears increas'd by ſeveral Prodigies of ſtrange Thunders and Tempeſts, but eſpecially by the Appearance of four Parhelions, or Mock-Suns, beſides the true Sun, which were ſeen in the Air from Morning 'till Night; which indeed happen'd to be the Forerunners of ſeveral Troubles in England, Wales and Ireland. The Poictovins and other Strangers thus bearing the Sway, ſo that the King's Perſon went guarded with whole Troops of them, the Earls and Barons refus'd to come to the King at a Parliament ſummon'd at Oxford. Upon which the King was adviſ'd to ſend out a ſecond and third Summons, to try whether they would come to Weſtminſter on the eleventh Day of July, promiſing alſo to reform whatever was amiſs. But when the Peers heard the Number of the Foreigners increas'd, and that there were but ſmall Hopes of an Accommodation, they laid aſide all Thoughts of meeting the King at the Day appointed, and by ſelect Meſſengers declar'd to him, That unleſs the Biſhop of Winchester and the Poictovins were immediately remov'd from his Court, they would by the Common Council of the Kingdom, force both Him and thoſe evil Counſellors out of the Realm, and would conſult about creating a new King. The King, whom his Father's Example had made more timorous, could eaſily have been perſuaded to a Compliance; but the Biſhop of Winchester and his Friends infus'd more Spirit and Reſolution into him. Upon which the moſt ſuſpected Perſons had a Day appointed them by the King, in which they ſhould deliver ſufficient Pledges to ſecure him of their Loyalty. Againſt that Day the Lords in great Numbers repair'd to London, but the Earl of Pembroke, being forewarn'd of Danger by his Siſter the Counteſs of Cornwall, fled back into Wales; and chiefly for want of his Presence nothing was concluded. The King not long after march'd to Gloceſter with an Army, where the Earl and his Adherents refus'd to appear; upon which the King burnt their Towns and Houſes, as if they had been Traitors, and without Trial diſpos'd of their Eſtates to the Poictovins and Strangers.

The Earl of Pembroke finding himſelf oppreſs'd, and deſerted by ſome whom the Biſhop of Wincheſter had bought off, immediately enter'd into a Confederacy with Lewellyn Prince of Wales, and other chief Men of that Country; and they all took an Oath not to make any Peace but by a general Conſent. And now the King having receiv'd more Foreigners, march'd with them down to Hereford, and from thence ſent to the Biſhop of St. Davids to defie the Earl of Pembroke, and commanded his Army to march againſt him, and beſiege his Caſtles. Yet notwithſtanding, after ſome ſmall Attempts and calmer Conſiderations, the King publickly promis'd, That by the Advice of his Council, all that was amiſs ſhould be rectify'd and amended: Accordingly on the ninth Day of October, the great Men met the King at Weſtminſter, and humbly beſought him for the Honour of Almighty God, to take into Favour his natural Subjects, who without any Trial by their Peers, he treated as Rebels. To which the Biſhop of Wincheſter reply'd, That there were no ſuch Peers in England as in France; therefore it was lawful for the King, by ſuch Juſtices as he appointed, to baniſh any Criminals out of the Nation, and by Judgment condemn them. This Anſwer was ſo highly reſented by the Biſhops, that with one Voice they threaten'd to excommunicate all the King's chief Counſellors by Name; but the Biſhop of Wincheſter appeal'd from their Sentence to the See of Rome. Then they ſolemnly execrated all ſuch as had alienated the King's Mind from his Native Subjects, and diſturb'd the Peace of the Kingdom.

M. Paris. &c.

The King ill adviſed.

In the mean Time the Earl of Pembroke had retaken a Caſtle which he had lately ſurrender'd to the King; which provok'd the King to march with a powerful Army into Wales; but the Earl had before deſtroy'd all the Forage, ſo that the King for Want of Neceſſaries was oblig'd to retire to the Caſtle of Groſmont in Monmouthſhire. Here the Earl, whoſe Conduct was equal to his Valour, ſo manag'd his Forces, that attacking the King's Army by Night, he put the whole into ſuch Diſorder, that they immediately fled, and left five hundred Horſe, and all their Baggage, for a Prey to the Enemy; upon which, the King leaving two Noblemen with the Poictovins, to make good the Marches againſt the Welſh, return'd with Diſhonour. The Earl alſo found them Employment whom the King left behind; and whereas the valiant Baldwin, a Flemiſh Knight, with a thouſand Horſe, thought to have ſurpris'd him, when with a tenth Part of that Number he came to view the Caſtle of Monmouth; the Earl alone bravely defended himſelf againſt twelve of his Enemies, and when his Horſe was ſlain, he threw one of them out of the Saddle, and leap'd into it himſelf, never giving ground 'till his other Forces came in to his Aſſiſtance, and obtain'd a compleat Victory, with the Slaughter and Captivity of many Poictovins and others. His other Exploits in and about Wales, were not few nor diſhonourable, only he had the Misfortune to have his Soveraign on the contrary Side. About the ſame Time, Hubert de Burgo, having Intelligence that the Biſhop of Wincheſter deſign'd his Death, eſcap'd out of the Caſtle of Deviſes, where he was Priſoner, to a neighbouring Church; but was hal'd from thence by the Keepers of the Caſtle. The Biſhop of Salisbury, in whoſe Dioceſe it happen'd, caus'd him to be ſafely reſtor'd to the ſame Place, from whence by the Earl of Pembroke, and a Troop of Soldiers, he was reſcu'd, and carry'd into Wales. Thus he, who when he was in Power and Grandeur, inſiſted upon abſolute Obedience to the King, now under Preſſures and Afflictions, ſtood as ſtrongly for Self-Defence.

and joining with the Forces of Lewellyn, proceeded with Fire and Sword as far as Shrewsbury, part of which they laid in Aſhes, and plunder'd the reſt. The King then at Gloceſter, for want of ſufficient Forces, departed thence with no ſmall Concern to Wincheſter, abandoning thoſe other Parts to Waſte and Ruin. When the King's Counſellors ſaw their Houſes and Lands deſtroy'd, their Poictovin Friends greatly diminiſh'd, and themſelves without Remedy, they projected how to ruin the Earl by Treachery, whom they could not conquer by Valour. In order to which they compos'd Letters in the King's Name, ſeal'd with his and eleven of their own Seals, and directed them to Fitz-Gerald, the King's Juſticiary in Ireland, and ſeveral others who were the Earl's ſworn Feudataries, importing, 'That tho' the Earl had been proclaim'd a Traitor, 'proſcrib'd by the King's Court, and diveſted of his Paternal Eſtate, yet ſtill he 'purſu'd the King with his uſual Malice and Violence; wherefore they were 'requir'd, as faithful Subjects, whenever the Earl ſhould come over thither, 'to take him alive or dead, and preſent him to the King, which if they perform'd, 'all his great Poſſeſſions in Ireland ſhould be divided among them; for which 'they gave them the King's Promiſe and their own Securities for the Performance. The Iriſh Noblemen hearing the Tenor of theſe Letters, ſent private Meſſengers to theſe Counſellors, aſſuring them, 'That if what was promis'd them 'could be ſecur'd by the King's Charter, they would undertake to effect what 'he deſir'd. Upon which theſe Counſellors ſurreptitiouſly got the Seal from the Biſhop of Chicheſter now Chancellor, and without his Knowledge ſeal'd a Charter with it, by which all the Rights and Poſſeſſions of the Earl were to be divided among them, and forthwith diſpatch'd a Meſſenger with it to the ſaid Noblemen. Upon the Receiving of which, they immediately reſolv'd the Deſtruction of the Earl; accordingly they rais'd a great Force, with which they enter'd his Lands, took his Caſtles, and waſted his Poſſeſſions, purpoſely to provoke him to come over into Ireland. This Plot ſoon took effect; for going over to take Revenge of theſe mercenary Enemies, he was treacherouſly beſet by them, and was kill'd by a Wound given him on the Back, while he with incomparable Bravery defended himſelf againſt a Multitude. Thus dy'd this valiant Man, who deſerv'd to have liv'd in better Times, and under a Prince who knew how to value Men of Worth; yet when he receiv'd the News of his Death, he much lamented the Loſs of ſo brave a Soldier, and ſo noble a Subject, declaring, He had not left his Equal behind him.

Wendov. M. Paris. Before this happen'd, the King came to a Treaty at Weſtminſter with the Biſhops and Nobility; in which the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, and ſeveral Biſhops repreſented to him, The calamitous Condition to which both he and the whole Kingdom was reduc'd, by following the pernicious Counſels of the Biſhop of Wincheſter and his Accomplices, whoſe Advice had occaſion'd all the evil Events, Wars and Miſeries that had happen'd in his Reign: Adding withal, That if he did not ſpeedily remove theſe evil Counſellors from his Court and Preſence, and receive his Native and Liege-Subjects into their Places, they muſt of Neceſſity proceed to Eccleſiaſtical Cenſures againſt all Oppoſers. Upon which the King calmly reply'd, That he could not reform his Council, 'till he had taken their Accounts, and ſo deſir'd a ſmall Reſpite, which at preſent gave Satisfaction to all. At another Meeting, the King was again admoniſh'd by the Arch-Biſhop, of the deſolate Condition of his Kingdom, and all the impending Dangers; and being again threaten'd with the Excommunication of himſelf as well as others, he at length promis'd to be directed by their Counſels. Shortly after he commanded the Biſhop of Wincheſter to retire to his Biſhoprick, and keep to his Care of Souls, without concerning himſelf with the Affairs of the Publick; and likewiſe commanded Peter de Rivaulx to give in his Accounts, yield up his Caſtles, and depart his Court, declaring with an Oath, That if he had not been a benefic'd Clerk, he would have caus'd his Eyes to be pull'd out. He alſo diſcharg'd the Poictovins from his Service, both in his Court and Garriſons, ſons, commanding them to return into their own Country, and never ſee his Face more. Thus having purg'd his Court, and freed his Kingdom from Foreigners, he ſubmitted to the Advice of the Arch-Biſhop and Biſhops, by whom he hop'd to reduce his unſetled Kingdom to a proſperous Condition. By their Directions he came to a Treaty with Lewellyn Prince of Wales, and iſſu'd out his Letters to all his Confederates and proſcrib'd Perſons to meet at Gloceſter on the twenty ninth Day of May, to be reconcil'd to him, and reſtor'd to their Inheritances, while the Arch-Biſhop and Biſhops aſſur'd them of ſafe Conduct.

He is reconcil'd to many.

The firſt who came to accept of the King's Favour was the late Juſticiary Hubert, whom the King receiv'd very graciouſly; after him Gilbert Baſſet and Richard Sward, with ſeveral others, who were all receiv'd with the Kiſs of Peace, reconcil'd to the King, and reſtor'd to all their Rights and Poſſeſſions. At the Interceſſion of the Arch-Biſhop he alſo reſtor'd to Gilbert, Brother to the late Earl of Pembroke, all his Inheritance both in England and Ireland, and receiv'd his Homage; and on Whitſunday following at Worceſter he knighted him, and gave him the Marſhal's Staff.

Upon this general Reconciliation, the Practices by which the great Earl of Pembroke was deſtroy'd, and his Poſſeſſions diſmember'd, were all laid open; and the Copies of the Letters ſent into Ireland were by means of the Arch-Biſhop publickly read in the Preſence of the King, the Prelates, Earls and Barons. The exhibiting of theſe drew Tears from moſt of them; and the King declar'd by an Oath, That he knew not the Contents of the ſaid Letters, tho' by the Importunity of the Biſhop of Wincheſter, Rivaulx, Segrave and others, he had caus'd his Seal to be put to them. Theſe being ſhortly after ſummon'd to appear in the King's Court at Weſtminſter, inſtead of coming, took Sanctuary in ſeveral Places; but at length by the Management of the Arch-Biſhop, moſt of them were brought before the King, who in Perſon ſate upon the Bench with his Juſticiaries. Peter de Rivaulx was the firſt that appear'd in a Clerk's Habit, yet with a Dagger at his Girdle, and bow'd to the King, who as ſoon as he ſaw him, call'd him Traitor, accus'd him for his pernicious Counſels, and requir'd him to give an Account of his Treaſuryſhip, and alſo the Wardſhips of the young Nobility, with the Eſcheats and other Profits of the Crown; and after this ſent him to the Tower, and ſeiz'd all his Lay Poſſeſſions, becauſe under his Clerk's Habit he had a Coat of Mail, and a Knight's Weapon at his Girdle. At the ſame Day alſo appear'd Stephen Segrave before the King, who likewiſe call'd him Traitor, and added, That by his wicked Advice Hubert Earl of Kent was remov'd from his Office of Juſticiary, and impriſon'd, and many of the Nobility proſcrib'd, requiring him to give an Account of his Juſticiaryſhip. But by the Mediation of the Arch-Biſhop, Time was given to him and others; and the King getting Mony out of them, and making Hugh de Pateſhull chief Juſticiary, all Things in a ſhort Time were brought to a reaſonable and quiet Condition.

Theſe calmer Times were made more pleaſant and joyful by the Marriage of the Emperor Frederick with the Lady Iſabella, King Henry's Siſter, now about twenty Years of Age, with whom the King gave thirty thouſand Marks, as her Portion. The Meſſengers arriv'd in March with the Emperor's Letters, clos'd with a Seal of Gold, and the Arch-Biſhop of Coloign, and the Duke of Lovain were ſent to conduct her over. The King brought her to Sandwich, with a fair Train of three hundred Horſe, and being nobly furniſh'd with all Things, ſhe took ſhipping in May, and arriv'd at Antwerp, and was magnificently entertain'd; while her Sweetneſs of Behaviour, and her charming Beauty attracted the Love and Admiration of all People. At the Solemnity of her Marriage were preſent three Kings, eleven Dukes, thirty Earls, beſides a great Number of Prelates. This Imperial Affinity gave a worthy Hiſtorian occaſion to diſplay the Glory and Grandeur of the Engliſh Princes; but among them all, none were more highly advanc'd than the Children of King John, one of whoſe

Sons

Sons was now a King, the other afterwards choſen to be an Emperor, one of his Daughters now a Queen, this other now an Empreſs. Here Roger Wendover ends his Hiſtory, to whoſe Labours we have been often and very much oblig'd.

M. Paris. V. King Henry, being arriv'd to the thirtieth Year of his Age, and the twentieth of his Reign, reſolv'd to enter into a nuptial State, and accordingly marry'd the Lady Eleanor, ſecond Daughter to Raymond Earl of Provence, who tho' his Fortunes were in a low Condition, yet he marry'd his four Daughters to as many Kings. Immediately after her Marriage ſhe was crown'd at Weſtminſter with extraordinary Splendor and Magnificence; at which Solemnity the City of London ſignally diſplay'd its Grandeur, being richly adorn'd with Silks, Banners, Crowns, Palls, Tapers and Lamps, with all the ſtrange Varieties of Wit and Invention. The Citizens, well mounted, and glorioufly attir'd, met the King on Horſe-back; and at the Dinner, with the Clangor of Trumpets before them, they enter'd, carrying three hundred and ſixty Cups of Gold and Silver, to ſerve the King and his noble Gueſts with Wine, according to their Duties in Coronations. Our Author here takes particular Notice, that the Earl of Cheſter, as Lord High-Conſtable, carry'd the Sword of St. Edward, call'd Curteine, before the King, in Token, 'That he is Earl of the Palace, and 'has by Right a Power of reſtraining the King, if he ſhould act any Thing 'amiſs. Shortly after the King went from London to Merton-Abby, where he met with his great Men to treat with them about the Affairs of the Kingdom; and here were made the Laws call'd the Statutes of Merton. To this Place came the Emperor's Meſſengers, deſiring the King to ſend his Brother Richard to his Aſſiſtance againſt the French; but by the Advice of the Nobility, his Requeſt was refus'd, becauſe he was young, and next Heir to the Crown, if the King dy'd without Iſſue. A. D. 1236. Reg. 20/21. The King marries Eleanor Daughter to the Earl of Provence.

Ibid. And now the jealous Lords began again to relapſe into their uſual Diſcontents, heinouſly reſenting it, That the King was ſo much govern'd by his Wife's Uncle, William de Valentia; inſomuch that the King withdrawing himſelf into the Tower of London, the Lords refus'd to come to him. Upon better Advice therefore the King return'd to his Palace; where ſome great Officers, and others, were remov'd from the Privy-Council, and their Places, not without the Admiration of moſt People. But the Biſhop of Chicheſter, choſen Lord Chancellor in the King's Minority, being requir'd by his Soveraign to deliver up his Seal, poſitively refus'd, declaring, That as he had receiv'd it by the Authority of the Parliament, he would not reſign it without their Conſent. Theſe frequent Oppoſitions from his Prelates and Peers, induc'd this unſteady King to reſume into his Favour ſome of thoſe Counſellors he had not long ſince diſplac'd, as Peter de Rivaulx, and Stephen Segrave. Then to ſecure himſelf from remoter Dangers, he travell'd towards York, to eſtabliſh a Peace between him and Alexander King of the Scots; who in Confidence of the Amity and Aſſiſtance of Prince Lewellyn, demanded the County of Northumberland. Nevertheleſs, by the Wiſdom of their Friends, and their own Moderation, they parted in Peace; the King of England, rather than give up ſo neceſſary a Frontier, obliging himſelf to lay out certain Lands, in lieu of that County, which King John had formerly given as a Portion with his Daughter. In this Year Matth. Paris tells us of a ſtrange Prodigy ſeen near the Abby of Rock in Yorkſhire; which was, that for ſeveral Days together ſome Troops of Men on Horſeback appear'd to riſe out of the Ground, and dividing themſelves into Parties, ſeem'd to fight with each other, and at laſt to ſink into the Earth again. The like Apparitions, as he ſays, were alſo ſeen this Year in Ireland, as the Earl of Gloceſter related it to him, and affirm'd the Truth of the Fact. The Lords again diſcontented. A ſtrange Prodigy.

M. Paris. &c. King Henry, whoſe Treaſuries were exhauſted by the Payment of his Siſter's Portion to the Emperor, now call'd a Parliament at London, where he could not obtain any Supplies from the States of the Land, but upon Confirmation of A. D. 1237. Reg. 21/22.

The King wants Mony. of the National Privileges of England formerly granted, and upon Acceptance of the Earls of Ferrars, and Warren, and John Fitz-Geoffry into his Privy-Council. The King, to ſatisfie the People, caus'd them to ſwear to give no unfaithful Advice, and to abſtain from all Corruption, or Sale of Juſtice; and finally he promis'd himſelf to rely wholly upon his natural Subjects for Advice, and to leave all others. Upon this a Thirtieth of all Profits was granted; but then it was appointed, that the Mony ſhould not be paid into the Exchequer, but was to be depoſited in ſome Religious Houſe or Caſtle in every County, to be expended for the Uſe of the Publick, as Occaſion requir'd; ſo that if the King fail'd to perform his Part, every Man ſhould receive back what he had depoſited. One ordinary Cauſe of Expence ſeem'd now to be remov'd, for Lewellyn Prince of Wales, being diſtemper'd in Body, and diſturb'd by the Rebellions of his Son Griffin, voluntarily agreed to hold the whole Principality of the Kings of England.

The Prince of Wales ſubmits to England.

Here Matth. Paris complains of the State of England at this Time, which by the King's Flexibility was become the ordinary Prey of ſometimes one Sort of Strangers, and ſometimes another, as Poictovins, Italians, Germans and Provencials. But no Kind of Strangers then ſo much infeſted England as the Romans, of whom there ſwarm'd three Sorts; Uſurers, who were the Pope's Merchants; Italian Clerks, vile and illiterate Perſons, who being arm'd with the Pope's Bulls and Cenſures, poſſeſs'd themſelves of many ſpiritual Revenues; and Farmers and Procters for the Romans, who ſubtlely ſcraping together whatever was of Value in the Land, ſent it over the Sea to their luxurious Maſters. And as theſe Papal Engines acted here in England, ſo they did with others at Rome, the Governors of that Church not ſeeking to win Mens Souls but their Mony, oppreſſing the Religious by Puniſhments, Uſuries and Simonies, without any Care of Juſtice and Honeſty; which caus'd the Greek Church at this Time to fall quite away, and to oppoſe it ſelf againſt that of Rome. England had then no leſs Cauſe than Greece; but as Pope Gregory knew that the only Way to keep England firm, was to ſecure the King, ſo the King ſaw no Way to curb his Barons, but by yielding to the Pope, tho' with ſo many inſufferable Miſchiefs. And for ſome ſuch Deſign Cardinal Otto the Pope's Legate was ſent into England, utterly againſt the Will of the Peers, and eſpecially of the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, who publickly reprov'd the King for allowing of it, declaring it dangerous to the Kingdom. Yet ſome good Offices were at firſt perform'd by the Legate; particularly in a Treaty of Peace begun between the two Kings of England and Scotland at York, where Otto interpos'd himſelf, and occaſion'd a final Agreement. Notwithſtanding this, the Barons were inrag'd to ſee the King ſo addicted to the Will of the Romans, and the Legate, for which the Earl of Cornwall his Brother reprov'd him as carrying himſelf more like the Pope's Penſioner than a King. By which the King began to be ſo ſenſible of his Authority, that when the Legate call'd a National Synod at St. Paul's, he ſent Meſſengers to forbid him on the Behalf of the King and Kingdom, Not to attempt any Thing that was againſt the Crown and Royal Dignity.

Uſurpations of the Church of Rome.

A. D. 1238. Reg. 22/23. About this Time Simon Montfort, an active and vigorous Man, ſo wrought himſelf into Favour, that the King with his own Hands privately gave him his Siſter Eleanor, Widow to the late Earl of Pembroke, notwithſtanding ſhe had vow'd her ſelf a Nun. This being known to the Earl of Cornwall, and the diſcontented Lords, it was highly reſented, becauſe the King according to his Promiſe had not firſt conſulted them, as in all Matters of Moment; inſomuch that none but Earl Hubert adher'd to the forſaken King. The Earl of Cornwall was the Head of this Defection, of whom Men generally hop'd, That he would now free the Nation from the great Oppreſſions of Romans and other Strangers. Upon which the Legate undertook to adviſe him, alledging, That if the whole Nation roſe againſt the King, yet he being his own Brother, ought to adhere to adhere to him. To whom the Earl reply'd, That it was not ſtrange that he ſhould be ſo concern'd for the preſent Condition of the Kingdom, ſince he was the only Heir apparent to the Crown: And tho' ſo many Profits accru'd to the King, yet by the great Gifts beſtow'd to the Queen's Relations, the Treaſury was exhauſted, when the Kingdom was inviron'd with Enemies and Strangers, who were enrich'd with the Church Revenues and Benefices founded by his pious Anceſtors. The Legate finding that neither Threats nor Promiſes would prevail upon the Barons of this Party, but that their Inclinations were bent towards the Earl, he adviſ'd the King to appoint the firſt Sunday in Lent to give his poſitive Anſwer. Upon which Day the Nobility met at London, guarded with Horſe and Arms, to compel the King to the Performance of his Promiſes; and at length, after many Debates, the King promiſ'd to ſubmit himſelf to the Determination of ſome of the moſt grave and diſcreet Men; which Agreement was reduc'd to Writing, and ſeal'd both by the Legate and the Nobility.

M. Paris. Not long after, the King going to Woodſtock, a Traitor was ſeiz'd there who deſign'd to aſſaſſinate his Majeſty; for which he was drawn in Pieces by Horſes at Coventry. About the ſame Time the Legate was in no leſs Danger at Oxford, where being at firſt honourably entertain'd by the Univerſity in Ouſney Abby, the Pride of his Romans there prov'd ſo inſupportable, that a Company of the younger Students, being provok'd to arm themſelves, not only ſlew the Legate's Kinſman, but would have done the ſame to the Legate himſelf, whom they term'd an Uſurer, a Simoniack, a Perverter of the King, and a Subverter of the Kingdom, enriching Strangers with the Spoils of the Natives. But abſconding himſelf, he at Midnight eſcap'd over the River, not without Danger of drowning, and fled to the King for Protection. For which Outrage, the King ſending a Troop of Soldiers, impriſon'd thirty of the Offenders; and the Legate interdicted the whole Univerſity; 'till all the Biſhops of England, who met purpoſely at a Synod, pleaded for a Relaxation. To whoſe Importunity the haughty Legate would not condeſcend, unleſs all the Biſhops would yield to go on Foot with the Students from St. Paul's Church to the Legate's Houſe, which was about a Mile diſtant, who there without Gowns, Caps or Shoes, ſhould humbly crave Abſolution; all which was accordingly perform'd.

The Pope's Legate in Danger.

Ibid. Not long after the Legate was recall'd to Rome by the Pope, upon Notice of the daily Offences given to England; but by the earneſt Endeavours of the King, who fear'd leſt the Nobility ſhould prevail againſt him, he was detain'd as a neceſſary Evil to eſtabliſh Peace. About the ſame Time he created Simon Montfort Earl of Leiceſter, but ſhortly after broke ſuddenly with him, alledging That he had firſt corrupted his Siſter, and to cover her Shame he permitted the Marriage. He likewiſe receiv'd Stephen Segrave again into his Favour and Council; ſo unconſtant was this Prince, that he ſcarce lov'd or hated, but according to the Influence and Suggeſtions of thoſe about him. Yet at length he began to diſcover the indirect Practices of his beloved Legate, whoſe great Friend, Peter Saracen, having been taken Priſoner by the Emperor, and obliged to pay ten thouſand Pounds for his Ranſom, this ſhameleſs Man adviſ'd the King to bind himſelf and his Crown for the Payment of it. By which the King perceiving what Toyls were laid to inſnare him, in a great Rage ſwore, That he repented he had ever admitted the Legate into the Land, to devour all its Wealth. And the Biſhops of the Nation, meeting in a Synod at London to redreſs the Oppreſſions of the Engliſh Church, told the Legate in plain Terms, That the Importunity of the Romans had ſo long exhauſted their Church Revenues, that they would no longer endure it. Shortly after when the Legate was entring Scotland, the King of that Country met him, and declar'd to him, That never any Legate had enter'd there before, and there was no Occaſion for any at this Time; for Chriſtianity and the Church was then in a proſperous Condition. But by the Mediation of ſome Friends, it was agreed under the the Hand and Seal of the Legate, That this ſhould not be drawn into a Precedent; whereupon the Legate enter'd Scotland, and held a Synod at Edinburgh, and having extorted what Mony he could, he return'd privately to England. About the ſame Time the variable King caus'd ſeveral Articles of Treaſon and high Miſdemeanors to be exhibited in his Court againſt his faithful Hubert, pretended to be committed while the Management of publick Affairs paſs'd through his Hands: To all which he anſwer'd with ſuch Modeſty and Submiſſion, and ſo fully to the Purpoſe, that all who heard him were ſatisfy'd of his Innocence; tho' the King and all his Lawyers did their utmoſt to prove him guilty. However the King's Anger was no ways abated, 'till he had reſign'd four of his beſt Caſtles, Blanch Caſtle, Groſmund in Wales, Screnefrith and Hatfield. In the ſame Year, on the ſixteenth Day of June, Queen Eleanor was deliver'd of a Son nam'd Edward, afterwards King of England.

A. D. 1240. Reg. 24, 25.

About the ſame Time the Emperor Frederick being excommunicated by the Pope, afterwards by his Ambaſſadors complain'd to King Henry, That he ſeemed to have forgot his Alliance and Marriage with his Siſter, when he ſuffer'd the Pope's Sentence of Excommunication againſt him to be publiſh'd in his Kingdom, and had inconſiderately allow'd the Pope's Legate as Coadjutor in theſe Practices againſt him; wherefore he deſir'd that the Legate might be expell'd England, as the Enemy and Pillager of his Subjects. To whom the King moſt diſhonourably anſwer'd, That he ought to obey the Pope, and his Eccleſiaſtical Commands, becauſe he was his Tributary and Feudatary. However he adviſ'd the Legate to leave his Kingdom, to prevent further Miſchiefs, and incenſing the Emperor; yet he found Pretences to ſtay 'till the following Year, and in the mean Time to extort unreaſonable Sums from the Clergy and others. There were alſo Commands given to the Italian Uſurers, by the King, To leave the moſt pure Earth of his Realm, as he phras'd it; but, as M. Paris adds, by giving the King Mony, which is too much us'd to juſtifie the Impious, they for the moſt Part remain'd ſtill, being unwilling to forſake ſuch rich Paſtures. Whether upon Diſcontent for theſe burdenſom Times, or otherwiſe, Richard Earl of Cornwall took upon him the Croſs, began his Voyage to the Holy-Land, and left his Son Henry to the King his Brother's Care; and not long after was follow'd by William Longſpee Earl of Salisbury, and ſeveral other Engliſh Noblemen, that attended him.

A. D. 1241. Reg. 25, 26.

At length, after near four Years Continuance, the Legate being commanded by the Pope to return, took his ſolemn Leave of the King, and parted with many tender Sighs and Embraces. No Man but the King lamented his Departure; for, ſetting aſide the Holy Veſſels and Ornaments of the Churches, he had drawn more Riches from the Clergy than he left behind; beſides he had occaſion'd three hundred rich Benefices and Prebendaries to be given to the Pope's Creatures, and reſerv'd for his own Uſe. Upon his Departure, Peter of Savoy the Queen's Uncle arriv'd, whom the King entertain'd with great Magnificence, and gave him the Earldom of Richmond. This and the like Bounties to Strangers occaſion'd ſtill more Hatred againſt the King, who in favour of his Queen, procur'd her Uncle Boniface to be choſen Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, the Rents of which were then above four thouſand Marks per annum. Edmund his Predeceſſor, being weary of the Pope's Exactions and Oppreſſions in England, had made choice of a voluntary Exile at Pountney in France, where he dy'd with the Honour and Opinion of a Saint. In the ſame Year dy'd two great Ladies of the Royal Blood of England; firſt, Iſabella, the Empreſs, and the King's eldeſt Siſter, in Childbed, to the great Grief of the Emperor her Husband; next, Eleanor, Siſter to Arthur Duke of Bretaign, who having been kept Priſoner thirty nine Years, deceas'd in the Caſtle of Briſtol, without ever being marry'd. This laſt was a Lady of a noble Spirit, ever inſiſting upon her Right to the Crown; who upon her Death left a more indiſputable Title to King Henry, than ever he had before.

VI. The King's Imployments had hitherto been almoſt wholly taken up in Civil Diſturbances, or in the too patient Bearing of ſome foreign Grievances, nouriſh'd within his own Kingdom; which gave him perhaps little Leiſure, Means, or Inclination to purſue any Tranſmarine Action. But now having with great Oppoſition furniſh'd himſelf with Mony and Men, he took Shipping immediately after Eaſter towards Poictou, where the Earl of Marche, now Huſband to Queen Iſabel his Mother, expected his Arrival. He committed the Government of the Land to the Arch-Biſhop of York; and took with him the Earl of Cornwall, lately return'd with much Honour from the Holy-Land, and ſeven other Earls, with about three hundred Knights, beſides other Soldiers. To reſiſt the Engliſh, the King of France, who had given Poictou to his Brother Alphonſo, aſſembled a powerful Army of four thouſand Men of Arms, and about twenty thouſand Soldiers, with a thouſand Carriages. And laying Siege to Fronteney, a Caſtle belonging to the Earl of Marche, King Henry ſent a Meſſenger of Defiance to him, as a Breaker of the Truce. Lewis, a juſt and valiant Prince, deny'd That ever he broke the Truce; but that the King of England had been the Aggreſſor in joining with ſuch as were Rebels againſt him. Yet, provided that the Engliſh would not protect his Enemies the Earls of Marche, Tholouſe and others, he offer'd to give him Poictou, and a great Part of Normandy, in Satisfaction of his Father's Oath, and further to prolong the laſt Truce three Years more. Theſe Conditions, ſo honourable and advantagious to the King of England, by the Practices of the Poictovins, who fear'd the French King's Anger would prove too heavy for them, if the Engliſh abandon'd their Cauſe, were unfortunately refus'd.

The King's Deſigns in France.

The fair Offers of the French King refus'd.

Ibid.

Upon this Refuſal, the French King expreſs'd much Concern for the Oaths that his Father had made to King Henry when he left England, of delivering up his Dominions in France. But one of his Miniſters reply'd, That the Oath was mutual, and that the King of England had broken it when he caus'd Conſtantine a Citizen of London to be hang'd for defending his Father's Honour. This weak Pretence ſatisfy'd the King's Scruples for the preſent; and proceeding in his Attacks upon the Caſtle of Fronteney, took it with the Earl of Marche's Son, and above four hundred other Priſoners. When ſome adviſ'd him That the Earl's Son and the reſt might be executed as a Terror to other Rebels, he generouſly reply'd, The Son has obey'd his Father, and the reſt the Command of their Lord, upon which account neither of them deſerve Death. After this, Lewis march'd directly to Tailleburgh where King Henry was incamp'd, who now perceiv'd that he was utterly diſappointed by the Earl of Marche, and in great Danger: Therefore expoſtulating with the Earl How he had perform'd his Promiſe of procuring Men, if he ſupply'd him with Mony? the Earl reply'd, He never made ſuch a Promiſe, and if any Writing was ſeal'd to that Effect, it was all the Contrivance of his Wife, the King's Mother. Immediately Earl Richard diſarm'd himſelf, and with a Truncheon in his Hand went to the French Camp, where he was kindly and honourably receiv'd; and deſiring a ſhort Truce of the King, he obtain'd one for a Day and a Night: By which means King Henry his Brother had an Opportunity of eſcaping with his Army, tho' not without great Diſhonour and Difficulty. The Earl of Marche now repenting of his Attempts, ſubmitted to the French King, and made private Articles for himſelf; ſo that King Henry being abandon'd, was oblig'd to fly into Gaſcony. Upon which the Cities of Xaintes, Ponti, and all the reſt of Poictou, forthwith ſubmitted to King Lewis; only Hertold Governor of Mirabel Caſtle went to the King of England, and implor'd his Protection; to whom the King reply'd, That he was betray'd by the Earl of Marche, and was ſcarce able to ſecure his own Perſon, therefore he had leave to act according to his Diſcretion. Upon this he went to the King of France, and ſubmitted himſelf to his Protection, and that King anſwer'd, That he only had behav'd himſelf faithfully to his Soveraign, and therefore receiv'd the Caſtle and Himſelf very kindly; and having firſt taken an Oath of Fealty, generouſly reſtor'd it to him again. The further Proſecution of this War was hinder'd by Sickneſs and Famine, which much afflicted the French Army; which at length occaſion'd a five Year's Truce between the two Kings. Lewis return'd to Paris, and Henry retir'd to his City of Bourdeux in Gaſcony; where, being govern'd by the Counſels of the King of Arragon and the Earl of Tholouſe, he ſpent the Winter in Softneſs and Pleaſure, as tho' no Diſhonour had befallen him. Here his Queen Eleanor bore a Daughter call'd Beatrix.

A Truce between the Kings of England and France.

A. D. 1243. Reg. 27/28.

In the following Year the five Years Truce between the two Kings was ſolemnly confirm'd; by which Agreement the King of France was not only to retain whatever he had gain'd by the Sword, but alſo to receive five thouſand Pounds every Year from the King of England: To ſuch diſhonourable Terms was this poor Prince by his own Inconſiderateneſs reduc'd. His Return was long expected in England, yet much delay'd by the Gaſcoigns, by reaſon of the Mony he expended amongſt them; ſo that he could not arrive at his own Kingdom before the twenty fifth Day of September. By reaſon of this expenſive Voyage, he ſoon became very burdenſome to his Subjects, as well by the Levy of Scutage, as by forc'd Loans, and other Methods. The Jews alſo felt the Severity of his Wants ſo far, that Chriſtians commiſerated their Condition; whoſe Gold he receiv'd with his own Hands, and their Silver by thoſe of his Officers. Theſe and other importunate Corraſions, were not only us'd to fill up ſuch Breaches as the French Affairs had produc'd, but alſo to ſpend on Shows and Entertainments. For on the firſt of November, Beatrix Counteſs of Provence, the Queen's Mother, arriv'd in England, being receiv'd at London with all imaginable Pomp and Magnificence. She brought her Daughter Cynthia with her, who on the twenty third of the ſame Month was marry'd to the King's Brother Earl Richard; and the Nuptials were celebrated with ſuch Splendor and Feaſting, that no leſs than thirty thouſand Diſhes were provided for the Entertainment.

King Henry returns with Diſhonour from France.

Ibid.

A. D. 1244. Reg. 28/29.

Theſe new Expences occaſion'd a further Want in the King's Coffers, and therefore he call'd a Parliament for a new Supply; to whom he promis'd To obſerve the Liberties ſworn to at his Coronation, and granted in his Charters, and further declar'd, That his Honour and theirs ſhould be inſeparable. Upon which the whole Body beſought him To remember 'how often he had re-'ceiv'd Mony from his faithful Subjects, without performing his Promiſes; 'That after the taking of Bedford, he had Carrucage, two Shillings upon eve-'ry Plough-Land; the Year after, a Fifteenth upon all their Moveables: Up-'on his Paſſage into Bretaign he had no ſmall Sums from the Prelates, Mona-'ſteries, Burgeſſes and Jews: After his Return he had Scutage, three Marks 'upon every Knight's Fee; then a Fortieth of all Moveables; a while after, a 'Thirtieth; ſhortly after, for the Marriage of his Daughter to the Emperor, 'two Marks upon every Plough-Land; and at his Son's Birth, by Preſents he 'had heap'd up conſiderable Sums. Again when he went into Gaſcony, he had 'rais'd vaſt Quantities of Mony from all Sorts of People, and upon his Return, 'after he had been deluded and diſhonour'd, he had in a manner fleec'd his 'Subjects. Yet ſtill, under the Name of Aid for the Marriage of the King's eldeſt Daughter, they granted him twenty Shillings upon every Knight's Fee, to be paid at Eaſter and Michaelmaſs. To which they added this ſevere Expoſtulation, How well the King will keep his Promiſes, in Requital of the paſt and preſent Contributions, he only knows to whom nothing is unknown. But ſuch as endeavour'd to ſtrengthen the Pope's Deſigns, by raiſing Mony from the Engliſh Clergy, met with a conſtant Oppoſition; not only through the Unwillingneſs of the Clergy, but alſo becauſe the Emperor had written to the King, in expreſs Terms, That if he ſuffer'd any Contributions for the Pope, he would certainly revenge it upon all the Engliſh that fell into his Hands.

In

Powel. M. Paris. &c. In the mean Time, Griffin Brother to David Prince of Wales, after a long Impriſonment in the Tower, endeavouring to eſcape, loſt his Life by the Breaking of the Rope that ſhould have given him his Liberty; which Accident occaſion'd his Brother David to revolt and take up Arms, notwithſtanding the ſolemn Submiſſion he had made three Years before. And to ſupport his Deſigns, in Imitation of King John, he put himſelf under the Protection of the Pope, offering him an annual Tribute of five hundred Marks; all which produc'd no great Effect. At the ſame Time that the King receiv'd the News of the Welſh Inſurrection, he alſo heard, That the King of the Scots had declar'd, He would not hold the leaſt Piece of Earth of the King of England. For the Management of this double War, he firſt march'd into the North, where at Newcaſtle, by means of the Death of the principal Incendiary, and the Mediation of others, all Conteſts between the two Kings were adjuſted, according to thoſe Articles formerly made between them at the City of York. The Welſh being now leſs formidable, the King ſent but a ſmall Part of his Army againſt them, under the Conduct of Hubert Fitz-Mathew; but through their own Neglect, and the Vigilance of the Welſh, Hubert and all his Men were defeated and diſpers'd. The News of this Diſhonour ſo affected the King, that he reſolv'd to ſend a powerful Army againſt the Welſh; but when he deſir'd a Subſidy of his Parliament for that purpoſe, he was with one Voice and Mind deny'd; tho' at the ſame time his Debts to Foreign Merchants for Wines and other Neceſſaries, were ſo numerous and ſo continually remember'd, that he could ſcarce paſs abroad without their Clamours. Yet the News he receiv'd from Gaſcony, That his Lieutenant De Molis had defeated the King of Navarre, did ſomewhat mitigate theſe Misfortunes; and at the ſame Time Robert Paſſeleu by his ſevere fining ſuch as had encroach'd upon the King's Foreſts, in a ſhort Time fill'd his Coffers beyond all Expectation.

and with Scotland.

The King's ill Succeſs.

M. Paris. Weſtmin. The great Benefits the King found from his new Supplies, caus'd him daily to conſider how to augment them, and put a Stop to all foreign Hindrances and Out-lets. Upon the Departure of Otto, the Pope's Legate, who had vaſtly inrich'd both himſelf and his Maſter, it was hop'd that the Nation ſhould have found ſome Eaſe from the Romiſh Extortions; but it prov'd otherwiſe; for, as M. Paris complains, new Agents and Factors ſtill came over, as if England had been an unexhauſtible Spring, and Rome a bottomleſs Gulf. Upon which Account the King had wrot both to this Pope and his Predeceſſor, deſiring them To deſiſt from thus afflicting England with their Exactions; yet out of Fear of him whom he had acknowledg'd his Soveraign, and a Deſire of more Power, he ſupported the Romiſh Miniſters, againſt the Pleaſure of the whole Nation. Which ſo incourag'd the preſent Pope, that he deſign'd to make a Viſit into England himſelf; to which purpoſe he caus'd his Cardinals to write their perſuaſory Letters to the King, as a Thing highly conducing to his Safety, and to his Kingdom's Immortal Glory, to enjoy the Preſence of the Lord Pope, who greatly deſir'd to ſee the Delicacies of Weſtminſter, and the Riches of London. But the King's Council expreſly declar'd to him, That the Rapines and Simonies of the Romans had ſufficiently ſtain'd the Purity of England, without the Pope's coming perſonally to pillage the Wealth of the Church and Kingdom. Tho' the Pope was refus'd Entrance in Perſon, yet his Rapines were ſtill carry'd on by his Factor and Chaplain Martin; inſomuch that ſeveral of the Peers, commiſerating the Condition of the Land, took Order for a ſtrict Watch at all the Ports of England, that all Letters from Rome ſhould be ſtopp'd. Shortly after the King order'd a ſtrict Enquiry to be made into each County of the true Value of the Benefices which the Italian Clergy-Men then enjoy'd in England by the Gift of the Pope; and they were found to amount to ſixty thouſand Marks per Annum, which at that Time exceeded the whole Revenue of the Crown. Upon which Report the King became fully ſenſible of the inſatiable Avarice of the Romiſh Church, but all that he durſt do was to permit a ſharp Epiſtle to be written in the Name of the general Body of the Nation, in which they ſet forth the execrable Extortions and Exactions of the Pope's Legates and Nuntio's, and ſent it to the Pope then ſitting in a Council at Lyons. Here, the Pope giving dilatory and uncertain Anſwers, Earl Bigot and the reſt of the King's Agents, with terrible Threats and Oaths declar'd, That they would remedy that themſelves, which the Pope would not. And indeed the Nobility at home had already begun to act to that Effect, having commanded Martin to depart out of the Land, or he and all his Company ſhould be cut in pieces. Who departing in Haſte, ſo inrag'd the Pope with the News of this Uſage, that he declar'd thus, It is full Time that we make Peace with the Emperor, that ſo we may humble theſe rebellious petty Princes; for the great Dragon being once pacify'd, the ſmaller Serpents will eaſily be trodden under foot. Then to let King Henry ſee his Power, he ſent to all the Biſhops of England, commanding them that each ſhould ſet his Seal to that Charter of Tribute which King John had unhappily granted; which theſe timorous Biſhops perform'd, greatly to the Nation's Damage, and their own Reproach. The King at firſt ſhew'd his Reſentments, and declar'd That he would never comply with ſuch Baſeneſs; but wanting Conſtancy and Courage, he in a ſhort Time return'd to his wonted Tameneſs and Submiſſion.

The Pope's Pride.

The Welſh Affairs growing very troubleſome by reaſon of the caſual Death of Fitz-Mathew, the King prepar'd to ſuppreſs their Inſults in Perſon: In order to which the King came to St. Paul's Church, and there took leave of the Citizens of London, after a familiar and popular Manner. And that neither War nor Want ſhould make him forget his Magnificence, he began to pull down the old Abby Church at Weſtminſter, and new build it in that ſtately Manner in which it remains to this Day. But all that he did in Wales for near two Months, was to build the Caſtle of Gannock, which he finiſh'd with great Difficulty, and put a ſtrong Garriſon into it; and the Winter approaching, he deſtroy'd all the Victuals and Forage upon the Borders, and the inward Parts of Wales, and then return'd with his Army into England. For this Expedition the King pawn'd his Jewels to his Brother Richard for three thouſand Marks. Here M. Paris has a long Liſt of great Perſons, who dying about this Time, left neither Name nor Iſſue to preſerve the Memory of their Grandeur; but none ſo remarkable as the Earls of Pembroke, of whom there were five ſucceſſive Brothers, who dying left the noble Earldom, with a mighty Eſtate in England, Ireland and Wales, to be divided between five Siſters, all marry'd to the greateſt Men of the Nation. Our Author aſcribes this ſudden Failure of the Heir Males to the Curſe of an Iriſh Biſhop upon their Father, who for taking away ſome Lands belonging to his See, and refuſing to reſtore them, pray'd that God would ſhew ſome remarkable Judgment upon his Family.

A. D. 1246. Reg. 30/31.

The King finding himſelf free from foreign Troubles, now apply'd himſelf to the Reformation of the inward Maladies of his Dominions; and for that End he call'd a full Parliament to London, to which he deliver'd in Writing the Sum of the Grievances both in Church and State: As Firſt, 'That the Pope had ex-'torted great Contributions of the Clergy, without the King's Conſent, againſt 'the Rights and Liberties of the Kingdom. Secondly, That Patrons could not 'beſtow their Livings on fit Perſons, becauſe the Pope gave them to his Ro-'mans, who could not ſpeak Engliſh, but impoveriſh'd the Nation by carrying 'away the Coin. Thirdly, That the Pope's Proviſions and Penſions were exor-'bitant and inſupportable. Fourthly, That Engliſh Men were drawn out of 'their Country to finiſh their Cauſes abroad. And Fifthly, That the Pope 'by his Clauſe of Non Obſtante vacated Oaths, Cuſtoms, Charters, Grants, 'Statutes, Rights and Privileges. Upon which the King, Prelates, Earls, Barons, Abbots and Priors, did all write their ſeveral Complaints to the Pope, requiring ſpeedy Redreſs of thoſe infinite Injuries to the King and all his Subjects, who would rather die than thus daily endure ſuch Oppreſſions. Notwithſtanding, ſtanding, ſeveral Prelates, out of Fear or Ambition, privately promoted the Pope's Deſigns, when he ſecretly requir'd an annual Tallage of the Clergy for the Maintenance of his Soldiers; and that the State ſhould have no Notice of it, he caus'd them to ſwear not to reveal this Contribution to any Man for the Space of half a Year. Yet the King came to the Knowledge of it, and by Proclamation commanded that the Mony ſhould not be carry'd out of the Land, and that none of his Subjects ſhould contribute any Mony to the Pope: But it came to no great Effect, for ſome Romanizing Biſhops and ambitious Clerks of his Council, fearing the Papal Threats, drew him to leave his Purpoſe weakly, which he had manfully undertaken. The Biſhop of Worceſter, a principal Agent, was ſaid to have Authority from the Pope to Interdict the Land, which was the main Thing the King fear'd, and which, as our Author freely writes, was not worth his Fears; and the Earl of Cornwall alſo with others, labour'd to promote the Pope's Intereſt, ſo that the wonted Extortions were as current as ever. And further the Pope granted to Boniface, now Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, a Foreigner and Uncle to the Queen, a Bull for levying a Tax of ten thouſand Marks in ſeven Years Time upon the Biſhops and Clergy of his Province, to diſcharge, as it was pretended, the Debts of the Archbiſhoprick.

But to little Effect.

M. Paris. &c. If we ſhould ſo often inſiſt upon the Relation of this Kingdom's Misfortunes, as the Pope's endleſs Corraſions, and the State's repeated Complaints give us Occaſion, we ſhould overburden the Reader with diſmal Matter, which Monks themſelves have mournfully and copiouſly ſet forth, ſhowing the too ſervile Affections of our Anceſtors, who ſtill enter'd upon new Conſultations about the Diſeaſe, but never brought the Remedy to its right uſe. For upon freſh Extortions from Rome, the King again aſſembled his Parliament to think of a Redreſs, the whole State, as well Clergy as Laity, being reduc'd to ſuch a low Condition as was never known before; of which they again made their heavy Complaints, who were to protect the Land from ſuch Wrongs and Miſchiefs. Their only Remedy was again to write Letters to the Pope, which ſlender Force he could eaſily diſſipate; and tho', to put a Stop to preſent Clamours, he promis'd never to ſend any Legates into England, but at the State's Requeſt, yet he daily ſent his exacting Clerks, with the Power, tho' not with the Title and Enſigns of Legates, ſo to delude the King, and impoſe upon his Subjects. In the midſt of theſe unhappy Times, the King ſummon'd all his Peers to meet on the Feſtival of St. Edward, the thirteenth of October, partly, as the Writ of Summons ſets forth, To hear the good News of a Benefit conferr'd on England from Heav'n, partly to celebrate the Tranſlation of that Martyr, and partly for the Solemnity of Knighting William de Valentia, the King's Half Brother. The good News they were to hear was, That a Portion of our Saviour's Blood was ſent to the King from Jeruſalem; which with great Reverence and Devotion, the King himſelf in a mean Habit carry'd on Foot, from St. Paul's Church to Weſtminſter, where it was carefully repoſited.

Ibid. As the Pope continually wanted Mony from this Kingdom, ſo did the King alſo: For which Reaſon he ſummon'd a Parliament at London, and requir'd of the Members to grant him a pecuniary Aid. But inſtead of complying, they reprov'd him, For asking it without bluſhing, ſeeing when they granted the laſt, he promis'd by his Charter, That he would no more burden his Nobility. Moreover they blam'd him For his repeated Kindneſſes and Liberalities to Foreigners, and Contempt of his Native Subjects, for not encouraging the Trade of his own Kingdom, and in exacting unreaſonable Gifts from Merchants: And laſtly, For keeping Biſhopricks and Monaſteries void in his own Hands. To which they added, That neither the Juſticiary, Chancellor, nor Treaſurer, were made by the Common-Council of the Kingdom, as they were in his Predeceſſor's Reign. The King inwardly touch'd at this, promis'd, That what was amiſs ſhould be ſpeedily redreſs'd; to which the whole Body return'd Anſwer, That as they had often, ſo they would now patiently wait a while; and according cording as his Promiſes were perform'd, ſo ſhould their Obedience be. Upon which the Matter was defer'd for three or four Months; and meeting again the King made a Speech to them to this Effect, That they had not treated their King civilly, but would impoſe mean and ſervile Conditions upon him; and what each of them in private thought to be his Right was deny'd him, even that Authority which every Maſter exercis'd in his Family, who might uſe what Counſel, and might chuſe what Servants he thought fit in his own Houſe, but this they deny'd to their Soveraign: And as Servants ought not to judge or impoſe any Difficulties upon their Lord, ſo neither might Vaſſals upon their Prince; therefore he reſolv'd to remove none of his Miniſters at their Pleaſure. Yet notwithſtanding he expected a pecuniary Aid, for the Recovery of his Rights beyond the Seas, which was their Concern as well as his. They all unanimouſly reply'd, That they would no longer impoveriſh themſelves to inrich Foreigners: So the King was left to furniſh himſelf by the Sale of his Jewels, Plate, and other valuable Goods; and being told that he might find Buyers in London, he reply'd, That if the Treaſury of Auguſtus were to be ſold, the Citizens of London were able to purchaſe it.

He reſents the Affront.

A. D. 1249. Reg. 33/34. The Affairs of Gaſcony, which had been greatly diſturb'd by one Guaſto de Biard, were now by the Courage and Conduct of Simon Montfort Earl of Leiceſter, reduc'd to good Order; which render'd his Preſence very acceptable in the Court of England. The King intending to promote that Enterprize afreſh againſt the following Spring, left no Methods untry'd, which either by Art or inceſſant Intreaties he could uſe to repleniſh his exhauſted Coffers. In which he too much debas'd the Royal Name and Dignity of a King, declaring to ſeveral, whoſe Bounty he crav'd, That it was more Charity to aſſiſt him with Mony, than one that went begging from Door to Door. In the mean Time the King neglected not the Adminiſtration of Juſtice; for, whereas the whole County of Hampſhire was infeſted with Felons, Robbers and Murderers, he ſo manag'd the Affair, by ſitting in Perſon at Wincheſter Caſtle, that the Infamy and Danger of thoſe Places were clear'd by hanging the chief Offenders, many of whom were wealthy, and ſome the King's own Servants; the latter of whom pleaded, That the King had for a long Time ſtopp'd their Wages, ſo that they were oblig'd either to ſell their Horſes and Equipage, or live upon Robberies. The King, now deſirous to be Friends with the Citizens of London, to whom of late he had been too hard and extorting, publickly reconcil'd himſelf to them, whom for that Cauſe he commanded to appear at Weſtminſter, and there immediately undertook the Cruſado, and receiv'd the Badge from Arch-Biſhop Boniface; but whatever his Intentions were, he himſelf never came to Action. In the mean Time, contrary to the Example of his Anceſtors, he ſo much abridg'd the Expences of his Houſe, and his Alms, that he juſtly ſuſtain'd ſome diſhonourable Imputations. Nevertheleſs he began wiſely to extricate himſelf out of many Merchants Debts; towards which he forc'd great Aids from the Jews, as being the ordinary Clippers and Defacers of his Coin, and the Forgers of Seals and Charters; from one of whom he had at ſeveral Times got thirty thouſand Marks of Silver, beſides two hundred Marks in Gold. And to get more Mony he ſent a ſevere Inquiſitor to ſearch into the Tranſgreſſions upon Foreſts; which Charge he executed with that Violence and Extortion upon the Gentry, that tho' he rais'd large Sums, yet it loſt him the Affections of his People, when he came afterwards to ſtand in moſt need of them.

The King, now wholly intent upon raiſing of Mony, neither gave any rich Preſents according to the ancient Cuſtom of England, nor would put on his Royal Robes, but ſtill ſhorten'd the Allowances of his Houſhold and Entertainments, without any Regard to Majeſty or Cenſure. his chief Favourites, which they rather look'd upon as a Debt than a Courteſie. This was the diſhonourable State of the King's Court at this Time: Yet in the greateſt Wants, and moſt rigorous Parſimony, he could not defend himſelf againſt the Suits and Preferments of his Poictovins and Provencials; ſo that it became a common Murmur in England, Our Inheritance is converted to Aliens, and our Houſes to Strangers: And what was yet more grievous, their Pride and Violence were inſupportable. In theſe unhappy Times the Clauſe of Non Obſtante, firſt introduc'd by the Pope, was taken up in England by the King, in his Grants and Charters, as Non obſtante priore Mandato, and Non obſtante antiqua Libertate, and the like; which our Author calls a deteſtable Clauſe: And Roger de Thurkeby, one of the King's Juſtices, at the firſt Sight of it, with a deep Sigh cry'd out, Alas, to what Times are we arriv'd! The Civil Court is corrupted by the Eccleſiaſtical, and the River is poiſon'd from that Fountain.

Ibid. Many took the Advantage of theſe Times, among the reſt Henry de Bath, one of the King's Juſticiaries, who by his Briberies and Extortions had rais'd a great Eſtate upon the Ruin of others; for which he was accus'd to the King, who oblig'd him to appear before the next Parliament at London. At the appointed Time he came with a magnificent Train of his own and his Lady's Relations, hoping by that means to turn the Edge of Juſtice. Beſides other Crimes, he was accus'd of incenſing the whole Baronage againſt the King, which had endanger'd a general Sedition; and the King was ſo highly provok'd againſt him, that he caus'd it to be proclaim'd in his own Court and in London, That if any Perſon had any Complaint againſt Henry de Bath, he might come in and be heard. Upon which one of his Fellow-Juſtices charg'd him with acquitting a notorious Criminal for a great Bribe; which further ſo inrag'd the King, that ſtanding up he raſhly cry'd out, That if any Man would kill Henry de Bath, he would pardon him; and he had ſoon been diſpatch'd, had not the Prudence of John Manſel, and the Threats of the Biſhop of London ſecur'd him from further Violence. But at length having made Earl Richard his Friend, by great Preſents, through his Mediation, and the Promiſe of two thouſand Marks, he gain'd his Liberty, return'd to Court, and was receiv'd into Favour: For at this Time Juſtice, and all other Things became ſaleable. In the ſame Year, part of Wales was wholly ſubdu'd, and receiv'd the Engliſh Laws; and the North-Eaſt Parts were committed to the Government of Alun de Zouch, who farm'd them at eleven Hundred Marks per Annum. About the ſame Time the Community of London ſwore Allegiance to Prince Edward, ſaving the Fidelity they ow'd to the King his Father, who then alſo granted them a Confirmation of all Liberties they enjoy'd in the Reign of King Henry the Firſt; for which Charter they paid the King five hundred Marks.

King of Scotland, now about twelve Years of Age, ſent Ambaſſadors to King Henry, deſiring the laſt Peace between the two Nations might be ratify'd, as well as the Agreement of a Marriage between himſelf and the Lady Margaret the King's Daughter. Upon which Motion, both the Kings met on Chriſtmaſs at York, where King Henry firſt knighted young Alexander, and the next Day gave him his Daughter Margaret in Marriage. The Nuptials were ſolemniz'd with a mighty Confluence of Prelates and Noblemen out of England, Scotland and France, beſides two Kings, three Queens, a thouſand Engliſh, and ſix hundred Scotch Knights, who all appear'd in the moſt ſplendid Apparel and Equipage. The Arch-Biſhop of York, who was Prince of the Northern Parts, gave ſixty fat Oxen towards the Nuptial Dinner, and was at the further Expence of four thouſand Marks. Upon the Marriage Alexander did Homage to King Henry for Lothian and the other Lands he held of him; but being alſo demanded to do the ſame Homage for the Kingdom of Scotland, as his Predeceſſors ceſſors had done, the young King wiſely reply'd, That he came thither at the King of England's Invitation, and by this Marriage to unite himſelf more firmly to him, but unprepar'd to give an Anſwer to ſuch Difficulties, without conſulting his Nobility. King Henry hearing this modeſt Reply, would preſs him no further, leſt the deſign'd Mirth and Jollity ſhould be diſturb'd, but reſerv'd it to a more convenient Opportunity.

Not long after the Noblemen of Gaſcony ſent over great and many Complaints to the King againſt their Governor Simon Montfort Earl of Leiceſter, who upon that Account came twice into England; and the laſt Time he ſo well vindicated himſelf before his Majeſty's Perſon, that he ſilenc'd moſt of his Adverſaries. The King, perceiving that his Brother Richard, and many of the chief Nobility join'd with him, could not reſtrain his Reſentments; and when the Earl boldly demanded a Recompence for his Services and Expences, according to the King's Royal Word and Ingagement, the King reply'd, He would not ſtand to any Promiſe he had made to a Traitor. Upon which the Earl told the King He Lied; and were he not a King, he would make him eat his Words; reproachfully demanding, Whether any Man would believe he was a Chriſtian, or had been at Confeſſion? The King anſwering in the Affirmative, the Earl ask'd, What avail'd Confeſſion, without Repentance and Satisfaction? The King reply'd, He had never more Reaſon to repent, than for his beſtowing ſuch Preferments upon one who had ſo little Gratitude and Manners; and would have caus'd him to be apprehended for his Inſolence, but by the Interpoſition of Friends, they parted from each other outwardly reconcil'd. Shortly after, he order'd the Earl to return into Gaſcony, telling him, That if he was ſuch a Lover of War, he might there find ſufficient Employment, and a Reward anſwerable to his Merits: To which the Earl boldly reply'd, That he would go over, and not return, 'till he had ſubdu'd the Enemies, and reduc'd the rebellious Subjects of an ungrateful Prince. Thus was this weak King inſulted by his own Subjects, and not only by Men but alſo by Women; particularly the young Counteſs Dowager of Arundel, who receiving a Repulſe from the King in a Matter alledg'd to be hers in Equity, thus freely accoſted him: My Lord the King, why do you turn your Face from Juſtice? We can obtain no Right from your Court; You are plac'd between God and us, but you neither govern your ſelf nor us, as you ought; but daily oppreſs the Church, and afflict the Nobility of your Kingdom. The King, fir'd at her Diſcourſe, with a furious Look demanded, Whether the Nobility of England had given her a Commiſſion to be their Advocate? To which ſhe with no leſs Warmth reply'd, The Nobility have not made me any ſuch Charter, tho' you have broke that which you and your Father have granted, and ſworn inviolably to obſerve, and for which you have ſo often extorted Mony from your Subjects. Where are the Liberties of England, ſo often reduc'd to Writing, ſo often granted, and ſo often purchas'd and redeem'd? Therefore I, tho' a Woman, with all your natural Subjects, do appeal from you to the Tribunal of Heaven, where the great and terrible Judge ſhall revenge our Cauſe. The King, confounded at ſuch bold Truths, for a while remain'd ſilent, and then ask'd her Whether ſhe deſir'd a Favour, becauſe ſhe was his Couſin? To which ſhe only reply'd, Since he had deny'd doing Juſtice, how could ſhe expect any Favour? and ſo departed without any other Satisfaction than the Affronting a Monarch without Control.

In the ſame Year Groſthead Biſhop of Lincoln employ'd one of his Clerks to take an exact Account of the yearly Revenue that Italian and Foreign Clergy-Men poſſeſs'd in England, which was found to exceed ſeventy thouſand Marks, when the King's bare Revenue was at this Time ſo low, that it ſcarce reach'd one third Part of that Sum. At the ſame Time John Manſel Clerk, who was the King's principal Counſellor, enjoy'd ſuch an unreaſonable Number of Eccleſiaſtical Preferments at once, that his Revenues amounted to four thouſand Marks

Marks per annum, an Income then ſufficient for the greateſt Prelates. The King, who had incurr'd the ill Will and Curſes of the People by many illegal Exactions, ſtill wanted a large Sum of Mony for an Expedition to the Holy-Land; for which purpoſe he call'd a Parliament, and demanded great Supplies of them. To which they conſented, upon Condition that he would once for all ſubmit himſelf to govern wholly by Law, and confirm the Charters and Liberties of the Kingdom. To that end, the Nobility being aſſembled in Weſtminſter Hall, all thoſe that oppos'd, violated, diminiſh'd or chang'd the Liberties contain'd in the great Charters, were ſolemnly excommunicated and anathematiz'd with Bell, Book and Candle, by the Arch-Biſhop and Biſhops, in their Robes and Pontificalia; and this was done in the Preſence, and by the Aſſent of the King, who in the mean Time laying his Hand on his Breaſt, after all was perform'd, pronounc'd theſe Words, 'So may God help me, as I inviolably obſerve all 'theſe Things; which I promiſe, as I am a Man, as I am a Chriſtian, as I 'am a Knight, and as I am a King crown'd and anointed. Then alſo the original Charters granted by King John were produc'd, and read before them all; which the King having regranted and confirm'd, they put out their Candles, and threw them down ſmoaking upon the Ground, and every one wiſh'd, That ſuch as oppos'd that Sentence, might ſo ſtink and ſmoke in Hell. Never were Human Laws and Liberties confirm'd with greater Solemnity and Majeſty; yet the King, being led by pernicious Counſellors, in a ſhort Time made it his Endeavours to break through all Obligations, which meeting with a turbulent Nobility, at length brought himſelf and the Nation into great Miſeries.

Ibid. In the mean Time the valiant Montfort Earl of Leiceſter being remov'd from his Government of Gaſcony, the King's Son Edward was put in his Room; upon which Change, Alphonſo King of Caſtile pretended a Grant of that Country from King Henry II. confirm'd by his Sons Richard and John. Upon this, ſeveral of the Nobility of Gaſcony revolted from King Henry, and join'd with Alphonſo; but the Citizens of Bourdeaux continu'd faithful, and gave Notice to the King of England, That without a ſpeedy and powerful Aſſiſtance, he would loſe the whole Country. The King at this was extreamly concern'd for the Removal of Montfort; and uſing what Expedition, and raiſing what Force he could, in Auguſt he landed at Bourdeaux, where ſuch Means were us'd, that by the End of Summer, he recover'd all his Caſtles in Gaſcony, either by Force or Compoſition. Yet the King, not daring to rely upon the Fidelity of the Gaſcoignes, and ſuſpecting that they might ſtill revolt to the King of Caſtile or Spain, ſent Ambaſſadors to deſire his Friendſhip, and that he would marry his Siſter Eleanor to his Son and Heir Prince Edward, on whom he had lately beſtow'd Gaſcony. The Ambaſſadors ſo well diſpatch'd the Affair, that they not only concluded the Match, but alſo made a League with the King of Caſtile, and brought back a Charter ſeal'd with a Golden Seal; by which he releas'd to King Henry whatever Right he had, or could have in that Country by the Grant of Henry II. King Richard, or King John. Then, upon the Ambaſſadors aſſuring their Maſter of Alphonſo's Sincerity, he ſhortly after ſent to his Son Prince Edward, to come over to him, in order to ſend him into Spain to conſummate the Match. Among other Acts of Love and Sincerity, Alphonſo ſent this good Advice to the King of England, That after the Example of good Princes, he ſhould be a Lamb towards his Subjects and Natives, and a Lion to Aliens and Rebels. Earl Montfort, who had generouſly refus'd the High-Stewardſhip of all France, with a brave Troop of Soldiers now offer'd his Service to the King, who admiring at his Greatneſs receiv'd him with all outward Marks of Joy; at whoſe Reconciliation, the Gaſcoignes, who dreaded the Power of his Arms, were ſo diſhearten'd, that they came gradually in, and became good Subjects.

In the following Year the Queen alſo arriv'd at Bourdeaux with her two Sons, Edward and Edmund; and ſhortly after Prince Edward was ſent in great State to King Alphonſo, where having marry'd his Siſter Eleanor, he was honourably ſent back to his Father with his princely Bride. Upon his Arrival, King Henry ſetled upon Him and his Princeſs all Gaſcony, Ireland and Wales, with the City and Towns of Briſtol, Stamford and Grantham: From which Time the King began to prepare for his Return into England, and upon ſtating his Accounts, he found that the Expences of his Expeditions into France, beſides thirty thouſand Marks he beſtow'd upon the Poictovins, amounted to ſo vaſt a Sum as would have more than purchas'd all his Lands in that Country. And what was ſtill worſe, our Author tells us it was to little or no Effect; ſo that when the King was told of this mighty Expence by one about him, he cry'd out, For God's ſake name it no more, leſt the very Relation makes Men wonder and ſtand amaz'd! Having ſetled all Affairs, King Henry ask'd Leave of the King of France to paſs through his Kingdom, which was not only granted, but alſo he himſelf met the King of England at Chartres, where he was then attended by a thouſand brave Horſe with noble Riders, beſides Sumpter-Horſes and many Carriages. His own Queen was with him, and her Siſter the Counteſs of Cornwall; and there the Queen of France met them, with her other Siſter the Counteſs of Anjou, as alſo the old Counteſs of Provence, the Mother of all theſe four Ladies. From thence they were conducted to Paris, where for eight Days they remain'd with triumphant Joy and Satisfaction, making mutual and magnificent Entertainments, ſuch as had not been known before. After which the King of France brought King Henry one Day's Journey towards the Sea, where they took their Leaves with extraordinary Tenderneſs and Affection; and King Lewis at his Departure, with a deep Sigh ſaid, Oh that the Peers and Baronage of my Kingdom would give their Conſents, and then we might be inſeperable Friends! This he ſpoke with Reſpect to Normandy and thoſe other Territories, which his Nobility would not permit him to reſtore to the King of England; which was a great Trouble to the Conſcience of this pious Prince.

Prince Edmund made King of Sicily.

It was the next Year before the King landed in England, and a conſiderable Time after before the new Princeſs Eleanor arriv'd, who was receiv'd by the Londoners with great Pomp, and had her Lodgings furniſh'd with Hangings and Foot-Carpets after the Spaniſh Faſhion; which ſeem'd ſtrange and ſuperfluous to the Engliſh, who were not accuſtom'd to ſuch Sort of Magnificence; and the great Honours paid to the Spaniards prov'd very ungrateful to the Natives. On the other Side, Edmund the King's ſecond Son, by a Ring ſent from the Pope, was ſolemnly inveſted in the Kingdom of Sicily and Apulia. The Ambaſſador who brought it was a Biſhop, who immediately departed; for indeed his Buſineſs was glorious in Show, but in Reality deluſory and unprofitable; both becauſe the King had unreaſonably ingag'd himſelf in the Pope's Conteſt with the preſent Emperor, as alſo becauſe the Romiſh Forces had lately been overthrown, before this airy Honour could be granted to Prince Edmund; whom yet his Father treated as a King, highly pleaſing himſelf with the Trouble of a waſtful Title, to his own and the whole Kingdom's great Impoveriſhment. The Calamities of the Kingdom in theſe expenſive Times were the more deplorable, becauſe they were continually countenanc'd by the King, who ought to have redreſs'd them. But the Pope having no way ſo eaſie to be ſupply'd as by the King, nor the King any but by the People, both Pope and King agreed to grind the People for each others Intereſt; the King to ſatisfie the Pope's Avarice, and the Pope to advance the King's Ambition. The Gaining of the Kingdom of Sicily was the Colour, for which the King pretended to go in Perſon; and therefore Ruſtand, the Pope's Agent, who was ſent to gather the Tenth of all England for the Uſe of the Pope or King indifferently, had call'd a great Council the former Year, and adjourn'd it 'till this; where he alſo requir'd all the Prelates to bind themſelves to the Pope's Merchants, as having already receiv'd a great Sum of Mony from them, which was imploy'd to the Uſe of their Churches. To which deceitful Allegation, the Prelates reply'd, They would rather die than ſuffer ſuch Oppreſſions, and they accounted it a greater Inſtance of Martyrdom to die in ſuch a Cauſe, than in that of Thomas Becket. The reſt of the Nobility alſo abſolutely refus'd either to recover Sicily, or to bear the Charge of it, as being both impracticable; the one for the Strength of Manfrede, and the other for the preſent Poverty of England. And indeed not long after, the Pope and Manfrede were reconcil'd, and ſo King Henry and King Edmund were deluded, one of his great Expences, and the other of his imaginary Crown. By this the King was partly waken'd out of his Dreams, in which he had continu'd feeding his Thoughts with a Proſpect of leaving a Kingdom to each Son; tho' he never reſted 'till he had almoſt plung'd the Crown into the Gulfs of irrecoverable Debts and Uſury. For beſides many other Burdens, the King, by the Management of the Romiſh Court, now ſtood ingag'd to the Pope for near two hundred thouſand Marks.

The Nation oppreſs'd both by the King and the Pope.

M. Paris. Pamel. Theſe continual Wants occaſion'd the King to be ſtricter than formerly, and to go in Perſon into the Court of the Exchequer among the Barons, where he made ſevere Orders againſt all Sheriffs and Bailiffs of incorporate Towns, who did not at the exact Time appear at the Exchequer, to pay in the King's Mony that came to their Hands. At the ſame Time he amerc'd all the Sheriffs in England, becauſe they had not diſtrain'd every one that had fifteen Pounds a Year in their ſeveral Counties, to come up and be knighted; all which added to the Grievances of the Nation. In the ſame Year two Things added much to the publick Expences; the firſt was the Arrival of the young King and Queen of Scotland, who were entertain'd by King Henry at London with great Charge and Magnificence. The other was the Inſurrection of the Welſh, who having been much oppreſs'd by the continu'd Sale of the Government of their Nation, ſtood up for the Defence of their Laws and Country, and invading the Engliſh Borders, deſtroy'd the Tenants of Prince Edward, whom as yet they had not acknowledg'd for their Lord. Whereupon the Prince, having no preſent Mony, borrow'd four thouſand Marks of his Brother Earl Richard, in order to ſuppreſs their Incurſions; but the whole Winter was ſo wet and ſtormy, and the retiring Places of the Welſh ſo boggy and impaſſable, that the Engliſh durſt not attempt them, ſo that the Expedition prov'd ineffectual, and the Prince's Expences in vain. And indeed the Welſh perform'd great Actions under Prince Lewellyn ap Griffith, by whoſe Means they valiantly recover'd all the Inland Country of North-Wales, with other Places; in one Encounter ſlew above two thouſand Engliſh Men, and ravag'd the Country to the very Gates of Cheſter. This they had the greater Opportunity to effect, becauſe King Henry, while he form'd Kingdoms in the Clouds, and plung'd himſelf into the Depths of Uſury, ſuffer'd his Relations and Favourites to trample Right and Reaſon under Foot, and with the Hatred of himſelf to fill their Purſes; while his own Treaſure daily conſum'd, and Mens Minds were more and more alienated from him, as Perſons who deſpair'd of Redreſs and Juſtice. The Welſh perſiſting in their Attempts, forc'd the valiant Prince Edward to retire for want of Aſſiſtance; and when he complain'd to his Father, his Anſwer was, That Wales was his own by Gift, therefore he ought to get Honour in his Youth, for he himſelf was otherwiſe imploy'd.

The Succeſſes of the Welſh.

M. Paris. &c. In Order to ſupply his Wants the King call'd another Parliament to Weſtminſter, where he brought his Son Edmund, attir'd in an Apulian Habit; and having plac'd him in publick View, he ſaid, Behold, ye faithful Subjects, my Son Edmund, whom Heav'n of its Bounty has call'd to Royal Dignity: How worthy is he of all your Favours; and how inhuman will it be for any to deny him Aſſiſtance in this extraordinary Juncture? Then he declar'd, That by the Conſent of the Church of England, he had oblig'd himſelf to the Pope, under under pain of losing his Kingdom, for the Payment of one hundred and forty thousand Marks, besides Interest, which had greatly increas'd; for the Discharge of which he demanded the Tenths of the whole Benefic'd Clergy for five Years, without Abatement or Deduction. This Demand made all Men stand amaz'd, especially when they found that this Oppression had taken its Rise from the Pope himself: But at length, when neither Excuses nor Intreaties would prevail, they granted the King an Aid of fifty thousand Marks towards his urgent Necessities; but with this unacceptable Condition, That he should for the future most inviolably observe that Capital Charter, which had been so often promis'd, and so often purchas'd: But the King thinking the Sum insufficient, refus'd to accept it; tho' afterward it is believ'd that he took it. Tho' the King was exceeding poor, yet his Brother Richard had heap'd up such Riches, that he was able to spend a hundred Marks every Day for ten Years together, without accounting his Revenues he receiv'd from England and Germany. Upon the Account of his great Wealth, this Year Ambassadors from Germany came and declar'd to him, That the Princes of the Sacred Empire had elected him King of the Romans, beseeching him to accept of that Dignity. At first he declin'd it, but by the Persuasion of his Brother, he consented; and after some Time he pass'd over to Aix-la-Chapelle, where both he and his Countess were crown'd with great Splendor and Magnificence, and plac'd in the Throne of Charles the Great with the usual Solemnity. His Departure was succeeded by a great Famine and a prodigious Scarcity of Coin, the former proceeding from the Wetness of the Season, and the latter chiefly from the Earl's carrying over with him seven hundred thousand Pounds in ready Mony: An incredible Sum in those Days, besides what King Henry had of late sent to the Pope upon several Accounts; so that it was no Wonder if England was exhausted of all its current Mony.

Earl Richard made King of the Romans.

A. D. 1258. Reg. 42/43.

In these Times of Want, when fifty Ships laden with Corn were sent by Richard King of the Romans to London, the King took a laudable Care that the Citizens should not engross that Commodity to the Damage of the Poor; but no Warnings, Intreaties, or Advices were sufficient to make him truly frugal in his own Person, by which he was miserably straiten'd. Nor would the Parliament he summon'd contribute any Thing, but forming some great Attempts in their Minds, in direct Terms concluded, That they neither would, nor could any longer endure such Exactions. Moreover they laid open many Grievances, and Earl Montfort complain'd of the Dishonour and Injury done by the King's Half-Brother Willam de Valence, calling him Traitor; so that against the next Session of Parliament to be held on St. Barnabas's Day at Oxford, he, with the Earls of Gloceſter and Norfolk, alledging their Fear of Strangers and Favourites, resolv'd to come with all their Forces. They also sent Emissaries to the King of France, begging so much Assistance at least, as that he would not hinder their good Intentions of establishing the distracted State of England; and they also took care to watch the Ports against Foreigners. Thus they prepar'd to abate the Insolency and Haughtiness of the Poictovins and other Strangers, by whom the King was powerfully led; for they despair'd of Redress at his Hands, who, as M. Paris says, like another Proteus took all Shapes upon him to serve his Ends, and slipt out at his Pleasure, no Promises or Ties being strong enough to hold him. And to add to his Misfortunes, the Pope also began to show his Displeasure, because he observ'd not his reiterated Promises, by which he had bound himself, upon Forfeiture of his Kingdom, to correct his wonted Excesses; and therefore threaten'd both to Excommunicate him and to Interdict his Dominions. Upon which the King in a great Confusion sent him five thousand Marks, to pacifie and bring him to a softer Temper, and to keep off the Sentence for a Time; with which Mony, and the King's earnest Petitions, his Holiness seem'd tolerably well satisfy'd.

The Barons combine against the King.

At

Ibid. At the Time appointed the Parliament met at Oxford, where the turbulent Earls and Barons occaſion'd the King to allow of twenty four Perſons to be choſen, one half by himſelf and the other by the Peers, to have the whole Adminiſtration of the Government and State, and the yearly Appointment of all great Officers, reſerving only to the King the higheſt Place at Meetings, and Salutations of Honour in publick Places. And becauſe they would not miſs of their Deſigns, they came well arm'd and appointed, ſo that the King and Prince Edward were forc'd to ſwear to their Ordinances, the Lords having threaten'd Death to all Oppoſers. The chief of their Ordinances were, 'That the King 'ſhould inviolably obſerve the Charter of Liberties, ſo often granted and pur-'chas'd: That ſuch a Juſticiary ſhould be choſen, who would do Juſtice to the 'Poor as well as Rich: That the twenty four ſhould chuſe the Juſtices, Chan-'cellors, Treaſurers, and other Officers from Year to Year: That they, or 'their Adherents, ſhould have the Cuſtody of the King's Caſtles: That three 'Parliaments ſhould meet every Year at ſet Times. Theſe, with ſome others, were call'd The Proviſions of Oxford, which the whole Baronage of England was bound by Oath to obſerve, and That they would never deſiſt from proſecuting theſe their juſt Reſolves, either for Loſs of their Lives or Eſtates; and to confirm them the Arch-Biſhops and Biſhops ſolemnly execrated all ſuch as reſiſted them. Thus through the Eaſineſs of a weak and inconſtant Prince, and the growing Power of an inſolent and exaſperated Nobility, the Head of the State became a Cypher, and the whole Government was put into the Hands of a few, who really deſign'd their own Intereſt and Grandeur more than the common Good of the Nation. This Confederacy was ſo ſtrong, that when William de Valence, refus'd to deliver up any Caſtle given to him, Earl Montfort and the reſt anſwer'd, They would either have his Caſtles or his Head: Which violent Proceeding ſo terrify'd the Poictovins, that they ſuddenly left Oxford and fled into France, where alſo the Barons had made them odious. The People alſo ſeem'd to join in this Confederacy, which caus'd the Peers to be ſo peremptory in all their Conferences, that when Henry Son to the King of the Romans, refus'd to take their Oath without his Father's Conſent, they plainly aſſur'd him, That if his Father would not join with the Baronage of England, he ſhould not have one Foot of Land in the Nation. And leſt any Thing might be omitted, they commanded the City of London to ſtand upon its Guard, and caus'd the Citizens to bind themſelves under their publick Seal, immutably to adhear to the Baronage of England. Moreover, becauſe ſeveral other petty Tyrants of the Nation, encourag'd by their Example, had oppreſs'd their Inferiors, they procur'd the King to appoint four Knights Commiſſioners in every Shire, to enquire into all ſuch Injuries, and certifie the ſame under their Seals within a limited Time.

Their high Demands at Oxford.

The King complies.

His Prerogative much weaken'd.

Ibid. The Barons daily proceeded in their Methods of Reformation, in removing of Officers, puniſhing Offenders, and diſcouraging of Strangers; againſt the laſt they were more ſevere, becauſe the Earl of Gloceſter, being reduc'd to a dangerous Weakneſs, had all the Symptoms of Poiſon, which was charg'd upon the Poictovins. This, and ſome other Accidents of the like nature made them very jealous and ſuſpicious, and the declar'd Reſentments of the King to the Earl of Leiceſter gave them no ſmall Uneaſineſs. This was diſcover'd by chance; as the King was paſſing by Water from Weſtminſter, he was ſurpriz'd by a violent Storm of Thunder and Lightning, of which being extreamly fearful, he commanded the Barge-Men to ſet him on Shore at the neareſt Stairs, which happen'd to be Durham Houſe, where the Earl of Leiceſter then lay. The Earl hearing the King was there, immediately ran down to receive him, and finding him under ſome Conſternation, he ſaid, Your Majeſty need not be afraid, the Storm is all over. No, Montfort, anſwer'd the King with a ſtern Look and a deep Oath, I fear not the Thunder ſo much as I do Thee. At which Words the Earl a little confounded, reply'd, Sir, I am ſorry you ſhould fear fear your true Friend and faithful Servant, more than the Enemies and Devourers of your Kingdom.

A. D. 1259. Reg. 43/44.

In these new modell'd Times, Richard King of the Romans, desiring to see King Henry his Brother, and designing to bring such a Force as might strengthen him against his Barons, was advertis'd that the Nobility design'd to oppose him both by Sea and Land; which caus'd him to lay aside his Purpose, and to land at Dover after a private manner, with his Wife and Son, and but a small Retinue. Here he was met by the King with great Congratulations at the Sea-side, but neither of them were permitted to enter into the Castle, Because it was the principal Key of the Nation. And on the next Day, at the Chapter-House in Canterbury, before many of the Nobility, the King of the Romans was call'd by the bare Title of Richard Earl of Cornwall, and took this following Oath, That he would be faithful and diligent, together with the Barons, to reform the Kingdom of England, hitherto too much disorder'd by the Counsel of Evil Men; and would be an effectual Coadjutor to expel all Rebels and Disturbers of the Land; which Oath he would observe upon pain of losing all his Lands in England. Thus, while the Barons were in a great measure Soveraigns, and the Earl of Leicester was gone with others to make a firm League with the French, the King himself was led, or betray'd into a very dishonourable Compliance with that Nation. For the King having sail'd into France, demanded a Restitution of all those Territories that King Philip and King Lewis had taken and detain'd both from his Father and himself. The French alledg'd many Things against his Demands, but especially, That the ancient Donation of Normandy was never spontaneous, but had been forcibly extorted by Duke Rollo from the King of France. Upon this King Henry, having neither Courage to undertake, nor Mony to maintain a War to recover his lost Rights, came in Person to the King of France's Parliament at Abbeville, and there made a final Peace and Agreement with that King, upon these following Conditions. 'That the King of England should resign his Right to the Dukedom of Nor- 'mandy, and Earldom of Anjou, upon Payment of three hundred thousand 'smaller Pounds of Tourain Mony: In Consideration of which King Lewis 'further promis'd him the Restitution of certain Territories in Gascony, of the 'yearly Value of twenty thousand Pounds Sterling. So that retaining all the Province of Gascony, and its Appendages, and having absolutely resign'd his Right to all the rest of the Dominions in the King of France's Possession, King Henry from thenceforward shorten'd his Stile in his Patents, Letters and Seal, and no longer call'd himself Duke of Normandy and Anjou. About this Period, Matth. Paris a Monk of St. Albans, the most celebrated Historian of this Age, ended his History of England, from which we have receiv'd great Assistance; and shortly after ended his Life.

A. D. 1260. Reg. 44/45.

VIII. King Henry, having for the Advantage of some present Mony made disadvantagious Concessions, and having freed himself from the irksom Troubles of Foreign Contests, spent some Time in the Pleasures of the French Court at Paris, where he was splendidly entertain'd and regal'd by King Lewis, while all Things were establish'd and confirm'd after the most effectual Manner. And returning into England not long after, he began to employ all his Thoughts how to restore the Royal Power, and to throw off that Burden which the Nobility had laid upon him. In order to this he sent privately to the Pope to be absolv'd from his Oath to the Provisions of Oxford, which without any great Difficulty was obtain'd both for himself and Prince Edward; but Pope Alexander deceasing before the Dispensation could be seal'd, the King was oblig'd to stay a longer Time, 'till it could be confirm'd by Pope Urban his Successor. Besides this he wrote into France to King Lewis, and his Son Prince Edward, who was gone over under the Pretence of a Tournament at Paris, to provide him what Forces he could. These Matters being adjusted, the King summon'd a Council Council or Parliament at London, he there plainly and briefly declar'd, That ſince by the late Proviſions of Oxford, they had likewiſe oblig'd themſelves on their Part to encreaſe his Revenue, and pay his Debts, of which they had perform'd neither; but inſtead of that, ſeeking their own private Intereſt, had rather diminiſh'd than increas'd his Revenues; and by putting himſelf under their Government, he was become more their Slave than their King; therefore they were not to wonder, if confiding no longer in their Councils, he had ſought for Redreſs elſewhere. And ſhortly after he put himſelf into the Tower of London, together with the Queen, and then commanding the ancient Treaſury to be broke open, he employ'd the Mony in the Fortifications of the Tower. Moreover, he order'd the City of London to be ſtrengthen'd, and ſummon'd all the Youth of the City, from twelve Years of Age and upwards, cauſing them to ſwear Fealty to him; and commanded it to be proclaim'd, that Whoever would take up Arms under him, ſhould be maintain'd at his Charge. A. D. 1261. Reg. 45/46.

The Beginnings of the Barons Wars.

Theſe were the Grounds and Beginnings of that unhappy Civil War, which for near five Years tormented this Kingdom; which the King was the more ready to undertake, becauſe about this Time he receiv'd from the Pope his Bull of Abſolution from his Oath to the Proviſions of Oxford. Upon which Account it was declar'd, That the Oath it ſelf was unlawful, being made without his Holineſs's Conſent, who was his ſupreme Lord, and whoſe Vaſſal the King now acknowledg'd himſelf to be. Accordingly the King turn'd out the Barons Chancellor and chief Juſticiary, and put in Walter Merton and Philip Baſſet in their Rooms; which occaſion'd the Nobility to haſten to Arms at Wincheſter, where the King then was, who receiving Intelligence of their Deſigns by Sir John Manſel, haſten'd back to the Tower of London.

Riſhang. Pomel. &c.

Still the War did not begin; for the King making ſeveral Conceſſions and Compliances, all the Conteſts between him and the Barons ſeem'd for a while to be ended; ſo that the King had Leiſure and Opportunity to go over with his Queen into his Dominions in France, where he continu'd for a conſiderable Space. During his Abſence the Earl of Leiceſter appear'd at a great Council held at London by the Juſticiary Baſſet, where he produc'd a Brief or Letter from the Pope, wherein he confirm'd the Proviſions of Oxford, and recall'd the King's Abſolution, declaring He was deceiv'd in the granting of it; which ſhows the variable Temper of the Pope and his Court. But how much ſoever the Abſolution was recall'd, it was ſhortly after re-confirm'd, and made uſe of by the King upon his Return into England, which was ſucceeded by ſeveral Acts of Hoſtility between Him and the Barons. The ſecret Confederacy with Lewellyn Prince of Wales, gave the Barons no ſmall Incouragement, who about this Time waſted the Dominions of Prince Edward in the Marches of Wales; ſo that now Places were won and loſt, and Priſoners taken on all Sides. Prince Edward took the Caſtle of Briſtol, and fin'd the City a thouſand Pounds. Earl Montfort, the General of the Barons, executed his greateſt Revenges upon the Queen's Friends who were Foreigners; and marching forwards, recover'd Gloceſter Caſtle, enter'd Worceſter and Bridgenorth; and after that ſurpriz'd the Iſle of Ely, ſubduing that Fenny Country to the Barons Uſe. Sir John Manſel, the King's chief Counſellor, apprehending the worſt, fled ſecretly from the Tower, where the King continu'd; and Henry Son to the King of the Romans, was taken by the Barons. In the mean Time the valiant Prince Edward fortify'd Windſor Caſtle, and garriſon'd it with Strangers. Mutual Wearineſs at length begot a Deſire of Peace, and the King would have yielded to the Proviſions of Oxford, but the Queen ſhew'd her ſelf utterly againſt it; which being known to the Londoners, it put the meaner Sort into ſuch a brutiſh Rage, that when ſhe was to ſhoot the Bridge from the Tower towards Windſor, they with Dirt, Stones and villanous Words forc'd her to return back. Prince Edward, under the Conduct of the Biſhop of Worceſter, came from the Caſtle of Briſtol, and contrary to his Promiſe enter'd into that of Windſor; but afterwards wards going forth to meet Earl Montfort at Kingſton, with a Deſign for a Treaty, the Earl got Poſſeſſion of Windſor Caſtle, and would not permit him to depart. At London ſtill in a Parliament aſſembled, Matters were in ſome Meaſure made up; and the King's Party daily grew ſtronger.

A. D. 1264. Reg. 48/49. At length the King of France was made Arbitrator in theſe great Conteſts; and the Cauſe was fully heard at Amiens, where he gave Judgment for the King of England againſt the Barons, pronouncing all the Statutes and Acts made at Oxford void; but with this Proviſo, That nothing of the Charters granted by King John and the preſent King ſhould be infring'd. Of which Clauſe the Earl of Leiceſter and his Party took Advantage, alledging, That the Proviſions of Oxford, were only in Purſuance and Corroboration of thoſe Charters; therefore, refuſing to ſtand by the Arbitration, which they ſaid contradicted it ſelf, the War broke out more furiouſly than ever. The King with his Brother and Son, and a ſtrong Force march'd to Oxford, from whence he diſmiſs'd all the Students, which are ſaid to be above fifteen thouſand in Number; among whom being ſo many young Noblemen, the King doubted of their Affections to the Barons. Upon which moſt of them went to Northampton, where the Barons were then powerful; to which Place the King march'd with his Army, and breaking in at the Town Walls, attack'd the Enemies, among whom the Students of Oxford had a Banner by themſelves advanc'd directly againſt the King; and they more annoy'd him in the Battel, than the reſt of the Barons. For which the King, after he had gain'd the Day, threaten'd a ſevere Revenge; but his Counſellors inform'd him, That they were the Sons of the Nobility and Gentry of his Kingdom; that if he ſhould cauſe them to be executed, their Fathers and Relations would make a dangerous Retaliation; upon which he deſiſted. The King here took Simon Montfort the Younger, and fourteen other principal Barons and Knights-Bannerets, forty other Knights, beſides Eſquires and others. Encourag'd with this Succeſs he advanced his Royal Standard towards Nottingham, burning and waſting the Barons Eſtates wherever he march'd. To divert this Storm, Earl Montfort haſten'd to London, and then made an Attempt upon Rocheſter Caſtle, which the Earl of Warren defended for the King. Upon which, the King turn'd his Arms, and coming to raiſe the Siege, took the Caſtle of Kingſton, which belong'd to the Earl of Gloceſter; and then unexpectedly ſetting upon thoſe who lay before Rocheſter, while Montfort was abſent, he kill'd many and diſpers'd the reſt. Next he took the Caſtle of Tunbridge, with the Counteſs of Gloceſter, whom he ſet at Liberty; and then taking the Cinque-Ports into Favour, he ſetled himſelf for a while at Lewes in Suſſex.

The King ſucceeds.

At Lewes the Barons ſent Letters to the King proteſting all Loyal Obedience to his Perſon, but all Hoſtility to their Enemies about him. To which the King return'd Anſwer, That they were the Cauſe of all the Wars and Miſeries in the Nation; that their Intentions were not according to their Profeſſions, nor their Actions agreeable to their Pretences, therefore he defy'd them. The King of the Romans, Prince Edward, and the reſt of the King's Friends ſent the like Letters of Defiance. Upon this, the Barons being weaker in Numbers, ſent Mediators for Peace, and offer'd to pay the King thirty thouſand Pounds in Conſideration of Damages done in the Nation, provided That the Statutes of Oxford might ſtand good. But the King inrag'd at their whole Proceedings, ſent a freſh Defiance to Montfort and his Accomplices; which provok'd them to do the like, and to renounce the Fealty they ow'd him. Upon this both Parties provided for an Ingagement, and as ſoon as the two Armies approach'd each other, a fierce Battel inſu'd, and the ſtout Earl of Leiceſter, with the Body under him, and that next to him, ſet upon the Forces commanded by the King and his Brother; rightly judging, that if they were either defeated or taken Priſoners, the Victory would fall to the Barons. As for the noble Prince Edward, he with the Flower of his Army furiouſly attack'd tack'd the Londoners, who tho' very numerous, fled at the Terror of his Arms; and to revenge the Affront they had done his Mother at London Bridge, inceſſantly purſu'd them, and made a moſt miſerable Slaughter of them for near four Miles together. But while his martial Rage tranſported him too far, the Bodies commanded by the Earls of Leiceſter and Gloceſter, having valiantly aſſaulted thoſe commanded by King Henry and his Brother, in a ſhort Time utterly routed them; ſo that the two Brothers being almoſt abandon'd in the Field, were conſtrain'd, after a long and brave Reſiſtance, to ſurrender themſelves, Henry to the Earl of Leiceſter, and Richard to the Earl of Gloceſter, who were immediately ſecur'd in the Priory of Lewes. Whereupon all the reſt of the Men that had fled into the Town, laid down their Arms and yielded, thinking it no Diſhonour to ſuſtain the ſame Fate with their Maſters. Prince Edward returning with his Coſen Henry from the Purſuit of the Londoners, ſoon found that inſtead of any Advantage gain'd, for the Concluſion of a Peace, both he and his Coſen muſt ſurrender themſelves as Hoſtages.

The King and his Brother taken Priſoners.

Weſtminſ. Riſhang. Walſing. Thus was Montfort Earl of Leiceſter in poſſeſſion of two Kings and their eldeſt Sons; and to compleat all his Deſigns, he carry'd King Henry along with him, as it were on Progreſs, but rather in Triumph about the Country, that by the Authority of his Preſence he might take in all the Places that ſtill held out. And now having the whole Kingdom at his Diſpoſal, he not only freed all his own Party, but alſo beſtow'd all the great Offices of State upon his own Creatures and Relations; by which Means the King, who had now reign'd near fifty Years, ſignify'd little more than a Cypher; ſo that he could not go any where without a Keeper, but was at the Diſpoſal of others. As for Prince Edward and his Coſen Henry, they were not us'd like Hoſtages, but as ordinary Priſoners, being kept in ſtrict Cuſtody for a Time at Wallingford, then in Dover Caſtle, and ſometimes in other Places. Nor could all the Threats of the Pope and Court of Rome avail, to make him relinquiſh any Part of that Authority he had aſſum'd. During this Man's Uſurpation, the Cinque Ports preſum'd ſo far as to ſet out great Numbers of Privateers, who took all Veſſels they found, as well Engliſh as Foreign, ſeiz'd their Goods, kill'd their Men, and threw their Bodies into the Sea: By which Means England, that uſually excell'd all other Nations in Plenty of Foreign Commodities, was now become ſo indigent, that Wines, Salt, Iron, and all other imported Wares, roſe to that exceſſive Rate, that they were ſold at four Times their former Price: So that there being no Means either for importing or exporting of Goods, all Merchants were reduc'd to great Extremities.

Earl Montfort's Power.

Walſing. Riſhang. &c. Theſe pretended Patrons of Liberty, who took up Arms to defend the Kingdom from the Tyranny of an unfortunate King, having once obtain'd his Power, fell themſelves into Factions, and became as unjuſt and tyrannical in the Uſe of it, as the King they had oppos'd; and the Nation was ſo far from receiving Advantage by the Change, that inſtead of one they had now many Tyrants. But this Violence upon the Conſtitution could not continue long; for Montfort, graſping at an unbounded Authority, ſoon provok'd the Envy of the Earl of Gloceſter, who was to have a proportionable Share, ſo that it occaſion'd a fatal Quarrel, and a Diviſion of Intereſt; and upon this Gloceſter confederated with Roger Mortimer and his Aſſociates, to whom not long after the Earls of Warren, Surry and Suſſex, with ſeveral others join'd. In the mean Time a Parliament was call'd by the Power of Earl Montfort, and in the Name of the King, to meet at Weſtminſter on the twenty ſecond Day of January; which was the firſt Parliament, that, according to the Opinions of Doctor Brady, had ever two Knights for each Shire, and two Burgeſſes for each City and Borough, as at this Day: So that from this critical and rebellious Year the Doctor dates the Original of the Houſe of Commons in Parliament; but with what Certainty, or Probability, may be learnt from the Works of Mr. Petit, Mr. Tyrrell, Dr. Hody, and others. This Parliament was call'd upon two Accounts, the One to ſet Prince Edward at Liberty, and to ſecure Earl Montfort and his Party; the Other to obtain the King's Charter of Pardon and indemnity for all that was paſt. As to the firſt, the Prince could obtain no more than to be made a Priſoner at large; but not long after, the Breach growing ſtill wider between Montfort and Gloceſter, the Prince by the Help of John Mortimer, broke looſe from his Keepers at Hereford, and arriv'd ſafely to the Earl of Gloceſter's Party at Wigmore.

Prince Edward eſcapes.

The Affairs turn to the King's Advantage.

The Freedom of this valiant Prince ſoon turn'd the Face of Affairs; for he confederating with the Counties of Hereford, Worceſter, Shropſhire and Cheſter, by his ſolemn Oaths and Promiſes, obtain'd a powerful Aſſiſtance from the Earl of Gloceſter and many others; by which Means he ſoon became Maſter of the Cities of Worceſter, Gloceſter and Hereford. At the ſame Time Earl Montfort, with Lewellyn Prince of Wales, ravag'd all their Enemies Lands in Monmouth and Glamorgan Shires. Prince Edward, and the Earl of Gloceſter, on the other Side haſten'd to the Caſtle of Kenelworth, kept by Simon Earl Montfort's Son; where they intercepted the Earl of Oxford, with about thirteen Knights-Bannerets before they could reach the Caſtle. Here Intelligence was brought, that Montfort was return'd with the King out of South-Wales, and lay near Worceſter: To which Place the Prince boldly advanc'd to give him Battel; and the Earl hearing of his Approach, incamp'd at Eveſham with his whole Power. Upon the third Day of Auguſt the Heroick Prince ſet out from Worceſter, and with great Art and Skill ſtruck in between Earl Montfort and his Paſſage to Kenelworth, and then ſuddenly turn'd back towards Eveſham; the Earl of Gloceſter with his Force, and the Lord Mortimer with his, moving thither by two other Ways; ſo that the Earl being almoſt ſurrounded, was oblig'd either to fight or yield. At firſt he was in Hopes that one Party belong'd to his Son, but finding it otherwiſe, he in a deſpairing Manner cry'd, Lord have Mercy upon our Souls, for our Bodies are our Enemies; yet ſtill he reſolv'd either to conquer or die. His eldeſt Son deſiring him not to deſpair, ſince the Chance of War was doubtful, he anſwer'd, He only fear'd that his own and his Brother's Pride and Preſumption had ruin'd them; yet ſtill he hop'd to die for the Cauſe of God and Juſtice. However he omitted nothing in this Battel, which was very ſharp and bloody, that might ſpeak him a noble and valiant Commander, 'till firſt his Son, and afterwards himſelf was ſlain; at the Inſtant of whoſe Fall, there happen'd ſo great a Clap of Thunder, as if Heav'n it ſelf had fought againſt him, and no leſs Power could have given him his Death. In the Battel, the King himſelf was wounded on the Shoulder, and near being ſlain, had he not cry'd out I am Henry your King! at which the Prince ran to him, and begging his Bleſſing, left him to a ſtrong Guard, 'till he had ended the Battel, and gain'd a compleat Victory. Thus dy'd the celebrated Simon Montfort Earl of Leiceſter, whoſe Body was reproachfully diſmember'd, and his Head ſent to the Wife of Roger Mortimer. He was once in a probable Way to eſtabliſh a new Race of Kings in England; but as the juſt Reward of his Ingratitude, as well as Ambition and Rebellion, he and all his Family periſh'd and came to nothing in a few Years.

King Henry being thus reſtor'd to Liberty, immediately call'd a Parliament at Wincheſter, by the Authority of which, he ſeiz'd on the Charters and Privileges of the City of London, and of many other Towns for their Rebellion. All thoſe who were taken in Battel were committed to ſafe Cuſtody, and ſuch as had join'd with Earl Montfort were fully diſinherited, and a rateable Diſtribution made of their Eſtates to the King's moſt deſerving Friends. Simon and Guy Montfort, the Earl's two Sons, were the chief of the Attainted; the Counteſs Dowager their Mother, and Siſter to the King, being extreamly mortify'd at the fatal Loſſes of her Husband and eldeſt Son, had leave to paſs over into France, where ſhe ended her Days in a Nunnery. Simon, the eldeſt ſurviving Son, being encouraged by his Brother Richard, and Ottobon the Pope's Legate, [illegible] in England. Simon had several Friends about the King, but the Earl of Gloucester, envying his Restoration to full Favour, it was at length concluded, upon his Submission, that he should live in Exile, and for his Maintenance receive only five hundred Marks per Annum. The Legate about the same Time, to hinder the Growth of any new Rebellion, excommunicated the Bishops of Winchester, Worcester, London and Chichester, for having once adher'd to Earl Montfort; and also declar'd, That the Clergy were to pay their Tenths for seven Years next ensuing to the King. But still the Castle of Kenilworth would not yield, but with a very few Defendants, after an extraordinary manner, held out half a Year's Siege against all the King's Forces; who at length gave the Garrison their Lives and Liberties, as also all the rich Plunder they had taken from the adjacent Country before the Siege.

The Barons decline.

To put an End to all Troubles, the most moderate Men were desirous that the King should pardon all Offences, and restore the Lands of the Disinherited upon certain reasonable Fines: Which Proposition found a great Enemy of Roger Mortimer, who had by the King's Donation gain'd much of their Land; which so mov'd the Earl of Gloucester to Indignation and Distrust, that he withdrew himself from the Court in great Discontent. Not long after, being more and more disobliged, he sent his Messenger to the King desiring him To remove all Strangers from his Presence, to see that the Provisions of Oxford were observ'd through his Kingdom, and to keep such Promises as he had made at Evesham. In the mean Time the chief Out-laws and disinherited Men, had got Possession of the Isle of Ely, from whence they made many Incursions and Devastations. To end these Mischiefs, all, except Earl Montfort's Sons and the Earl of Derby, were offer'd to be put to Ransom, and for certain Fines to be restor'd to their Lands; but they requir'd to have them all without Redemption, and complain'd to the King and the Legate of many Grievances. When Proposals had no better Effect, the King and Prince Edward besieg'd the Isle of Ely on all Sides. Which being known to the Earl of Gloucester, tho' he had promis'd under his Seal not to take up Arms against the King but in his own Defence, he gather'd an Army out of Wales in Favour of the Disinherited, march'd up to the City of London, and by the Consent of the Citizens took full Possession of it, commanding also the Pope's Legate, who lodg'd in the Tower, to surrender it to him. Yet shortly after a Peace was fully concluded, by the Mediation of the King of the Romans and the Lord Philip Basset; and the Earl of Gloucester bound himself in a Bond of ten thousand Marks, never to raise any Disturbance again. Lewellyn Prince of Wales, who had greatly supported Earl Montfort's Rebellion, for thirty two thousand Pounds was restor'd to four Cantreds, which the King had taken from him in the War, and fully reconcil'd. And the Rebels in the Isle of Ely shortly after submitting to the noble Prince Edward, the Barons War ended, after it had above five Years afflicted the sinful Nation; in which, while they violently struggled for Superiority, both Sides were great Sufferers, according to the frequent Events of Civil Wars.

IX. These domestick Disturbances being thus compos'd, King Henry spent the four last Years of his Reign in perfect Peace and Tranquility, without any remarkable Contest or memorable Action. To establish which, he caus'd it to be proclaim'd in every County throughout England, That whosoever should invade, or unjustly usurp any Man's Goods or Possessions, as had been usual in the late Troubles, should be liable to a Capital Punishment. And to compleat all, he call'd a Parliament to meet at Marlborough, to renew and establish the Body of the Laws of England, where were made those Laws now extant

The Statutes of Marlborough. under the Title of The Statutes of Marlborough; in which among many other Things, Magna Charta and Charta Foreſta were again confirm'd. In the midſt of this Peace, by the ſolemn Preaching of Ottobon the Pope's Legate, the King's Sons, Prince Edward and Earl Edmund his Brother, as alſo Henry eldeſt Son to the King of the Romans, with the Earls of Gloceſter, Warren and Pembroke, and about one hundred and twenty other Knights, being touch'd with the great Loſſes in the Holy-Land, all receiv'd the Croſs at the Hands of the Legate, and devoted themſelves to this Employment. In the following Year, the Prince went over into France to join with King Lewis in the Holy War, who for his Proviſion in that Expedition lent him thirty thouſand Marks, for the Security of which the Prince mortgag'd Gaſcony to him. But before he enter'd upon the Journey, he return'd to England, and aſſiſted in the Ceremony of the Tranſlation of the Relicks of Edward the Confeſſor into a richer Shrine: For which the King had ſummon'd all the Prelates and Nobility of England, beſides the richeſt Men in all the Cities and Boroughs of England, to render the Solemnity more illuſtrious. Theſe being all aſſembled, with an infinite Confluence of People, the King himſelf and his Brother Richard began the Ceremony, by taking up St. Edward's Coffin upon their Shoulders; to which alſo the Princes Edward and Edmund, with divers Earls and Barons, lent their Hands: And being ſo carry'd, the Bones or Relicks were plac'd in a noble Shrine of Gold, adorn'd with precious Stones, which was then ſet in a high and eminent Place with the utmoſt Reverence, where it continu'd many Years.

The Prince did not depart out of England 'till the latter End of the following Year; before which Time, on the thirteenth Day of May, ſeveral of the Biſhops came to St. Paul's Church, and there caus'd the Bull of Pope Honorius the Third to be publickly read, by which he confirm'd the Charters of Liberties and Foreſts, which had been granted by this King in the Beginning of his Reign; and at the ſame Time ſolemnly excommunicated all Infringers of thoſe Charters, as had been formerly publiſh'd in Weſtminſter-Hall, in the Year 1253. Not long after, the Earl of Warren and Surrey, and Alan Lord Zouche, having a great Suit in Weſtminſter-Hall, the former ſet upon the latter in open Court and mortally wounded him; for which he was fin'd five thouſand Pounds to the King, and two thouſand to the Family of the Lord Zouche. About the middle of Auguſt, the Heroick Prince Edward, with his Princeſs Eleanor, left England, and winter'd in Sicily; where he was ſo intent upon his Holy Expedition, that when he underſtood that his chief Support the King of France was dead, and afterwards, that the greateſt Part of his Fleet was loſt by a Storm, and when he was diſſuaded from the Attempt by all about him, he ſwore a ſolemn Oath, That tho' all deſerted him, he would go, if he were attended only by his Groom. Accordingly in the following Spring he arriv'd in the Holy-Land, reliev'd the Town of Acon, and after that perform'd many noble Actions and great Enterprizes, to the great Damage of the Saracens, and his own laſting Renown. So that in a ſhort Time he became ſo formidable to his Enemies, that ſome of their Commanders diſhonourably ſent a deſperate Aſſaſſin, who under the Pretence of treating with him, ſtabb'd him with a poiſon'd Dagger; of which by Providence he eſcap'd with great Torment, and extreameſt Danger. And here we are told of an admirable Inſtance of Conjugal Love in his Princeſs Eleanor; who is ſaid to have ſuck'd out the Venom of the Wound with her own Lips, and by that means ſav'd his Life: But of this we have no great Certainty. Not long after ſhe was deliver'd of a Daughter, in the City of Acon, who from the Place of her Birth was nam'd Joan de Acres, and was afterwards marry'd to Gilbert Earl of Gloceſter.

he was extreamly disturb'd by a violent Contest between the Citizens and the Monks of Norwich, which increas'd to that Degree, that the former set Fire to the Cathedral Church, which together with the adjoining Monastery and Buildings, were all consum'd to the Ground; and they sacrilegiously carry'd away all the Holy Vessels and their Books which escap'd the Flames. The King highly mov'd at this Outrage and Impiety, sent down Justiciary Trivet to Norwich, who convicted great Numbers of the Offenders, and condemn'd them to be drawn at Horses Tails and hang'd; and soon after came in Person, who when he beheld the Ruins of the Cathedral, he could scarce refrain from Tears. The Bishop of Rochester excommunicated all that were concern'd in the Fact, and the King condemn'd the Community of the City to pay three thousand Marks, towards the Rebuilding of the Church, besides ten Pounds in Gold, and the Value of a hundred Pounds in Silver for a Golden Cup. The King in his Return to London, reposing himself at the Abby of St. Edmund's Bury, was there seiz'd with a languishing Distemper that never left him. Getting with great Difficulty to London, he there perform'd all those Religious Offices then thought necessary for a dying Man, and order'd by his Will that his Goods should first discharge his Debts, and the rest be given to the Poor; after which he dy'd on the twentieth Day of November, and the sixty sixth Year of his Age, after a very tedious and inglorious Reign of fifty six Years, one Month, and four Days. His Body, array'd in Royal Robes and the Crown on his Head, was two Days after carry'd by the chief Nobility in solemn mournful Pomp, and bury'd in the Church of Westminster, before the High Altar, near the Shrine of Edward the Confessor, where his Tomb with his Statue in Brass remains to this Day.

A great Disturbance in Norwich.

King Henry dies.

This Reign, which was the longest of any of the Kings of England, affords us great Variety and numerous Instances of an infirm and distemper'd State, occasion'd both by the Inequality of the Prince's Management, and the Impatience of a turbulent Nobility. As to the King's Person, he was of middle Stature, of a strong Body, and well proportion'd; but as to his Mind, he was so variable and uncertain, that it is hard to give a just Account of him. We find that he was naturally wilful and passionate, easily provok'd to Anger, and as easily appeas'd; fickle and unconstant both in his Love and Hatred; for he never had so great a Favourite, but he threw him into Disgrace, nor so great an Enemy, but he receiv'd him into Favour. He was by Nature easie and merciful, so that if he acted too rigorously in any Thing, it is to be imputed to his chief Ministers who had a full Ascendent over him; for he was scarce ever Sui Juris, being always under the Government of others, and too often of Strangers. And indeed it may justly be said of him, that he was a much better Man than a King and Governor; for tho' he oppress'd his Subjects with unreasonable Taxes, often broke his Coronation Oath, and as often violated his own Charters (for which he never miss'd of Punishment) yet he was nevertheless remarkable for his Devotion towards God, his Charity towards the Poor, and his Chastity as to himself. As to the former, he us'd to prefer Prayers before Sermons, alledging, That he had rather converse with his Friend, than hear from him. As to his Charities, Lewellyn Prince of Wales was wont to say, That he more dreaded the Power of his Alms, than all his Forces and Clergy together; and his Chastity has been celebrated by several Writers, as being a Virtue too rare in Princes, and unknown to all his Predecessors of the Norman Race besides William I. But as for personal Valour and Courage, he was not much noted; his greatest Happiness was in his admirable Son, who ended all Civil Troubles, and afterwards by his Prudence and Fortitude rais'd the English Monarchy to a great Part of its ancient Glory.

His Character.

In this Reign, Stealing of Cattel, which before was but pecuniary, is said to have been first made Capital; and as to Weights and Measures, some of them were by Law fix'd thus: An English Penny call'd a Sterling, round and without out Clipping was to weigh thirty two Wheat Corns taken out of the midst of the Ear; and twenty Pennies were to make an Ounce, twelve Ounces one Pound, eight Pounds a Gallon of Wine, and eight Gallons a London Bushel, the eighth Part of a Quarter. In the forty first Year of his Reign, the King coin'd a Penny of pure Gold of the Weight of two Barley Corns, and commanded that it should pass for twenty Shillings; which was the first Piece of Gold we find was coin'd in England.

Thus we have gone through with eight Kings of the Norman Race, of whom the six first were Heroes and valiant Warriors, and the seventh no despicable Soldier. And of these eight, only Richard I. had a certain and unquestionable Right to the Crown of England, if we reckon according to the strict Rules of Hereditary Succession; for all the rest came to the Throne when there was a nearer Heir living.

I. IN the two laſt Reigns the Monarchy of England was extreamly debas'd and diſhonour'd, as well by inteſtine Convulſions, as foreign Loſſes; but now it began again to raiſe its Head, and to diſplay its Grandeur, by Means of the renowned Prince Edward, ſirnam'd Longſhanks, from the Tallneſs of his Stature, and the Celerity of his Motions. The Spirit and Abilities of this Prince appear'd in the Beginning of his Actions under his Father, after the great Defeat he gave the Barons at Eveſham; the Proſecution of the diſinherited Oppoſers; the expoſing of his Perſon to all Hazards and Labours; his ſingle Combate with Adam Gurdon the valiant Out-Law; and his noble Adventures and Attempts in the Eaſt: And finally his great Experience in the Affairs of the World, with the Vigour of his Age, which was now the thirty fourth Year, might well preſage what an able Maſter he would prove in the Management of them. Therefore upon the Death of King Henry, John Earl of Warren and Gilbert Earl of Gloceſter, with the Clergy and Laity, went to the great Altar in the Church of Weſtminſter, and ſwore Fealty to his Firſt-Born Son Edward, then in the Holy-Land, not knowing whether he was living. Shortly after the Nobility of the Nation met at the new Temple

Temple in London, where a new Seal being produc'd, they appointed Miniſters and Guardians to keep the King's Treaſure, and the Peace of the Kingdom, which were the Arch-Biſhop of York, the Earl of Cornwall, and the Earl of Gloceſter, who by their Appointment enter'd upon the Exerciſe of the Government, without any poſſible Privity or Knowledge of the King: Yet all the Writs, Proclamations and Inſtruments concerning the Government were iſſu'd out in the King's Name, as appears by ſeveral Inſtances upon Record. Upon the Feaſt of St. Hilary, a Convention of the States was ſummon'd to ſettle the Peace of the Kingdom 'till he ſhould return, conſiſting not only of the Lords, but of four Knights for every Shire, and as many Citizens for every City, as the Waverly Annals aſſure us; in which it was provided, that there ſhould be no Itinerant Judges, except only of the Bench, 'till the King's Return.

King Edward leaves the Holy Land.

During theſe Proviſions at home, Prince Edward, being diſappointed of his promis'd Succours, left the Holy-Land, and return'd to Sicily, where he was honourably receiv'd by Charles King of that Iſland. Here, to the Memory of that filial Duty and Affection rare in Princes, we are aſſur'd, that the Death of his Son and Heir coming firſt to his Knowledge, and ſoon after of the King his Father, he expreſs'd much greater Sorrow at the Latter than the Former; and when the King of Sicily admired at his Behaviour, he anſwer'd, That the Loſs of Children might be retriev'd by the Birth of others, but the Loſs of Parents was irreparable. From Sicily he was by the King conducted to the Roman Court, where he ſpent ſome Time with Pope Gregory the Tenth, his Friend and familiar Acquaintance in the Holy-Land; and from thence he paſs'd into Burgundy, where at the Foot of the Mountains, ſome Engliſh Biſhops, Abbots, Earls and Barons met him, with all the Marks of Duty and Affection. Here, being challeng'd in a Tournament by the ſtout and fierce Earl of Chabloun, he highly ſignaliz'd his perſonal Strength and Valour by the Conqueſt of his potent Adverſary. From thence, paſſing into France, he was receiv'd with great Honour by King Philip his Coſen-German, to whom he did Homage for the Hereditary Lands held of him, and receiv'd formal Poſſeſſion of them. Then taking his Leave of the King and Peers of France, he went into Gaſcony to receive the Homage and Service of his Subjects there, in which he found much Oppoſition from ſeveral; but chiefly from Gaſton Viſcount of Bearn, who becauſe a Predeceſſor of his had ſworn Fealty to the King of Arragon, he utterly deny'd his Homage. Upon which King Edward ſeiz'd upon his Perſon, and kept him Priſoner among his Retinue, from whence making his Eſcape, he was driven out of his Country; and upon an Appeal to King Philip, as Soveraign Lord of Gaſcony, he in favour of King Edward, compell'd Gaſton to hold his Lands of him.

His Coronation.

In the ſecond Year of his Reign, having ſetled his Affairs beyond Sea, he took Shipping at Boloign, and landed in England on the twenty fifth Day of July; where the two Earls of Gloceſter and Warren receiv'd him with greater State than any others, conducting him to their Caſtles of Tunbridge and Rigate, where they feaſted and entertain'd him with great Magnificence for many Days. On the nineteenth Day of Auguſt, he and his Queen Eleanor, his faithful Aſſociate in all his Travels and Hazards, were ſolemnly crowned at Weſtminſter by Rober Kilwarby Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury; in the Preſence of Queen Eleanor the King's Mother, Alexander King of Scotland, John Duke of Bretaign, and Multitudes of the Nobility and others: Where for the more royal Celebration of this grand Feaſt, and Honour of ſo martial a King, there were five hundred great Horſes let looſe, for the Benefit of any that could catch them. Towards the Middle of October, the King iſſu'd out Writs of Inquiry by the Oaths of twelve legal Men, to two Commiſſiones in every County, to inquire what his Royalties, and the Liberties and Prerogatives of his Crown were, who were his Tenants in Capite, and Military Service, and how many and what Fees they held of him; Of his Tenants in ancient Demeaſn, how how they behav'd themſelves, and in what Condition their Farms were; Of Sheriffs, Coroners, Eſcheators, Bayliffs and their Clerks, whether they had extorted Mony from any Man, by reaſon of their Office, had injur'd any Man, or receiv'd Bribes for Negligence or Remiſneſs; with all other Matters relating to the Benefit of the Publick.

Pewel. Weſtminſ. Wikes. During the Eſtabliſhment of theſe Affairs in England, the final Extinction of the Principality and Government of Wales began to draw near; but ſtill like the Movement of all great Tranſactions, by Length of Time, and gradual Approaches. The Original began at King Edward's Coronation, at which Time the King ſent for Lewellyn Prince of Wales to attend at the Solemnity, and pay him Homage; but he making ſome Excuſes, was for that Reaſon admoniſh'd to repair to the King's Parliament to be held the following Year at Weſtminſter. At which Time alſo he refus'd to appear, fearing the King's former Diſpleaſure in his Father's Reign, and alledging, He was in Danger as to his Perſon; but directing his Excuſe to the two Arch-Biſhops and their Suffragans, he profeſs'd his Readineſs to acknowledge the King, If he would ſend a Commiſſion for taking his Oath and Fealty; or if he would appoint ſome indifferent Place, or if he would give his Son, the Earl of Gloceſter and his Chancellor for Hoſtages of Security. The King, diſſembling the Arrogancy of the Demand for the preſent, proceeded in the Buſineſs of his Parliament, and made excellent Laws both for Church and State, and for the Eaſe and Benefit of both; which are call'd The firſt Statutes of Weſtminſter. But after the Parliament was diſſolv'd, the King took up a Reſolution to ſeize upon the whole Fee of Prince Lewellyn, for his Denial of Homage; and made his Preparations accordingly. In the Beginnings of which, he met with a fair Proſpect of Succeſs by a conſiderable Prize, which four Ships of Briſtol took about the Iſles of Scilly, in which the Daughter of the great Montfort Earl of Leiceſter, who was juſt given in Marriage to Lewellyn, and her Brother Aimerick were ſurpriz'd; but ſhe found honourable Uſage from the King, her near Kinſman. Upon this Lewellyn ſent Ambaſſadors to obtain a Peace, and to propoſe a Ranſom for his intended Wife; but the King refus'd both, unleſs he would reſtore the Lands which he had ſeiz'd and invaded in the Marches to the juſt Proprietors, and repair the Caſtles in England which he had deſtroy'd. The Prince not complying, the King ſent Forces to ſecure the Engliſh Frontiers from the Devaſtations of the Welſh; but thoſe proving inſufficient, in the fifth Year of his Reign, he iſſu'd out his Writs to all the Nobility and others that held of him by military Service to appear at Worceſter at a certain Day. And for the better Management of publick Affairs, the Courts of the Exchequer and the King's Bench were remov'd for a while from Weſtminſter to Shrewsbury, that they might be near the King's Perſon. Having got a ſufficient Army the valiant King march'd towards Wales, and in his Paſſage cut a large and ſpacious Way through a vaſt Wood into Lewellyn's Country, where he built the two Caſtles of Flint and Rothelan. Then ſeizing on the Welſhmen's Lands and Goods, he waſted their Country, and drove them into their uſual Place of Retreat, the Mountains of Snowdon; and with the Aſſiſtance of the Men of the Five Ports, he in a ſhort Time took the Iſle of Angleſey.

Walſing. Pewel. At length Prince Lewellyn finding himſelf unable to reſiſt ſo potent an Adverſary, deſired a Peace, which was granted him upon very hard Conditions; the principal of which ſhows the Welſh to have had greater Riches in Poſſeſſion at this Time, than after Ages would readily believe. For one Article was, That Lewellyn ſhould pay fifty thouſand Pounds at the King's Pleaſure; and another, That he ſhould hold the Iſle of Angleſey in Fee-Farm of the King, for Himſelf and his Heirs, upon the Payment of five Thouſand Marks ready Mony, and a thouſand Marks annual Rent. The reſt of the Articles amounted to as much as a Conqueſt, or Diſſolution of the Principality of Wales, after Lewellyn's Deceaſe, who was to enjoy it during Life, upon certain Conditions.

For the Ratification of all which, Lewellyn granted a ſufficient Number of Hoſtages, and alſo oblig'd himſelf to make Satisfaction to his three Brothers, Owen, Roderick and David; the two former of whom he had impriſon'd, and the laſt he had forc'd to fly into England, where he had receiv'd the Honour of Knighthood, and many Favours from the King. After which, King Edward to ſhow his Generoſity and Greatneſs, releas'd the Prince from the greateſt Part of the Sums promis'd, and freely reſtor'd him his deſign'd Spouſe, honouring his Nuptials with his own Preſence, and that of the Queen.

A. D. 1279. Reg. 7.

As the King inlarg'd his Dominions in England, ſo he gain'd ſome Territories in France, as particularly the Earldom of Ponthieu in Picardy, which fell to his Queen by the Death of her Mother the Queen of Caſtile, who was alſo Counteſs of Ponthieu. Upon which Account he went into France with his Queen, and at Amiens did Homage to King Philip for that and other Lands in Gaſcony, of which he deliver'd to him the perpetual Poſſeſſion; for which King Edward reſign'd all his Right to the Dukedom of Normandy, reſerving only thirty Livers of Paris to be annually paid out of the Exchequer. *Walſing. The King takes care of the Coin of the Nation.

At his Return into England, he took great Care of the Coin of the Nation, which had been much debas'd by frequent Clippings and Counterfeits; and to put a Stop to this Miſchief, in November, all the Jews in England were taken and impriſon'd in one Day, and being legally try'd, no leſs than two hundred and eighty of both Sexes were hang'd, beſides great Numbers that were fin'd. The King alſo held a Parliament, in which to diminiſh the exorbitant Power of the Eccleſiaſticks, the firſt Statute of Mortmain was enacted. And to regulate the Diſorders in the Church, a Council or Synod was held at Reading by John Peckham, lately made Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury; in which it was determin'd among other Things That no Clergy-Man ſhould have above one Benefice with the Cure of Souls. As the State-Councils in the late Reign firſt began to be call'd Parliaments, ſo the Eccleſiaſtical Councils or Synods ſeem to have begun about this Time to be call'd Convocations. And this preſent Convocation is the firſt Time that the Dioceſan Clergy appear to have been repreſented by Proctors of their own chuſing; before which they gave Procuratorial Letters to their Arch-Deacons.

The firſt Statute of Mortmain.

A. D. 1280. Reg. 8/9.

About the ſame Time the King wanting Mony, found out a new Project for his purpoſe; namely, That whereas he was chief Lord of many Manors and Poſſeſſions, he well underſtood that partly by Length of Time, and partly by Caſualties during the late Civil Wars, many Mens Deeds and Evidences were loſt or deſtroy'd; therefore under Colour of putting the Statute of Quo waranto, enacted this Year at Gloceſter, in Execution, he commanded by Proclamation, That all ſuch as held any Lands or Tenements of him, ſhould come and ſhow their Titles, which if defective, were to be redeem'd by large Sums of Mony. This Proclamation was look'd upon as very inſidious, and a great Hardſhip upon many, yet ſeveral were oblig'd to comply to their great Damage; but when the bold Earl of Warren was call'd before the King's Juſticiaries, and demanded by what Right he held his Lands, he drew out a large ruſty Sword and declar'd, That he held them by that Inſtrument, and by that would hold them 'till Death. This free and open Declaration, together with the Diſcontents of many intereſted People, induc'd this wiſe King in a ſhort Time to deſiſt from his Deſign.

The King enquires into Mens Titles to their Eſtates.

A. D. 1281. Reg. 9/10.

Tho' the noble King Edward had endeavour'd to gain the Welſh more by his Munificence than his Power, and had treated Lewellyn with a Generoſity beyond all Expectation; yet the natural Deſire of a full Liberty, and the fond Belief of Merlin's Prophecy That this Prince ſhould wear the Diadem of Brute, had ſuch Effects upon that Nation, that they again betook themſelves to Arms. David, who had receiv'd many Favours and Honours from King Edward, was the principal Agent, for joining with his Brother Lewellyn, he ſuddenly ſurpriz'd the Lord Clifford, the King's Juſticiary in Wales, kill'd many of his Servants, wounded, bound and ſent him Priſoner to the Mountain of Snowdon, *Weſtminſ. Snowdon, and then committed great Devaſtations, and deſtroy'd the Marches. The King hearing the News of this Revolt, at firſt doubted the Truth of it, but upon better Information, he prepar'd his Army to march into Wales; but before he join'd with his Men, he made a Viſit to his Mother at a Nunnery in Ambresbury, who with great Satisfaction entertain'd him with the Preſence of a Man who pretended to have had his Sight reſtor'd at the Tomb of his Father Henry. But the King well knowing the Party, to her great Diſpleaſure declar'd, That he ſo well knew the Juſtice of his Father, that he would rather pull out the Eyes of ſuch a wicked Impoſtor, than reſtore them to their Sight. From thence marching into Wales with his Army, he built a large Bridge of Veſſels over the River Menay, oppoſite to Bangor, poſſeſs'd himſelf of the Country about Snowdon, and gave many Shares of thoſe Lands to his Barons, and others who had faithfully aſſiſted him. Over this Bridge many of the Nobility of the King's Party paſs'd out of Angleſey to view and obſerve the Country; but being terrify'd with the Multitude and Noiſe of the Welſh coming upon them, by too haſty a Return, they were unfortunately drown'd in their Paſſage. The Welſh incourag'd by this Accident, which they look'd upon as a Miracle, excited their Prince with the Notion of Merlin's Prophecy, and ingag'd him to come down from the Mountains into the Plains, with the greateſt Part of his Forces. This Counſel prov'd fatal to him, for being ſhortly after attack'd by King Edward's Forces, his Army was defeated, and he himſelf was ſlain, and his Head was ſent to King Edward, who order'd it to be ignominiouſly crown'd with Ivy, and to be ſet upon the Tower of London.

Lewellyn the laſt Prince, ſlain.

Walſing. Powel. &c.

This was the End of Lewellyn, the laſt Soveraign Prince of Wales, of the moſt noble and ancient Family in Europe; with whom the Liberty of that Nation did ſhortly after expire. For the Welſh being now diſhearten'd and confounded, it was not long before the valiant Edward made himſelf Maſter of the greateſt Part of the Country; reſerving to himſelf the Port Towns and Forts towards the Sea, and diſtributing the Inland Parts to the Lords his Followers. In which he wiſely follow'd the Methods of Auguſtus, who thus under the ſpecious Pretext of a Defence for the Provinces, had the command of all their Forces at his Pleaſure. Nevertheleſs the whole Flame was not yet extinguiſh'd, for David the Prince's Brother, and chief Incendiary in this fatal Conteſt, was ſtill with ſome Forces at large. This Man being at length taken and brought to King Edward at the Caſtle of Rothelan could not obtain the Favour of his Speech or Sight, but was immediately ſent away Priſoner to Shrowsbury; where a Parliament being ſummon'd, after a legal and judicial Trial, the King caus'd David to be put to a terrible Death, by Hanging, Beheading and Quartering; his Head being ſet up at London, and his Quarters at Briſtol, Northampton, York and Wincheſter, to be a Terror to all ingrateful and diſloyal Perſons: A manifold Execution, and the firſt of that Kind in this Kingdom, in the Perſon of a Prince's Son, or any Nobleman we find in our Hiſtory. The Welſh Line thus extinct, King Edward upon the twenty fifth Day of April had a Son born at Caernarvon in this Country, who was alſo call'd Edward and reign'd after him, being the firſt of the Sons of the Kings of England that had the Title of Prince of Wales. And that the Welſh might be inur'd to new Laws, with the Birth of a new Lord, King Edward, after the Example of his Grand-father King John in Ireland, eſtabliſh'd all the Engliſh Laws and Offices amongſt them. Thus came Wales, that ſmall Portion left to the ancient Britains, to be ſubject to the Crown of England: And it is wonderful that it ſhould ſo long ſubſiſt againſt ſo great a Power; having had but ſmall Aſſiſtance from others, no Strength by Sea, no Alliances or Intelligence with Princes out of this Iſle; and being ſo often invaded, ſo often diſtreſs'd, ſo eagerly purſu'd, by almoſt every King of England, and thought to have been by many of them ſubdu'd, it muſt needs ſhow the real Worthineſs of the Nation, and their noble Courage in preſerving their ancient Liberty.

II. Wales being reduc'd, and England in a profound Peace, we do not find many Matters of Moment for five or six Years together. After the King had eſtabliſh'd the Welſh Affairs, he kept a ſolemn Chriſtmaſs at Briſtol, which none of the Engliſh Kings had done before; and from thence went to London, from whence he had been almoſt three Years abſent. Not long after he ſeiz'd upon the Privileges of the City, diſcharg'd the preſent Mayor, and put another in his Room; becauſe, as we are told, he had taken Bribes of the Bakers, and ſuffer'd them to ſell Bread that wanted ſix or ſeven Ounces Weight in a Penny Loaf. The King alſo held a Parliament at Weſtminſter, in which the Statutes call'd Additamenta Gloceſtriæ were enacted, or rather the Statutes of Weſtminſter the Second. About which Time all the new Work in the Abby Church of Weſtminſter was compleatly finiſh'd, which had been begun above ſixty Years before. In the ſucceeding Year the Jews in one Night were generally apprehended, and kept in ſtrict Cuſtody throughout all Parts of England, 'till they had purchas'd their Liberty from the Crown. It is reported that the Commons of England granted to the King the fifth Part of all their Moveables, to procure the Baniſhment of all the Jews from the Land; but this ſubtle Generation, to defeat all their Deſigns, preſented the King with ſuch large Sums of Mony, as ſtopp'd the Execution.

The King of France having in the laſt Year deſir'd the Mediation of King Edward between him and the Kings of Arragon and Caſtile, he comply'd with his Requeſt, and this Year with a noble Retinue paſs'd over into France, where he receiv'd many Honours, and ſate in Perſon with the French King at his Parliament in Paris. He continu'd above three Years in ſeveral Parts of France, to make a full and final Eſtabliſhment of his Dominions in that Country; during which Time, beſides his Mediation ratify'd, by demanding the Territories his Grand-father King John had loſt, he is ſaid to obtain ten thouſand Pound Sterling of the French King, to be yearly paid at the Tower of London, together with ſome Arrears for Normandy. During his Continuance in France, a violent Conteſt aroſe between the Lord Pain Tiptoſt, Governor of ſome Caſtles in Wales, and a Welſh Knight call'd Rees ap Meridoc; inſomuch that ſeveral Skirmiſhes were fought between them, to the great Diſturbance of the whole Country. Upon which King Edward wrote out of France to the ſaid Rees, requiring him to keep the Peace 'till his Return, when he ſhould receive reſonable Satisfaction; but Rees having already taken up Arms, reſolv'd to revenge his own Cauſe, and by the Aſſiſtance of great Numbers of his Countrymen, burnt and deſtroy'd many Towns in Wales. Theſe Ravages ſo far increas'd, that the King thought fit to ſend to the Earl of Cornwall his Lieutenant in England, requiring him to march with an Army into Wales, to ſuppreſs the Attempts of thoſe People. Accordingly the Earl, with ſome other Noblemen, enter'd Wales with a ſufficient Power, and purſuing the Forces of Rees, diſpers'd them, and deſtroy'd ſeveral of his Caſtles; but by Undermining the Walls of the Caſtle of Druſlan, the Baron Stafford, the Lord Montchenſy, with many Knights and Eſquires were bruis'd to Death by the Fall of them. In the next Year Rees renew'd his violent Attempts, and gather'd together a numerous Force; upon which the Lord Tiptoſt, Deputy of Wales, with what Engliſh Troops he could procure in a ſhort Time, march'd directly to oppoſe him. Rees underſtanding that the Engliſh were far leſs in Number, did not doubt of Succeſs, and fell down upon them with great Fury and Precipitation; but at length the Valour and Conduct of the Engliſh prevail'd, ſo that Rees himſelf was taken Priſoner, and the greateſt Part of his Men, to the Number of four thouſand, were cut in Pieces. Thus were the Welſhmen chaſtis'd for their rebellious Inſurrection; and Rees himſelf was brought to York, where in the following Year he ſuffer'd the new introduc'd Execution of being hang'd, drawn and quarter'd.

At length, after a full Eſtabliſhment of the Affairs in France, and above three Years Continuance in that Country, King Edward with his Queen return'd into England, to the great Joy and Satisfaction of the Nation. Shortly after, like a Father of his Country, he undertook to purge the Land from all Corruptions and Oppreſſions of his Officers, and becauſe ſeveral of his Juſticiaries had to inrich themſelves taken Bribes, and perverted Judgment, he took care to puniſh them according to the Nature of their Crimes, and not only remov'd them with all the Marks of Diſhonour, but alſo laid ſevere Fines upon them. We have the Names of twelve that were found guilty, among whom Sir Thomas Weyland, the King's chief Juſticiary, and Adam de Stratton, were principal; the former had all his Goods confiſcated, and alſo ſuffer'd Baniſhment, and the latter was oblig'd to pay a Fine of no leſs than three hundred and twenty thouſand Marks. After this the King compell'd all his Juſticiaries to take an Oath that from that Time, they would take no Penſion, Fee or Preſent from any Man, but only the Civility of an ordinary Breakfaſt. Then calling a Parliament, the Statutes of Weſtminſter the Third were enacted; at which Time it was decreed that all the Jews ſhould quit the Nation, in Conſideration of which the Parliament gave the King a Fifteenth upon all Goods. Upon which all the Jews were for ever baniſh'd out of the King's Dominions, and could by no Methods obtain leave to return: All their immoveable Goods were confiſcated, with their Bonds and Tallies; but their Moveables, Gold, Silver and Jewels, were allow'd them, and they had Liberty to carry them away with them. In the ſame Year the King, in a Journey towards Scotland, loſt his moſt beloved Conſort, the incomparable Queen Eleanor, who had been his inſeparable Attendant in all his Travels, Dangers and Labours. She dy'd at Hareby near Bullenbroke in Lincolnſhire; her Bowels were bury'd in our Lady's Chappel in the Cathedral of Lincoln, and her Body in the Abby Church of Weſtminſter, at the Feet of King Henry the Third. The King with extream Grief and Sorrow attended her Corps from Lincolnſhire to Weſtminſter, erecting ſtately Croſſes at Lincoln, Grantham, Stamford, Northampton, Waltham, Cheapſide, Charing, and in all other Places, where the Body reſted, to the renown'd Memory of this moſt admirable Wife, and excellent Queen.

III. In theſe Times a terrible Storm began to threaten the Realm of Scotland, which prov'd much to the Diminution of the Name and Authority of that Kingdom, and no leſs to the aggrandiſing the Reign of King Edward; and which was introduc'd, as Boetius tells us, with formidable Preſages, as extraordinary Meteors, Floods, Fires and Peſtilence. The Beginning of it was occaſion'd by the Death of Alexander King of Scotland, who in the Year 1285 loſt his Life by a Fall off his Horſe, and left his Kingdom without any Heir, beſides one young Grand-Child nam'd Margaret, Daughter to Eric King of Norwey; upon which the Government of the Kingdom was manag'd by particular Guardians for about five Years. But the young Princeſs Margaret, whom King Edward had deſign'd for his Son's Wife, dying this preſent Year, there aroſe no leſs than twelve Pretenders to the Right of the Crown of Scotland, beſides Eric King of Norwey, which put the Nation into a great Confuſion. The Names of the twelve were John Baliol, Robert Brus, Florence Earl of Holland, Partrick Dunbar Earl of Marche, William Veſcy, William Ros, Robert Pinkny, Nicolas Soules, Patrick Galighty, Roger Mundevil, John Comyn, and John Haſtings. Upon this Conteſt and Diſturbance, King Edward, as Superior and direct Lord of Scotland, call'd a Parliament at Norham in the Confines of that Kingdom, and went thither in Perſon to determine the Controverſie about the Right of Succeſſion between all the Competitors. The Account of which important Tranſaction we have from undoubted Records publiſh'd at large by Mr. Pryn, which diſcover ſeveral Miſtakes or Defects both in the Scotch and Engliſh Hiſtorians.

A. D. 1291. Reg. 19/20.

In the nineteenth Year of this Reign, and the tenth Day of May, by King Edward's Command the Nobility, Prelates and Community of the Kingdoms of England and Scotland met at Norham; where Roger Brabancon, the King's Juſticiary, in the King's Name, publickly declar'd to the whole Aſſembly the Reaſon of his Majeſty's Coming, and of their Summons to that Place, That his Majeſty taking notice of the Confuſions of Scotland ſince the Death of Alexander their laſt King and his Progeny, out of the Affection he had for them and all the Inhabitants, whoſe Safety and Protection was well known to belong to him, for the doing Juſtice to all that claim'd the Kingdom, and for the Preſervation of the Publick Peace, he appear'd there: And likewiſe, without Uſurpation or Diminution of their Liberties, to ſhew them his Superiority and Direct Dominion out of divers undoubted Chronicles and Monuments, and to demand their Aſſent, and Recognition of his Authority. Upon this Declaration, the Nobility and Repreſentatives of Scotland requir'd Time to conſult with their abſent Members, which the King granted only 'till the next Day; when meeting again, they preſs'd for a longer Time to anſwer to his Demand concerning their Recognition of his Superiority and Direct Dominion over the Kingdom of Scotland, which he had declar'd to be his Right. Upon Deliberation, the King appointed the ſecond Day of June, on which Day They were poſitively to anſwer his Demand, and if they had any Writings, Evidences or Antiquities that might exclude him from the Right and Exerciſe of his Superiority and Direct Dominion, or overthrow his Reaſons and Arguments for it, they were then to exhibit them openly; proteſting, That he was ready to grant what Law and Juſtice had eſtabliſh'd. And that they might the better underſtand his Title, and make their Objections againſt it, the Biſhop of Durham was appointed to declare to the Aſſembly, That the Arguments the King deſign'd to uſe were Hiſtorical, and taken from the Writings of Marianus Scotus, William of Malmesbury, Roger de Hoveden, Henry de Huntington, Ralph de Diceto, and Matthew Paris, implying, 'That the Scots had been conquer'd by 'ſeveral of the Engliſh Saxon Kings; That ſeveral of their Kings had ſub-'mitted, ſworn Fealty, done Homage to them, and receiv'd the Crown and 'Kingdom from them; and that the Scots had alſo ſubmitted and been go-'vern'd by ſuch Kings, as the other had plac'd over them; and laſtly after 'the Norman Conqueſt, the very ſame Thing had been acted, acknowledg'd and 'ſubmitted to, in all the ſeveral Reigns ſince that Revolution.

King Edward claims the Superiority over that Kingdom.

The Arguments he us'd.

Upon the ſecond Day of June, the Nobility and Community of Scotland, met in a green Plain over-againſt Norham Caſtle, where King Edward reſided; together with thoſe Noblemen who claim'd the Kingdom. Upon which the Biſhop of Bath was ſent to demand of them in the King's Name, What they had done ſince the laſt Meeting, and whether they would exhibit or propound any Thing that could or ought to exclude the King of England from the Right and Exerciſe of the Superiority and Direct Dominion of Scotland; proteſting in the Name of his Maſter, that he would favourably hear them, allow what was juſt, and report their Anſwer to him and his Council. Being often requir'd, and they alledging nothing to the contrary, the Biſhop reported the Subſtance of what had been ſaid and urg'd for the King of England's Title, and what had been tranſacted in theſe ſeveral Meetings, and then declar'd to them, That the King would make uſe of his Right of Superiority and Direct Dominion in Scotland, in deciding the Controverſie between the ſeveral Competitors for that Kingdom. Then beginning with Robert Brus, one of the twelve Claimers, he ask'd him in the Preſence of all, Whether in claiming the ſaid Right, he would demand and receive Juſtice before the King of England, as Superior and Direct Lord of the Kingdom of Scotland; who publickly, expreſly and without Contradiction, anſwer'd, That he did acknowledge the King of England to be Superior and Direct Lord of the Kingdom of Scotland, and as ſuch he would before him demand and receive Juſtice. The ſame Anſwer was return'd by all the reſt reſt of the Competitors, who did not only make this publick Recognition, but alſo ſet their Hands and Seals to a certain Inſtrument, ſtill upon Record, in which they declar'd That to the King of England belong'd the Soveraign Seigneury of the Kingdom of Scotland, and the Cognizance of hearing, trying and determining their Right; and that they would keep firm and ſtable to his Act and Determination.

Ibid. This done, King Edward and his Council treated with the Scotch Nobility and Competitors about a Method of Proceedings, and the Reformation of the State of the Nation: And it was unanimouſly agreed by both Kingdoms, That John Baliol and John Comyn ſhould chuſe forty Perſons, and Robert Brus as many, whoſe Names within three Days ſhould be deliver'd to the King, to whom he was to add twenty four, more or leſs, who ſhould hear and diſcuſs the Rights of all the Pretenders, and to make a faithful Report to him, That he might give the definitive Sentence. But becauſe for want of Poſſeſſion the King had not full Power to put his Sentence in Execution, on the fourth Day of June, by a ſecond Inſtrument the Competitors, with the Conſent of the Community of the Nation, gave him actual Poſſeſſion of the Kingdom and Caſtles of Scotland. In which it was declar'd That they did it freely and without Compulſion; that as Soveraign Lord they had given King Edward Seiſin of all the Land and Strength of Scotland, upon Condition That he ſhould reſtore all Things as he had found them, within two Months after he had determin'd the Right of Succeſſion; ſaving to the Crown of England, the Homage of him that ſhall be King. On the fifth of June, the Names of the Eighty elected to examine and report the Rights of the Competitors, were deliver'd to the King; and on the ſixth, they were order'd to appoint the Day and Place for hearing and diſcuſſing their Right. Berwick upon Tweed was appointed for the Place; but not agreeing upon the Day, the King as ſuperior Lord, by the Conſent of both Nations, appointed the ſecond of Auguſt, as a peremptory Day for the Competitors to plead their Rights and Titles. On the eleventh Day of June, all the Guardians of the Kingdom, with the Governors of the Caſtles, deliver'd up their Guardianſhips and Offices to the King as ſuperior Lord; which when he had receiv'd, he committed the Charge of the Kingdom to the ſame Perſons, to govern it under him, and in his Name. This being finiſh'd, the next Day, all Perſons preſent, both Eccleſiaſtical and Civil, who were oblig'd to ſwear Fealty to their own King, did it in a ſolemn Manner to King Edward, as ſuperior and direct Lord of Scotland, in a Green Plain within the Bounds of that Kingdom. From that Time, 'till the Beginning of Auguſt, the reſt of the People were, to ſave Labour and Expences, ſworn by Commiſſioners in all Parts of the Kingdom, of which the Names of great Numbers are ſtill upon the Rolls; and in every Place, when they had ſworn, the King of England's Peace or Pardon was proclaim'd.

The Manner of Proceeding.

King Edward has Poſſeſſion given him of Scotland.

Weſtminſ. &c. While the King was deciding this great Controverſie, his Mother Queen Eleanor dy'd about Midſummer, upon which he return'd into England to ſee her Funeral ſolemniz'd with all filial Duty and Honour. After which he came to Berwick upon the third Day of Auguſt, where the twelve Competitors appear'd before him and a Parliament of both Nations, and with them the twenty four Engliſh Examiners of their Titles choſen by the King, and the eighty choſen by Robert Brus and John Baliol. The Petitions, with the Reaſons of their Claims having been propounded and ſhown to the Examiners, they reported them to the King before the whole Aſſembly, and in the Preſence of every one of the Demandants. The King finding it to be an Affair of great Weight and Moment, by their own Conſent, appointed them a longer Time 'till the ſecond Day of June in the following Year 1292, for the further Proceeding in this uncommon Controverſie.

The King's Mother dies.

A. D. 1292. Reg. $\frac{20}{21}$.

The Tower Rolls. At the appointed Time, the King met again at Berwick, where the Communities of both Nations being aſſembled, and the Competitors preſent, the Auditors tors appointed to diſcuſs their Rights and Pretenſions, after an attentive Hearing related all that had paſs'd to the King; who, with the Nobility of both Kingdoms, carefully examin'd them. But becauſe he found there would be many Delays, and much Time expended, to the Inconveniency and Peril of the Kingdom, it was order'd by the expreſs Conſent of all the Pretenders, and by the Aſſent of the whole Aſſembly, That the Rights and Titles of Robert Brus and John Baliol ſhould be firſt examin'd and diſcuſs'd, and that afterwards all others might proſecute their Claims if they thought fit. The King, tho' he had it in his Power to determine the Cauſe alone, yet that he might proceed with more Prudence and Security, he caus'd the eighty Examiners to take an Oath, That they would adviſe him how and by what Laws and Cuſtoms he was to paſs Judgment in this Matter. Theſe eighty alledg'd great Difficulties, and deſir'd that the twenty four appointed by the King might be added to them; and theſe alledg'd greater, and refus'd to undertake the Charge, without the Advice of thoſe Engliſh Prelates and Nobility that were abſent. Wherefore, by the unanimous Conſent of all preſent, the King appointed the fourteenth Day of October next, for the further Proceeding in this Affair, in his Parliament to be held in the ſame Place.

The Nobility and Auditors met according to Appointment; and the King demanded By what Laws and Cuſtoms Judgment was to be given in the preſent Caſe; if none were found, how it was to be determin'd; and whether otherwiſe concerning the Kingdom, than concerning Earldoms, Baronies and other Tenures? They all unanimouſly anſwer'd, That Judgment was to be made by the Laws of the Kingdom, if any were found; if not, the King ought, by the Advice of his Nobility, to make a new One: And as to the Right of Succeſſion in Scotland, Judgment was to be given as in Earldoms, Baronies, and other individible Tenures. Upon this Anſwer, the King order'd the Auditors favourably to hear John Baliol and Robert Brus from Day to Day what they had to alledge; and Robert Brus began with ſhewing the Reaſons and Arguments for his Claim, and then John Baliol ſet forth his, in a long Plea, and anſwer'd all that the other had ſaid. Now of the three Daughters of David Earl of Huntington, undoubted Heir to the Crown of Scotland, John Baliol was Grand-ſon to the Eldeſt, and Robert Brus was Son to the Second; wherefore the King before the whole Aſſembly deſir'd their Advice; and the Force of the Arguments on both Sides were drawn into this Queſtion: Whether the more Remote by one Degree in Succeſſion, coming from the eldeſt Siſter, ought, according to the Laws of both Kingdoms, to exclude the Nearer by one Degree coming from the ſecond Siſter; or whether the Nearer by one Degree coming from the ſecond Siſter, ought to exclude the more Remote by one Degree coming from the eldeſt Siſter? To which they unanimouſly anſwer'd, That the more Remote by one Degree lineally deſcending from the eldeſt Siſter, according to the Laws and Cuſtoms of both Kingdoms, was to be preferr'd to the Nearer by one Degree coming from the ſecond Siſter, in every Hereditary Succeſſion. Ibid.

The Nature of the Scoth Succeſſion.

Upon this Anſwer, the King caus'd the Matter to be re-examin'd before the Nobility of both Kingdoms, and appointed the ſixth Day of November for John Baliol and Robert Brus to hear their Sentence; which was pronounc'd by the King Judicially, by the Advice of the Nobility of both Kingdoms, the Auditors, and others of the Council: Namely, That Robert Brus ſhould receive nothing by his Petition concerning the Kingdom of Scotland; and the Sentence concerning John Baliol ſhould be ſuſpended, 'till the other Competitors were heard. Then the King commanded John Baliol, with the other Competitors, to proceed in their Petitions; among whom Robert Brus proteſted That he would proſecute his Claim to the Kingdom of Scotland, or a Third Part of it, after another Form and Manner than before. Upon this, John Haſtings, one of the Competitors, who was Son to the youngeſt of Earl David's three Daughters, Ibid.

Several Claims

Daughters, claim'd his Third Part of the Kingdom of Scotland as of a partible Inheritance, which ought to be divided between John Baliol, Robert Brus and John Haſtings, as Heirs to the three Daughters; alledging, That all the Lands, Tenements, Fees, Liberties, Demeaſns and Honours that were holden of the Crown of England in Capite were partible. The Arguments of Robert Brus were to the ſame effect; and he further claim'd To hold his Third Part in Capite, of his Lord the King of England by Homage, and requeſted of the King, That he might receive Judgment according to the Common Law of England. Upon this Plea, the King enquir'd of the Auditors and his Council, Whether the Kingdom of Scotland was partible or not; and they all anſwer'd in the Negative. Whereupon the King appointed the ſeventeenth of November as a peremptory Day, for all the Competitors to hear their Judgments, in his Parliament at Berwick; deſigning in the mean Space to deliberate and examine Things with the wiſeſt Men of both Kingdoms, the Auditors, and others of his Council, that he might be fully inform'd how to do Juſtice to all.

Ibid. On the appointed Day, there was a full Aſſembly of both Nations in the Hall of Berwick Caſtle, together with a great Multitude of the Populace; where nine of the twelve Competitors, for not proſecuting their Petitions, were diſmiſs'd without further Debate. The Petitions of Robert Brus and John Haſtings were next diſcuſs'd, who had claim'd the Third Part of the Kingdom for their Shares, as of a Partible Inheritance; but becauſe it had been agreed and adjudg'd by the Communities of both Nations, That the Kingdom ought to be poſſeſs'd by one ſingle Heir, by reaſon it was undividible in its nature like other Kingdoms, therefore it was judicially declar'd by the King, That they ſhould gain nothing by their ſaid Petition. As to the Petition of John Baliol, who claim'd the whole Kingdom, the King caus'd it to be re-examin'd by the Council of both Nations, and after a full Diſcuſſion, it was unanimouſly decreed, That the Kingdom of Scotland was impartible, and ought to remain in one Heir. And becauſe the King was Judge of the Rights of his Subjects, by the Laws of the Kingdoms approv'd by the Chief of both Nations; and by the ſame Laws, in the Caſe before them, it was judicially declar'd, That the more Remote by Deſcent in the firſt Line, was to be preferr'd to a Nearer in the ſecond, in the Succeſſion of an impartible Inheritance; and alſo, That none had deny'd him to be Heir of the firſt Line, and therefore to be preferr'd before all others as next Heir by Hereditary Succeſſion; Therefore the King of England, as Superior and Direct Lord of Scotland, adjudg'd, That the ſaid John Baliol ſhould have Seiſin and Poſſeſſion of that Kingdom, with all its Appurtenances, upon Condition, That he ſhould rightly and juſtly govern the People ſubject to him, that none might have Occaſion to complain of Injuſtice, nor the King, as Superior Lord of the Kingdom, to interpoſe his Authority; always reſerving the Right of the King of England and his Heirs in ſuch Caſes, when he would make uſe of it. Accordingly on the nineteenth Day of November, King Edward deliver'd him his Writ or Inſtrument of Poſſeſſion, reſerving the Right of him and his Heirs; and alſo iſſu'd out others directed to the ſeveral Caſtellans and Governors of Caſtles in Scotland, to give him full Poſſeſſion of them. The next Day at Norham he ſwore Fealty to King Edward, as his Liege and Superior Lord of the Kingdom of Scotland, and afterwards at Newcaſtle he did Homage to him in Form for the whole Kingdom of Scotland; in Teſtimony of both which he gave to King Edward his Letters Patents. About the ſame Time he was put into Corporal Poſſeſſion of the Kingdom at the Monaſtery of Scone near Perth, and plac'd in his Royal Throne, according to the ancient Cuſtom of Scotland.

plaint was, That King Edward having at Berwick reſtor'd to him certain Lands and Tenements in the County of Fife, King John had notwithſtanding diſſeis'd him of the ſame; and to hinder him from proſecuting his Right, had impriſon'd him, and caus'd an unjuſt Sentence to paſs againſt him, in Contempt of the King of England and Superior Lord of Scotland. Upon which Complaint, King Edward directed his Writ to the King of the Scots, ſummoning him to appear before Him and his Parliament in England, to anſwer to what Magdulph had to ſay againſt him. After Michaelmaſs he according to Summons appear'd, where he deny'd all Contempt of the Lord his King, but alledg'd, As he was King of Scotland, he durſt not anſwer to Magdulph's Complaint, or any Thing concerning his Kingdom, without the Advice of his own Subjects. Upon this Magdulph demanded Judgment againſt him as One who refus'd to anſwer; and the King expreſly told him, That he was his Liege-Man and Homager for the Kingdom of Scotland, therefore he had ſummon'd him to anſwer before him, or to ſhew Cauſe to the contrary. To which he reply'd as before, That he neither could nor durſt anſwer to any Thing concerning his Kingdom, without conſulting his People; and when he was told, That he might require another Day, he anſwer'd, He would require none. At this it was agreed, That King John had made no Defence againſt Magdulph; and becauſe he would not require a Day, nor ſhew Cauſe why he ought not to anſwer, in Eluſion of the King's Juriſdiction and Superiority, it was judg'd a Contempt and Diſobedience to him, and that three of his principal Caſtles of Scotland ſhould be ſeiz'd into his Hands, 'till he had given a full Satisfaction. But before the Sentence was pronounc'd, he in Parliament made Supplication to the King with his own Mouth, and alſo deliver'd a Petition in Writing, wherein he acknowledg'd the Superiority of the King of England, deſiring That he would firſt permit him to adviſe with his own Nation, and he would anſwer at his firſt Parliament after Eaſter next, and would behave himſelf towards him as he ought to do. King Edward adviſing upon this, at the Inſtance of his Nobility, and with the Conſent of Magdulph, granted his Petition, and gave him Time 'till the Parliament after Eaſter, in the following Year.

A. D. 1294. Reg. 22, 23. From this Time forwards, the King of the Scots, inſtead of complying, ſeem'd to have ſtudy'd nothing ſo much as ſhowing his Reſentments, and to take the firſt Opportunity to revenge himſelf of theſe ſuppos'd Indignities. In the mean Time there happen'd a violent Conteſt between the Engliſh and the Normans, occaſion'd firſt by a Norman being caſually ſlain by the Engliſh. Upon which Accident the Normans ſlew ſeveral of the Engliſh, and hung up one upon the Maſt of a Ship, whom they had taken at Sea; but not long after, ſixty ſtout Ships of the Engliſh, meeting with two hundred Sail of Normans, loaden with Wines, after a ſharp Encounter, in which great Numbers of the French were ſlain, they took their whole Fleet and brought them triumphantly into England. The King of France, who had privately promoted this Conteſt, in a great Anger now declar'd himſelf publickly, demanded Reſtitution, and cited King Edward judicially to appear and anſwer for ſome Injuries done in Gaſcony. Upon his Non-Appearance, and finding that he was buſily imploy'd in the Affairs of Scotland, the French King with his Forces gain'd Poſſeſſion of ſeveral Places in Gaſcony. To add to theſe Inconveniencies, the Scots, having by Time and ſeveral Steps ſtrengthen'd themſelves, reſolv'd at length to throw off the Engliſh Yoke: And firſt King John, with an Excuſe for his Non-Appearance before the Engliſh Parliament, according to his Promiſe, ſent over heavy Complaints of many and great Injuries, Oppreſſions and Grievances ſuſtain'd by his own Subjects from the Engliſh; for which he demanded Satisfaction of King Edward. After this, by the Conſent of his Nobility and others, he enter'd into a ſolemn League of Confederacy with the French King againſt the King of England, promiſing all mutual Aid and Aſſiſtance sistance to each other. This was seal'd with both the Kings Seals, and Counter-chang'd, consisting of seven main Articles; one of which was, That Edward, Son to John King of Scotland, should marry the Daughter of Charles of Valois Earl of Anjou, and Brother to the King of France. And to secure their Consciences, as well as their Cause, the Scots sent to Rome to have Absolution from their Oaths and Homage; and by means of false Suggestions made to Pope Celestin, they were all absolv'd by a particular Bull.

Walsing. Boetius. In the following Year, King John show'd himself more openly, return'd the Homage and Fealty for himself, and all others of his Kingdom to King Edward, and defy'd him by a particular Instrument or Writing; and the Scots declar'd themselves absolv'd from all former Obligations. Upon which Declarations, King Edward, rousing himself, advanc'd with a powerful Army to Newcastle. But the first Blood that was shed was on the English Side, of whom the Scotch slew almost a thousand in a private Village, and proceeded to ravage, burn and destroy the County of Cumberland, and other Parts: Which was not extreamly displeasing to the undaunted King of England, since the first Acts of Hostility proceeded from them whom he had a full Resolution to conquer, That at length he might be sole Monarch of Albion. Here began such a mortal Dissention between the two Nations, such Ravages and Bloodsheds, such Jealousies and Pretensions, as could not be intirely reconcil'd in less than three hundred Years. The valiant Edward, to chastise the Scots for their Breach of Oaths, enter'd their Kingdom with a brave Army, and besieg'd and took the strong Castle of Berwick with a great and terrible Slaughter. From thence he sent Part of his Army to reduce the Castle of Dunbar lately revolted, which was effected by the Death of great Numbers of the Scots, and by the Captivity of ten thousand Men, of whom were seven Barons, a hundred Knights, and thirty one Esquires. The Scots with all their Forces coming to relieve this Castle, King Edward by his mighty Valour defeated them, and kill'd no less than twenty two thousand upon the Spot. King Edward knowing as well how to use, as to gain a Victory, proceeded and took the Castle of Rocksborough; and to put an End to the War, he march'd to Edinburgh it self, and in eight Days took that strong Castle. From thence he march'd to Sterlin, Perth and other Places, reaping fresh Laurels where-ever he pass'd; 'till at length King John and his Nobility submitted and su'd for Mercy; which was granted, upon Condition, That they all should surrender themselves to him as his Subjects. Shortly after, the King of Scotland with a white Rod in his Hand, according to the Custom of Surrenders, presented himself before King Edward at Brechin, and resign'd to him and his Heirs the whole Kingdom of Scotland, without any Condition; and confirm'd this Resignation by a Charter under his Hand and Seal, dated the tenth Day of July, and the fourth of his Reign.

Walsing. Bostius. &c. This being done, King Edward immediately held a Parliament for Scotland, at Berwick, where the Nobility of that Kingdom, and great Numbers of others, did Homage to him as their Soveraign Lord and their Supream Governor, and confirm'd the same under their Hands and Seals; the Names of whom are still upon Record: And for the greater Security, they surrender'd into his Hands all the Castles and Forts of that Kingdom; except those of William Douglas, who chose any Punishment rather than yield to the Subjection of England. Notwithstanding this Agreement John the late King was sent to the Tower of London, where he was decently attended, and allow'd the Liberty of ten Miles Riding; and the Noblemen of Scotland, which he brought into England, were forbidden to pass the River Trent, under Forfeiture of their Heads. The Government of Scotland was committed to John Warren Earl of Surrey and Sussex; Hugh de Cressingham was made Treasurer, and William Ormesby chief Justiciary. And the more to show his Resolution of dissolving the distinct Soveraignty of Scotland, and like Wales to unite it to the English Monarchy, he took from Edinburgh the Crown and Scepter with all the Regalia, and brought them them to London; and alſo remov'd the famous Marble Chair out of the Monaſtery of Scone, which in Coronations ſerv'd for a Throne to the Kings of Scotland, and which was believ'd in an extraordinary Manner to be conſtantly attended with the Power and Fate of that Kingdom. Then to manifeſt the moſt compleat Marks of a Conqueſt, he proceeded, according to Boetius, to the Burning of the Scotch Records, the Abrogation of the Laws, altering the Forms of Divine Service, and tranſporting the moſt learned Men to his Univerſity of Oxford.

IV. King Edward in a great Meaſure had now been a Conqueror both of Wales and Scotland; but while he was imploy'd about the latter, he met with great Diſadvantages from the King of France, who had fraudulently got Poſſeſſion of all or the greateſt Part of Gaſcony. To obviate theſe Miſchiefs, the King enter'd into a Confederacy with Guy Earl of Flanders, whoſe Dominions the French King had unjuſtly invaded; and for a Supply for this and all other Occaſions, he call'd a Parliament at St. Edmund's Bury; in which the Citizens and Burgeſſes gave an eighth Part of all their Goods, the reſt of the Laity a twelfth, but the Clergy refus'd to give any Thing, by reaſon of a Conſtitution made and publiſh'd this Year by Pope Boniface, which prohibited all Eccleſiaſticks to pay any Secular Taxes without the Conſent of the Roman See, and that upon the ſevereſt Penalties. The Clergy refuſing in two ſeveral Meetings, the King proceeded to a higher Strain than any of his Predeceſſors, ſeiz'd upon all their Lay Fees, and put the whole Body of them out of his Protection, ſo that they could receive no Benefit from his Laws, nor Juſtice from his Courts. This venturous Proceeding ſo terrify'd the Clergy, that finding themſelves expos'd to all Injuries without Means of Redreſs, the Arch-Biſhop of York, with the Biſhops of Durham, Ely, Salisbury and Lincoln ſoon yielded to lay down in their Churches the fifth Part of all their Goods, towards the Maintenance of the King's Wars; by which they appeas'd his Diſpleaſure, and were receiv'd into Favour. But the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, by whoſe Incitement the reſt ſtood out, had all his Goods ſeiz'd, and the Monaſteries within his Dioceſe and Part of Lincoln were poſſeſs'd by publick Officers, who were appointed to adminiſter bare Neceſſaries to the Monks, converting the reſt to the King's Uſe. At length by much Suit, and by giving a fourth Part of their Goods, they redeem'd themſelves, and purchas'd the King's Favour. Thus will valiant and martial Princes have their Ends ſerv'd in Times of Neceſſity, notwithſtanding the greateſt Oppoſition.

Yet ſtill he met with ſome Checks from the Laity, upon ſummoning his Nobility at Salisbury, where he requir'd ſeveral of them to go into the Wars of Gaſcony. But they all making Excuſes, every Man for himſelf, the King in a great Paſſion threaten'd, That they ſhould go, or elſe he would give their Lands to others that would. Upon which Humfrey Bohun, High-Conſtable and Earl of Hereford, and Hugh Bigot, Earl of Norfolk and Marſhal of England, boldly declar'd, That if the King went in Perſon, they would attend him, or otherwiſe not; and further the Earl-Marſhal ſaid, That he was deſirous to go with his Majeſty, and march before him in the Vanguard, as by Right of Inheritance he ought. But the King told him expreſly, That he ſhould go with any other, tho' he himſelf went not in Perſon. The other anſwer'd, He was not oblig'd to go, therefore he would not without him. Upon which the King ſwore by the Eternal God, That he ſhould either go or hang; the other ſwore the ſame Oath, That he would neither go, nor hang, and ſo departed without leave, and afterwards, with the other Earl, ſtood upon his own Guard. Inſulting of Kings had been too faſhionable in his Father's Reign, therefore this Prince wiſely conceal'd and ſtifled his Reſentments, and prepar'd for his Voyage into Flanders, there to relieve the Earl of that Country, now diſtreſs'd by the French. Being ready to take ſhipping, the Arch-Biſhops, Biſhops, Earls, Barons and the Commons, ſent him a Roll of Grievances, alledging ſeveral unwarrantable Impoſitions upon Wool, and other Commodities, and ſeveral unjuſtifiable Practices, and complaining of the negligent Obſervance of the Great Charters. To all which the King return'd a civil and ſeaſonable Anſwer, promiſing to redreſs all Things at his Return, and requeſting the Nobility to raiſe no Diſturbance in his Abſence. And ſhortly after a Parliament was call'd by the Prince, where a new Tax being granted, the great Charters were again confirm'd, and afterwards ſeal'd in Flanders with the King's great Seal. Before the Finiſhing of theſe Tranſactions, the reſtleſs Scots, by the Inſtigation of William Waleys, whom they choſe for their Commander, arm'd themſelves and killed all the Engliſh they could find, and practis'd ſtrange Cruelties beſides. Upon Notice of which King Edward directed the Earl of Surrey with the Militia beyond Trent, to march into Scotland, and ſuppreſs this Inſurrection. The Earl raiſing an Army in the North, ſent his Nephew Henry de Percy with it into Scotland, who upon marching towards the Scots, found the Heads of them, William Waleys, and others, inclinable to a Peace, upon Condition of the Safety of their Lives and Limbs, Lands and Goods, and a general Pardon of all that was paſt. Henry de Percy admitted of the Peace, upon Promiſe of Hoſtages, and Articles in Writing, if it ſatisfy'd the King, who in a ſhort Time conſented to it, that his Voyage to Flanders might not be retarded. But ſoon after, the Scots taking Advantage from ſome Diſcontents in England, upon ſeveral Pretences delay'd to give Hoſtages for the Peace; and towards the latter End of Auguſt took Arms again under the Conduct of Waleys, and in a ſhort Time drove almoſt all the Engliſh out of Scotland. William Warren, the Governor of Scotland, fled from Berwick into England, with many Engliſh that quitted the Town to the Scots; yet ſtill the Caſtle was kept, and well defended by thoſe that were lodg'd in it.

Inſurrections in Scotland.

Ibid. King Edward in Flanders hearing of theſe Troubles and Diſturbances, by the Mediation of Pope Boniface, made a two Years Truce with the King of France, and came over into England; and having redreſs'd ſeveral Things according to Promiſe, he ſummon'd the Militia of the whole Nation to meet him at Carliſle on Whitſun-Eve, to march againſt the Scots, whoſe Power was now formidable, and their Forces numerous. But before that Time, on the tenth Day of April, he held a full Parliament at York, to treat with him about certain Affairs that concern'd him and the whole Kingdom. Here the Lord High-Conſtable and Earl-Marſhal demanded That, becauſe the great Charters had been confirm'd beyond Sea, for the greater Security they might be confirm'd again; which the Biſhop of Durham, the Earls of Surrey, Warwick and Gloceſter, promis'd that the King ſhould perform, upon his Return with Victory. After which the King commanded his Army to be ready at Roxburg upon Tweed, on the twenty fourth Day of June; and going aſide to viſit the Tomb of St. John of Beverly in Yorkſhire, he found his Army at the Time and Place appointed. With this he march'd like a Conqueror into the Bowels of Scotland, and upon the twenty firſt Day of July came within Sight of the Enemy, in a large Field near Falkirk, where both Armies encamp'd. In the Morning a terrible Shout being heard from the Scotch Army, the Engliſh ran to Arms; but the King's Horſe, affrighted at the tumultuous Noiſe, as he was putting his Foot into the Stirrup, threw him to the Ground, and by his Legs broke two of his Ribs; who notwithſtanding proceeded couragiouſly to the Battel. William Waleys, who by his bold Enterpriſes had gain'd a ſingular Opinion from his Country-and gains a mighty Victory over the Scots.

Countrymen, having drawn up his numerous Army, inſtead of a formal Oration, in all Parts us'd this ſhort Speech, I have brought you to the King, fly if you can. But notwithſtanding the Numbers of the Scots, the Engliſh being led on by a mighty Warrior, attack'd them with ſo much Conduct and Bravery, that they ſoon broke their Troops, and defeated them, with a dreadful Slaughter of no leſs than ſixty thouſand Men, according to ſome Authors, tho' others ſay fewer. Waleys and the great Men of Scotland fled into the Woods; and the King, after he had taken in ſeveral Places, and us'd ſome Severities, return'd triumphantly into England, in the latter End of this Year; after he had in ſome Meaſure made a ſecond Conqueſt of the Kingdom of Scotland.

A. D. 1299. Reg. 27 28.

The two Years Truce made between the Engliſh and French, was now by the Means of Pope Boniface, turn'd to a ſetled Peace; in which Articles, beſides the Reſtoration of Gaſcony, it was agreed, That King Edward ſhould marry the French King's Siſter Margaret, and Prince Edward his Son the ſame King's Daughter Iſabel; Tho', ſays Walſingham, he by this Alliance promoted not the Good of the Realm in any Point. To this Affinity were added the greater Fences of a Domeſtick Quiet; for the King, whom Wars and Years had made renown'd and experienc'd, graciouſly and wiſely yielded to grant all that had been promis'd before his laſt Expedition into Scotland. And at a Parliament held at London, fifteen Days after Eaſter, he confirm'd the Charters, and for the fuller Satisfaction of the Nobility, he left out that Clauſe Salvo Jure Coronæ noſtræ; and what was wanting at this Time, he afterwards compleated at a Parliament held at Stamford. But that he might ſeem willing to deny the Pope no reaſonable Requeſt, he deliver'd into the Hands of his Nuntio John Baliol late King of Scotland, who was convey'd to his Inheritance in France, where he remain'd with the Brand of a falſe Seducer, and of a perjur'd Perſon to King Edward's Judgment, without any Part of his Regal Power over the Scottiſh Nation.

Walſing.

Magna Charta again confirm'd

The Peace which King Edward made in other Places, prov'd a greater Affliction to the Scots; for tho' they had recover'd Sterlin by Surrender of the Engliſh, and began with a noble Aſſertion of their ancient Liberty to aſſemble again under Waleys, yet the Time was not come for their Deliverance. For King Edward, according to Articles, having accompliſh'd his Nuptials with the French King's Siſter at Canterbury, and again confirm'd the great Charters, now made it his whole Buſineſs to finiſh his Deſign of annexing Scotland to the Crown of England. Accordingly, being accompany'd with his Son, and a formidable Army, he purſu'd the Affair ſo vigorouſly, that the Scots, tho' very numerous, fled before him, whoſe Valour had juſtly render'd him terrible; and that Day, in Walſingham's Opinion, had been irrecoverably fatal to the Scottiſh Name and Nation, if the Engliſh had been able to have follow'd them in their Armor, over their Bogs, Moraſſes and Mountains; or if the Welſh by their own Skill had ſupply'd the Defect. However King Edward held ſo cloſe a Poſſeſſion, that he would neither grant the Scotch Nobility their Baliol to reign over them, according to their Petition, not permit them to redeem ſuch Lands as he had given to his Engliſh Adventurers. The Scots being driven to Extremities, had recourſe to the Court of Rome, and procur'd inhibitory Letters from the Pope to King Edward; who upon Sight of them ſwore a terrible Oath, That he would not deſiſt. Nevertheleſs the Scots after a few Days requeſted the King to ſuffer them to live in Peace, 'till they had taken Council of the Peers and the King of France, threatning him alſo with the utmoſt Power of Rome. Upon which the King with a diſdainful Smile anſwer'd, Have you done Homage to me as the Direct Lord of your Kingdom, and believe that I can be terrify'd with Pretences? as if I, like one who has no Power to compel, would tamely give up my undoubted Right? Let me hear no more of this; for if I do, I ſwear by all that's Sacred, I will deſtroy all Scotland from one Sea to the other. On the other Side the Scots bravely reply'd, That they would ſpend the the laſt Drop of their Blood for the Defence of Juſtice, and the Liberty of their Country. But becauſe the Scots had put themſelves under the immediate Protection of the Pope, who now began to claim the Right of that Kingdom, as before he had done of England, the King order'd the moſt learned Men of his Nation to ſearch the Archives of the Univerſities and Monaſteries, and order'd them to make an Hiſtorical Deduction of his Right and Title to Scotland; which was almoſt the ſame, but more full and particular than what he deliver'd to the Scots, when in the nineteenth Year of his Reign he claim'd the Superiority and Direct Dominion over their Kingdom. This was ſent in a Letter from the King to the Pope, with a Narrative concerning the whole Nation of Scotland, 'As their having done Homage and ſworn Fealty to him, and acknow-'ledg'd him to be their King and ſupreme Lord ſeveral Times; and notwith-'ſtanding they had againſt their Oaths, invaded, ravag'd and waſted England 'as they thought fit; therefore he caution'd his Holineſs againſt the falſe 'Inſinuations and Suggeſtions of that perfidious People; concluding with a Pe-'tition, That he would have a Paternal Care and Affection to his Royal 'Rights.

Walſing. Rectius. Yet by the Interceſſion of the King of France, King Edward granted the Scots a Truce 'till Whit-Sunday following: About which Time he made his Son Edward Prince of Wales and Earl of Cheſter, being then about ſeventeen Years of Age; with which the Welſh were highly pleas'd, as being born at Caernarvon in their own Country. The Truce being ended, the King not long after went into Scotland, where he continu'd all Winter, but loſt many of his military Horſes for want of Forage. After Chriſtmaſs, at the Inſtance of the French King, he again granted a Truce to the Scots 'till the firſt Day of November enſuing; and towards the Spring, having ſetled all Things in Scotland, he return'd into England. Here to prevent Inconveniencies and Tumults, the King by his Proclamations prohibited thoſe Tournaments, Juſts, and other Warlike Exerciſes, which had been very frequently in uſe among the young Nobility and Gentry. The Truce with the Scots being expir'd, the King ſent John de Seagrave with an Army into Scotland, making him Governor of Berwick, and Guardian of the whole Kingdom. This Perſon marching with a Party of Men towards Edinburgh, the Scotch Army, which lay in Ambuſcade, ſurpriz'd him, and took him Priſoner with many others: But a freſh Party fortunately arriving, reſcu'd him out of their Hands. The Scotch Writers ſay that the Engliſh loſt great Numbers in this Action, and magnifie it as very noble and honourable to their Nation.

Walſing. Weſtminſ. Rectius. &c. The King hearing of this Succeſs, and that the Scots began to encreaſe in Power, enter'd into their Country with a formidable Army, and by deliberate Marches paſs'd near three hundred Miles, as far as Cathneſs the utmoſt Limits of the Kingdom; while the Scots unable to withſtand his Arms, for the moſt part betook themſelves to the inacceſſible Woods and Mountains. But finding the King vigorous in his Purſuit, and reſolute in his Deſigns, they at length ſent Mediators, and humbly begg'd Peace of him, and that they might be permitted to compound for their Eſtates with thoſe Engliſh to whom they had been given; to both which the King readily condeſcended. In his Return from the North, he beſieg'd Sterlin Caſtle, which had been ſtrongly fortify'd againſt him, and ſtay'd all the Winter at Dumferling not far from that Place. *M. surrender'd upon Diſcretion, on the twentieth Day of July; the Governor of which, William Olifard, who had before ſurpriz'd it, was ſent to the Tower of London, and others to divers Caſtles. This put an End to the whole Expedition; and the King having ſetled all Things according to his Deſire, appointed John de Seagrave Governor of the Kingdom, and return'd into England in great Triumph: And coming to York, he remov'd the Courts of the King's Bench and the Exchequer, which had been there ſeven Years, to their ancient Place at London. Thus was Scotland in a manner conquer'd a third Time by the valiant King Edward; and had not Providence in Favour of that Kingdom, ordain'd ſome inacceſſible Places, and natural Strengths where no Armies could march or be maintain'd, the Scots from this Time would have probably loſt all their ancient Liberties.

His great Succeſs.

A. D. 1305. Reg. 33/34.

V. And now King Edward being poſſeſs'd of all his Aims, an univerſal Lord at home, mighty in Alliance and Power abroad, began to look more ſeverely to the publick Adminiſtration: And for a Terror to all Oppoſers, he caus'd William Waleys, who had been betray'd into his Hands by his Companion, to be try'd by the Laws of England; and notwithſtanding he had never acknowledg'd or ſubmitted to thoſe Laws, he was condemn'd to be hang'd, drawn and quarter'd, and his Limbs to be ſet up at ſeveral diſtant Towns: A hard Fate for one who had ſo bravely defended his own Country, and whom the Scotch have plac'd among the beſt Examples of Fortitude and Piety; tho' the Engliſh have accus'd him of the greateſt Cruelty and Barbarity. About the ſame Time the King began to exerciſe his Power and Authority upon Sir Nicolas Seagrave, one of the greateſt Knights of the Kingdom, who being formerly reproach'd with treaſonable Practices by Sir John Cromwell, offer'd to juſtifie himſelf by a Duel; which the King refus'd to grant, in regard of the War then depending. Upon which Seagrave, contrary to the King's Prohibition, left the Camp, and went over Sea to fight with his Adverſary; for which the King requir'd that Juſtice ſhould proceed againſt him, as a Contemner of his Royal Authority. The Judges conſulted three Days upon this Affair, and at length adjudg'd Seagrave guilty of Death, and all his Goods to be forfeited to the King; but in regard of his Blood they added, That he went not out of England in Contempt of the King, but to be reveng'd of his Accuſer, therefore it was in the King's Power to ſhew Mercy. Upon which the King in a great Paſſion reply'd, Have you been all this while conſulting for this? I know it is in my Power to ſhew Mercy to whom I pleaſe, but not for your Sakes: Who ever ſubmitted himſelf to my Favour, and met with a Repulſe? However, let this your Judgment be recorded, and for ever held as a Law. And ſo this Knight, for an Example to others, was committed to Priſon; tho' ſhortly after by the Labour of many Noblemen, and thirty Peers being bound for his Behaviour, the King reſtor'd him to his Eſtate.

The Puniſhment of Waleys.

The King's Regulations.

In the ſame Year, the King to eſtabliſh the Peace of the Nation, ſent out a new Writ of Inquiſition call'd Trailbaſton; for Intruders on other Mens Lands, who to oppreſs the right Owner, would make over their Land to great Men; for Batterers hired to beat and hurt others; for Breakers of the Peace; for Raviſhers, Incendiaries, Murderers, Fighters, Falſe Aſſizors, and other ſuch Criminals: Which Inquiſition was ſo ſeverely executed, and ſuch Fines rais'd, as brought in great Treaſure to the King. So did likewiſe another Commiſſion at the ſame Time ſent forth to examine the Behaviour of Officers and Miniſters of Juſtice, wherein many were found Delinquents, and paid dearly in their Purſes. As the King was ſtrict and ſevere upon all Criminals in general, ſo he would not ſpare his own Son, Prince Edward, who having been corrupted by a vicious inſinuating Companion call'd Piers Gaveſton, riotouſly broke the Park of Walter Langton Biſhop of Cheſter; for which the King diſgrac'd him ſo far, as to put him into a publick Priſon. The Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury at the ſame Time

Time being accus'd of diſturbing the Peace in the King's Abſence, he ſent him over to Pope Clement the Fifth, there to be cruſh'd by a double Power. This Pope was a Native of Bourdeaux, and ſo the more mindful of the King's Deſire, and the King more confident of his Favour, ſent him a noble Preſent of ſeveral Golden Veſſels: Which ſo affected the Mind of the Pope, that he let looſe this Lion, and unty'd the King from the Covenants made with his Subjects, concerning their Charters and Privileges, wholly abſolving him from his Oath: An Act of ſmall Piety in the Pope, and of as little Conſcience in the King; who, as if he had no further Occaſion for his People, began to aſſume too much Power, and to take too much Liberty from theſe unjuſtifiable Grants. A. D. 1306. Reg. 34/35. The Pope abſolves the King from his Oaths.

Walſing. Weſtmonaſt. Bertin. But on a ſudden there happen'd an Occaſion which brought him back to his right Orb again, cauſing him both to ſee his Error and to reform it; and this was a new Storm from Scotland, from whence he expected nothing but Peace and Compliance. For the Scots, who had twice or thrice done Homage and ſworn Fealty to King Edward, and the Biſhops alſo who had done the ſame, join'd with Robert Brus, Son to the former great Competitor, lately eſcap'd out of England, in ſetting up his Title to the Crown of Scotland, and ſo began a War more miſchievous and laſting than any before: And becauſe John Comyn, who was of great Power and Intereſt in the Kingdom, was reſolute in keeping his Oath to King Edward, Robert Brus and his Followers treacherouſly murder'd him in the very Church of Dumfres, on the twenty ninth Day of January; and on Lady-Day following, Robert was ſolemnly crown'd King at Scone, in the Preſence of two Biſhops, many Earls, Barons and Knights. King Edward being inform'd of the Proceedings of this new King and his Confederates, ſent Aymer de Valence Earl of Pembroke, with Robert Clifford and Henry Percy into Scotland, to ſuppreſs this threatning Inſurrection. The King likewiſe deſigning to follow them, ſummon'd his Army to rendezvous at Carliſle, fifteen Days after Midſummer; and to make the Expedition more great and glorious, he knighted his Son at Weſtminſter, and with him three hundred young Gentlemen, the Sons of Earls, Barons and great Men, who had ſufficient to maintain their Honour, and gave them their military Garments out of his own Wardrobe. Theſe with the Prince were to march into Scotland againſt thoſe of that Nation; but before they could arrive there, the Earl of Pembroke had attack'd and routed the Scots, and put their King to Flight at Metſen near St. John's Town or Perth; in which Battel great Numbers were kill'd, and many Perſons of Note taken Priſoners, moſt of whom were try'd and hang'd for Perjury and Rebellion. Afterwards King Edward, the Prince, and many great Men went into Scotland, where ſome receiv'd them very honourably, and others left their Habitations and fled. The Army ranging from Place to Place after the Fight, purſu'd the Fugitives, kill'd ſome and took others alive, among whom were the two Biſhops of St. Andrew's and Glaſco, with the Abbot of Scone, arm'd with their Surcoats; who were ſent into ſeveral Priſons in England. The Age of King Edward, his Rage, and Deſire of Revenge made him almoſt inexorable, and to ſpare ſcarce any of what Degree ſoever: The Earl of Athol, tho' of the Royal Blood and ally'd to him, was ſent to London, and diſhonourably preferr'd to a higher Gallows than any of the reſt: The Wife of King Robert, taken by the Lord Roſs, was ſent Priſoner to London, and his Daughter to a Monaſtery in Lindſey; and the Counteſs of Boughan, who aſſiſted in the Coronation of Robert, was put into a wooden Cage, made in the Shape of a Crown, and hung out upon the Walls of Berwick, for a diſmal Spectacle to be gaz'd on by the People.

King Edward's laſt Expedition into Scotland.

Weſtminſ. Walſing. &c. After this Summer's Expedition, the King paſs'd the Winter at Carliſle, reſolving old as he was never to deſiſt 'till he had finiſh'd his Work. Here on the twentieth Day of January, he held his laſt Parliament, in which, beſides the Proviſions for the Scotch Eſtabliſhment, ſeveral Conſultations and Methods were proſecuted for repelling another Kind of Enemy no leſs troubleſome to the State; namely A. D. 1307. Reg. 35. The laſt Parliament.

namely the Pope, and his ſtill continu'd Extortions in this Kingdom, of which great Complaints were made in this Aſſembly: Inſomuch that the Clergy were forc'd to appeal from the Pope's Bulls, and his Cardinal Legate's Exactions; and alſo the King's Council was oblig'd to enact ſeveral Orders and Conſtitutions for the reſtraining of their exceſſive Oppreſſions. In the Time of this Parliament, Obſervations being made of the extraordinary Familiarity between Prince Edward and Piers Gaveſton, and what mighty Influence that vicious Perſon had over him, the King wiſely commanded him to depart the Land, and oblig'd him by a ſolemn Oath not to return without his Licence. At the ſame Time he oblig'd the Prince to ſwear That he would not receive, retain or permit the ſaid Gaveſton to be with him, contrary to his Pleaſure; and for his Subſiſtance beyond Sea, he was allow'd a hundred Marks per Annum.

Gaveſton baniſh'd.

During theſe Tranſactions, the great Deliverance of Scotland drew near; for the noble King Robert, who for a while had liv'd in the moſt deſolate and abandon'd Condition, having gather'd together the ſcatter'd Remains of his Army, ſuddenly attack'd the Earl of Pembroke, and gave him a great Defeat, and immediately after chas'd the Earl of Gloceſter into the Caſtle of Ayr, which he beſieg'd, tho' without Succeſs. Upon which King Edward ſent into England, and under great Penalties commanded all that ought him Service to be ready at Carliſle, three Weeks after Midſummer; reſolving with this Force to march into the Bowels of Scotland. But before he could effect this Deſign, God was pleas'd to viſit him with his laſt Sickneſs; upon which he ſent for the Prince his Son to come before him, to whom, beſides many Admonitions to Piety, and the good Government of a Kingdom, he ſolemnly and upon his Bleſſing commanded three Things in a more eſpecial Manner; 'That he would carry his 'Bones about with him through Scotland, 'till he had ſubdu'd that Nation, not 'doubting but his Skeleton alone would produce Victory: That he would ſend 'his Heart to the Holy-Land, with a hundred and forty Knights to that War, 'and the thirty two thouſand Pounds he had provided for that Purpoſe: Laſt-'ly, That he would never recall Piers Gaveſton from the Baniſhment he ſo 'juſtly merited. After this he ſent him to London to conſummate the Match with the French King's Daughter; and ſhortly after, moving by ſmall Journies towards Scotland from Carliſle, he arriv'd at a ſmall Town call'd Burgh upon the Sands, where by his Diſtemper being put in Mind of his latter End, he piouſly broke forth into this memorable Ejaculation; O Lord! if thou thinkſt it good for theſe my People to have me continue longer with them, I am ready to venture my Life for them; but if otherwiſe, thy Will be done. Then in a ſhort Time after, being ſeiz'd with a Dyſentery or Bloody-Flux, while his Servants were going to lift him up in his Bed, to give him ſome Nouriſhment, he expired in their Arms, upon Friday the ſeventh of July, in the ſixty eighth Year of his Age, after a moſt vigorous and triumphant Reign of thirty four Years, ſeven Months, and twenty one Days. He was infinitely lamented by his Subjects, and his Corps was brought to Waltham, where it remain'd ſixteen Weeks, and on the twenty eighth Day of October it was bury'd in the Abby Church at Weſtminſter, at the Head of King Henry his Father, on the North Side of St. Edward's Shrine.

A great Change in Scotland.

This was the End of the mighty King Edward, the Firſt of that Name of the Norman Line, and the Fourth from King Egbert: A Prince of great Renown, in whoſe valiant Breaſt, as Mr. Camden expreſſes it, God ſeem'd to have pitch'd his Tent; and as well by his Courage and Wiſdom, as by Gracefulneſs and Strength of Body, to have rais'd him to the higheſt Pitch of Majeſty; ſo that he is deſervedly rank'd among the greateſt Ornaments of Britain. He was taller than ordinary Perſons by the Head and Shoulders, of a comely Aſpect, having black and curl'd Hair, and Eyes often ſparkling like Fire; being born and bred up to great and military Actions. Yet his Wit and Underſtanding was no leſs than his Valour and Bravery; and he had both an Ability of Judgment within within himſelf, and alſo a Readineſs to hear the Judgment of others. He was a wiſe Obſerver of Opportunity, wary and provident of his own Buſineſs, vigilant and vigorous in all publick Affairs, ſevere in Points of Juſtice, and not eaſily appeas'd when throughly provok'd, and in Continency equal to his Father, whom he far exceeded in all other Reſpects. He was alſo an excellent Governor, yet his Vigour and Ambition did ſometimes overflow and bear hard upon his Subjects; ſo that his Valour and Power was more for the Grandeur than for the Quiet of England; and never any King before or ſince him ſhed ſo much Chriſtian Blood within the Iſle of Britain as this Chriſtian Warrior did in his Time, with what he occaſion'd afterwards. He advanc'd the Soveraignty of the Crown of England, over the Kingdom of Scotland, more than any of his Predeceſſors; but leaving the Work not fully finiſh'd, from henceforth the Dominion of the Kings of England over that Realm, became leſs and leſs, 'till at length it diminiſh'd to nothing. He had by his firſt Queen Eleanor a numerous Iſſue of four Sons and nine Daughters; of theſe Sons only Edward ſurviv'd him; and by his ſecond Queen he had two Sons, Thomas made Earl of Norfolk, and Edmund Earl of Kent. As this Edward was the firſt Son of a King of England that differenc'd his Arms with a File, ſo he was the firſt King of England, that bore his Arms upon the Capariſons of his Horſe, as may be ſeen by his Royal Seal.

From the twenty ſecond Year of this Reign we have an uninterrupted Series of Parliaments down to our own Times, in Sumonitiones ad Parl. by Sir William Dugdale; and in his Time the preſent Conſtitution of our Parliaments was ſo far eſtabliſh'd, that by a Law ſolemnly publiſh'd as an Addition to Magna Charta, with Excommunications, it was enacted, That no Tax ſhould be levy'd without the Conſent of the Knights and Burgeſſes in Parliament. In the twenty ſeventh Year of this Reign an Order was made concerning the Price of Victuals; a fat Cock to be ſold at three-half-Pence, a fat Capon for two Pence half-Penny, two Pullets for three-half-Pence, a Gooſe for four Pence, a Mallard for three-half-Pence, a Patridge for three-half-Pence, a Pheaſant for four Pence, a Heron for ſix Pence, a Plover for a Penny, a Swan for three Shillings, a Crane for twelve Pence, two Wood-Cocks for three-half-Pence, a fat Lamb from Chriſtmaſs to Shrove-Tide for ſixteen Pence, and all the Year after for four Pence. Wheat was once ſold for twenty Pence a Quarter, and in ſome Places for ſixteen Pence.

SECT. II.

The Reign of King EDWARD the Second.

Containing 19 Years, 6 Months, and 15 Days.

La Mort. Walſing. I. UPON the Death of the great King Edward the Firſt, his Eldeſt Son, Edward of Caernarvon, now twenty three Years of Age, ſucceeded him with a general Applauſe, tho' he was far his Inferior in all Reſpects. Never any Prince came to the Crown with greater Love of the Nation, or loſt it in ſo ſhort a Time. For before his Father's Funeral Solemnities were finiſh'd, he contrary to all Advice ſhew'd a fatal Diſregard to all his dying Precepts; and the firſt publick Act he did was the recalling his looſe and beloved Aſſociate Piers Gaveſton from Exile, whom he immediately rais'd from the Son of an ordinary Gaſconian Knight to be Earl of Cornwall, Lord of Man, Guardian and Lieutenant of England, and Diſpoſer of innumerable Preferments. And becauſe Walter Langton, Biſhop of Cheſter, and Treaſurer of England, had like a juſt Servant in his Father's Reign reprov'd him for ſome lewd Extravagancies, and complain'd of Gaveſton, as the Promoter of Vices ſo unbecoming a Prince; he remember'd to puniſh a Man ſo full of troubleſom Virtues, and arreſted him by Sir John Felton, Conſtable of the Tower of London, impriſon'd him in Wallingford Caſtle, and ſeiz'd upon all his Goods and Temporalties: And his Prejudice was ſo great againſt him, that no Man durſt ſpeak in his Favour; 'till afterwards, by means of the Papal Authority, he was reſtor'd, and in ſome ſort reconcil'd.

A. D. 1308. Reg. 1/2.

That which beſt ſuited with this King's youthful Affections, the Marriage with the Princeſs Iſabel, Daughter to Philip King of France, he perform'd with extraordinary Magnificence at Boloign; at which Solemnity were preſent the King of France, the King of Navarre, the King of Almain, and the King of Sicily, with three Queens beſides the Bride, and a glorious Concourſe of other Princes, Noblemen and Ladies: Among whom Earl Gaveſton by his graceful Mien and rich Attire, ſo far exceeded the reſt in Splendor and Magnificence, that it rais'd the Envy and Indignation of the whole Aſſembly. This foreign Favourite, who had a beautiful Body, a quick Wit, and a daring Courage, had ſo far exaſperated the Engliſh Nobility, that they threaten'd to hinder the King's Coronation, which had been appointed ſhortly after, if he was not remov'd from the Court and Kingdom. Upon which the King, to avoid ſo great a Diſhonour, promis'd upon his Faith to yield to what they deſir'd in the next Parliament. But upon the Solemnity, Gaveſton with the utmoſt Pomp was appointed to carry St. Edward's Crown before the King, which belong'd only to thoſe of the Royal Blood, which more encreas'd the Hatred of the Prelates and Nobility againſt him. And now having got Poſſeſſion of the Heart of this weak Prince, he by his riotous Practices ſoon fill'd his Court with Buffoons, Paraſites, and the like pernicious Inſtruments, drawing Edward from the Thoughts of all noble Enterprizes, in Accompliſhment of his Father's Will, or Diſcharge of his particular Duty, inclining him to all Sorts of diſhonourable Vanities and ſoft criminal Pleaſures: While he himſelf revell'd in outward Felicity, waſting the Riches of the Nation, or converting them to his private Uſes. He had ſo great an Aſcendent, that the King's Favours were his continual Advantages; and he wore the very Jewels of the Crown, which the King imprudently declar'd, ſhould have deſcended to him, were his Power equal to his Affection.

He marries the King of France's Daughter.

His Coronation.

By reaſon of the King's extravagant Favours, and eſpecially for his marrying him to his Niece Margaret, Siſter to the Earl of Gloceſter, the Nobility were much exaſperated, who vehemently preſs'd the King, That he would oblige him to avoid the Realm. Upon which Importunities, the King with great Reluctancy ſent him into Ireland; not as an Exile, but as his Lieutenant there, to direct and act all Things in his Name, as if he had been preſent himſelf. But he continu'd not long in that Country; for in the ſecond Year of this Reign, to the King's great Satisfaction, he procur'd a Tournament to be proclaim'd at Wallingford, where he appear'd with ſo many Military Men out of Foreign Parts, that he inſulted over the Engliſh Nobility that came to meet him; among whom the chief were the Earls of Lancaſter, Hereford, Warwick, Pembroke and Warren, to whom this Favourite gave ridiculous and opprobrious Names. The Prelates, Earls and Barons, taking advantage of the King's exorbitant Kindneſs to him, and his heaping ſuch vaſt Riches upon him, to the great Diminution of the Crown Revenues, by their daily Care at length obtain'd of the King to make a formal Grant or Commiſſion to them, enabling them to appoint a ſelect Number amongſt them, that ſhould have Power to make Ordinances for the Government of the King's Houſhould and his Kingdom. Accordingly ſeven Prelates, eight Earls, and ſix Barons were nominated and ſolemnly ſworn; who after that drew up forty one Articles, Ordinances or Conſtitutions, which were all all confirm'd by a particular Inſtrument from the King. Thus he who before ſeem'd jealous of truſting his Subjects, now gave them an Opportunity of puniſhing that Miſtruſt; and to add to the King's Troubles, he now receiv'd many Complaints from the Pope, with a particular Demand of the Rent of a thouſand Marks per Annum due to the Roman Church, and Arrears for fifteen Years in his Father's Time: But we do not find how he ſatisfy'd theſe Demands.

1312. By the twentieth Article of the Ordinances Earl Gaveſton was oblig'd with great Uneaſineſs to quit the Nation and go into Baniſhment; yet in no long Time after, the King recall'd him with infinite Fondneſs, declaring, That he had been baniſh'd contrary to the Laws and Uſages of the Kingdom, which he was bound to maintain by his Coronation Oath. Therefore he wrote to all the Sheriffs in England, 'That ſince in the Inſtrument of Exile he had no 'other Appellations but of Good and Loyal, he return'd at his Commandment, 'and was ready to anſwer all that could be objected againſt him: Wherefore he 'ſhould always eſteem him Good and Loyal, and expected them to repute him 'ſo, and to publiſh the Matter through their whole Counties. The Lords did not neglect this Occaſion of the King's Tenderneſs, but publickly declar'd, That the Laws and Cuſtoms of the Kingdom, together with the late made Ordinances, were not obſerv'd nor regarded. The King to obviate the Effects of ſuch Reports iſſu'd a Declaration to be publiſh'd in all Parts, manifeſting his Deſire of Peace and an Obſervance of the Laws, and the late Ordinances; and not long after he wrote to the Community of the City of London, to ſecure that City, ſo that no Miſchiefs might ariſe from the Meeting of the Nobility. Theſe and ſome other Methods proving ineffectual, he deſign'd to proceed amicably with the diſſatisfy'd Biſhops and Barons, and according to the Power reſerv'd in his Proteſtation when he confirm'd the Ordinances, he appointed thirteen Commiſſioners to treat with thoſe of the Nobility who had made the late Ordinances, and to correct and reform all ſuch Things as were prejudicial and injurious. Theſe Propoſals were very reaſonable and amicable; but ſtill the Inſolencies and Extravagancies of Earl Gaveſton ſo far increas'd, as prevented all Accommodation. And alſo the young Queen thought her ſelf not a little injur'd by this ungrateful Man's Predominancy, for which ſhe ſent her Complaints to the King of France her Father, That her Lord's Affection to him was ſo great, that it had both alienated his Love for her, and himſelf from her Bed. Which occaſion'd ſome Writers to ſay, That the King was as looſe in a perſonal Affection to him, as he was in his publick Favours.

Trokelow. Walſing. In the mean Time the Lords purſu'd their Deſigns both privately and publickly, which were much promoted by the old Earl of Lincoln's dying Speech to the powerful Earl of Lancaſter, who had marry'd his Daughter and Heir; in which he alledg'd, That God had bleſs'd him with greater Riches and Authority than any Nobleman in England; for which he ow'd the greater Honour and Service: That he ſaw the Church of England, formerly in a State of Liberty, now reduc'd to Servitude by the Oppreſſions of the Romans, and the Exactions of Crown'd Heads; and the People, who had enjoy'd many Privileges, brought to the ſame Condition by divers Tallages and Vexations: Adjuring him by God's Bleſſing and his own, That when he had an Opportunity, he would deliver the Church and People from ſuch Oppreſſions; That he would pay all due Honour and Reverence to the King his Lord, yet cauſe him to remove from his Preſence all evil Counſellors and Strangers, and effectually to obſerve the Tenor of Magna Charta, and all other Ordinances granted to the Clergy and Laity; for accompliſhing of which he ſhould contract a ſtrict Alliance with the Earl of Warwick, who better underſtood them than any other. Having ended this Speech, he took his leave of the World; and ſhortly after the great Earl of Lancaſter, with his Adherents the Earls of Hereford, Pembroke, Warwick, Arundel and Warren, and ſeveral Barons, joining with the Arch-

A. D. 1312. Reg. 7.

The great Earl of Lancaſter was choſen their General, who by common Conſent ſent to the King then at York, petitioning him, Either to deliver Earl Gaveſton to them, or oblige him to quit the Kingdom, according to the late Ordinances. The King took ſmall Notice of their Supplications, left York, and repair'd to Newcaſtle, where he continu'd for a conſiderable Space. Upon which the Lords, with what Forces they could raiſe, march'd with all Speed towards Newcaſtle; not that they would offer Injury, or create Trouble to their Soveraign, but only take Earl Gaveſton, and judge him according to the Laws made by common Agreement. Upon their Approach, the King and Gaveſton immediately fled to Tinmouth; and tho' the Queen, then great with Child, with a Flood of Tears begg'd of him not to leave her in that Place, he without any Pity took Shipping and ſail'd with his Favourite to Scarborough, commanding the Garriſon of the Caſtle to protect him, while he repair'd into Warwickſhire. The Earl of Lancaſter, having poſſeſs'd himſelf of Newcaſtle, ſent Meſſengers to the Queen at Tinmouth to comfort her, faithfully promiſing, That he would not give over his Purſuit, 'till he had remov'd Gaveſton from the King; excuſing himſelf for not coming to her in Perſon, leſt for her ſake, he ſhould incur the King's Indignation. Shortly after the Lords left Newcaſtle, march'd with all Speed to Scarborough Caſtle, and inveſted it; but the Earl of Lancaſter finding no Oppoſition from the Country, retir'd with his Forces, and left the Ears of Pembroke and Warren to take the Caſtle, who in a ſhort Time ſo ſtraiten'd it, that Gaveſton ſurrender'd himſelf upon Condition that he might ſtand to the Judgment of the Barons, and once more ſpeak to the King. Upon Notice of which, the King earneſtly deſir'd he might ſpeak with him, and heartily begg'd that his Life might be ſav'd; promiſing upon that Condition to ſatisfie the Deſires of the Nobility in all Things. Upon this Promiſe, the Earl of Pembroke perſuaded the Barons to grant the King's Requeſt, ingaging upon the higheſt Penalties to keep him ſafe, 'till he had ſpoken with the King, and then reſtore him to the Barons at a prefix'd Time and Place, deſigning to carry him to Wallingford. In his Way thither, at Deddington in Oxfordſhire, the Earl left him to the Care of his Servants, while he lodg'd with his Lady at a neighbouring Place; which being known to the Earl of Warwick, he came with a great Force, and at Night took him from the Servants, and carry'd him to his Caſtle at Warwick. The Lords now conſulting what to do with him, a ſubtle Man amongſt them declar'd, That after all this Expence and Trouble, it would be very weak in them to hazard the loſing of him; adding, That it was much better he ſhould die, than a War ſhould be rais'd in the Kingdom. Upon which Advice, they took him out of Priſon, and carry'd him to an Aſcent about a Mile North-Eaſt of Warwick, call'd Black-Low, and there beheaded this Favourite; notwithſtanding the earneſt Solicitations of the King, which nothing but the total Deſtruction of all Truſt and Confidence could have render'd ineffectual.

They behead him at Warwick.

The Lords now finding their own Strength and the King's Weakneſs, proudly demanded of the King, That their Ordinances might be confirm'd and put in Execution, Threatning to conſtrain him by Force if not ſpeedily perform'd; and accordingly they quarter'd their Forces in the Country about Dunſtable, while the King continu'd at London. Yet at length by the Management and Mediation of the Pope's Nuncio's, the Biſhops and the Earl of Gloceſter, Articles were agreed upon, and the preſent Heats allay'd, upon Condition that the Lords ſhould reſtore to the King all they had taken at Newcaſtle, and what belong'd to Earl Gaveſton, all which was ſhortly after perform'd. But the Reſentments the King harbour'd for the Loſs of his dear Companion were by the Sycophancies of the French at Windſor reviv'd again in a ſhort Time; therefore fore in a Parliament at London, the King vehemently charg'd thoſe preſumptuous Lords with their Contempt againſt him in the Spoils they committed at Newcaſtle, and the inhuman Murther of his Friend. To all which they boldly reply'd, That they had not offended in any Point, but deſerv'd his Royal Favour, in proſecuting the publick Enemy of the Nation, who had been ſo juſtly baniſh'd by two ſeveral Kings. Nevertheleſs, to prevent Civil Conteſts, by the careful Management of the young Queen and the Prelates, the Lords in the open Court at Weſtminſter humbled themſelves before the King, ſupplicating his Favour; and the King by Writing granted his gracious Pardon to all ſuch as deſir'd it. The whole Houſe of Parliament ſeeing the King's Wants, of their own Accord granted him a Fifteenth, and all Parties return'd home with Satisfaction; but not long after, Guy Earl of Warwick, who in this Parliament was appointed to be of the Privy-Council, deceas'd, being poiſon'd by ſome of the King's ſecret Friends, as it was believ'd by many. In the ſame Year of this Reign, the King's Sorrow for Gaveſton was much alleviated by the Birth of a Son at Windſor on the thirteenth Day of November, and baptiz'd by the Name of Edward; a Prince whoſe noble Acts afterwards redeem'd all the Blemiſhes with which his Father's Infelicities had darkned the Engliſh Name.

Buchan. Bottins. Waſing. &c.

II. While the State of England ſtood thus diſtemper'd at home, through the Infirmity of a weak Head, that of Scotland grew ſtrong by the provident Care of a vigilant and couragious King; who not only overcame all Factions, but gradually recover'd moſt of his own Country, and made great Devaſtations in the Borders of England. Having taken Edinburgh and other Places, while King Edward ſeem'd inchanted with unworthy Languiſhments, he ſent his Brother to beſiege the ſtrong Caſtle of Sterling; but after ſome Continuance before it, and deſpairing of taking it by Force, both Parties agreed to theſe Conditions, That if the Engliſh did not relieve the Caſtle within a Year from the Day of the Treaty, it ſhould be ſurrender'd to the Scots, and the Garriſon ſhould have ſafe Conduct to march whither they pleas'd, with all their Goods. Rous'd with theſe repeated Advantages, King Edward ſummon'd all his Power and Force, and with a mighty Army began his March, conſiſting of a hundred thouſand Men, according to the Scotch Writers, and of thoſe of many Nations, who in Imagination had poſſeſs'd themſelves of all the Strength and Riches of Scotland, before they enter'd that Kingdom. Beſides the King was gloriouſly attended with moſt of the Nobility and great Men of England, except the four Earls of Lancaſter, Warwick, Warren and Arundel, who refus'd to go, becauſe the King had protracted the Ratification of their deſired Liberties and Proviſions. This ſplendid Army having enter'd Scotland, more with the Ornaments of Feſtival Solemnities than the Accoutrements of hardy Soldiers, was met near Sterling by the undaunted King Robert at the Head of a well appointed Army of thirty thouſand Men, harden'd with the continual Uſe of War and Domeſtick Evils, fierce and reſolute, carrying about with them all their Hopes of Life, Liberty, and whatever was dear to them. The Advantage of the Ground was theirs, having on one Side unacceſſible Rocks to defend them, on the other a mooriſh Spot of Land, where they made Pits and Trenches fill'd with ſharp Stakes, and cover'd over with Hurdles, ſo that the Foot might ſafely paſs over; but in the Battel they ſo hamper'd and confounded the Engliſh Horſe, that the Scots gain'd the Day, and gave England the greateſt Overthrow that ever that Nation ſuſtain'd. This fatal Battel was call'd Bannock's-Bourn, becauſe fought by the Brook or River Bannock, upon which the Scotch made ſeveral ſcoffing Rhymes upon the Loſſes and Misfortunes of the Engliſh. Gilbert Earl of Clare was ſlain, with many Noblemen of the higheſt Rank, ſeven hundred Knights and Bannerets, great Numbers of Gentlemen, and ten thouſand common Soldiers, tho' the Scotch Writers ters ſay fifty. Many great Men were taken Priſoners, great Riches and Booty loſt, and the King himſelf with great Difficulty eſcap'd by Flight. This Defeat gave ſuch Wealth and Power to the Scots, that they liv'd ſecurely for ſeveral Years after; yet King Edward upon his Return to York ſhew'd a great Inclination to repair this Diſhonour, but the People grew cold and languid, and return'd home without effecting any Thing. The Unhappy Borderers were great Sufferers by it, and became ſo diſheartned, that according to Walſingham a hundred of them would fly from three Scotch Soldiers; to ſuch a ſudden Faintneſs were the Inferiors brought, when the nobler Parts of the State were diſpirited.

Calamities in England.

This great Diſaſter was attended and ſucceeded by terrible Inundations, Famines and Peſtilences, which exceedingly afflicted the Land. Upon the Dearneſs of Proviſions, at a Parliament held at Weſtminſter, it was ordain'd That all Victuals exceeding an eſtabliſh'd Price ſhould be forfeited to the King: Particularly the beſt Ox fatted with Graſs ſhould be ſold for ſixteen Shillings, if fatted with Corn for twenty four Shillings; the beſt Cow for twelve Shillings; a fat Swine of two Years old for three Shillings and four Pence; a fat Wether or Mutton unſhorn for twenty Pence, and ſhorn for fourteen Pence; a fat Gooſe for two Pence half-penny, a fat Capon for two Pence, a fat Hen for a Penny, two Chickens for a Penny, four Pidgeons for a Penny, and twenty four Eggs for the ſame. But this Act was in Time found to be ſo prejudicial, by reaſon of the Scarcity of all Things, that in the following Year it was repeal'd, and Men were left to their Liberty to make what Advantage they could in theſe calamitous Times. But neither the Diſhonours from Scotland, nor the Miſeries and Diſcontents at home, could divert King Edward from a publick Solemnization of his beloved Gaveſton's Funeral; whoſe Body he remov'd with great Pomp and Splendor from his former Burial at Oxford to King's Langley in Hertfordſhire; where he in Perſon, with the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, four Biſhops, many Abbots and Eccleſiaſticks, honour'd his Obſequies: But few of the Nobility could ſo far lay aſide their Reſentments, as to attend upon ſuch an Occaſion.

A great Famine.

In the mean Time the State of the Kingdom became deplorable, there being no Love between the King and the Nobility, nor any great Care in Him, or Them, of the publick Affairs; yet they aſſembled at a Parliament in London, where nothing material was enacted, and the Famine and Peſtilence daily encreas'd. The Famine was become ſo exceſſive, as we are told, That not only Horſes and Dogs, but even Men and Children were ſtolen for Food; and, which is horrible to imagine, the Criminals newly brought into the Priſons, were torn in Pieces, and eaten almoſt alive by ſuch as had been there a longer Time. In London it was proclaim'd, That no Corn ſhould be converted to Brewers Uſes, which Act, the King, mov'd with Compaſſion towards the Nation, both follow'd himſelf, and caus'd to be executed throughout the Kingdom; otherwiſe, ſays Walſingham, the greater Part of the People had periſh'd for want of Bread. The Bloody Flux or Dyſentery, caus'd by crude and corrupt Humours, proceeding from unwholſome Diet, rag'd in all Places, and together with other Diſtempers brought ſuch Multitudes of the meaner Sort to their Graves, that the Living were ſcarce ſufficient to bury the Dead. But all theſe Calamities could not extinguiſh the Rancour between the King and his Nobility, tho' he made the Head of them, the Earl of Lancaſter, Chief of his Privy-Council; for daily ſome Accident happen'd that increas'd the Averſion. Particularly this great Earl's Wife was taken out of his Houſe at Canford in Dorſetſhire, by one Richard St. Martin, a moſt deformed Dwarf, who claim'd her, the greateſt Heireſs in England, for his Wife, avowing that he had lain with her before ſhe was marry'd to the Earl; which the Lady her ſelf, to her perpetual Infamy and Diſhonour, voluntarily averr'd. By her this worthleſs Perſon claim'd and obtain'd both the Earldoms of Lincoln and Salisbury, to the the great Diminution of the Earl's Power and Fortunes; which never could have been effected without the greateſt Supporters. The King was noted as a ſpecial Agent in this Affair, which being in ſo tender a Point as Marriage, added much to his other Violations of Order and good Government, and gave Occaſion and Boldneſs to inferior Perſons to reproach his Behaviour. Particularly at the Celebration of the Feaſt of Penteco ſt, at Dinner in the open Hall of Weſtminſter, a Woman fantaſtically diſguis'd enter'd on Horſe-back and deliver'd a Lettter to him at the Table, which reprov'd him for his great Neglect of ſuch as had done noble Service to him and his Father, and tax'd him with advancing of unworthy Men, and other Miſcarriages. This Letter being read, and the Woman retir'd, the King in a Rage blam'd his Guards for ſuffering her to enter in ſuch a Manner; who excus'd themſelves by alledging It was not the Cuſtom in Kings Palaces, at Times of Feſtivals, to keep out any that came to divert the Aſſembly. The Woman being found, confeſs'd that ſhe was hired by a particular Knight to do this Act; and he being examin'd, boldly declar'd, That what he did was purely for the King's Honour, and ſo eſcap'd without any further Noiſe or Diſturbance.

The Earl of Lancaſter diſguſted.

Boetius. Walſing. &c.

Still the Northern Parts were not only infeſted and waſted by the Scots, but likewiſe by ſuch Engliſh as under Colour of Protection and Aſſiſtance, robb'd and pillag'd where-ever they came, to the miſerable Ruin of the Inhabitants. Nor did the King ſeem to have any Will or Power to relieve the common Calamities, but rather to convert all his Thoughts and Forces againſt the Diſpleaſure of the Nobility, who under the Notion of maintaining their Proviſions and Eſtabliſhments, daily withdrew their Love, Service and Duty from him. Wherefore finding himſelf thus weak and abandon'd, he begg'd the Spiritual Aſſiſtance of the Pope; who thereupon ſent certain Cardinals to ſettle the Peace and Tranquility of the Nation. Theſe made a formal Reconciliation between the King and the Earl of Lancaſter, who in a certain Plain near Leiceſter amicably met with Kiſſes and Embraces; but when they could not work the ſame Effect with the Scots, they put their whole Country under an Interdict. For they had now ſo much increas'd in Strength and Power, that they began to caſt their Eyes upon the Kingdom of Ireland; whither Edward, Brother to King Robert, had paſs'd with an Army, and procur'd himſelf to be crown'd King of that Country, by the Favour of ſome of the Iriſh Nobility. Yet after three Years from his firſt Entrance, the Engliſh under the Conduct of the Arch-Biſhop of Armagh, and John Lord Brenningham Juſticiary of Ireland, ſo valiantly encounter'd him, that he loſt both his uſurped Kingdom and his Life. In this Battel fell many of the Scotch Nobility, beſides above five thouſand of the ordinary Sort, which much diminiſh'd the Glory of all their former Succeſſes. But King Robert, like an expert and vigilant Prince, was no ways diſhearten'd, but proceeding with all Vigour, won the important Town of Berwick, which was ſoon ſurrender'd to him, by the Treaſon, as it is believ'd, of Peter Spalding the Governor. And when King Edward endeavour'd to recover it again, the Scots diverted him from the Siege with Incurſions and Slaughters of his People in other Parts of England, being near ſurprizing of the Queen her ſelf in a Village not far from York, where ſhe continu'd during the Siege of Berwick; which Contrivance was form'd by the Scots and ſome perfidious Engliſh, whom King Robert had brib'd for that purpoſe. The Inhabitants of York and the adjacent Country, having ſuſtain'd innumerable Loſſes by the Scots, gather'd together an Army of ten thouſand Men, and briskly attack'd them at Wilton on Swaile; but being neither well led, nor experienc'd, they were defeated with the Loſs of three thouſand Men. The King being inform'd of this Misfortune, and finding all Affairs in a melancholy Poſture, gladly concluded a formal Truce with the Scots for two Years, and again return'd with Diſhonour from the Northern Parts.

ed, but was ſucceeded with great Troubles and Confuſion. For it happen'd that about this Time, the King, upon the Recommendation of the Lords themſelves, had made Hugh de Spenſer Lord Chamberlain, who being a Man of equal Inſolence, Vices and Ambition with Gaveſton, ſo inſinuated himſelf with the King, that he obtain'd all the Favours and Authority that the other ever enjoy'd, and in like manner procur'd no leſs Envy and Hatred. Hugh his Father, an ancient Knight, the better to ſupport his Son in his Courſes, was likewiſe employ'd, and grew in great Favour with the King, who afterwards alſo created him Earl of Wincheſter; and tho' he was unlike his Son in Manners and Qualifications, yet his inordinate Affection to him was the Cauſe of his own Ruin. The Son, as he was of a noble Shape and Preſence, ſo the very Spirit of Pride and Rapine carry'd him to ſuch intollerable Actions and Oppreſſions. that Gaveſton might with good Reaſon ſeem to be wiſh'd for again. Againſt theſe two, who wholly govern'd the unfortunate King, the popular Earl of Lancaſter and moſt of the Nobility ſwell'd with ſuch Rage and Impatience, that gathering together above eleven thouſand Men, they enter'd upon their ſeveral Lands and vaſt Eſtates, waſted ſixty three Manors of the Father, and took away ſuch Quantities of Sheep, Oxen and Swine, together with ſuch Proviſions of Corn, Wine, and other Conveniencies and Neceſſaries from both, as amounted to about ſixty eight thouſand Pounds; as it was given in by themſelves afterwards. And not ſatisfy'd with theſe Waſtes, the Lords by the Terror of civil Arms, in Parliament procur'd theſe two Favourites to be baniſh'd; revenging at once both their own and the publick Injuries.

In all Conteſts which happen'd between the King and his Nobility, Queen Iſabel had been hitherto a Promoter of Peace, and a Performer of many worthy Offices; but the ill Fates of the Earls of Lancaſter and Hereford would not permit her to continue ſo any longer: For the Queen being one Night deny'd Lodging in the Caſtle of Leeds in Kent, which belong'd to the Lord of Badleſmere, one of the Earl's Party, ſhe withdrew her good Opinion, and oblig'd the King to take a cruel Revenge for this Diſhonour. For immediately after coming in Perſon with many thouſand Men before the Caſtle, he took the Governor, and all the beſt of the Garriſon, and put them to a ſhameful Death. Then deſiring to be reveng'd on the Lords for their late Inſolencies, he march'd to Circeſter, took many Caſtles and beſieg'd others; while the Lords, not ſuſpecting ſuch ſudden Aſſaults, were providing for their Defence. At Circeſter Hugh Spenſer the Son repair'd to him according to Command, having been hovering upon the Sea, expecting the Event of theſe Affairs by Land. The Nobility, who had fallen from their Soveraign's good Opinion, and wanting now their uſual Mediatrix the Queen, lay expos'd to all the Miſchiefs that Enemies could raiſe or procure from the King; who, taking the Regal Power to be in Danger, reſolv'd couragiouſly to die in the Conteſt, or bring the Lords to a full Subjection. In the mean Time the Judgment of Baniſhment given againſt the two Spenſers was revers'd as erronious, and their Revocation decreed by the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury and his Suffragans.

The Lords weaken'd.

The Lords, not all of the ſame Diſpoſition, began to be apprehenſive of the King's Power, and many of them forſook their Commander the Earl of Lancaſter, and ſurrender'd themſelves to the King; and others were apprehended, particularly the two Mortimers, who were committed to the Tower of London, and others to Wallingford Caſtle. The Faction weaken'd by this Defection, drew together in the North under the Conduct of the Earl of Lancaſter, who was now to fight for his Life as well as Eſtate. Upon which the King march'd thither, and with a Part of his Army conſtrain'd the Earl to fly from Burton upon Trent; whoſe Forces in their Retreat or Flight behav'd themſelves outragiouſly and barbarouſly. ment; for the King purſu'd them to Burgh-Bridge, while they were marching towards their Allies the Scots, where they were ſtopp'd by Forces brought from Carliſle by Sir Andrew Harclay, and others from York by Sir Simon Ward. In forcing his Way over the Bridge, the Earl of Hereford was kill'd; and the Earl of Lancaſter not being able to ſuſtain the Shock of the Battel, nor yet to eſcape, was taken Priſoner by Sir Andrew Harclay, and many other Barons, Bannerets and Knights, to the Number of ninety five. The Earl was immediately ſent Priſoner to Pontfract Caſtle, his own but lately ſurrender'd, where the whole Multitude derided him and call'd him King Arthur, which Name he is ſaid by ſome to have aſſum'd to himſelf, in an intercepted Letter written to the Scots. But this was not all his Fate, for on the third Day after his Apprehenſion, the King ſitting in Judgment at the ſame Caſtle, with his Brother Edmund Earl of Kent, the Earls of Pembroke and Warren, both the Spenſers, and others, Sentence of Death was given againſt Thomas Earl of Lancaſter, by drawing, hanging and beheading as a Rebel and a Traitor. The two firſt Puniſhments were remitted in regard he was of the Royal Blood; but he was beheaded on the ſame Day he was condemn'd without the Town of Pontfract, before his own Caſtle; and that without anſwering, or the Judgment of his Peers. And by the ſame Judgment were condemn'd the Lord Roger Clifford, the Lord Warren Liſle, the Lord William Tokit, Thomas Manduit, Henry Bradburn, William Fitzwilliams, William Lord Cheyny, Thomas Lord Mowbray, and Joceline Lord D'enynvill; all which were executed at York. Shortly after the Lord Teyes was taken, drawn, hang'd and quarter'd at London, the Lord Aldenham at Windſor, the Lords Badleſmere and Aſhbournham at Canterbury, and the Lord Gifford at Gloceſter; all great Men and in great Cities, to ſpread the more Terror over the Kingdom; which was attended with the intire Confiſcation of all their Lands, Titles and Eſtates, by which many were inrich'd and advanc'd. Never was the Engliſh Nation ſo ſtain'd with the Blood of her Nobility ſhed in this Manner ſince the Conqueſt, which being caus'd in a great Meaſure by the Power of the Spenſers, and without regular Proceſs, it open'd Veins for more to follow, and afterwards procur'd a moſt diſmal Revenge.

A grand Execution of the Nobility.

Bertius. Walſing. King Edward conceiving that this Exploit had made him formidable to the Scots, as well as terrible to the Engliſh, march'd with a mighty Army, but with ſmall Proviſions into Scotland; from whence not long after, for want of uſual Subſiſtance, he was compell'd to retire without the Honour of any Action. And what prov'd ſtill more diſhonourable, the Scots purſu'd him many Miles into England, and at Blackmore Foreſt took all his Treaſure and Furniture, and were ſo near taking his Perſon, that he could hardly eſcape with a few Followers. They took the Earl of Richmond and the King of France's Envoy, with many others, and waſted the Country with Fire and Sword almoſt to the Walls of York; they burnt Ripon, and compounded with Beverly for four hundred Pounds, and return'd home loaden with great Spoils and Booty. This was the Succeſs of this unfortunate King in his third Scottiſh Expedition; yet King Robert, having lain five Years under the Cenſure of the Pope's Interdict, deſir'd a Truce, which was granted him for thirteen Years.

The King worſted by the Scots.

La Mort. Walſing. And now being at Leiſure, and in a calmer Temper, the King began to have a Senſe of the Execution of the Earl of Lancaſter, which was diſcover'd upon this Occaſion: Some Perſons about him making earneſt Suit to grant a Pardon to a Man of low Condition, one of the Earl's Aſſiſtants and Followers, he fell into a violent Paſſion, exclaiming againſt them as unjuſt and wicked Counſellors, who could urge him to ſave the Life of a notorious Villain, and would not ſpeak one Word for his near Kinſman the Earl of Lancaſter; who, if he had liv'd, might have been beneficial to him and the whole Kingdom; but for this Man, the longer he liv'd, the more Miſchief he would commit: Therefore with a deſperate Oath he declar'd, That he ſhould ſuffer that Death he had deſerv'd. And notwithſtanding the Crimes and Treaſons of this Earl of Lancaſter, the People held him in ſuch Veneration, that they repair'd to his Tomb as to that of the greateſt Saint; and many Miracles and Cures were reported to have been wrought there. Sir Andrew Harclay, who took him Priſoner at Burgh-Bridge, being advanc'd for his Service to the Earldom of Carliſle, enjoy'd his Honour but a ſhort Time. For in the following Year, either falling into Diſcontent by the Spenſers envying his high Preferment, or combining with the Scots who had allur'd him with the Hopes of a great Match, as he was accus'd, he was degraded of all his Honours, drawn, hang'd and quarter'd at London for Treaſon; and remains among the Examples of ſudden Downfalls, under an unconſtant and ill-governing Prince.

A. D. 1323. Reg. 16 17.

IV. We are now arriv'd at the laſt Act or Part of King Edward's Tragical Misfortunes; occaſion'd from the new King of France, Charles the Fifth, his pretending to ſeize the Dutchy of Gaſcony for want of Homage, and from the exorbitant Power and Poſſeſſions of the two Spenſers. Theſe two powerful Men, one created Earl of Wincheſter and the other Earl of Gloceſter, now aſpiring to the Height of Command, and endeavouring to remove all Impediments to their Grandeur, continually rais'd mortal Enmities againſt themſelves and the King. The Queen took their Carriage heinouſly, becauſe, among other Diſobligations, they had retrench'd her expenſive Way of Living, while they abounded in all Riches and Magnificence, as ſhe complain'd, particularly, That the Daughter and Heir of the King of France was marry'd to a Miſer, and tho' ſhe was promis'd to be made a Queen, ſhe was no better than a Waiting-Woman, living upon a Penſion from the Spenſers. Thus was the Foundation of their common Deſtruction laid, and begun in the Impotency of a Woman's Will; to ſtrengthen which, they themſelves increas'd her Party with Adam Biſhop of Hereford, by diveſting him of all his Temporalties as a Traitor, for having ſupported the Mortimers in the Barons Conteſt. This Adam was a Man of a ſubtle Wit, profound in Human Policy, daring and factious, who for this Cauſe conceiving the greateſt Indignation, ſoon found means to become dear to the Queen, and to form a great and ſecret Party: To which Henry Biſhop of Lincoln, who for the like Cauſes had been kept out of his Temporalties about two Years, join'd himſelf. Neither would the Avarice of the Spenſers permit them to leſſen the Multitudes of their Enemies; for they ſold the King's Pardons and Favours to ſuch as had been concern'd in the Barons Conteſt at ſuch exceſſive Rates, both of Lands and Mony, that they impoveriſh'd many of the Nobility. In ſum, the Royal Power being in the Hands of the Spenſers, and the Chancellor Baldock, or of their Creatures and Favourites, this new Faction had the general Diſcontents of the Nation to work upon for their Advantage.

La Mer. Walſing.

The ſeveral Steps towards King Edward's Ruin.

The King being thus govern'd, and having ſent his Brother Edmund Earl of Kent to compoſe the Affairs of Gaſcony, the Matter was ſoon brought to this Iſſue: That whereas the King reſolv'd to have gone in Perſon into France, the Spenſers, who dreaded a Separation from his Perſon, as knowing the Reverence of that to be their only Safegard, perſuaded the King, contrary to the Opinion of all others, to oblige the Queen in her Requeſts, and ſend her over to negotiate his Affairs with her Brother the French King. All this ſhe in a ſhort Time perform'd, and by her Suit and Management all Differences were compos'd, upon Condition that King Edward ſhould give to his Son Prince Edward the Dukedom of Gaſcony and the Earldom of Ponthieu, for which the King of France was willing to accept of his young Nephew's Homage. This being effected, the Prince was ſent over for that Purpoſe to his Mother, to the utter Ruin of the King his Father and all his Favourites: For the Heir of England being in Foreign Parts, and among the contrary Faction, all their Conſultation was, under Colour of defeating the Spenſers, how to accompliſh their own Deſigns.

Ibid.

A. D. 1324. Reg. 17 18.

The Queen ſent over to France.

Deſigns. And what ſtrengthen'd their Intereſt was the Arrival of young Roger Mortimer from England, a Perſon as much in Favour with the Queen as the Spenſers were with the King, who having been impriſon'd in the Tower for joining in the late Rebellion, had either corrupted or poiſon'd his Keepers, and made his Eſcape with other Fugitives into France. Now the Queen and Prince having perform'd the whole of their Negotiation, the King about Michaelmaſs ſent ſeveral kind Letters and Meſſages to them to deſire them to return into England; but the Conſpiracy not being ripe, ſhe deferr'd the Thing upon ſeveral Pretences, and detain'd her Son ſtill. Among many that went over with the young Prince was Stapleton Biſhop of Exeter, who perceiving the Familiarity between the Queen and Mortimer to be greater than was agreeable either to her Honour or Duty, and ſeeing him and other Fugitives enjoy that Privacy in Council that was aſſign'd to himſelf, he return'd ſecretly and unexpectedly into England, and faithfully inform'd the King of all that he knew.

Deſigns againſt the King.

Walſing. &c. The unfortunate King Edward now clearly ſeeing his Error, by the Greatneſs of his Dangers, earneſtly ſolicited the King of France to ſend home the Queen and the Prince; but that not ſucceeding, he imprudently in the City of London caus'd them to be proclaim'd Enemies to the Kingdom, baniſhing them and all their Adherents from the ſame. For his greater Security alſo he caus'd the Ports to be carefully watch'd; and beſides this, there was a Deſign laid, as it was ſuppos'd and believ'd, to take away the Lives of the Queen and Prince. The Queen on the other Side, fearing that the Spenſers Gold might ruin all her Proceedings in France, politickly retir'd out of the Way, 'till with the Prince, the Lord Mortimer, and her other Adherents, were arriv'd ſafely in Hainault. There was alſo ſome other Reaſons to move Queen Iſabel to depart out of France, beſides the Danger of Deſigns againſt her Perſon, as to divert and remove a War from her Native Country, which for her ſake began now to be infeſted on the Sea-Coaſts: For Sir John Oturwin, Sir Nicolas Kiried, and Sir John Felton, with the Navy of the Ports, and of other Places, had by Commiſſion from the King ſo ſcoured the narrow Seas, that they within a ſhort Time, brought a hundred and twenty Norman Ships into England, as lawful Prizes. And further, whereas thoſe two Biſhops, which the Pope had ſent over upon her Account, were return'd out of England, without doing or hoping to do her any Service, ſhe was fully perſuaded that the Sword or nothing could effect it.

A. D. 1325. Reg. 18/19.

The Queen and her Party proclaim'd Traitors.

La Mort. Walſing. But at Hainault ſhe found a hearty and honourable Reception from William the Earl of that Country; where, contrary to the Advice and Conſent of the Peers of England, ſhe contracted the Prince her Son, then not fourteen Years of Age, to Philippa, one of the Earl's Daughters; and with the Mony of her Portion rais'd Soldiers out of Hainault and Germany for her Service in England. Being provided with Men and Veſſels, ſhe embark'd for England with her Son, and Edmund Earl of Kent the King's Brother, Roger Mortimer, and many others who fled out of England, and with two thouſand ſeven hundred and fifty ſeven Men at Arms, commanded by John the Earl's Brother, ſhe landed at Harwich on Wedneſday before Michaelmaſs Day, where ſhe was join'd by the Earl-Marſhal; the Earl of Leiceſter, with ſeveral Barons and Knights, and almoſt all the Prelates, but chiefly with the Biſhops of Lincoln, Hereford and Ely, who together compos'd a conſiderable Army, which being refreſh'd at St. Edmund's Bury, ſet forwards to meet with all Oppoſers. The unfortunate King, now deſtitute of Friends and Means, as well as Courage and Counſel, demanded Aſſiſtance of the City of London, where he receiv'd this Anſwer, That they would honour and obey the King, Queen and Prince, but would ſhut their Gates againſt all Foreigners and Traitors to the Realm. The King and his few Friends repoſing no Aſſurance in this Anſwer, committed an Error worſe than any of his former, by retiring himſelf into the Weſt, with his inſeparable Favourites the Spenſers, Baldock and others, there to raiſe an Army

Army againſt the Queen. But before his Departure, he left his other Son, the Lord John of Eltham in the Tower of London, with his Niece the Counteſs of Gloceſter Wife to the younger Spenſer, committing the Government of the Tower to Sir John Weſton, who was well provided of Men and Ammunition. He alſo by Proclamation commanded all Men to kill and deſtroy the Queen's Adherents, none excepted but her ſelf, the Prince, and Edmund Earl of Kent; and that none upon pain of Death, and Forfeiture of Eſtates, ſhould any ways aid or aſſiſt them; and that whoever brought him the Head of the Lord Mortimer, ſhould be rewarded with a thouſand Pounds. Thus the King took his final leave of the City of London, and in a great Meaſure of his Rule and Dominion.

The Queen's Power increaſes

On the contrary Side the Queen in a ſhort Time gather'd a very conſiderable Force, which to retain, as well as to encreaſe, Letters and Rumours were diſpers'd in all Parts, declaring That the King of France, to aid his Siſter, had got ready ſo many Dukes, Earls and others, that England could ſcarce maintain them. This falſe Report had great Effect upon ſuch as depended upon the Force of Arms; but to thoſe whom the Power of Religion might move, it was as ſubtlely, tho' as falſely ſpread abroad, That the Pope had excommunicated all ſuch as had taken up Arms againſt the Queen; and the more to countenance the Faction, that two Cardinals imploy'd about that Affair, were ſeen in the Queen's Camp. Beſides theſe, it was proclaim'd, That the Cauſes of the Queen's Arrival were only to deliver the Nation from the King's Evil Counſellors, which were nam'd to be the two Spenſers, Robert Baldock Lord Chancellor, and their Favourites; all others were to be ſafe, that nothing ſhould be taken from any Subject without paying ready Mony, and a Penalty was impos'd on all who acted contrary, as for the Value of three Pence to loſe a Finger, ſix Pence the Hand, and twelve Pence the Head; and finally whoſoever brought the younger Spenſer's Head to the Queen, ſhould have two thouſand Pounds Reward. With theſe outward Shows of Juſtice and Reaſon, the Queen with her Son and whole Army purſu'd the King, as it had been agreed in a Council of War, marching firſt into the City of Oxford; where the Biſhop of Hereford, the Queen's chief Counſellor, preach'd before her, the Army and the Univerſity, believing the Cauſe of her Proceedings, and taking for his Text, My Head, my Head aketh; from whence he concluded, contrary to the Rules of Phyſick, as well as Precepts of Divinity, that an aking and ſick Head of a Kingdom, was of Neceſſity to be taken off, and not otherwiſe to be cured. In the mean Time the Londoners in Favour of the Queen, and Hatred of the Spenſers, committed horrid Outrages, beſides inhuman Sacrilege in cutting off the Biſhop of Exeter's Head, and ſome others, whom the King had left Guardians of the City, among whom was a Citizen of their own John de Marchal, an Acquaintance of the younger Spenſer. They alſo got the Tower into their Poſſeſſion, placing and diſplacing the Garriſon and Officers at their Pleaſure, under the Name of the Lord John of Eltham, the King's ſecond Son, whom they proclaim'd Cuſtos of the City and the Kingdom. They alſo ſet at Liberty all Priſoners, which by the popular Queen's Commands was done throughout the Nation; and all Exiles and Fugitives were recall'd, who all flocking to the City of London, made no ſmall Addition to her Forces.

The miſerable King had now the clamorous Effects of ill Counſels calling too loud upon him; yet found no Way left to recover or repair the Misfortunes to which thoſe Errors had reduc'd him. Where-ever he went he found but few Subjects, for thoſe with their Hearts were loſt before; but being led on by uncertain Advices, after many Motions, as various as his former Humour, he took Shipping with a few Friends, intending for the Iſle of Lundy, or Ireland; but having ſuſtain'd much Damage at Sea, he came on Shore in Glamorganſhire, where he entruſted himſelf to God, and the Faith of the Welſh, who ſtill retain'd their former Love to him, lying ſecret amongſt them in the Abby of Nethe.

In the mean Time the Queen with increaſing Forces, and reſtleſs Revenge, purſu'd her flying Husband and Soveraign; and from Oxford march'd directly to Gloceſter, and from thence to Briſtol; which being fortify'd as well as the Time would permit, was committed by the King to the Care of the Earl of Arundel, and the elder Spenſer. But this Place ſoon yielded to that Succeſs, which ſeem'd to deny all Hopes to the King's declining Condition. Old Spenſer was there taken and executed upon the common Gallows with all the Rigour that Revenge and Conqueſt could invent; and with as much Contempt of Law, as he and his Son had formerly ſhew'd. They condemn'd him without Trial; and prevented his natural End, which could not have been long, being then near ninety Years of Age.

La Mor. Walſing. &c. The King having lain conceal'd for ſome Time, Proclamations were daily iſſu'd from the Queen's Army declaring, That if King Edward would come in and conform himſelf to the Laws and Government of the Nation, he ſhould be reſtor'd by the general Conſent of the People. But the King, not daring to truſt to this Declaration, kept himſelf ſtill conceal'd with Spenſer; upon which the Queen with her Forces and Friends at Hereford undertook to diſpoſe of the Government, and by the Conſent of the Lords and Community of England, Prince Edward was made Cuſtos or Guardian of the Kingdom, and had Fealty ſworn to him accordingly; the Biſhop of Norwich was made Chancellor of the Realm, and the Biſhop of Wincheſter Treaſurer. But the King's Perſon was ſtill too great to be kept long in ſecret; for the revengeful Eyes of the late Earl of Lancaſter's Brother, with ſome others, ſoon diſcover'd him in his Retirement; and by the Force of Mony and Arms they got him into their Poſſeſſion, together with the younger Spenſer, Chancellor Baldock, and Simon de Reding. The King was convey'd by the Earl from the Place of his Captivity to Monmouth, to Ledbury, and ſo to the Caſtle of Kenelworth in Warwickſhire, belonging to the Earl of Leiceſter, to whoſe Cuſtody he was committed: The other three, Spenſer, Baldock and Reding, were ſtrongly guarded to Hereford, there to be diſpos'd at the Pleaſure of their moſt mortal Enemies. Before their Arrival, the Earl of Arundel with ſome others were beheaded, chiefly to oblige Mortimer, who now govern'd the Queen's Affections as well as Affairs. The younger Spenſer was carry'd along, only to grace the Queen's triumphant March; and, as the chief Cauſe of her taking Arms, he was render'd a moſt contemptible Spectacle, and expos'd in a ſitting Poſture, to increaſe the Scorns and Reproaches that uſually attend ſuch miſerable Objects. But he was ſoon eas'd of his Sufferings, and receiv'd Sentence of Death from the Judge William Truſſel; then being ignominiouſly dragg'd to the Place of Execution, he was hung upon a Gallows fifty Foot high, and after that beheaded and quarter'd; they who brought him to the Queen having their promis'd Reward of two thouſand Pounds. His Head was ſet up at London, and his Quarters in four Parts of the Kingdom; and Simon de Reding was hang'd ten Foot lower than he in the ſame Place. This Execution was done on a Monday, in Revenge of the Death of the Earl of Lancaſter, whoſe Blood was ſhed on that Day. As to Chancellor Baldock, he was committed to the Biſhop of Hereford's Care, who brought him to London; where the tumultuous People took him by Violence, and tho' he was a Biſhop, thruſt him into Newgate, where he dy'd miſerably.

Walſing. Brady. After ſome Stay at Hereford, the Queen came to London with her Son Edward, and her Favourite Mortimer; where ſhe was receiv'd with as many Teſtimonies of Joy and Satisfaction, as could ariſe from two ſuch great Cauſes, as the Misfortunes of her Husband, and her own Succeſs. A Parliament or Convention was then ſummon'd, which was held the next Day after the Epiphany; where it was adjudg'd and declar'd That King Edward was unfit to govern the Kingdom any longer, for theſe Reaſons: Firſt, 'For that in all his Reign he has 'been miſs-led and govern'd by others, who gave him evil Counſel to the Diſhonour 'of Himſelf, and the Deſtruction of the Church and his People, not conſide-

'ring or knowing whether it was Good or Evil; nor would remedy these Things, 'when he was petition'd by the chief Men of his Kingdom, nor suffer them to 'be redress'd. Secondly, He would not submit to good Counsel, nor the good 'Government of his Kingdom; but neglecting the Business of the Realm, gave 'himself to Works and Employments unbecoming his Station. Thirdly, For want of 'good Government he lost the Kingdom of Scotland, and other Territories in 'Gascony and Ireland, which his Father had left to him in a peaceable State. 'Fourthly, By his Pride and Cruelty he destroy'd the Holy Church, and her 'chief Ministers, imprisoning some, and distressing others; and also executed, 'imprison'd, banish'd, and disinherited many great and noble Men of the Land. 'Fifthly, Whereas he was bound by Oath to do Justice to all, he only observ'd 'his own Profit, and the Avarice of his wicked Counsellors; nor did he regard 'the other Points of his Coronation Oath. Sixthly, He abandon'd his King-'dom, and endeavour'd to destroy it and his People; and what was worse, by 'the Cruelty and Default of his Person, he was become incorrigible without 'Hopes of Amendment. All which were so notorious, as not to be gainsaid.

He is declar'd no King. For these Reasons he was declar'd no King, and his Son appointed to be crown'd, which was proclaim'd in the great Hall of Westminster, with the universal Consent of the People there present; and the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury made a Sermon upon this Text, The Voice of the People is the Voice of God, exhorting all there present to invoke the King of Kings for the Person they had then chosen.

The Queen, when she heard of this heavy Sentence, of deposing her Husband, seem'd to sink under the Weight she was to bear, and to act the Part of a tender and dutiful Wife; but she who had reduc'd him to that Condition cou'd scarcely with feign'd Tears and Lamentations persuade others to believe that she really deplor'd it. Besides that unjustifiable Passion for Mortimer, which had so long and so violently govern'd her, was a convincing Proof that there was not Kindness enough left for her unhappy Husband to cause a sincere Grief for his Calamities. The Prince her Son, either mov'd by that specious Shew of Sorrow, which might easily deceive his innocent Youth, or rather urg'd by his own natural and generous Temper, solemnly vow'd That he would never accept of the Crown but by his Father's Consent. Upon which Commissioners were sent to the King at Kenelworth Castle, consisting of three Bishops, two Earls, two Barons, two Abbots, and two Justiciaries; among whom was Judge Trussel, Proxy to the whole Parliament. The Bishops of Lincoln and Hereford went before to prepare and persuade the King to resign the Crown; and as Promises frequently exceed Performances, they assur'd him, He should live more happy than before, and that in Effect he should only resign his Cares, and enjoy an undisturb'd Quiet and Plenty. On the other side they threatned, That if he refus'd to Grant what the People would certainly Take, and which was desir'd of him to satisfie his Son, he could not prevent his own Fate, but would bring Misfortunes upon his Posterity; for in that Case the People would chuse a King that had no Relation to his Blood.

La Mort. Walsing. &c.

He is persuaded to resign.

Upon the Arrival of the Commissioners, who were to receive his Resignation, the poor dispirited King came forth cloath'd in deep Mourning answerable to his Sorrows; and at the Sight of that Power which was to take away his, he could support himself no longer, but sunk with the Weight of his Afflictions down to the Ground. But after some Time being reviv'd and recover'd, the Bishop of Hereford deliver'd to him the subject Matter of their Commission, with the fatal Consequences of his Non-Compliance, which must involve his Son and Posterity in his own unhappy Condition. Upon which the King being greatly dejected, told them, That he submitted to all Things with the more Patience, because his Crimes and Offences had caus'd the Misery that was fallen upon him; yet it was a most afflicting Thought to him, That his People should retain such Hatred against him, as not to endure him any longer for their their Soveraign: But if his Condition would admit of any Conſolation, it muſt proceed from the Kindneſs they had ſhown to his Son, which he could not but gratefully acknowledge. This ſaid, they proceeded to the ſhort Ceremony of his Reſignation, which principally conſiſted in the Surrender of his Diadem and Enſigns of Majeſty to the Uſe of his Son the new King. For the Form of it, this being the firſt known in England, they could follow no Precedent, but were oblig'd to make one, and Judge Truſſel put it into the Stile of Law to render it more Authentick, and pronounc'd it after this Manner, 'I William 'Truſſel in the Name of all the Men of the Land of England, and of all 'the Parliament Procurator, reſign to Thee Edward the Homage that was 'made to Thee ſometime, and from this Time forwards, I defy Thee and 'prive Thee of all Royal Power; and I ſhall never be Attendant on Thee as 'King after this Time. Which being done, Sir Thomas Blunt Knight Steward of the Houſhold, by breaking his Staff, reſign'd his Office, and declar'd that the late King's Family was diſcharg'd. This was done upon the twenty ſecond Day of January, in the forty third Year of his Age, after an unfortunate and diſhonourable Reign of nineteen Years, ſix Months, and fifteen Days. The Manner of his Reſignation.

Here ended all the Power and Soveraignty of King Edward the Second, which dropt from him without thoſe violent Struggles that uſually attend ſuch Conteſts; and in our Hiſtory this is the firſt Inſtance where a King fell with ſo little Honour, and ſo great Infidelity, that found neither Sword nor Tongue to aſſert his Right. Tho' England had endur'd great Miſeries and Afflictions, through the Violence and Ambition of ſome of her Kings, yet ſhe had been govern'd by Men, and thoſe Troubles were incident to vigorous Diſpoſitions; but under this King, who could neither gain nor keep, the Nation ſuſtain'd all thoſe Calamities that could proceed from the Weakneſſes and Levities of a Child. His very Nature was ſo paſſive and complying, that he ſeem'd not only to have been govern'd, but even actuated by his Favourites, who directed and carry'd him as they pleas'd, commanded his Perſon and Kingdom, and only made uſe of his Name to colour and countenance their Villanies. For this Prince was not, like ſome of the former, ruin'd by a violent graſping at unlawful Power; but by meanly ſubjecting himſelf to the Power and Guidance of Others: And as Pride, Obſtinacy and Ambition were the Vices that embroyl'd ſome of the former Reigns; ſo Eaſineſs, Complacency, and Submiſſion or rather Subjection were the Ruin of this: Which cannot ſo much be call'd Vices in themſelves, as they became ſo, in being unfortunately plac'd. In ſhort he was more weak than wicked, and his Exorbitancies met with as great, or greater in his People. He was too much given to Drink, but remarkable for his Continence; and he left ſome Remains of his Charity and Piety behind him, having founded Orial College and St. Mary-Hall in Oxford, and built a Church for Friars at his Manor of Langley. His Character.

In the Beginning of this King's Reign all the Knights Templars throughout England were at once arreſted, and committed to Priſon. They were a famous Order of Knights inſtituted by Baldwin King of Jeruſalem about two hundred Years before, and firſt appointed for the Defence of that City, and the ſafe Conduct of thoſe that travelled thither. Afterwards they were diſpers'd through all the Kingdoms of Chriſtendom, and by the pious Munificence of Princes and others, enrich'd with infinite Poſſeſſions, which caus'd them to degenerate from their firſt Inſtitution, and to become exorbitantly vicious and ſcandalous. So that all the Kings of Chriſtendom at the ſame Time joyning together, caus'd them to be apprehended within their Dominions, and to be depriv'd both of their Order and Eſtates. Being firſt condemn'd in a general Council held at Vienna, their Eſtates were afterwards given to another Order of Knights call'd Hoſpitalers. The Deſtruction of the Knights Templars.

SECT. III.

The Reign of King EDWARD the Third.

Containing 50 Years, 4 Months, and 27 Days.

A. D. 1327. Reg. 1.

I. THE Wounds and Weakneſſes which the Publick ſuſtain'd in the Reign of King Edward the Second, were in a few Years cur'd by that of his mighty Son; and the Engliſh Nation not only recover'd Vigour and Strength, but alſo Beauty and Glory: But the Worth and Grandeur of this Prince did not immediately appear, he being not full fifteen Years of Age at his Father's Reſignation, and therefore continu'd under the Tuition and Government of others. Shortly after the Depoſition and Reſignation of the old King, great Preparations were made for this young Prince's Coronation, and he was firſt proclaim'd King by Order and Conſent of Parliament on the twenty fifth Day of January. And immediately after Writs were iſſu'd out to all the Sheriffs of the Kingdom to proclaim the new King's Peace, in which he declar'd to the People That his Father the late King had, by the Advice and Conſent of the Nobility and Community of the Realm, made a free and voluntary Reſignation of his Regal Dignity to him, as being his Eldeſt Son, and Heir to the Kingdom. Upon Sunday the firſt of February, this youthful Hero was firſt girded with the Sword of Knighthood by the Hands of his Coſen Henry Earl of Lancaſter, and then crown'd at Weſtminſter by Walter Reginald Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury with great Solemnity: And as an Earneſt of the numerous Benefits of his ſucceeding Reign, a general Pardon was proclaim'd; which gave Occaſion to ſucceeding Kings to grant the like at their Acceſſion to the Crown, in Imitation of ſo renown'd an Example. But by reaſon of his unripe Years, twelve of the chief Nobility were appointed as Guardians to Him and the Kingdom, 'till he ſhould be of Age, the Arch-Biſhops of Canterbury and York, the Biſhops of Wincheſter, Hereford and Worceſter, the two Earls of Norfolk and Kent, both Uncles to the King, and five Barons, Warren, Wake, Percy, Ingham and Roſs. But the Queen and the Lord Mortimer notwithſtanding uſurp'd this Charge, and in a great meaſure took all to themſelves; and the Queen's Dowry was ſo unreaſonably enlarg'd, that the King her Son had ſcarce a Third Part of the Crown Revenues to himſelf; of which Mortimer made great Advantage, to advance his Creatures, and eſtabliſh his own Authority and Grandeur.

His Guardians.

Before the Affairs of England were fully eſtabliſh'd, Robert King of Scotland, tho' decay'd and infirm, remembring how much he had ſuffer'd from this young King's Grand-father, notwithſtanding the Peace agreed on three Years before, reſolv'd to take Advantage of the unſetled Times, and invade the Kingdom of England; and accordingly about Eaſter, he ſent the Earl of Murrey and Sir James Douglas with an Army into England to waſte and ravage the Country, according to their former Methods of Invaſion. On the other Side young Edward, inflam'd with a Deſire of revenging the diſhonourable Defeats in his Father's Reign, and being inform'd of the Scotch Deſigns, by the Advice of his Council publiſh'd his Proclamations, commanding all Noblemen and others to be well appointed according to their Ranks and Degrees, and to attend him at the City of York on Aſcenſion-Day. He alſo ſent to the Lord John Beaumont, Brother to the Earl of Hainault, whom the Queen had brought over from the Low-Countries, requeſting his Company and Aſſiſtance in this Expedition, and that he would be at York at the appointed Time, with what Men of Arms he could procure. To which the Lord Beaumont readily comply'd; and gathering together out of Hainault, Flanders, Brabant, Artois and other other Places many brave Noblemen and Knights to accompany him, conſiſting of five hundred Men at Arms, all gallantly appointed and mounted, he arriv'd at the City of York three Days before Whitſontide, where he found the young King, the Queen his Mother, and all his Lords, and a powerful Army, attending his Coming. Shortly after their Arrival, there happen'd a great and unhappy Conteſt between ſome of the Archers of the Engliſh Army, and the Servants of the Foreigners, begun and promoted, as it was believ'd, by ſome Male-contents Friends to the Spenſers and the late Earl of Arundel, which not only caus'd the ſhedding of ſome Blood in the Army, but alſo became a great Impediment in the deſign'd Expedition. The Occaſion of the Quarrel was found to be in the Engliſh, which tho' by the King's Care it was with ſome Difficulty appeas'd, yet it was an ominous Preſage of the ill Succeſs of that Enterprize; and becauſe in the Minds of ſome of the Parties offended there ſtill remain'd ſome ſecret Reſentments, it happen'd that all the promiſing Endeavours of the King of England came at that Time to little or no Effect.

Froiſart. Boetius. &c. After ſix Weeks Continuance in and about York, King Edward, hearing that the Scots were enter'd England, left that Place, and with his Barons and Forces, and the Lord Beaumont and his Men, march'd to the City of Durham. Before which Time, notwithſtanding the Care of the Earl-Marſhal at Newcaſtle, and the Lord Mowbray at Carliſle, the Scots had paſs'd the River Tyne with an Army conſiſting of four thouſand Men at Arms, Knights and Eſquires well mounted, and a thouſand others arm'd after their Country Faſhion, upon ſmall inconſiderable Horſes, beſides their Forces on Foot. King Edward being inform'd of this, and the Devaſtations they made, immediately gave Command for every Man to diſlodge, and follow the Lord Marſhal's Banner; and thus prepar'd, he with his mighty Army advanc'd towards the Enemy, with no better Guide to direct him, than the Smoak of their Burnings. At length he found them incamp'd in Stanhope Park, in the Biſhoprick of Durham, where he ſtrongly beleagur'd them on every Side, and ſo confin'd them for the Space of fifteen Days, that their Proviſions fail'd them; and being much weaken'd with Hunger, they were conſtrain'd to invent a Way for their Eſcape. And therefore they prepar'd great Numbers of Fleaks, Hurdels and Faggots, by the help of which, in the following Night, they and their Horſes paſs'd ſafely out of the Park, over a deep and mooriſh Ground, which by the Negligence or Treachery of ſome great Men in King Edward's Army was left undefended, and with all Speed and Secrecy fled from the Sight of the Engliſh to the next Mountains. King Edward, inrag'd at their Eſcape, with his whole Army purſu'd them from Place to Place for many Days together; but could not diſcover them, 'till after a Proclamation of a hundred Pounds per Annum, and the Honour of Knighthood, to be given to any who would bring certain Intelligence where they were incamp'd, he was inform'd by One who had labour'd for that Purpoſe, that they were lodg'd in a certain Mountain, ſix Miles from his Camp, and attended his Coming with a Deſign to give him Battel. Upon this pleaſing Account, the King and his Army, having perform'd all Acts of Devotion, and refreſh'd themſelves and Horſes, follow'd this new made Knight as their Guide through difficult Paſſages, and about Noon arriv'd within Sight of their Enemies.

He marches againſt them.

They make their Eſcape.

Froiſart. Walſing. As the Engliſh had the greater Army, ſo the Scotch had the Advantage of the Ground, having drawn up their Men in the Deſcent of the Mountain, where a great River ran between the Engliſh and them, ſo full of large Rocks and Stones, that the Engliſh could not paſs over to them without the greateſt Hazards; nor was there Room between the Scotch and River for the Engliſh to draw up in Battalia. King Edward therefore, after a Council of War, by his Heralds made theſe Propoſals to the Scots, That if they would paſs the River and fight with him in the plain Field, he would freely retire 'till he had left them ſufficient Space to range their whole Army, that Day, or when they pleas'd; pleas'd; or elſe upon the like Offer, he would come over to them. But the Scotch would accept of neither, ſending this Anſwer to the King of England, That ſince the Engliſh were three Times more numerous than they, it would be the higheſt Indiſcretion for them to abandon that Ground they had choſen for their Defence: And ſince the Engliſh were not ignorant in whoſe Dominions they were, and what Waſte they had made, they might correct them if they could, for they would ſtay there as long as they thought fit. Upon this Anſwer, King Edward order'd his Men to continue there the Night following, and they were forc'd to lye upon the Ground and hard Stones in their Armour, without any Conveniency for their Horſes or themſelves; and thus the two Armies continu'd in Sight of each other for three Days, being neither of them deſirous to fight, by reaſon of the Danger in paſſing the River. On the fourth Day, the Engliſh perceiving that the Scots had left the Mountain by Night, and being inform'd that they were lodg'd on another by the ſame River Side, more advantagious than the former by reaſon of a neighbouring Wood, they immediately decamp'd and lodg'd themſelves upon another Hill over-againſt the Scots, where the two Armies being drawn up, made fair ſhews of a Battel; but neither durſt run the Hazard of paſſing the River. Thus they continu'd for the Space of eighteen Days, during which Time, ſome of both Parties often broke out, and skirmiſh'd with each other, to the Death and Captivity of many; and the King of England by his Heralds renew'd his former Propoſal of accommodating them with convenient Ground to fight on, or to accept of the like from them; but the Scots continuing in their firſt Reſolution, would conſent to nothing of that Nature.

King Edward offers them Battel.

They refuſe.

A brave Attempt.

Among other Occurrences that happen'd during this Time, the brave and couragious Attempt of the Lord James Douglas ought not to be forgotten, who in the Night Time with two hundred extraordinary Horſemen paſs'd the River ſome Diſtance from the Engliſh Army, and notwithſtanding the Watch, ſuddenly broke into the Camp, and ſlew divers of the Army without Reſiſtance; then riding up to the King's Tent, cut ſome of the Cords of it, and ſlew the King's Chaplain who valiantly defended his Maſter, from whence he retir'd with the Loſs of a few Men to his own Army. From this Time the Engliſh were more careful in their Watch, and the moſt Part lay every Night in their Arms, to prevent the like Attempts; and tho' the Scots were a hardy People enduring Hunger, Cold and Labour, and ſatisfy'd with a mean and ſpare Diet, yet at this Time wanting all Proviſions, and loſing all Hopes of further Succeſs this Campaign, they reſolv'd to break up with all convenient Speed, and return to their proper Habitations; and therefore, after they had waſted all that might be uſeful to the Engliſh, they privately retir'd at Midnight, and got ſafe into their own Country. In the mean Time the King of England and his Lords, highly diſſatisfy'd at this Diſappointment, took Counſel what was beſt to be done; and duely conſidering that the Soldiers were fatigu'd with frequent Removals, Hunger, Wet, Cold, ill Lodgings and hard Paſſages, and that their Horſes were weaken'd for Want of Conveniencies and good Proviſion, they concluded that it would be to no Advantage to purſue the Scots any further. And having ſpent above a Month in an uſeleſs Purſuit, the King repair'd with his Army to Durham, and within three Days after to York, where he found the Queen his Mother, and divers other noble Ladies, who receiv'd him and his Company with great Joy. Here the King gave leave to all Soldiers to return to their Habitations, and diſmiſs'd the Lord Beaumont and all his Retinue and Attendance with munificent Rewards for all former Services. And thus the mighty Preparation which King Edward and his Friends had made for the Ruin of the ſmall Scotch Army, came to little Effect; and this young King born for Victories and Triumphs, was depriv'd of the Honour of his firſt Action; the ill Succeſs of which was afterwards charg'd upon the Lord Mortimer, who is ſaid to have kept private Intelligence with the Enemy, and to have ſuffer'd them to eſcape without Damage.

The King not ſucceſsful.

During

La More, &c. During theſe Tranſactions in the North, the old depos'd King remain'd cloſe Priſoner at Kenelworth Caſtle in Warwickſhire, with an Allowance of a hundred Marks a Month for his Expences; but depriv'd of all other Human Comforts, eſpecially the Company of his Queen, whom he ſtill lov'd intirely, tho' ſhe was the great Cauſe of his Ruin. All his ſoft and tender Invitations by Letters were fruſtrated by the Vigilance of Mortimer, who conſented to her ſending civil Anſwers and Suits of Apparel, but perſuaded her, That his Deſign was only to murder her, if he could get her into his Power. This great Neglect caus'd him with many Sighs to ſay to his Keepers, Wherein have I offended my Wife, and my Son, whom they have made King; that neither of them will let me ſee their Faces? But in a ſhort Time the Nation began ſenſibly to reflect upon his ſad Fate, calmly to conſider the Pretences of his Enemies, and to contrive how they might be kind to him, and prevent further Miſchiefs. His chief Keeper alſo, the Earl of Lancaſter, began to be every Way obliging to him, highly commiſerating his deplorable State, and many Lords and Others thought upon Means to deliver him out of his Captivity. The Notice or rather Suſpicion of this extreamly ſtartled Mortimer and the Queen, and all the chief Actors in this Tragedy, who reviewing all their former Actions, and dreading the old King's Liberty as their own inevitable Ruin, immediately reſolv'd to remove him from Kenelworth Caſtle, and appointed him two new Keepers, Thomas Gournay and John Maltravers Knights, Perſons of a rough and incompaſſionate Temper. Theſe two impious Agents had Commiſſion to enter any Fortreſs and Caſtle in the Kingdom; and by them he was remov'd from Kenelworth, and hurry'd about in the Night from one Place to another, as firſt to the Caſtle of Corfe in Dorſetſhire, then to Briſtol Caſtle, and at length to Barkley Caſtle in Gloceſterſhire; and all this to diſappoint his Friends, and to prevent their Aſſiſtance. In his Paſſage to Barkley Caſtle they us'd the moſt horrid Indignities to him; and the more to diſguiſe him from any Man's Knowledge they ſhav'd his Head and Beard; which was done in the open Fields, by the Commandment of Gournay, who caus'd the miſerable King to ſit on a Mole-Hill while the Barber ſhav'd him, who uſing cold Water out of a Ditch told him, That that ſhould ſerve him for this Time; to which he mournfully reply'd, That they ſhould not hinder him of warm Water to his ſhaving, and therewithal let fall a ſhower of Tears that overflow'd his Face and Beard.

Ibid. At Barkley Caſtle they proceeded to greater Inhumanities and more barbarous Uſages, endeavouring to deſtroy him by unheard of Contrivances: But being fruſtrated in their Deſigns by his Strength of Body and Fortitude of Mind, they deſir'd freſh Inſtructions from ſome at Court, who directly intimated the Neceſſity of removing him; only the ſubtle Biſhop of Hereford is ſaid to have ſent them this dark ambiguous Line, Edwardum occidere nolite timere bonum eſt, at once incouraging the Murder, and reſerving an Excuſe for himſelf. However to remove all Difficulties, upon the twenty ſecond Day of September, finding him in his Bed, they preſs'd heavy Bolſters and Pillows upon his Head, and through a ductile Pipe thruſt up a red hot Iron into his Bowels and Body; and in this cruel manner murder'd him, that no Wound or Mark of a violent Death might be found upon him. For the Body being afterwards view'd by many conſiderable Citizens of Briſtol and Gloceſter, ſummon'd thither for that purpoſe, they could find no Sign either of Wound or Poiſon; ſo that their Evidence confirm'd the Report ſpread abroad, that he dy'd of the Extremity of Grief. Thus fell the unfortunate King Edward the Second, who for his meek and pious Behaviour under his Afflictions, was afterwards reputed a Saint. This happen'd about eight Months after he was depos'd; and his Body was carry'd to Gloceſter, where without any Funeral Pomp it was bury'd in St. Peter's Minſter by the Benedictine Friars. Afterwards his Son erected to his Memory a fair Monument with his Portraiture of Alabaſter, in the ſecond Arch and the North and barbarouſly murder'd.

North Side of the Altar, between two Pillars of the Tuscan Order, about which are painted the Figures of several Stags, with which, as common Fame tells us, his Corps was drawn thither from Barkley Castle. After this execrable Paricide the immediate Agents Gournay and Maltravers, instead of receiving Rewards, met with such terrible Threats from the Queen and Bishop of Hereford, that they were forc'd to fly beyond Sea to secure their detested Lives. Gournay, after three Years Exile, was taken and sent for England, but in his Passage had his Head struck off; and Maltravers fled into Germany, where in Repentance he had Time to waste a miserable Life. But Heaven's Vengeance did not stop at the Lives of the chief Contrivers, but afterwards reach'd to the whole Kingdom; and what happen'd to the Progeny of the present Prince, whose Throne (tho' perhaps without his Guilt) was erected upon his Father's Blood, the many imbru'd Scaffolds, the various bloody Fields, the infinite Slaughters occasion'd by their divided Families, with the extirpated Race of most of this present Nobility, will abundantly testifie.

The Punishments of his Murderers.

A. D. 1328. Reg. 2.

II. Young Edward having now a Title to the Crown of England beyond all Dispute, by the Advice of his Mother and others solemniz'd the Marriage between himself and the beautiful Lady Philippa, the Earl of Hainault's youngest Daughter, to whom he had formerly been contracted. The Ceremony was perform'd at York on the twenty fourth Day of January; and on the first Sunday in Lent the young Queen was crown'd at Westminster with great Pomp and Glory, and the Coronation was succeeded by all Kinds of magnificent Rejoycings for three Weeks after. In Whitsond Week a Parliament was held at Northampton, in which King Edward first mov'd about his Title to the Crown of France; for Charles King of France, Brother to his Mother Isabel, being lately dead without Issue Male; notwithstanding that King Edward acknowledg'd the Salick Law which excluded Females Inheritance, yet he maintain'd this Point, That the Sons of the Daughters, having no such Imbecillity of Sex, were not uncapable, and that the Peers of France ought to prefer him, who was a Male and Grand-Child to King Philip, before Philip of Valois; whom they had lately advanc'd, tho' he was but a Nephew.

King Edward marry'd.

King Edward's first Claim to France.

In this Parliament a dishonourable Peace was concluded between the Kingdom of England and Scotland, chiefly manag'd by the old Queen and Mortimer; by whose Contrivance, the better to confirm it, a Marriage was agreed on between David Prince of Scotland, Son to King Robert, and Joan Sister to King Edward; which Match, by Reason of the tender Years of the Prince who did not exceed seven Years of Age, promising but little Advantage, was oppos'd by most of the Nobility of England. Besides, by the secret Management of the Queen-Mother, Mortimer and Sir James Douglas, the King by his Charter surrender'd his Title to the Soveraignty of the Kingdom of Scotland, and therein releas'd to King Robert and his Heirs, all Homages and Fealties that the Kings of Scotland by their several Charters ought to have done to the Crown of England. And also he deliver'd up divers Deeds, Instruments and Records of their former Homages and Fealties done to the King of England his Predecessors, together with that famous Evidence call'd Ragman Rowle, which was seal'd and sign'd by the King of Scotland and his Nobility to King Edward the First; which contain'd all the several Services that the King of the Scots, and all the Prelates, Earls and Barons of that Kingdom ought to have done to the King of England for the Time being; as also all the Rights that several Barons and Knights of England ought to have had in the Realm of Scotland. At the same Parliament were also re-deliver'd many ancient Jewels and Monuments, among the rest the Black Cross of Scotland, which King Edward the First brought from the Abby of Scone; and many other Things were transacted to the Damage and Dishonour of the Crown of England, against the Consent of the English Nobility, by the Procurement of Queen Queen Iſabel and her Party, who at that Time ſo manag'd the Affairs of the Kingdom, that both Lords and Commons were highly diſſatisfy'd. In Conſideration of the foreſaid Peace, the intended Marriage, and the diſhonourable Surrenders and Releaſes, together with the Damages done by the Scots, it was alſo concluded that King Robert ſhould pay thirty thouſand Marks to the King of England, within the Space of three Years. And according to Agreement, upon the twenty ſecond Day of July the Marriage was ſolemniz'd between David Prince of Scotland and the Lady Joan the King's Siſter, at the Town of Berwick, to the great Diſſatisfaction of the Chief of the Engliſh Nation. In another Parliament held in October, the Lord Mortimer procur'd himſelf to be made Earl of Marche; at which Time two other Earls were created, the King's Brother John of Eltham was made Earl of Cornwall, and Sir James Butler of Ireland Earl of Ormond. From which Parliament the Earl of Lancaſter, and ſome other Peers, ſeeing the King at the Diſpoſal of others, abſented themſelves, and by Arms began to redreſs publick Grievances; but by the wiſe Mediation of the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, Matters were adjuſted and they reconcil'd to the King.

Bertini, &c. Within a Year after the Marriage between Prince David of Scotland and King Edward's Siſter, Robert King of that Country, being worn out with his great Infirmity, and ſenſible of approaching Death, caus'd his chief Nobility to be aſſembled in his Chamber, and in the Preſence of all committed to them the Government of his Son David, then not fully eight Years of Age: And among many Things touching the Government of the Kingdom of Scotland, he gave them theſe politick Inſtructions concerning their Affairs with the Engliſh. Firſt That they would never appoint any ſet Battel with the Engliſh, nor hazard the Realm upon the Chance of one Field, but rather to keep them from invading of their Country by frequent Skirmiſhes, Incurſions, and Intercepting their Forces; that if the Scots were defeated, they might ſtill have a Reſerve for a new Reſiſtance. Next, That they would not make any laſting Peace with England, leſt long Reſt and Inactivity ſhould ſo enervate their Minds and Bodies, as they would not be able to endure great Pains and Labour; and ſince the Engliſh would not continue any longer in Peace, than their Want of a convenient Opportunity to attempt a new War, it was ſafeſt for them, never to conclude a perpetual Peace with them, nor make any Truce longer than three or four Years. Laſtly, That they would be always mindful, that when there appear'd the leaſt Shew of any intended War from England, then to be moſt wary and circumſpect, leſt their Enemies ſhould invade their Country, and find them unprepar'd for able and timely Reſiſtance. He ſurviv'd not long after theſe and ſome other Inſtructions, but dy'd of a Leproſie, in the twenty fourth Year of his Reign, leaving his young Son David to ſucceed him in the Kingdom of Scotland. He was an expert Soldier, valiant and wiſe, and conſidering the innumerable Difficulties he had in gaining and keeping his Kingdom againſt King Edward the Firſt, and the Power of England, he may well be rank'd in the Number of the braveſt Princes of that Time.

Walſing. In the mean Time Earl Mortimer daily encreas'd in Power and Grandeur, and joining in Intereſt and Affection with the Queen-Mother, diſpos'd of all Offices and Places, and the Treaſure of the Nation; ſo that many great Men envy'd and oppos'd him, but none ſo dangerouſly as the King's Uncle Edmund Earl of Kent, who endeavour'd to reſcue the young King from the exorbitant Power of his Governors.* To remove this great Oppoſer, Mortimer by his infernal Artifices and plauſible Accuſations caus'd him to be condemn'd in a Parliament held at Wincheſter, for conſpiring to deliver his Brother Edward late King of England; being by an extraordinary Contrivance drawn into an abſurd Belief that he was ſtill alive, and kept ſecretly in Corfe Caſtle. Thus for endeavouring to ſet a dead Man at Liberty the noble Earl of Kent had his Head ſtrucken off at Wincheſter; and he became ſo diſmal an Object of Pity from Noon

Noon 'till Night, at the Place of Execution before the Caſtle Gates, none being found to behead him, 'till a vile Wretch of the Marſhalſea was ſent and did it: So little Conſcience did the Malice and Ambition of his potent Adverſaries make of ſhedding the Royal Blood; yet the Hand of Heav'n ſeem'd to have been upon him for formerly countenancing what was done againſt his Royal Brother; ſo that he loſt his Life in the twenty eighth Year of his Age.

King Edward, ſtill under Guardians, in the ſame Year was ſummon'd by the new King of France to do Homage to him for Gaſcony and other Territories in that Kingdom; which Meſſage was very ungrateful to him: But conſidering the Emergencies of Affairs, he went over into France and met the French King at Amiens; where, to let the French ſee what manner of Prince he was, he came ſo royally appointed and attended, as if he deſign'd to have ſtrucken him with Fear, or Admiration, having many Earls, Barons and Knights, and a thouſand Horſe in his Retinue. At the appointed Day, being glorioufly attired in Robes of Crimſon Velvet, powder'd with Golden Leopards, his Crown on his Head, his mighty Sword by his Side, and his Golden Spurs on his Heels, he did his Homage with a Poſture and Magnificence different from any of his Predeceſſors. This, and the haughty Reception he met withal, occaſion'd a great Envy between the two Kings; and prov'd afterwards an Incentive towards a bloody War.

A. D. 1330. Reg. 4.

At length the Vengeance of Heav'n began to overtake the haughty and ſubtle Mortimer, whoſe immoderate Power became a Grievance to the State, and whoſe Familiarity with the Queen-Mother gave Occaſion for ſome to report ſhe was with Child by him. The publick Complaints and the ſecret Whiſpers of ſeveral of the Nobility rous'd up a ſleeping Lion in the young King's Breaſt, ſo that he grew enrag'd at the Proceedings of this ſhining Favourite; for ſuch were Mortimer's Extravagancies, that he eclips'd the Royal Youth in outward Pomp and Magnificence, his Perſon being ſurrounded with a more numerous Attendance, and his Authority ſo great that he rais'd Men with his Smiles, and ruin'd them with his Frowns. The vigorous Edward awaken'd by theſe Proceedings, at a Parliament held at Nottingham, reſolv'd to deſtroy this powerful Man whoſe Intereſt threaten'd both him and the Publick. Accordingly, with the brave Montague and a few valiant Followers, he enter'd into Nottingham Caſtle by Night, through a ſecret Mine in a Rock, ſince call'd Mortimer's Hole, and with ſome little Bloodſhed ſeiz'd upon Mortimer with the Queen, tho' he had no leſs than a hundred and eighty Knights in his Retinue, beſides Eſquires and Gentlemen. With him were taken the Lord Geoffry Mortimer his Son, and Sir Simon de Bedford a great Agent of his; and all three were ſent Priſoners to the Tower of London under a ſtrong Guard. This being done, the King by common Conſent of Parliament took into his Hands his Mother's exceſſive Dowry, and reſtrain'd her extravagant Living to a narrow Penſion of three thouſand Pounds per Annum, confining her within as narrow Limits for her Abode, but yearly giving her the Honour and Comfort of one or two Viſits; tho' otherwiſe ſcarce thinking her worthy of Life, in regard of her Familiarity with Mortimer, and her many heinous Practices.

As to Mortimer, fourteen Articles were exhibited againſt him in a Parliament held not long after at Weſtminſter, in which he was accus'd of ſeveral grievous Crimes and Offences, particularly That he had procured many exorbitant Grants from the Crown out of England, Wales and Ireland; That he had caus'd the Murder of the late King, and his Brother the Earl of Kent; and That he had kept a ſecret Correſpondence with Scotland, and had occaſion'd a diſhonourable Treaty with that Nation. Theſe and other Accuſations being exhibited before the Earls and Barons in Parliament, they declar'd their Opinion that his Crimes were notorious and known to themſelves and the People, therefore they adjudg'd That the ſaid Earl Mortimer, as a Traitor and Enemy to the Kingdom, ſhould be drawn and hang'd at the common Gallows at Tyburn. This was executed after the moſt opprobrious Manner, and his Body was kept hanging two Days, for a Spectacle of Horror and Diſhonour: And this Sentence he receiv'd without being call'd to any Kind of Anſwer; which was a juſt Judgment upon an impious Miniſter who had treated others after the ſame Manner, particularly the two Spenſers and the Earl of Kent. There dy'd with him Sir Simon de Bedford, and John Deverel Eſquire, as well for Expiation of the late King Edward's Blood, as in Compliment, as it were, of ſo great a Man's Fall, who in ſuch Caſes ought not to die ſingly. Thus did this noble young Prince, now increaſing in Vigour and Wiſdom, begin to wipe out the Stains which during his Minority had blemiſh'd the State of his Kingdom. And to add to his Felicity; this Year Queen Philippa brought forth an admirable Son, nam'd Edward, and afterwards from his mighty Acts call'd The Black Prince; a Prince who ſeem'd to have been ſent from Heav'n for the Glory and Renown of the Engliſh Nation, and to be at once the Delight and Terror of Mankind.

III. The young King Edward having taken the Government into his own Hands, ſoon began to diſplay his Vigour and Power; and the firſt Country that felt the Force of his Arms was Scotland. For growing ſenſible that the Peace laſt concluded with that Nation, was diſhonourable to him and his Kingdom, and conſidering that his Brother-in-Law King David was poſſeſs'd of the Town of Berwick, which belong'd to the Crown of England, and deſiring to receive the uſual Homage for all Scotland, he reſolv'd to right himſelf upon the firſt Occaſion, which was ſoon offer'd upon a great Conteſt about the Crown of that Kingdom, which was this. Edward Baliol, Son to John Baliol formerly King of Scotland, thirty two Years after his Father's Depoſition, taking Advantage of the Youth of King David, and of the Factions among the Scottiſh Nobility, by the Solicitation of the Lord Beaumont then in France with him, ſet his Thoughts upon the Recovery of the Kingdom of Scotland; and came together with the Lord Beaumont over into England, and for a ſhort Time continu'd privately with the Lady Veſcy at Sandhall upon Ouſe in Yorkſhire, 'till by the Intereſt of the Lord Beaumont, the Lord Talbot, and others, he was permitted ſecretly to get what Aſſiſtance he could procure in England to furniſh him for his intended Enterprize. His Deſigns being known in England, many Noblemen and Soldiers repair'd to him, and prepar'd to attend him into Scotland; as the Lord Beaumont, with an Intent to claim the Earldom of Bucquhan in the Right of his Lady, Sir Gilbert Umfreville claiming the Earldom of Angus, the Lord Percy claiming the Earldom of Galloway, and David Strathbolgy the Earldom of Athol; together with the Lord Stafford, the Lord Talbot, Sir Geofry Mowbray, Walter Comin, and divers others; who at the Concluſion of the laſt Peace being baniſh'd out of Scotland, all reſolv'd to fight for the Recovery of their Lands and Honours then detain'd from them. Beſides Edward Baliol had ſeveral Friends in Scotland, from whom he receiv'd fair Invitations and ample Incouragement.

A new Deſign upon Scotland.

Ibid. All Things being in Readineſs, and Shipping provided, Baliol with his Friends, and two thouſand five hundred well appointed Men, ſet Sail and landed at Kingcorn, not far from Perth; and to prevent all Hopes of Flight, the Veſſels were ſent back. Upon the Rumour of his Arrival, the Scots, to the Number of ten thouſand, had gather'd towards the Shore to hinder his Landing, being conducted by the Earl of Fife; but finding all his Men actually on Shore, they ſet furiouſly upon them to deſtroy them. Baliol and his brave Adventurers being reduc'd to a Neceſſity of fighting valiantly or dying cowardly, encounter'd their Oppoſers with ſuch Vigour and Magnanimity, that they gave them a ſignal Defeat, and forc'd them to fly diſhonourably, crying out That the Enemy was come! The Earl of Fife, wounded both in Body and Mind, deſiring to be reveng'd and to redeem his loſt Honour, with the Aſſiſtance of the Earl of Caricke, Natural Son to King Robert deceas'd, and the Lord Seton, recruited his Forces, and with the ſame Number gave his Enemies a ſecond Battel, but with no better Succeſs than before; for the greateſt Part of his Army was cut in pieces, except the Captains and Commanders, who ſav'd themſelves by Flight, or were taken Priſoners. Upon this ſecond Victory Baliol march'd further into the Country, which he reduc'd as far as the Abby of Dumferling, where he found good Store of Proviſion and Ammunition; while the Scots, not far off at a Place call'd Glaſmore, had another Army prepar'd, conſiſting of forty thouſand Men. Of which Baliol being inform'd, he thought it neceſſary to put his ſmall Army in mind of his former great Succeſs, and to uſe many forcible Reaſons to encourage them againſt the Inequality of the Numbers. His Exhortations being ſeconded by the Lord Veſcy, the Lord Stafford, and Sir Fulk Warren, all Men of extraordinary Valour, the Soldiers were inſpired with ſo much Warmth and Vigour, that they a third Time bravely encounter'd their Enemies, and gave them a great and bloody Overthrow. Within five Days after, the Engliſh meeting with Sir Nigel Brus at Dupline, at the Head of ten thouſand Men, they valiantly attack'd him, defeated him, and ſlew moſt of his Men; having made an Order among themſelves to take no Priſoners, becauſe they wanted Men to take Care of them. Theſe four Battels were all fought in a few Days Time, in which, as ſome Writers report, ſixty thouſand Scots were ſlain; which happen'd as well by their confus'd Diſorder and Want of Diſcipline, as the Valour of the Engliſh. The chief Men of the Scots ſlain were the Earl of Marre, one of the Governors of Scotland, the Earl of Carick, the Earl of Murrey, the Earl of Menteith, Robert Keith Marſhal of Scotland, Sir Alexander Seton, Sir Alexander Fraſer, Sir David Lindſey, Sir George Dunbarre, and many other brave Commanders; while the Earl of Fife with ſome few others were taken Priſoners. Of the Engliſh Side we read not of any great Man ſlain, beſides two Knights, Sir John Gordon, and Sir Reginald Beche, and thirty three Eſquires; ſo extraordinary valiant and fortunate were theſe Engliſh Adventurers.

The great Succeſs of the new Adventurers.

The Lord Baliol's Friends and Soldiers being highly incourag'd with theſe happy Victories, immediately advanc'd towards St. John's Town or Perth, which they beſieg'd and ſoon took by Force without any great Reſiſtance; where they found Proviſion and Ammunition ſufficient both for their Relief and Defence. From hence Baliol ſent all his wounded Men to Sea to be convey'd to England and cured there; who in their Voyage met with one Crabbe, a Flemmiſh Pirate and a Friend to the Scots, who hating the Engliſh, furiouſly ſet upon them with a Deſign to deſtroy every Man. But the Engliſh, tho' they were wounded, ſo well defended themſelves, and fought ſo valiantly, that they ſoon defeated Crabbe and his Company, and forc'd him to fly to Scotland. As he came towards Perth, he found the Earl of Marche, the other Governor of Scotland, and Archibald Douglas, with thirty thouſand Scots beſieging the Town; to whom he related his bad Succeſs, how the wounded Engliſh Men had by their Valour defeated him at Sea, urging further, That there was but little Expectation of prevailing againſt the Lord Baliol, who with his Handful of Men had overthrown ſo many of the Scotch Nobility; therefore he adviſ'd them to break up the Siege, and in Time to provide for their own Security. The Scots, mov'd with his Perſuaſions, and ſome other Conſiderations, tho' they had fill'd up the Town Ditches, and had a fair Proſpect of Taking the Place, by the Direction of the Earl of Marche, ſuddenly rais'd the Siege in the Night, and retir'd with great Diſhonour.

Knighton &c.

Further Succeſſes.

The Reputation of theſe frequent and incredible Victories was ſo great, that it brought great Numbers of Lords, Ladies and others to the Lord Baliol, who offer'd him their Service and Aſſiſtance, as his Loyal Subjects, towards his Recovery of the Crown of Scotland; and there did their Homages and Fealties to him as their Soveraign Lord, for all the Lands and Honours they held. As an an Addition to Baliol's Succeſſes, at the ſame Time, ſeveral of the Ports and Cities of England at their own Charges ſent a Fleet of Ships towards Scotland, to aſſiſt the Engliſh Lords if there were Occaſion, and to attack the Scotch Navy where-ever they could meet with them; which fell out according to their Expectation and Deſire. For they met with them in the Water of Tay, where they fought with them and intirely defeated them, took ſome of their Ships, and burnt and ſunk the reſt. All Things thus happily ſucceeding on Baliol's Side, and daily encreaſing in Power, he receiv'd the Oaths of the Earl of Fife, and the Biſhop of Dunkeld; and with them and many others he went to Scone, where he was ſolemnly crown'd King on the twenty fourth Day of September, and receiv'd the Homages and Fealties of many of the Nobility and Gentry there aſſembled. Before which, young King David, to avoid all Dangers, by the Advice of his Council, fled out of his Kingdom into France, with Queen Joan his Wife, Siſter to the King of England; where they were moſt civilly entertain'd by Philip King of France, and there continu'd for the Space of nine Years.

Walſing. Knighton. Bottins. &c.

In the mean Time, the noble King Edward, now at full Age, hearing of the late Coronation of Lord Baliol, and the preſent Diviſion of the Nobility of Scotland, was highly pleas'd at theſe Tranſactions, ſuppoſing now that he had a fair Opportunity of ſubduing that Kingdom; therefore he reſolv'd to ſhew himſelf openly for Baliol againſt David his Brother-in-Law. But firſt, to avoid the Imputation of Breach of Articles, he publickly proclaim'd, That he was not oblig'd to obſerve any League with Scotland that was made in his Minority, againſt his own and the Nation's Conſent. After which he prepar'd to go in Perſon with a powerful Army towards Scotland, and march'd with the utmoſt Expedition, deſigning for his firſt Action the Recovery of the important Town of Berwick, which he ſtrongly beſieg'd by Sea and Land. After a Month's Siege, there happen'd a great Fire in the Town, which caus'd the Beſieg'd to deſire a Truce, upon Promiſe of ſurrendering it and the Caſtle, if not reliev'd within fifteen Days, and to give twelve Hoſtages for Performance. But before the Time was expir'd, all the Nobility of Scotland of King David's Party, march'd with a powerful Army under the Conduct of the Lord Archibald Douglas their General, as far as the River Tweed; but finding it difficult to relieve the Town, they reſolv'd to act by Way of Diverſion, and hearing that the young Queen was then at Bamburgh Caſtle, they advanc'd towards it with great Speed in hopes to ſurprize the Place, but ſtill without Succeſs. Then after ſix Days ravaging of the Country, by the Importunities of the Garriſon of Berwick, who perſuaded them to ingage the Engliſh Forces, at that Time far leſs numerous than themſelves, they return'd towards the Town, and drew up their Army in four great Battalions, under as many Noblemen. On Monday the nineteenth of July, King Edward march'd out with great Bravery to meet them at the Head of his own Army, and at Hallidown-Hill, not far from Berwick, he valiantly encounter'd the whole Scotch Army, and gave them a total Defeat. In this Battel were ſlain ſeven Scotch Earls, nine hundred Knights and Bannerets, and four hundred Eſquires, and of common Soldiers to the Number of two and thirty thouſand and upwards; tho' the Scotch Writers will not acknowledge half the Number. Upon this great Victory, within two Days the Beſieg'd ſurrender'd both the Town and Caſtle to the King's Mercy, who kept it in his own Hands, by the Right of Conqueſt, as well as by that deriv'd from his Father and Grand-father. Then obliging Edward Baliol by Oath, and ordaining him and ſome Noblemen of England to be Governors of the Realm of Scotland in his Abſence, he triumphantly return'd with glorious Succeſs into England, where he was receiv'd with great Joy by all his Subjects. As to his hanging the Governor of Berwick's Sons contrary the Law of Arms, and ſome other Severities reported of him by Scotch Writers, we look upon them to be highly improbable, and directly contrary to the Character of this great and generous Prince.

King Edward marches againſt the Scots.

He gives them a great Defeat at Hallidown-Hill.

and takes Berwick.

After King Edward's Return, Baliol the new King of the Scots, at the Head of twenty ſix thouſand Men, moſt of them Engliſh, march'd forwards to proſecute his Succeſs into the very Heart of Scotland, taking Towns and Caſtles at his Pleaſure; and having paſs'd beyond the Frith of Edinburgh, and reduc'd all the ſtrong Places that held out for King David, except Dunbritton and a few other Caſtles, he ſummon'd a Parliament about Michaelmaſs to meet him at Perth or St. John's Town. Here all thoſe Engliſh Lords, who claim'd Eſtates in Scotland, repair'd and did their Homage for the reſpective Lands they held under him, reſerving the Allegiance they ow'd to their Soveraign Lord the King of England; the principal of whom were the Lord Beaumont, the Earl of Buchan, the Lord Talbot, the Earl of Athol, the Lord Piercy, and divers other Engliſh Noblemen, who were all reſtor'd to the Honours and Eſtates they claim'd in Scotland: And in this Parliament all Acts, Statutes, Ordinances and Grants made by Robert or David Brus, late Kings of Scotland, were declar'd null and void. And thus David was ſeemingly depriv'd of his Kingdom, and Edward Baliol in all Appearance plac'd in the Throne of Scotland. And to ſtrengthen his Alliance, firſt at Edinburgh, and afterwards at Newcaſtle, he in the Preſence of many great Lords and Commons of both Nations, did Homage to the King of England, as to his ſuperior Lord; and took his Oath of Fealty, binding himſelf and his Heirs to hold the Kingdom of Scotland of him and his Succeſſors for ever; and further he granted to him the Poſſeſſion of five Counties next adjoining to the Borders.

New Advantages gain'd.

A. D. 1334. Reg. 8.

But this Homage, and over-liberal Conceſſions made from one King to the other, were ſo far from advancing the Intereſt of either, that they ſerv'd to turn the Body of that jealous Nation againſt both; ſince the Scots ſaw that King Edward ſought his own Grandeur more than their Intereſt, and that Baliol was an Inſtrument to promote his Deſigns. Several of the Scotch Nobility alſo finding their late Services ſlighted, began to revolt from Baliol, and to promote the Intereſt of King David; and not long after, raiſing great Numbers of the Commons of Scotland, they reſolv'd to begin a War. Baliol being inform'd of this met and ingag'd with them at Annandale; but after an obſtinate Fight, many of his Men were ſlain, the reſt diſpers'd, and he himſelf oblig'd to fly out of the Nation to the City of Carliſle; from whence he ſent to the King of England, complaining of the Falſhood and Treachery of his People, in whom he truſted, and again begg'd his Aſſiſtance againſt his Enemies. In the mean Time King Edward call'd a Parliament at London, where he declar'd that he had form'd a Reſolution to take a Voyage with the French King and other Chriſtian Princes to the Holy-Land. But this Change in Scotland ſoon alter'd his Deſign; and having a Tenth granted him from the Clergy, a Fifteenth from the Temporalty, and a Twelfth from the Cities and Boroughs, he enter'd Scotland with a great Power, and no leſs Terror. Then joining with King Baliol, who before had made great Devaſtations, he without taking in Caſtles and ſtrong Places, ſwiftly purſu'd the flying Scots as far as beyond Cathneſs, which was farther than King Edward his Grand-father had ever reach'd. After which Actions, the two Kings of England and Scotland rejoin'd their Forces, and return'd towards Berwick. But ſhortly after, the Earl of Dunbar revolted in the Highlands, and renounc'd his Homage to both Parties; which oblig'd King Edward to remain the reſt of the Year in the Borders of Scotland, and keep his Chriſtmaſs at Roxburgh, ſtill retaining the Pope's Nuncio with him, who came to mediate a Peace between him and King David, then under the Protection of the French King.

A. D. 1335. Reg. 9.

In the following Year, after ſome Stay in England, King Edward with a well prepar'd Army enter'd Scotland both by Sea and Land; and marching as far as Perth, he ravag'd all the Country, as he had done the Year before; and meeting with ſmall Oppoſition, he conſtituted David Earl of Athol Governor of Scotland to ſubdue the reſt of the Places that held out. But tho' the Scots were were ſuppos'd to be retir'd into their Woods and Mountains for Safety, yet ſhortly after, under the Conduct of the Earls of Murrey and Dunbar, they ſurpriz'd five hundred Engliſh Archers, who returning home too ſecurely, were all put to the Sword: And not long after, John Earl of Namur, and Robert his Brother, having landed in England, and marching with ſeveral Lords and Knights and a ſelect Body of a hundred Men at Arms, were aſſaulted near Edinburgh by the Earl of Marche and the Lord Douglas; and after a ſharp Conflict were forc'd to ſurrender themſelves Priſoners. Yet either out of Generoſity or Policy, to gratifie the French King, whoſe Kinſmen they were, they were not only releas'd by the Earl of Murrey, but were alſo by him convey'd back as far as the Engliſh Borders; but in his Return the Earl ſuffer'd for his Compliment, being met by the Garriſon of Roxburgh, who routed his Party, and took him Priſoner. In the mean Time King Edward's Brother the late Earl of Cornwall enter'd Scotland and deſtroy'd Galloway, Carrick, Kyle, and all the Weſtern Parts that held out againſt King Baliol; and after that repair'd to his Brother at Perth, lately return'd from an Expedition in the Highlands. At Perth King Edward receiv'd Ambaſſadors from the King of France, who to hinder his Progreſs in Scotland, had procur'd the Pope to mediate a Peace between him and King David, and alſo to deſire him to accompany King Philip in the Holy-War, which he had lately undertaken by the Incouragement of his Holineſs. But King Edward being offended at the French King's Intermedling in his Affairs, gave the Ambaſſadors this ſhort and reſolute Anſwer, That by the Bleſſing of Heav'n he was able at any Time to make War upon the Infidels, without their Maſter's Aſſiſtance; and that he would undertake no foreign Expedition, 'till he had ſubdu'd his Enemies the Scots. Not long after many of the Scotch Nobility, ſeeing King Edward's Reſolution and Power, came and ſubmitted to him at Perth, where Articles of Peace were in a ſhort Time concluded. Then having ſetled his Affairs in Scotland, fortify'd the Town of Perth, new built the Caſtles of Sterling and Edinburgh, and left ſufficient Forces with the Earl of Athol, he return'd into England in Autumn, with the valiant Lord Talbot, whom he had lately ranſom'd from his Impriſonment.

The Scotch Nobility ſubmit to King Edward.

Ibid. After King Edward's Departure, the Earl of Athol, reſolving to redeem his loſt Credit with the two Kings, laid Siege to the Caſtle of Kildrumney, which ſtill held out for King David; but upon the Arrival of the Earl of Dunbar, and the Lords Murrey and Douglas, who came to relieve the Place, he was not only defeated by an inferior Force, but alſo loſt his Life together with his Honour and Reputation. The Death of this Governor caus'd a great Turn in the Affairs of Scotland, ſo that many Places in the North revolted, and declar'd for King David againſt Baliol and the Engliſh Power; which Defection caus'd King Edward to raiſe an Army of forty thouſand Men, with which like a Conqueror he enter'd into the Bowels of Scotland, rais'd the Siege of Lochindoris, purſu'd the Enemy through Athol and Murrey, and paſs'd with his victorious Arms as far as Elgin and Innernes, where Scotland is bounded by the Ocean. Then marching from one Province to another, ravaging and deſtroying all Places that oppos'd his Authority, at his Return, beſides other Places, he burnt the Town of Aberdeen, becauſe the Inhabitants had treacherouſly kill'd an Engliſh Knight call'd Thomas Roſſelyn. After he had ſtrucken Terror in all Places, and met with little or no Oppoſition, he left King Baliol to reduce the Remainder of the Scots, and in the middle of September return'd triumphantly into England; having now made four ſucceſsful and glorious Expeditions into Scotland. In theſe Expeditions the King never return'd but with ſuch great Deſtruction and Bloodſhed of that afflicted People, that it might give cauſe of the greateſt Admiration to imagine how it was poſſible for that barren Part of the Iſle, and ſo often waſted, to breed ſo many Men as had been ſlain in Battel within theſe fifty laſt Years; and yet ſtill be able to bring Armies into into the Field, both to maintain their own Conteſts, and to defend their Liberties, and that poor Ground they inhabited.

A. D. 1337. Reg. 11.

IV. King Edward, now experienc'd and renown'd in Arms, deſign'd not to have left Scotland ſo ſoon, but he had for ſome Time a far nobler Prize in View; and that was no leſs than the Kingdom of France, towards the Attainment of which he had already made ſome Advances, and ſeveral fair Pretenſions as to his Title to that Crown. This Deſign was violently promoted by Robert de Artois, a Prince of the Blood of France, who being highly diſoblig'd by the French King's awarding the County of Artois from him to his Aunt Matilda, openly declar'd, That he would unmake the King by the ſame Power he had made him; which ſo provok'd King Philip, that he immediately proclaim'd him a Traitor, confiſcated all his Eſtate, and forc'd him to fly out of his Kingdom. In England he was generouſly entertain'd by King Edward, made of his Council, and inveſted with the Earldom of Richmond; and here he became the grand Incendiary between the two mighty Nations, and blew up ſuch a dreadful Flame as laſted above a hundred Years, and the Smoak of it much longer. This at preſent was very happy for the State of Scotland, which Boetius acknowledges to have been ſo weaken'd and impoveriſh'd, that if King Edward had continu'd his Wars, it muſt have came to inevitable Ruin. This was alſo the Cauſe why the French, the great Supporters of the Scotch, became more vigilant, and us'd all Means to annoy the Engliſh, not only in Scotland, but alſo in Gaſcony and other Places; which, beſides King Edward's Title to the Crown of France, had given ſufficient Cauſe for a Breach between the two Kings. But that the World might take Notice of his juſt Proceedings, and main Cauſes of his Deſign againſt France, King Edward in a pious Epiſtle directed to the Colledge of Cardinals declar'd, 'Firſt, 'his Title to the Crown of France, which Philip de Valois had unjuſtly de-'tain'd, notwithſtanding he himſelf was the neareſt in Blood of any Male living. 'Secondly, That his Ambaſſadors, deſiring to put the Cauſe to a Civil Trial, 'were not only refus'd to be heard, but were repuls'd with Danger of their 'Lives. Thirdly, That the Court of the twelve Peers, in giving the Crown 'from him, when under Age, left the Office of Judges and became Invaders; wherefore their Proceedings againſt him during his Minority were 'lawleſs, null and void. Fourthly, That Philip de Valois invaded the Duke-'dom of Gaſcony, which belong'd to the Crown of England, and added ſuch 'Places and Territories as he had injuriouſly gain'd to thoſe he had injuriouſly 'detain'd. Fifthly, That he had aſſiſted the Scots in their Inſurrections againſt 'him, when by reaſon of his near Relation he ought rather to have join'd 'with him; and finally had declar'd by his Actions, That his Honour, Power 'and Perſon were equally hated by him.

The Beginnings of the Wars with France.

King Edward's Pretenſions.

King Edward, knowing that Words alone were of no great Effect, to ſtrengthen his Alliance, by the Advice of his Council and his Father-in-Law the Earl of Hainault, reſolv'd to join with ſeveral Princes of the high and low Dutch, who lay moſt convenient for his Deſigns. But the better to unite their Intereſts, he was adviſ'd to gain the Alliance of Lewis the Emperor, with whom he made in Effect but an unprofitable Confederacy; tho' it was really ſubſervient to his preſent Purpoſes. Moſt to his Advantage were the extraordinary Endeavours of James de Artevile, a rich Burger of Gaunt, of admirable Dexterity and Management, and ſo popular among the Flemmings, that he had the Command of Flanders more than the Earl himſelf, who was lately expell'd. By the ſingular Diligence of this Burger, and of Sigar de Courtray, a Nobleman of Flanders, a mighty Party was ſoon rais'd for the Engliſh againſt the French: Which was much increas'd by an Overthrow given to the French Flemmings, who under the Conduct of Guy Brother to the Earl of Flanders, had plac'd themſelves in the Iſle of Cadſant to ſtop the Paſſage of the Engliſh, who who fortunately took Guy Priſoner, and ſlew moſt of his Men. This Victory was obtain'd by the Earl of Darby, the Lord Cobham, the Lord Beauchamp, and other Commanders; of whoſe Fame D'Artevile made ſuch a ſeaſonable Uſe, by letting the Flemmings ſee the Engliſh were able to protect them, that without Heſitation they became firm Confederates in the Preſence of the Earl of Gelder at Gaunt, notwithſtanding the Endeavours of the great King of France, and their Soveraign Earl to the contrary. As King Edward took Care of his Intereſt abroad, ſo was he no leſs careful of his Country at home; and in a Parliament held at Weſtminſter it was ordain'd, That no Engliſh Wool ſhould be tranſported; and that all Cloath-Workers ſhould be receiv'd from any Foreign Parts, and fit Places aſſign'd them, with divers Liberties and Privileges; and that they ſhould have a certain Allowance from the King, 'till they were fix'd in a competent Way of Living. It was alſo ordain'd, That none ſhould wear any Cloaths wrought beyond Sea for the future, except the King, Queen, and their Children; alſo, That no one ſhould wear foreign Furrs or Silks, unleſs he was worth one hundred Pounds per Annum. By theſe and the like Laws King Edward gradually reviv'd the Woollen Manufacture, after it had been loſt for many Years to this Nation; from which Time it ſtill increas'd to the general Advantage of the Kingdom. Alſo in this Parliament the King created his eldeſt Son Prince Edward, Duke of Cornwall, who was the firſt that ever had the Title of Duke in England: He alſo created ſix Earls, of Darby, Salisbury, Gloceſter, Huntington, Northampton and Suffolk, and twenty Knights; at which Solemnity the King made a moſt magnificent Entertainment.

The firſt Duke in England.

Walſing. Froiſart. The War, which all this Time ſeem'd only in Mens Mouths, now began to break out into Actions, and ſome of the firſt Flames appear'd at Southampton, which the French, by the help of their Gallies, almoſt reduc'd to Aſhes; but they with the Loſs of their chief Commander and three hundred Soldiers were repuls'd the next Day. To extinguiſh this encreaſing Conteſt, Pope Benedict ſent over two Cardinals into England; but one of them in a Speech to the Clergy ſeeming to favour the French Clergy, the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury immediately ſtood up and proteſted, That the Cardinal's Arguments were vain and frivolous. Whereupon they ſoon after departed, and it was publiſh'd in all Parts of England, That King Edward had a Right to the Crown of France, which he deſign'd to proſecute by all honourable Methods. Notwithſtanding the King, to avoid the Effuſion of Chriſtian Blood, gave Inſtructions to the Cardinals, that upon certain reaſonable Conditions he was willing to make an entire Peace with France, and to take any honeſt and proportionable Offer: But the chief Impediment to this was that the French inſiſted to have the Scots included in the Treaty, to which King Edward would by no Means conſent, reſolving, when Opportunity permitted, to reduce them to the Engliſh Scepter, ſo that the Labour and Hopes of the Cardinals were all ineffectual. Philip de Valois, in Poſſeſſion of ſo noble a Kingdom, on the other Side had the moſt prevalent Motives to ſtand off; as his own Honour, Profit, Strength and Alliance, beſides the Vaſtneſs and apparent Difficulty of King Edward's Enterprize. Then to juſtifie his Cauſe he alledg'd, 'Firſt, That the 'Salick Law had cut off all King Edward's Pretenſions to the Crown of France. 'Secondly, That he Himſelf was acknowledg'd and receiv'd as King by a pub-'lick Act of the whole State of France. Thirdly, King Edward's Birth-Place 'made him a Stranger to the French, and therefore incapable of Governing that 'Nation. Laſtly, King Edward in the Beginning of his Reign, had in his 'own Perſon done Homage to Philip de Valois for the Dukedom of Gaſcony, 'and by his Letters Patents teſtify'd the ſame.

Froiſart. Knighton. &c. At length, after the moſt mature Deliberation, King Edward, on the ſixteenth Day of July, took Shipping at the Port of Orewell near Harwich, with a Royal Navy of five hundred Sail, and many of the chief Nobility of England in his Company; who with their great Trains and Retinues compos'd a formidable dable Body of Horſe. Beſides theſe the King had a great Multitude of Archers and Welſhmen, with all which he arriv'd at Antwerp, then belonging to the Duke of Brabant; and while he reſided in that City, vaſt Throngs of People came from all Parts to ſee him, and to obſerve the extraordinary Magnificence of his Court. After ſeveral Treaties of Alliances, King Edward remov'd to Cologn, whither the Emperor himſelf came no leſs than ſeven Days Journey to meet his Majeſty. The Enterview was ſurprizingly pompous, in the Midſt of the Market-Place, where two Royal Thrones were erected in the open Air, the one for the Emperor, and the other for the King of England. The former took his Place firſt, and the other immediately after; in which magnificent Aſſembly, as Aſſiſtants there were four great Dukes, three Arch-Biſhops, ſix Biſhops, thirty ſeven Earls, and of Barons, Bannerets, Knights and Eſquires about ſeventeen thouſand. Here the Emperor ſet forth the Falſhood which the King of France had us'd towards him, and thereupon defy'd him, and pronounc'd both him and his Adherents Enemies to the Empire; and further by an Inſtrument which he publickly deliver'd to King Edward, he ordain'd and conſtituted him his Deputy and Vicar-General of the Sacred Roman Empire, over all the Provinces in the Weſt as far as Cologn; and after that he enter'd into a League Offenſive and Defenſive for the Term of ſeven Years. After King Edward's Return to Antwerp with his new Power, he vigorouſly proſecuted his Affair of Confederacy with the Lords and Governors of the Low-Countries, among whom he and his Royal Family continu'd with great Love and Eſteem above a whole Year. The principal Perſons that enter'd into this League againſt the French were the Arch-Biſhop of Cologn, the Duke of Brabant, the Duke of Gelderland who had lately marry'd King Edward's Siſter Iſabel, the Marqueſs of Juliers, with ſeveral German Princes. On the other Side the French had the King of Bohemia, the Count Palatine of the Rhine, the Biſhop of Metz, the Duke of Auſtria, the Marqueſs of Montferrat, the Earl of Genoa, beſides many Princes out of Germany, Franche-County, Savoy, Daupbine, Spain and other Countries. So that all the beſt of the Chriſtian World were either in Arms, or aſſiſting in this Conteſt between the two mighty Monarchs of England and France.

His Enterview with the Emperor.

A. D. 1339. Reg. 13.

All Things being prepar'd, after ſome ſmaller Actions, the mighty Edward at the Head of a brave Army of above forty thouſand Men enter'd into the Confines of France, where in five Weeks Time he ravag'd all the Territories of Cambreſis, Vermandois, Tieraſche and Laonois; and other Parts of Picardy and Artois were wholly waſted except ſome few of the ſtronger Places, and ſuch as had ſworn Allegiance to him. So that the Inhabitants of the Country fled on all Sides, without making Reſiſtance. In the mean Time King Philip, with a more numerous Army, and ſtill increaſing, encamp'd in Cambreſis, and reſolv'd not to move from thence 'till he had fought with the King of England and his Allies: And to that End, on the Monday following, a principal Commander of the French ſent Letters to another in King Edward's Army, deſiring him to give his Maſter Notice from King Philip, That if he would chuſe any open Place, not incumber'd with Woods or Bogs, he would give him Battel before Thurſday next: Which was alſo confirm'd by another Meſſenger from the King of Bohemia and the Duke of Lorain. Not long after, the two Armies advancing within three Leagues of each other, King Edward, not to be behind hand with the Enemy, by a particular Herald ſent the King of France a Challenge To fight his whole Army on what Day he ſhould pleaſe to appoint; which was accepted by King Philip, who appointed Friday the twenty ſecond of October: In the mean Time the Princes and Commanders had Notice to prepare themſelves for this great Encounter. When, on the appointed Day, both Armies were drawn out in Order of Battel, and all expected a bloody Ingagement, it was again debated in the French King's Council of War, Whether it was beſt to give the Engliſh Battel or not. Many of his Counſellors maintain'd,

He enters France.

Froiſart. Du Cheſn. &c.

A Day of Battel appointed.

That

That the Hazard was too great, ſince if they loſt the Day, the Crown of France would be in Danger; whereas if the Enemy were beaten, neither King Edward, nor his Allies would loſe any of their Dominions. While this was debating, King Philip was abſolutely diſcourag'd by Letters from the King of Naples and Sicily, who by the Rules of Aſtrology declar'd That he would be overcome if he fought with King Edward that Time. Upon which King Philip immediately gave Orders to his Army to retreat into the Camp, and in the Night privately march'd away into the Borders of Flanders. King Edward finding that there was no further Expectation of Fighting, remov'd towards Hainault; ſo that nothing of any great Moment was further tranſacted this Year. but to no Effect.

Froiſart. Knighton. &c. About this Time, the Flemmings, the moſt neceſſary Part of King Edward's Alliance, began to decline their Aſſiſtance, and would not ingage in an offenſive War againſt France, unleſs King Edward would firſt aſſume the Title and Arms of that Kingdom, as the only lawful King of it. This was projected by the famous D'Artevile; and after the Propoſal was fully and publickly debated, He with the Conſent of the Flemmings and others, took upon him the Title and Arms of France, quartering the French Flower de Liſes with the Leopards or Lions of England. And about this Time he plac'd this French Motto under his Shield Dieu & mon Droit, God and my Right; declaring his Confidence to be only in God and the Juſtice of his Cauſe: Which Motto, together with the Arms of France, has been continu'd by all the ſucceeding Kings of England. After this, King Edward publiſh'd the ſame under his Seal, ſetting the Name of England firſt, and ſent his Letters Patents to the Frontiers of the Enemies Dominions, and fixing them upon the Doors of the Churches, as well to declare the Reaſon of his Proceedings, as to exempt thoſe from a ſucceeding Storm, who upon this Notice would acknowledge him their lawful Soveraign. His Affairs growing ripe in thoſe Parts, he left his Queen and Children at Antwerp, as an aſſur'd Pledge of his Return, and in February took Shipping for England; where in a Parliament at Weſtminſter, he obtain'd very liberal Aids upon Wool, Leather and other Things, for the ſupporting of his intended Conqueſt. In lieu of which ready Aſſiſtance, he granted a general Pardon both for Treſpaſſes, and all Aids for making his Son Knight, and the Marriage of his Daughter during his Reign; forgiving alſo all Arrears of Farmers and Accountants 'till the tenth Year of his Reign, and all old Debts due to any of his Predeceſſors; and likewiſe confirm'd the famous Magna Charta, and of the Foreſts, with ſome others. In this Parliament the Lords and Commons petition'd, That ſince the King had taken upon him the Title of King of France, and chang'd his Arms, they might not be oblig'd to obey Him as King of France, nor that the Kingdom of England be put in Subjection to Him, as King of France. Upon which he caus'd ſeveral Letters Patents to be publiſh'd, which gave them full Satisfaction.

He calls a Parliament.

Ibid. The grand Diſcourſe was now all of the Conqueſt of France; Muſters were made throughout the Kingdom, Armourers and other warlike Artificers were full of Employment, and all Engliſhmen ſeem'd poſſeſs'd with a martial Eagerneſs and Fury. King Edward being ready to repaſs the Sea, receiv'd Intelligence that the French lay near Sluice in Flanders with a mighty Fleet of four hundred Ships to intercept him; whereupon he reſolv'd to force his Way through. Accordingly he ſet Sail about Midſummer, and ſtood towards the Coaſt where the Enemy attended, being reinforc'd by the Northern Navy of England, under the Command of the Lord Morley; ſo that he had in all about two or three hundred Sail. The valiant King commanding in Perſon, order'd the beſt Ships that were well mann'd with Archers and other Soldiers to ſtand foremoſt in the Line of Battel; then having tack'd about to gain the Weather-gage, they bravely receiv'd the firſt Onſet. For the French Admirals, diſcovering the Royal Banner of England upon one of the biggeſt Ships, were ſatisfy'd that the King was there in Perſon; they therefore reſolv'd to uſe all Methods to break his Fleet, and take him Priſoner. So falling down upon the Engliſh, there began an obſtinate Fight, firſt with a dreadful Shower of Arrows, by which the Engliſh Archers did greater Execution than the French; and after that the two Fleets, coming cloſe to each other, proceeded to grapling and boarding, and by handy Strokes a deſperate Slaughter was made, and that with various Succeſs. This Fight continu'd from Ten in the Morning 'till Seven at Night; 'till at length the Strength and Courage of the Engliſh prevail'd againſt far greater Numbers of the French, cauſing Multitudes of them to leap deſperately into the Sea, to ſhun the Power of their Arms; and in the Concluſion, not above thirty of the French Veſſels could eſcape. In this Battel the French loſt about thirty thouſand Men; and this was the greateſt Sea-Fight that had ever happen'd on the Narrow Seas, and the firſt in which a King of England commanded in Perſon; where, beſides himſelf, the greateſt Earls and Barons of his Kingdom behav'd themſelves with incomparable Bravery and Gallantry. This was ſuch killing News to France, that at firſt none durſt tell it to King Philip but by means of his Jeſter, who in his Preſence often cry'd out Cowardly Engliſhmen! Fainthearted Engliſhmen! 'till the King enquiring into his Meaning, he told him That the Frenchmen moſt bravely leap'd into the Sea, and the Engliſhmen had not the Courage to follow them. By which artificial Turn the King apprehended a Notion of this Overthrow.

He obtains a glorious Victory over the French Fleet.

After this memorable Victory, King Edward landing in Flanders, in a ſhort Time gather'd together one of the moſt powerful Armies, that ever any King of England commanded, conſiſting of near an hundred thouſand Soldiers Engliſh and Dutch, and under the Conduct of many worthy Generals. With this he advanc'd to the Northern Parts of France, where after great Ravages made in the Country, he ſat down before Tourney, deſigning it both for a Seat of War, and a Place of Refuge. King Philip on the other Side had provided an Army, not inferior to the other in Numbers, which beſides himſelf was commanded by the two Kings of Navarre and Bohemia, with ſeveral Princes and great Men, who in a ſhort Time advanc'd towards King Edward's Forces. At Tourney, King Edward with invincible Courage ſent a Meſſage to his Rival, ſaluting him by no other Title than Philip of Valois, by which, To avoid the Effuſion of Blood, he challenged him to meet and fight him in a ſingle Combate; or, if that diſpleas'd him, each to bring a hundred Men into the Field, and decide the Conteſt with ſo ſmall a Hazard; or otherwiſe, within ten Days to join in a full Battel with all their Forces near Tourney. To which Philip gave no direct Anſwer, as being contrary to his Honour; alledging, That the Meſſage was not ſent to him the King of France, but barely to Philip of Valois: Nevertheleſs he let him underſtand, That his Deſign was to beat him out of France, hoping in Chriſt, from whom he deriv'd his Power, ſhortly to effect it. The Eyes of all Chriſtendom were now upon theſe mighty Armies, anxiouſly expecting the Event and Fate of the War, when after three Months Continuance near Tourney, and no great Action perform'd, Jane de Valois, Siſter to King Philip and Mother to King Edward's Queen, a Princeſs of extraordinary Virtue, came from Fountenelles, where ſhe had taken the Life of a Nun, to mediate a Peace between theſe two inrag'd Kings, her Brother and Son-in-Law. She travell'd from one to the other, labour'd inceſſantly, and never deſiſted, tho' often deny'd, 'till ſhe had with great Patience and wiſe Conduct ſo allay'd their furious Paſſions, that ſhe obtain'd a Day and Place for both Kings to parley together: A memorable Work to be effected by a Woman, in ſuch a warlike Age as this was. This Parley ſoon produc'd a Truce for one Year, by which the Earls of Salisbury and Suffolk, who had been taken Priſoners, were releas'd; and ſhortly after both the great Armies were disbanded. Upon which King Edward return'd home with his Queen, who had remain'd three Years in thoſe Parts,

He enters the Borders of France with a mighty Army.

A Truce concluded for a Year.

Parts, and had there brought forth two Sons, Lionell, afterwards Duke of Clarence, and John born at Gaunt, aftewards Duke of Lancaſter.

Ibid. But King Edward's condeſcending to this ſudden Truce, had in reality no other Motive than ſome Supplies of Mony, which came ſhort of his Expectation, notwithſtanding thoſe great Impoſitions laid on his Subjects. Therefore in his Return to England, to puniſh the Miſmanagement of his Miniſters and Officers, he committed ſome to Priſon, turn'd others out of their Places, and was ſo vigorous and active, that it occaſion'd a warm Conteſt between him and John Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, who by Letters boldly complain'd of manifeſt Violences done againſt the Liberties of the Church and Engliſh Nation contain'd in Magna Charta, &c. And whereas the King openly charg'd the Arch-Biſhop to have been the chief Adviſer of his entering into a League with the Germans, and then telling him, That he need take no Care for Treaſure, becauſe he himſelf would ſee him abundantly furniſh'd from England, out of the new granted Subſidies and Profits of the Crown; And that through the Defects in the Arch-Biſhop's Performances, he was not only oblig'd to deſiſt from his preſent Deſigns, but alſo to intangle himſelf among Bankers and Uſurers; the Arch-Biſhop return'd Anſwer, That he deſir'd it might be examin'd in open Parliament who hinder'd the City of Tourney from being taken; directly removing the Blame from himſelf and his Friends, upon ſuch as were daily Contrivers, who ſerving their own Turns by the Abuſe of the Publick, would expoſe him to the Odium of their Actions. And ſome were of Opinion that the Arch-Biſhop privately practis'd againſt the King's good Fortune in France; which if true, it was eaſie to diſcover the principal Motive. For certainly Pope Benedict was no ways pleas'd with King Edward's Succeſſes, nor with the War it ſelf, affirming it pernicious to Chriſtendom; the Scandal of which the French charg'd upon the Engliſh as unlawful Claimers, as the Engliſh did upon the French as unjuſt Detainers. This Pope therefore interpos'd, and put Flanders under an Interdict, as having diſloyally deſerted their own Earl, and their principal Lord Philip King of France, contrary to their Faith and Allegiance; but they for their Juſtification return'd Anſwer, That Edward was the only lawful King of France, and Philip, to whom they had ſworn, a meer Uſurper; therefore notwithſtanding the Interdict, and the Papal Deciſion, they ſtill perſiſted in their Adherence. But what ſtill further weaken'd King Edward's Intereſt, was the Deſertion of the Emperor Lewis, who being won over to the Party of the French King, became his ſworn Confederate, and revok'd the Vicarſhip of the Empire, formerly confirm'd on the King of England, pretending that the Cauſe was for concluding the late Truce without him, as appears by his Letters to King Edward, which are again by him bravely and compleatly anſwer'd.

The Pope interdicts Flanders.

The Emperor abandons King Edward.

Ibid. But inſtead of this remote and unconſtant Confederate, whoſe Power was without the Limits of France, Fortune brought in another more near and offenſive, within the Body of that Kingdom. For about this Time the Succeſſion to the Dukedom of Bretaign was in Conteſt between Charles de Blois, Nephew to King Philip, and John de Montfort, upon this Title: Arthur Duke of Bretaign had by his firſt Wife two Sons, John and Guy, and by his ſecond this John de Montfort. John the Eldeſt, having no Iſſue, appointed his Niece Jane, Daughter to his Brother Guy deceas'd, to ſucceed him in his Dukedom; upon which Appointment Charles de Blois marry'd her, on Condition his Iſſue by her ſhould inherit the ſame, and for the greater Security he was inveſted in it during the Life of John their Uncle. But after his Death, John de Montfort, claiming the Dukedom, went to Paris to do Homage for it to King Philip; but Charles de Blois, oppoſing him in Right of his Wife, the Controverſie was referr'd to the Parliament, where Sentence paſs'd in Favour of Charles. Montfort inrag'd at this, repair'd to the King of England, to whom he did Homage for his Dukedom, was receiv'd with great Applauſe, and his Title acknowledg'd as good. Returning back into Bretaign with Satisfaction and Aſſiſtance; after ſome Encounters with his Enemy, he was taken and committed Priſoner in Paris. His Lady, the Counteſs of Montfort, a Woman of an undaunted and maſculine Spirit, vigorouſly proſecuted her Husband's Quarrel, put on Armour, led her People in Perſon, ſurpriz'd and defended many ſtrong Places in Bretaign. But at length being preſs'd ſtrongly by Charles de Blois, ſhe begg'd Aſſiſtance of the King of England, and had it ſent, under the Conduct of the Lord Water de Manny; which reliev'd her at preſent, but the future requir'd more, of which King Edward was not ſparing in regard of his own Deſigns. The Counteſs her ſelf came into England to treat both for Supplies and Alliance, and of a Match between her Son and a Daughter of King Edward; and the Earls of Salisbury, Pembroke and Suffolk, and the Lords Stafford, Spenſer and Bourchier, with Robert de Artois, the firſt grand Incendiary, were ſent with conſiderable Forces back with the Lady. Many were the Encounters, Attacks and Surprizes, both by Sea and Land, between the Engliſh and the French; and at the Siege of Vannes, Robert de Artois receiv'd his laſt Wound, after he had valiantly, tho' ſome think diſhonourably, aſſiſted the Engliſh about ſix Years. Not long after King Edward went over into Bretaign in Perſon with freſh Supplies; and lying before Vannes, John Duke of Normandy, eldeſt Son to the King of France, ſent to the Aſſiſtance of Charles de Blois, with an Army of forty thouſand Men came to give him Battel. But being juſt ready to encounter, a Mediation of Truce was made by two Cardinals, ſent from Pope Clement VI. and concluded for three whole Years, upon ſeveral Conditions, with a Reference to the Pope and the Court of Rome, to hear and examine the Differences between the two Kingdoms, but not to determine them without the Conſent of both Kings. The Engliſh kept Poſſeſſion of the City of Vannes, that if a ſetled Peace follow'd not upon this Truce, they might have ſufficient Footing, from whence they might march into the Heart of France. John de Montfort did not long out-live this Truce, after whoſe Death the greateſt Part of Bretaign fell into the Hands of Charles de Blois.

A three Years Truce between England and France.

During the Time of the ſeveral Years Wars with France, a great Change happen'd in the Affairs of Scotland: For not long after the Departure of King Edward from that Kingdom, King David's Party, under their chief Commander Andrew Murrey, iſſu'd out from the Loughs, Mountains and other Places of Retreat with conſiderable Advantage. King Edward indeed had more than once ſent Armies under valiant Generals to ſupport Baliol's Cauſe, where Succeſs was variable 'till the Death of Murrey. After whom the Lord Smart, taking Advantage of King Edward's Foreign Expeditions, us'd all Methods to prepare a peaceable Entrance for King David, ſtill in France. The Aſſiſtance of the Lord William Douglas was very beneficial to that purpoſe, tho' not always fortunate; being overthrown in a ſet Battel by King Edward's Forces, under the Command of Sir Thomas Berkley, at Blackbourn. But towards the Deciſion of the Miſeries of the Nation, there arriv'd great Quantities of Ammunition and Supplies from the Kingdom of France, at ſuch Time as the Lord Smart had lain ten Weeks at the Seige of Perth with ſmall Hopes of Succeſs. Perth at length being ſurrender'd, Baliol finding his Intereſt and Power daily to decline, abandon'd the Nation, and retir'd into England. Upon which Deſertion, King David with his Queen, and many of the Scotch and French Nobility, return'd peaceably into Scotland, after nine Years Abſence; and 'till the French King's Cauſe unfortunately put him into Arms againſt the Engliſh, the afflicted Realm of Scotland enjoy'd Reſt and Quiet.

A. D. 1343. Reg. 17.

V. The provident King Edward, returning home after the Truce with France, became as careful in Domeſtick, as he had been vigorous in Foreign Affairs; and enacted the Statute of Proviſors upon this Occaſion: Pope Benedict

Walſing.

dict being dead, Clement VI. ſucceeded; a Man of ſingular Learning, but extreamly profuſe in his Preferments, who by Way of Proviſion had beſtow'd ſeveral choice Benefices in England upon Foreigners. For the Prevention of a Practice, ſo odious to the King and his Parliament, it was made High-Treaſon or Death for any to bring ſuch Papal Proviſions into the Kingdom. And in Juſtification, the King ſent an admirable Letter to the Pope in which he repreſented how highly it derogated from the State of the Kingdom of England, that ſuch Reſervations and Proviſions formerly us'd, ſhould in ſuch Manner be continu'd. For the Churches of England had formerly been endow'd by noble and worthy Perſons; that the People might be inſtructed by ſuch as were of their own Language: And yet by the Uſurpations of ſome of his Predeceſſors, Strangers, and ſometimes Enemies to the Realm, were preferr'd before Natives; whereby the Mony and Profits were tranſported, the Churches and Cures unſerv'd, Alms and Hoſpitality diſus'd, the Houſes and Edifices ruinated, the Charity and Devotion of the People diminiſh'd, and many other fatal Enormities occaſion'd, contrary to the Honour of God and the Founders Wills. In the Beginning of this ſame Parliament, the King created his eldeſt Son Edward Prince of Wales, inveſting him by a Coronet and a Ring of Gold. He was now in the thirteenth Year of his Age, being the Delight and Expectation of all Men; and in a ſhort Time he prov'd ſo renown'd a Gentleman, that the Commendations given by Walſingham of his Father, as exceeding all the Princes that went before him, may be parallel'd in the Son, as ſurpaſſing all the Princes that liv'd after him.

The Statute of Proviſors.

Young Edward made Prince of Wales.

Walſing. &c.

His noble Father King Edward, who had his Eye ſtill fix'd upon France as the Mark of his Conqueſt, having Notice among other Things by a Meſſenger from the Pope, that the Emperor Lewis had wholly ſubmitted himſelf, and was abſolv'd from all Cenſures, upon his declaring in King Philip's Favour; he couragiouſly broke out into this warm Expreſſion, If Lewis joins with the French King, I my ſelf will fight with them both. And whether invited by the Fame of King Arthur, and the Knights of the Round-Table, or by the Glory of all Martial Actions and Exerciſes; he order'd a ſpacious Room of Wood to be erected at Windſor Caſtle, two hundred Foot in Diameter, which he call'd the Round-Table, becauſe he there intended to treat all the Knights which he had invited from Foreign Parts. In the Beginning of this Year he held his Feaſt of the Round-Table at Windſor, and alſo iſſu'd out Letters of ſafe Conduct for all Foreign Knights and their Servants, who ſhould pleaſe to come to a ſolemn Tournament to be kept for fourteen Days together. At the appointed Day there was a noble Appearance of Knights and great Men of ſeveral Nations, and the Solemnity began with a moſt magnificent Entertainment or Supper; and the Day following the Juſts and Tournaments began, and were continu'd almoſt every Day during the King's Letters of Protection, being perform'd in the Preſence of the Queen and all the Ladies of the Court, who had Scaffolds purpoſely erected to behold theſe Martial Sports: Which ſo pleas'd the King, that in Auguſt following, he caus'd a more durable Structure to be erected of the like Form, and for the ſame Exerciſes to be continu'd every Year. In Emulation of all this King Philip, knowing that all tended to Preparations againſt him, erected the like in his Court, to prevent the Knights and great Soldiers of Germany and Italy from repairing to King Edward. And in one Thing more, he did wiſely and politickly, in giving leave to his Subjects freely to fell down his Woods for building of Ships, by which his Navy was much augmented, and became very ſerviceable afterwards. But his Jealouſies againſt the King of England put him upon open Acts of Cruelty, and occaſion'd him to put ſeveral principal Men of Normandy, Picardy and Gaſcony to Death, only becauſe they were Engliſh in Affection: Among whom are reckon'd Sir Oliver de Cliſſon, Bacco, Percie and Geoffry of Maleſtroict, Knights of the beſt Note: Sir Godfrey of Harcourt, Brother to the Earl of Harcourt, being alſo ſummon'd mon'd to Paris, fled into England, where he became a great Incendiary in the approaching Flame.

A. D. 1345. Reg. 19.

It was not Pope Clement's Mediation, or Diligence in diſcuſſing the Title and Pretenſions of theſe two mighty Monarchs, that could prolong the fatal Puniſhment of France; yet according to former Articles, each Prince ſent his particular Orators, where the Difficulties aroſe ſo thick and intricate, that the Pope deſpairing to clear them, deferr'd the Conſideration of them to another Time. Walſing. Froiſart.

The Truce with France broken.

But King Edward affirming the Truce to be manifeſtly broken, by the Execution and Perſecuting his Friends in Normandy and elſewhere, ſignify'd thus much to his Holineſs, That the Sword, not the Tongue ſhould determine his Right and Title. His Proviſions of Men, of Arms, of Ships, of Victuals and Treaſure, and of all Things neceſſary for ſo brave and daring an Enterprize, were worthy of the Grandeur, Courage and Majeſty of an Engliſh Monarch. Into Gaſcony he ſent the valiant Henry Earl of Darby, with a gallant Appearance of Commanders and proportionable Troops of Soldiers; where he perform'd many great Actions, for the Defence and Enlargement of that Dukedom, and took ſeveral Cities, Towns and Caſtles. After a glorious Campaign, in which he alſo defeated a ſuperior Body of French with the Loſs of ſeven thouſand of their Men, he return'd richly loaden with Spoils and Priſoners to Bourdeaux. Not long before this, at the taking of the City of Bergerac by Storm, where he permitted every particular Soldier to ſeize any Houſe and convert all the Treaſure to his own uſe; a certain Knight or Soldier call'd Reth ſeiz'd upon a Houſe where the Bankers for Security had lodg'd their Mony in long Sacks: Upon the Sight of which, Reth imagining ſo great a Treaſure not deſign'd for private Men, acquainted his General with what he had found; to whom the generous Earl anſwer'd, That the whole Houſe, and all the Mony in it was his own, tho' it was never ſo much. The Soldier upon a ſecond Search was ſtill far more ſurpriz'd, and thinking ſo great a Treaſure could belong to none but a General, once more acquainted him with the Greatneſs of it, which he had diſcover'd to be much more than at firſt. But this great Man was ſo far from being affected with it, That he told him with ſome Indignation, That the Greatneſs of the Treaſure could not alter the Caſe; ſince he paſs'd his Word and Honour, he ſcorn'd to revoke it. During this Campaign, the Scots attempting upon the Marches of England, by the Vigilance and Valour of the Biſhop of Carliſle, the Lords Percie, Nevile and Lucie, and others intruſted in thoſe Parts, they were forc'd to retire into their own Kingdom. It was now the Practice of either Prince to divert and diſturb each others Affairs in different Parts, as the Engliſh did King Philip's in Gaſcony, and he the Engliſh by his perpetual and conſtant Confederates the Scots. But King Edward at preſent could do it the leſs in Flanders, becauſe his moſt vigilant and faithful Friend, James de Artevile was this Year ſlain in a Mutiny by ſuch as were of the French Faction.

The Earl of Darby's Bravery.

A. D. 1346. Reg. 20.

At length King Edward, having eſtabliſh'd his Affairs in England, reſolv'd to go in Perſon into France, and try his Fortunes in that fair Kingdom, and preparing a great Fleet and a brave Army, he took leave of his beloved Queen and went to Southampton, accompany'd by his admirable Son the Prince of Wales, then in the ſixteenth Year of his Age, together with all the chief Nobility and moſt valiant Men of the Nation; to whom he made a ſhort Speech, which was communicated to the whole Army; in which he deſir'd them to behave themſelves like Men, ſince he reſolv'd to ſend back his Fleet upon his firſt landing in France; therefore if any Man's Courage fail'd him, he had his Liberty to ſtay in England: To which they unanimouſly anſwer'd, as tho' inſpir'd by his Valour, That they were all ready to follow ſo brave a Commander, were it to Death it ſelf. After a few Days Sail, his Fleet arriv'd at the Haven of La Hogue in Normandy, contrary to his firſt Intentions; where leaping on Shore with ſome Violence, the Blood guſh'd out of his *Froiſart. his Noſe. Upon which his Lords, diſcourag'd at ſuch an ill-boding Omen, deſir'd him to re-enter his Ship, and not land his Men that Day; but the King undauntedly reply'd, It was rather a Sign that the Land deſired to have him. Then knighting his Son, and ſome other young Men of Quality, he enter'd into the Country which did not expect him, reſolving to take a full Revenge for the Blood of his Friends, upon the Norman Towns and People; proteſting that he ſacrific'd them to Cliſſon, Bacco, Percy and the reſt. His Army, conſiſting of thirty thouſand Foot and twenty five hundred Horſe, march'd divided by Day in three Bodies, which uſually join'd together at Night. The Cities of Valongnes, Carentan, St. Lo and Harfleur became the firſt Prey to his victorious Arms; and Rodolph Conſtable of France, and the Earl of Tankerville, whom the King had ſent to Caen, encreas'd his Spoil and Fame by taking them Priſoners, with the Defeat of twenty thouſand Men. Moving from Caen, he continu'd his March by the Biſhopricks of Liſieux and Eureux, waſted and burnt all along the Seyne almoſt to the Walls of Paris, and came and encamped at Poiſſy. Here he endeavour'd to draw out King Philip to a Combate, declaring That he would wreſtle with him in the Eye of all France, on the great Theatre before his Capital City of Paris. But after he had continu'd there five Days, fearing to be enclos'd between the Rivers Seyne and Oyſe, he caus'd the Bridges to be repaired, and paſs'd into Beauvaiſes, with Deſign to retire into his Country of Ponthieu, all the Way marking his Road with dreadful Traces of Fire and Blood.

and marches up to Paris.

Ibid. King Philip, foaming with Rage to behold from his Capital City ſuch furious Flames in the Heart of his Kingdom, with the greateſt Army that France had ever ſeen, advanc'd towards his Enemy, reſolving upon Revenge, and ſcarce doubting of Victory; eſpecially ſince King Edward's Retreat was look'd upon as a Flight. King Edward had retir'd to gain the River Somme at a Place called Blanquetaque below Abbeville; but that Paſſage was to be diſputed by the Sword: For King Philip had before ſent a Norman Lord call'd Godemar du Fay, who ſtood ready on the oppoſite Bank of the River with a Body of twelve thouſand Men, ſo advantagiouſly poſted that King Edward's Paſſage was concluded to be impracticable. But this undaunted Hero, reſolving to paſs or periſh in the Attempt, plung'd foremoſt into the River, crying out, They who love me will follow me! upon which all preſs'd forwards, each ſtriving who ſhould be foremoſt, 'till through Showers of Darts and Arrows they gain'd the oppoſite Shore, and ſoon put the Enemy to flight, with the Loſs of two thouſand of their Men. King Philip, who thought he was ſecure of his Rival, and that he muſt be incloſ'd between the Somme and his own numerous Army, was enrag'd at this Defeat, and cry'd out That he was betray'd: Therefore he immediately follow'd the Engliſh by the Banks of the River, on the other Side of which King Edward and his Army lay; and he had with him an Army of above a hundred thouſand Men, yet King Edward bravely offer'd him a free Paſſage over the Ford, if he would paſs the next Tide, and chuſe a fit Place for Battel. But King Philip refuſing this generous Offer, the other march'd further into Ponthieu 'till he came near a Town call'd Creſſy; where finding a convenient Country for two Armies to draw up in Battalia, and rightly conjecturing that his Enemies would follow him where-ever he march'd, he ſaid to his Nobility, That he would now ſtay 'till he had fac'd his Enemies and recover'd this Province, the Inheritance of Queen Eleanor his Grand-mother; concluding with his own Motto, GOD DEFEND MY RIGHT: And becauſe he had not above a fourth Part of the Army King Philip brought into the Field, he commanded his Marſhals to chuſe the beſt Piece of Ground they could; which being done, and having ſent out his Scouts, he ſtrongly encamp'd himſelf and his Army, impatiently expecting his Enemy.

Ibid. In a ſhort Time after the French approach'd with no ſmall Numbers, Noiſe and Precipitation; while King Edward ſpent a great Part of the Night in the profoundeſt profoundeſt Devotions, and taking the Sacrament with his Son and the chief Nobility. In the Morning he form'd his Army into three main Battalions, the firſt of which was led by the young Prince of Wales, of Strength and Courage far above his Years; with whom were join'd the Earl of Warwick, the Earl of Oxford, the Lord Harcourt, with divers other Perſons of Quality, amounting to the Number of eight hundred Men of Arms, two thouſand Archers, and a thouſand light-arm'd Welſhmen. The ſecond Battalion was commanded by the Earls of Arundel and Northampton, the Lord Roſs, and many other valiant Lords and Knights; the whole Body amounting to the Number of eight hundred Men of Arms, and twelve hundred Archers. The laſt Battalion was headed by the King himſelf, accompany'd with the Lord Mowbray, the Lord Mortimer, and others; amounting to the Number of ſeven hundred Men of Arms and two thouſand Archers; the whole Army making up in all about thirty thouſand effective Soldiers. Then having Knighted fifty young Noblemen and Gentlemen for their Encouragement, the valiant King without the leaſt Perturbation, mounted on a white Nag and with a white Staff in his Hand, rode from Rank to Rank, and exhorted every Man to maintain his Right and Honour, with ſuch moving and obliging Expreſſions as fired the moſt faint-hearted in the Army. Then refreſhing themſelves, every Man prepar'd to conquer bravely or die honourably. The Prince's Battalion led the Van, and he had plac'd his Archers in the Front, who were drawn up in a thin oblong Square, that they might not be ſurrounded by their numerous Enemies, and behind them ſtood the Prince himſelf at the Head of the main Body of the Men of Arms; whilſt the King himſelf was drawn up on the Right Hand further off, on the Side of a Hill, with twelve thouſand Men, for a Reſerve in caſe of Extremity, and the Carriages were plac'd within a ſtrong Intrenchment caſt up for that purpoſe. The good Order of the Engliſh being told to the brave old King of Bohemia on the other Side, he made Anſwer, as a Man of Experience, Then I ſee, the Engliſh are reſolv'd to win all, or die.

The Order of his Army.

He prepares for Battel.

It was about three in the Afternoon when King Philip approach'd the Engliſh at the Head of his vaſt Army, and Multitude of Commanders, which he alſo divided into three main Bodies; and then order'd the firſt Onſet to be made by the Genoeſe Croſs-Bows, who were about fifteen thouſand. This they did with ſome Reluctancy, as being tir'd with the March, and having their Bow-ſtrings much damag'd by a great Shower of Rain; ſo that when they came to ingage with the Engliſh Long-Bows, they were ſoon broken in Pieces, and put to flight. This was attended with ſuch Confuſion and Damage to King Philip's Horſemen, that he cry'd out Kill theſe cowardly Villains who only hinder us! But after a while, getting clear of the Genoeſe, the Earls of Alencon, Flanders and Blois, with other Commanders fell in with that Engliſh Battalion where the young Prince commanded, who receiv'd them with incomparable Valour and Bravery. But freſh Squadrons of French and German Horſe ruſhing in with great Fury, the ſecond Battalion commanded by the Earls of Arundel and Northampton came in to his Aſſiſtance, and vigorouſly attacking the Enemy, caus'd a new Deluge of Blood in the Field. In the mean Time King Edward himſelf with his Battalion hover'd on the Hill like a Tempeſt in a Cloud, ready to diſcharge its Fury, but at preſent only watching and obſerving this unequal Conflict. Here a Meſſage was ſent to him from the Earl of Northampton to deſire him to come down and ſuccour his Son, now very hardly beſet; upon which he demanded Whether he was alive: The Meſſenger told him Yes, but was in Danger of being over-power'd by Numbers. Then, reply'd the King with his uſual Courage, let them know, that while my Son is alive, they ſend for no Aſſiſtance to me, for the Honour of this glorious Day ſhall be His. This Anſwer from ſo compleat a General added new Life and Flame to the Prince and his valiant Supporters, ſo that preſſing forwards with uncommon Vigour, this brave young Lion, ſurrounded with Blood and Death, far out-did did his Father's and the World's Expectation. Then ruſhing in to the main y of the French, the Marqueſs Charles, Emperor Elect, receiv'd him with t Courage, 'till his Men being ſlain round about him, and himſelf wounded everal Places, he found it neceſſary to quit the Field without ſtaying to ſee Fate of his Father the old King of Bohemia; who tho' he had already loſt Eye, and was almoſt blind with Age, reſolv'd not to ſtain his former Victories h an ignoble Flight: But making the Gentlemen about him lead him up to Enemy, and ordering his Horſe's Bridle to be ty'd to thoſe next him, as reſt did to thoſe of their Companions, they fought ſo deſperately that they ere all ſlain upon the Place, and their dead Bodies were found the next Day urrounding that of their Maſter. Then were the Arms of that valiant King, eing three Oſtrich-Feathers, taken by the Prince of Wales and afterwards us'd in his Device; and have ever ſince been born by his Succeſſors the Princes of Wales.

The Black Prince and the Engliſh are victorious.

Ibid. In the mean while King Philip did not fail to perform the Part not only of a courageous General, but alſo of a valiant Soldier: For rallying again the Flower of his Nobility and Men of Arms, he enter'd the hotteſt of the Battel, nd not being known, he was ſo hemm'd in among the Engliſh, that his Horſe ing kill'd, he was remounted by thoſe about him; and being again diſmoun- , and wounded in the Neck and Thigh, he had been ſlain or taken Priſoner d he not been mounted a third Time by the Lord John of Hainault; who the ſame Time, partly by Perſuaſions and partly by Force, oblig'd him to uit the Field. After whoſe Departure little Reſiſtance was made, ſo that e Victory in a ſhort Time fell intirely to the Engliſh; and Night put an nd to the Conflict. On the French Side were ſlain the two Kings of Bohe- ia and Majorca; and of Princes, the Earl of Alencon King Philip's Brother, the Earl of Blois, the Earl of Flanders, the Duke of Lorrain Nephew to the King of France, the Dauphine of Vienne, and many others of the chief Nobility of France, Bohemia and Germany. Beſides theſe, there fell twenty four Bannerets, twelve hundred Knights, fifteen hundred Gentlemen, four thouſand Men of Arms and Eſquires, and above thirty thouſand more of the Commons of France. And all this without the Loſs of any of the Engliſh Nobility, or of many common Soldiers; which was juſtly look'd upon as a ſignal Inſtance of the Divine Favour to King Edward's Arms; which were ſo nobly employ'd on this Day, being the twenty fourth of Auguſt, 1346. King Edward finding the Victory compleat, advanc'd with his untouch'd Battalion towards his victorious Son, and running into his Arms with a moſt affectionate Embrace and a Kiſs, he ſaid, My dear Son, Heav'n ſend you to perſevere in theſe proſperous Beginnings; you have this Day acquitted your ſelf moſt nobly, and truly merit that Crown for which we have fought. Inſtead of replying, the noble young Prince with the profoundeſt Modeſty and Silence fell n his Knees before his triumphant Father. The Night was ſpent by the whole rmy in ſolemn Rejoycing for this glorious Victory, but they made no manner of Boaſting: For it was the King's expreſs Command, That none ſhould inſult, or make any vain oſtentatious Songs, but all humbly to give Thanks to Almighty God, for his infinite Goodneſs and Mercy to them. The next Day, for the ſake of the Dead, the pious King caus'd the Place of Battel to be conſecrated, for the decent Sepulture both of his Enemies and Friends; and order'd that the Wounded ſhould be carefully dreſs'd and reliev'd; and to the meaner Sort, when recover'd, he generouſly gave Mony, and ſent them whither they pleas'd to go. While the King was taking Care of the Dead and Wounded, five hundred Lances and two thouſand Archers being ſent out to diſcover what was become of the Enemy, met with great Numbers of ſuch as were coming from Abbeville, Roven and other Places, all ignorant of what had happen'd; and ingaging with them, intirely defeated them, with the Loſs of ſeven thouſand Men. Our Writers report, that of Straglers that fled from the Battel, and of others that were coming towards the Place, there were ſlain many more than in the Field the Day before; which ſhews us the wonderful Loſs this afflicted Country ſuſtain'd at one fatal Blow.

The diſconſolate King Philip in the mean Time fled with a ſmall Company to the Caſtle of Braye, where the Guard enquiring who he was, he anſwer'd The Fortune of France; and being let in, he was receiv'd with all the Marks of Sorrow and Lamentation. Coming to Amiens, he bitterly exclaim'd againſt the Lord Godemar for ſuffering King Edward to paſs the River Somme, and threaten'd him with Death; but the Lord of Hainault moderated his Fury with this important Truth, That it was not in Godemar's Power to reſiſt the King of England, when all the Flower of France could not. And finding that Complaints and Puniſhments were of no Uſe, he endeavour'd to make the beſt Defence againſt the prevailing Arms of King Edward; who, reſolving to make the wiſeſt Uſe of his Victory, went and ſat down before the Town of Calais, which had been a long Annoyance both to him and his Kingdom, being then a Place of great Strength, and reputed the very Key of France. Nor did he inveſt it only by Land, but alſo block'd it up by Sea, the Earl of Huntington his Admiral lying before it with a great Fleet of ſeven hundred thirty eight Veſſels of all Sorts. Upon his Approach to the Place he ſent a Summons to John de Vienne the Governor To ſurrender to Him as rightful King of France, otherwiſe, upon taking the Place, he would put them all to the Sword. The other anſwer'd, He knew but one King of France, who had ſent him to keep that Place, of whoſe Aſſiſtance he doubted not, and in whoſe Service he reſolv'd to live and die. Upon this brave Anſwer, King Edward began to intrench himſelf ſtrongly before the City, and ſince he could not expect to take it by Aſſault, reſolv'd to reduce it by Famine; and to this End he threw up an Intrenchment quite round the Place, with regular Fortifications, and form'd his Camp into Streets, conſiſting of Huts cover'd with Reeds, ſufficient for his Soldiers to lodge in all the Winter. The Governor finding it was like to be a long Siege, reſolv'd to free the Town of as many uſeleſs Mouths as he could, and accordingly drove out more than ſeventeen hundred of the pooreſt and leaſt neceſſary People, and ſhut the Gates againſt them; which when the King ſaw, inſtead of driving them back and ſtarving them, he out of a Generous and Chriſtian Compaſſion permitted them to paſs through his Camp without Moleſtation, giving them all a Dinner, and two Pence a Perſon in Mony.

King Edward beſieges Calais.

His Generoſity.

Many Expedients were conſider'd for raiſing the Siege of this Important Place, but two more eſpecially: The firſt was to gather a ſufficient Force to beat King Edward in his Trenches, and the ſecond was to make a powerful Diverſion by Means of their ancient Allies the Scots. This latter, as the more eaſie, was firſt put in Execution by King David, who enter'd the Kingdom of England with a brave Army of above ſixty thouſand Men, aſſuring himſelf of Succeſs, in regard, as he conceiv'd, that the main Strength of the Nation was gone into France. But he ſoon found his Error: For the Lords of the North, as Gilbert Humfrevile Earl of Angos, and William Lord la Zouche, with eight other Lords, Percy, Mowbray, Nevile, Deincourt, Manley, Leyburne, Scroop and Muſgrave, as alſo the Arch-Biſhop of York and Biſhop of Durham, with others of the Clergy, gather'd ſo great a Force, and ſo well order'd them by the particular Animation of the Heroick Queen, who in Perſon rod from Rank to Rank, that they intirely defeated this great Army; took King David himſelf Priſoner, with the Earls of Fife, Menteth, Murrey and Southerland, the Lord Douglas, the Arch-Biſhop of St. Andrews, and many others, with the Death of at leaſt fifteen thouſand Soldiers. This Victory, as well as that of Creſſy, happen'd on a Saturday, ſix Weeks after the other; as if all Things had concurr'd to render this Year glorious and triumphant. King David was taken Priſoner by an Eſquire nam'd Copland, who carefully kept him in Poſſeſſion; and and being order'd by the Queen to deliver him up to her, he utterly refus'd, whereupon ſhe complain'd to the King lying then before Calais. Copland being commanded to repair thither, gave the King ſuch a modeſt and loyal Anſwer, that he order'd him a Reward of five hundred Pounds a Year in Land, with a Warrant to deliver his Royal Priſoner to the Queen; which he did at York with ſo handſom an Apology, as both ſhe and the Lords of the Council were fully ſatisfy'd. To compleat the Triumphs of this glorious Year, Sir Thomas Dagworth, like another Machabee, ſays our Author, with eight hundred Men of Arms, and one hundred Archers, in Bretaign overthrew Charles de Blois, who having twice in one Day with incredible Odds of Thirty to One, attack'd that brave Knight, was beaten out of the Field with extraordinary Loſs of Nobility and others ſlain and taken. Not long after, the ſame Sir Thomas, with only three hundred Men of Arms and four hundred Archers, attack'd the ſame Lord Charles, lying at the Siege of Roch-Darien, with twelve hundred Knights and Eſquires, ſix hundred other armed Men, two thouſand Croſs-Bow Men, and great Numbers of other Infantry; took Charles himſelf Priſoner, driving all his Forces, with incomparable Manhood and great Deſtruction out of the Field.

Sir Thomas Dagworth's Valour.

Still King Edward continu'd in Perſon before Calais, which he ſo cloſely block'd up by Sea and Land, that the Garriſon could receive no Relief; ſo that now they were reduc'd to a languiſhing Condition, as appear'd by a Letter from the Governor to King Philip, which by an extraordinary Accident fell into King Edward's Hands. In which he told his Maſter, That his People in Calais had eaten Horſes, Dogs and Rats; and nothing remain'd for them but to devour each other; wherefore they were reſolv'd, if not reliev'd, to die among their Enemies with Honour, rather than within the Walls by Famine. King Edward, by an uncommon Strain of Generoſity, ſent this Letter to King Philip, requiring him to uſe all Expedition, and ſuccour his good People in Calais, who ſuffer'd ſuch Miſeries for his Sake. Upon which King Philip haſten'd his Preparations, and having at length gather'd together a vaſt Army of a hundred and fifty thouſand Men, he with his Son John Duke of Normandy march'd and advanc'd near to King Edward's Camp; and on the latter End of July he ſent to offer him Battel. But the King of England wiſely anſwer'd, That he ſhould find him within his Trenches, if he durſt venture the Experiment; but ſince he had been at ſuch Expence of Time and Treaſure, he would not leave the Place, 'till he was Maſter of it. After this two Cardinals, ſent on purpoſe, urg'd for a Mediation and Treaty; in which the French King offer'd King Edward all Gaſcony and Ponthieu, with the Marriage of his Son John, and alſo the City of Calais. To which was reply'd, That King Edward was not oblig'd to the other for Calais, ſince the Place and all in it were at his Mercy already. Next the French propos'd, That the Right of both Kings might be decided by Combat between five or ſix, choſen by each Side, and the Place aſſign'd by the King of France: To which the Earl of Lancaſter anſwer'd, That the Place ought to be aſſign'd by King Edward, as rightful King of England and France; for Philip of Valois had no Right at all: So the Cardinals finding all ineffectual, retir'd to St. Omers. King Edward at that Time having a Reinforcement of ſeventeen thouſand Men, not to be backwards in Bravery, not only offer'd the French King Battel, but alſo at his own Coſt to fill the Trenches, and remove all Impediments that could hinder them from joining; provided he might have ſufficient Security that nothing ſhould be convey'd into the Town during that Time. This generous Offer was likewiſe refus'd, and King Philip, in a deſpairing Condition, ſuddenly ſet fire to his Tents, and with his vaſt Army retir'd to Amiens, where he disbanded his Soldiers.

A. D. 1347. Reg. 21.

The remarkable Siege of Calais.

King Edward's Bravery.

This Retreat extinguiſh'd all the Hopes of the Caliſians, and caus'd the Governor to take down the Banner of France, to ſet up that of England, and to beg a Parly with King Edward. This was granted, but by reaſon of the frequent Piracies, as well as obſtinate Defence they had made, the King would grant no milder Terms than that ſix of the chief Burgers of the Place ſhould come to him bare headed, bare footed, in their Shirts, with Halters about their Necks, the Keys of the Town and Caſtle in their Hands, and ſubmit themſelves to the King's Pleaſure: For the reſt he was deſign'd to ſhew them Mercy. This final Sentence being brought to the Town, caus'd a general Conſternation, it being thought impoſſible to find ſix who would fall a Sacrifice for the reſt; 'till at laſt a chief Burger call'd Euſtace St. Pierre gave a noble Example of Heroick Courage and Concern for his Fellow-Citizens, and bravely offer'd himſelf to be the firſt Man; which ſoon excited five Others to join with him. Theſe ſix being brought before the King in that ignominious Manner as was appointed, he was at firſt inexorable, and notwithſtanding the earneſt Interceſſions of his Son and Lords about him, he order'd them all to be immediately beheaded. But this deplorable Spectacle ſo pierc'd the Heart of the generous Queen, then in the Camp and great with Child, that ſhe went and threw her ſelf at the King's Feet, and begg'd of him for the Sake of Jeſus Chriſt, the Bleſſed Virgin, and the tender Love between them, that ſhe might have the Lives of thoſe poor miſerable Men. This affecting Sight ſoon melted the King into a tender Compaſſion and Compliance; and ſhe immediately caus'd them to be carry'd into her Apartment, where being new cloath'd ſhe order'd them a Dinner and ſix Nobles a Man, and then to be ſet at full Liberty: A noble and God-like Action, and worthy ſuch a great and pious Queen. And thus the ſtrong City of Calais was gain'd upon the third Day of Auguſt, 1347, after almoſt a whole Year's Siege with infinite Labour and Expence: All the Inhabitants, except a Prieſt and two ancient Men, were turn'd out, and ſent away to ſeek new Habitations; and a Colony of the Engliſh were planted in their Room, which continu'd in the Poſſeſſion of the Engliſh Crown above two hundred Years after. Upon the Taking of the Place, by the Mediation of Cardinals and other great Men, a Truce was concluded and ſworn between the two Kings, upon the twenty eighth Day of September, to continue 'till fifteen Days after the Midſummer following; and King Edward in a ſhort Time after, having ſetled the Town and his Affairs in thoſe Parts, making Sir Amery de Pavy, an Italian, Governor of the Place, return'd into England with great Glory and Renown; and ſpent the remaining Part of the Year in Triumphs and Tournaments, celebrated with extraordinary Magnificence.

VI. Never was the Engliſh Name ſo great and glorious as at this Time, nor did England her ſelf in any preceding Age enjoy a King more renown'd for Wiſdom, Valour and Good Fortune; the mighty Splendor of his Virtues, not only adorning her with Garlands, conquer'd Spoils and Trophies, but ſeeming alſo, like ſome new ſhining Sun, to infuſe Plenty and Fertility into the Earth it ſelf. To add to his Glory, this Year he was ſolemnly elected Emperor of Germany, by the Princes of that Empire, and Ambaſſadors were ſent over to him to deſire him to accept of that Dignity: But after a mature Conſideration of the Troubles and Factions in the Empire, he fully declin'd it, declaring to the Ambaſſadors, That he would not undertake ſo great a Burden, 'till he had gain'd the Crown of France, which was due to him by Hereditary Right. All this Year England ſo glory'd in the Spoils of France, that there was ſcarce a Woman of Condition but could ſhow ſome rich Furs and Foreign Furniture, and the Engliſh Ladies began to pride themſelves in the Faſhions of the French; and Luxury now increaſing, fine Table-Linnen, Gold and Silver, Plate and Jewels were commonly ſeen in the Houſes of private Perſons. And indeed the Vanity of the Women became very great at this Time; and they were ſo fond of Tournaments, that it was ordinary for them to ride forty or fifty in a Troop to theſe Aſſemblies; and having more Beauty than Diſcretion, went dreſs'd like Men in Party-colour'd Coats, embroider'd Girdles, and Daggers Daggers at their Waſtes; and thus they rod upon fine Horſes from one Tournament to another, waſting their Eſtates, and loſing their Reputations. But God had provided a ſevere Scourge for the Luxury now reigning in the Nation, ſending a dreadful Plague throughout the Nation, ſo that the Earth was fill'd with Graves, and the Air with Cries and Lamentations. This Peſtilence began firſt among the Turks, and pierc'd by Degrees into Italy and France, where it cut off many thouſands. In the City of London it had ſo quick and ſharp an Edge, that in the Space of one Year, there were bury'd in the common Church-yard call'd the Ceſtertian, or Charter-Houſe, above fifty thouſand Perſons. A. D. 1349. Reg. 23. A terrible Plague.

Froiſart. During theſe Calamities, the Lord Charny Governor of St. Omers made a ſecret Bargain with St. Amery de Pavy Governor of Calais, for twenty thouſand Crowns to betray that important Town to him; of which King Edward having Notice, went privately thither the very Night the Delivery was agreed on, with the Prince of Wales, and ſeveral Earls and Barons, and lodg'd himſelf in the Caſtle, to ſecure it with the Men he brought with him. The Mony was actually brought and paid, and twelve Knights and a hundred Men at Arms were let into the Caſtle; but to their great Surprize were immediately made Priſoners by the King's Guards who lay undiſcover'd. The Lord Charny was then under the Town with a conſiderable Force, plac'd near two Gates, ready to enter it when they were open'd. But in the mean Time the Prince of Wales iſſu'd out at one Gate, and the King at the other, conceal'd under the Banner of Sir Walter Manny, and fought bravely on Foot among the common Soldiers, being ingag'd with the Lord Euſtace of Rylemont, a valiant Man, who ſtruck the King twice to his Knees; yet at laſt he was overcome by him, and made his Priſoner, with the Lord Charny and many other French Men of Note. The young Prince alſo prevail'd againſt the Party he ingag'd; and there were ſlain and drown'd about ſix hundred French, who were double the Number to the Engliſh that ſally'd out upon them; ſo much did the latter exceed the former in Valour. The Night following the King order'd a ſplendid Supper to be provided, as well for the Priſoners as his own Nobility; and to their great Surprize coming in amongſt them, he told the Lord Charny, That he was but a little oblig'd to him, ſince he deſign'd to ſteal that from him by Night, which he fairly won by Day. But coming to the valiant Rylemont, he after a moſt obliging Manner took a rich Chaplet of Pearls from his own Head, and plac'd it upon the other's, as one who had deſerv'd beſt in the whole Action, and generouſly forgave him his Ranſom. Then removing Sir Amery de Pavy from his Government, and placing Sir John Beauchamp in his Room, the King return'd into England in Triumph with the chiefeſt of his Priſoners. A ſecret Deſign to betray Calais. The King prevents it in Perſon.

Walſing. &c. And now the renown'd Edward, reſolving to give the higheſt Incouragement to all Martial Virtues, about this Time inſtituted, or rather compleated the moſt Noble Order of Knighthood call'd the Garter. For the more ſolemn and magnificent Celebration of it, the King ſent his Heralds into France, Germany, the Low-Countries, and almoſt all the Kingdoms in Europe, to invite all Knights and Eſquires to come and ſhew their Military Skill and Valour, in all Kinds of Martial Exerciſes. As to the Original, Form and Nature of this glorious Order, we muſt refer our Reader to the learned Mr. Aſhmole's elaborate Work upon that Subject; and ſhall only obſerve, That the End and Deſign of this Inſtitution was truly noble and generous, and worthy of the mighty Prince who had invented it. For it was not only to adorn martial Virtue by ſplendid Robes and rich Jewels, but alſo to engage them by a Solemn Oath before God to preſerve Fidelity, Honour and Courage in the Minds of thoſe who were admitted into it; which Virtues were juſtly eſteem'd as the nobleſt Badges and Diſtinctions of all Military Men, and by a ſtrict Obſervation of which they could only acquire great and real Reputation; when not to act juſtly, valiantly and faithfully, was accounted the moſt imaginable Blemiſh and Diſhonour. A. D. 1350. Reg. 24. He conſtitutes the noble Order of the Garter.

nour. Not long after this famous Inſtitution, King Edward had a freſh Occaſion to ſhow his Valour: For hearing that certain Spaniſh Men of War, who the preceding Year had cruelly ſlain many Engliſhmen and taken away their Commodities, were come into his Seas, he like a Martial Neptune encounter'd them in Perſon not far from Winchelſey, with ſuch Ships as could ſuddenly be procur'd; and after a moſt obſtinate Fight, in which he and the Prince of Wales did Wonders, he took twenty ſix of the principal Ships, ſunk others, and drove away the reſt. The Gallantry and Spirit of the Spaniards was ſuch, that diſdaining to out-live the Diſgrace of yielding, moſt of them dy'd by the Engliſh Weapons, or were drown'd in the Sea. Thus did this great Prince ſeek all Occaſions, as well by Sea as Land, to expoſe his Perſon, not only to gain Glory, of which he had already ſufficient, but to defend his Nation from Foreign Enemies that had inſulted it; and he ſeems ſo much to have valu'd himſelf upon that Account, that on the firſt Pieces of Gold he ever coin'd, we find his Figure repreſented with a drawn Sword in the middle of a Ship of War. In the ſame Year dy'd Philip King of France, after he had reign'd twenty three Years, and was ſucceeded by his Son John Duke of Normandy, who renew'd the Truce with the Engliſh 'till Pentecoſt in the Year 1356.

He defeats the Spaniſh Fleet.

A. D. 1351. Reg. 25. But this Truce was not long well obſerv'd in France, each Nation taking what Advantage they could upon the other, in Picardy, Bretaign and Gaſcony. Sir John Beauchamp Governor of Calais finding the Ways to that Place much infeſted by the French, march'd out with three hundred Men at Arms, and two hundred Archers on Horſeback, and took much Booty in the adjacent Country; but in his Return was encounter'd by the Lord Beaulieu with a Body of two thouſand Frenchmen; which Lord he ſlew, and had routed his Company, when another ſtronger Party came up, and worſted his, took him Priſoner with twenty Engliſh Knights beſides. For the preſent he was ſucceeded by Sir Robert Herle, who being recruited by a ſelect Body of Men commanded by the Lord Manny, march'd into the French Territories, and after much Damage to the Neighbourhood, return'd without Loſs and ſo large a Booty of Cattel, that a fat Ox at Calais would hardly yield ſixteen Pence Sterling. Not long after Henry Earl of Lancaſter, lately made a Duke in Parliament, and the ſecond in England, was ſent by King Edward to Calais, who marching along the Sea-Coaſts, burnt the Suburbs of Boloign to the very Walls; then advancing as far as Eſtaples, which he plunder'd, he took a Compaſs to return back on the right Hand, where he did the like to Fanquenberg, and after that to Terouenne. In the Havens of theſe Towns he fir'd above a hundred Veſſels of all Sorts, and proceeded with Fire and Sword up to Arques and the Gates of St. Omers; and having ſufficiently made known the Terror of his Arms, he triumphantly return'd to Calais with many Priſoners and much Booty. In Bretaign, where the valiant Sir Thomas Dagworth had been unfortunately ſlain, Guy de Neſle, Marſhal of France, raiſing a conſiderable Army in that Country, was gallantly attack'd by Sir Walter Bently, Sir Robert Knolls and other brave Captains, who tho' they had but three hundred Men of Arms and ſix hundred Archers, intirely defeated him, with above four Times their Number. Thirteen Lords, a hundred and forty Knights, a hundred Eſquires, five hundred Men of Arms, and great Numbers of common Soldies were ſlain; and nine Lords, and a hundred and forty Knights and Eſquires were taken Priſoners: Which prov'd a terrible Blow to the French Intereſt in thoſe Parts, and was not eaſily repair'd. In the ſame Year, the Governor of Calais finding the Town and Caſtle of Guiſnes, within five Miles of it, to be a great Curb to his Garriſon on that Side, found Means to corrupt the Deputy-Governor of the Place, and had the Town betray'd to him for a certain Sum of Mony. Upon the taking of this Place in the Time of Truce, when Complaint was made of it by the French King's Envoys to King Edward, his Anſwer was, That Philip his Father, by attempting to purchaſe Calais, in the ſame Manner had taught Judging it more requiſite to advance his own Towns than thoſe of Foreigners, by the Commodities of his Kingdom. In the ſame Parliament that this was ſetled, many wiſe Ordinances were alſo enacted for the Governing and Ordering this Staple. Stow mentions an Act made in this Parliament at the Inſtance of the Londoners, That no common Harlot ſhould wear any Hood, except rayed or ſtrip'd with divers Colours, nor Furs; but Garments revers'd the wrong Side outwards: In which they endeavour'd well to ſet a ſcandalous Mark upon Impurity, to render it the more odious. ſon to the famous Mortimer, who was attainted and executed twenty three Years before, was now reſtored to Blood, and the Judgment againſt the Grandfather was revers'd, as being given without his Anſwering, and contrary to Law. About the ſame Time great Mediation was made by the Pope to reconcile the two Kings of England and France; and Commiſſioners met on both Sides to treat and conclude a Peace. The chief Article in Deliberation was That the King of England ſhould enjoy the whole Dukedom of Gaſcony, with the City of Calais, and the whole Counties of Artois and Guiſnes, for himſelf and Succeſſors, independently, without doing any Kind of Homage to the Kings of France. This at firſt ſeem'd fully agreed on, but at length was broken off by the French, to their further Calamity and Confuſion, who might better have given up a Ceremony relating to a Part, than have had the Whole ſo miſerably rent and torn in Pieces as it was afterwards.

ward that John King of France had given the Dukedom of Gaſcony to his Son the Dauphine, being much incens'd he immediately beſtow'd that Province upon his invincible Son the Prince of Wales; commanding Him to defend his Right with his Sword againſt his Adverſaries. All Things being ready for his Voyage, accompany'd with the Earls of Warwick, Suffolk, Salisbury and Oxford, the Lords Chandoys, Audley, Butefort, Liſle, and other brave Men, and having a thouſand Men at Arms, and fourteen hundred Archers, he ſet Sail towards Gaſcony; where he immediately proceeded to perform Actions worthy of his great Name and Courage. On the other Side, King Edward, rous'd with a falſe Alarm, croſs'd over the Seas, in Expectation of finding his Enemy King John at St. Omers; but failing of that, after many generous Offers of Combate and Battel, he ravag'd as far as Heſdin, and then return'd back to England o recover the Town of Berwick which the Scots had gotten by Surprize. Calling a Parliament at Weſtminſter, a great Supply was granted to him of fifty Shillings upon every full Sack of Wool, for ſix Years enſuing; by which Impoſition, our Hiſtorians believe that the King might be able to expend a thouſand Marks a Day; ſuch Vent of Wool was at that Time. But Berwick, before King Edward could appear to ſuccour it, was burnt and diſmantled, and then abandon'd by the Scots. The French had ſent forty thouſand Crowns and ſome Men at Arms into Scotland, to ſupport their Confederates againſt the Engliſh; but King Edward, not ſatisfy'd in regaining his own without chaſtiſing his Adverſaries, proceeded in a hoſtile Manner againſt the Scots both by Sea and Land. At Roxborough, Baliol one of the Kings of Scotland ſurrender'd to King Edward all the Right and Title which he had to that Kingdom, or any of the Appendages, reſerving only to himſelf a yearly Penſion of two thouſand and fifty Pounds:

His mighty Actions.

In the mean Time the Prince of Wales, as it were in Emulation of his Father's Glory, perform'd Wonders in France; for with his victorious Arms he recover'd many Cities, Towns and Priſoners, piercing like a Thunderbolt through all Languedoc, and taking and deſtroying the two great Cities of Narbon and Carcaſſone, which our Authors compare to London and York. The Damage done to the French King in this Expedition was exceeding great, for out of theſe Countries he rais'd a yearly Revenue of about four hundred thouſand old Crowns. The Pope ſending a Meſſenger from Avignon, with an Overture to intercede for Peace, had this Anſwer, That the Meſſage muſt be ſent to the King his Father, for he could not act without his particular Commands. In the mean Time he diſpos'd of all Things without Moleſtation, and return'd loaded with Spoils and Honour to Bourdeaux; from whence, after ſome Refreſhment, he ſet forwards for new Enterprizes and Adventures. His Army conſiſted of about eight thouſand brave and expert Soldiers, with whom he courageouſly advanc'd through Peregort and Limoſin into the very Heart of France, up to the Gates of Bourges in Berry; the Terror of his Name ſtill flying before him to his mighty Advantage. Thus ſatisfy'd for the preſent, he took a new Compaſs, with Deſign to return by Renvorantine in Blaſois, which he took, and then through the Countries of Tourain, Poictou and Xantoign, to his chief City of Bourdeaux. But John King of France, hurry'd on with Impatience and haſtning to go beyond his Father in Misfortunes, follow'd with an Army of ſixty thouſand Men, and near the City of Poictiers overtook the invincible Prince. Having drawn up his Men, he in a ſhort Speech told them, That while they were at Paris, and on their March, he had heard them deliver very ſwelling Words, How they would treat the Engliſh whenever they approach'd them: That now they were not far diſtant, and therefore he would ſoon lead them thither, hoping to find their Actions anſwerable to their former Threats. At the ſame Time two Cardinals from the Pope began to mediate a Peace; but the French King, ſuppoſing he had his Enemy at his Mercy, would accept of no other Conditions, but that the Prince ſhould deliver him four Hoſtages, and as vanquiſh'd, ſurrender himſelf and his Army to his Diſcretion. To which unworthy Motion the Prince reply'd with a contemptuous Smile, That he hop'd to conquer; but if not, he could but die, yet he would never yield to loſe his Honour, which he valu'd above his Life. The Legates Perſuaſions being ineffectual, both Parties prepar'd for Battel.

The glorious Battel of Poictiers.

Now was the Time that this youthful Hero, fir'd with new Proſpects of Glory, began to diſplay his noble Qualifications, and to ſignalize both his Wiſdom and Valour, after a moſt amazing Manner. Having mounted his Steed, riding from Rank to Rank, he told his Men That Victory was in the Hands of Heav'n, and not always to be gain'd by a Multitude; which if they obtain'd, immortal Honour would be their Reward, or elſe Death would put an end to their Labours: But for his Part England ſhould never pay his Ranſom, for he was reſolv'd either to die or conquer. Then wiſely taking all the Advantage that the Ground, Vines and Shrubs would afford them, a bloody Fight ſoon follow'd, which laſted above four Hours with uncommon Variety. Never did the Engliſh give nobler Teſtimony of their Valour and Bravery than at this Time; and the Prince himſelf with incredible Fury ruſh'd into the thickeſt of his Foes, forcing his Way with his inſatiable Sword, and like a raging Lion dealing Death and Deſtruction to all that approach'd him. At length the admirable Conduct and inimitable Courage of the Engliſh prevail'd againſt the powerful Numbers of the French; ſo that they were intirely defeated, and forc'd to abandon the Field; and King John himſelf, after a long and valiant Reſiſtance ance was taken Priſoner, together with his Son Philip, then but thirteen Years of Age. Thus in ſhort was this wonderful Battel gain'd in the Fields of Beauvoir, near Poictiers on Monday the nineteenth Day of September, to the great Glory of the Engliſh Prince and Nation. There were ſlain divers of the chief and moſt valiant of the Nobility of France, among whom were the two Dukes of Bourbon, beſides many Earls and Barons, about ſix thouſand Men at Arms, and of the common Sort eight thouſand more. The Place of Battel was left free to the Engliſh, and more than a hundred Warlike Banners were brought away in Triumph. When the Engliſh were all return'd from the Chace, they found they had twice as many Priſoners as themſelves; the chief of whom were the French King, his Son Philip, and ſeventeen Earls, beſides Barons, Knights and Eſquires to the Number of about two thouſand: Wherefore to prevent the Inconveniency of too many Priſoners, they let many of them go upon their Paroles, and appointed them their fix'd Ranſoms, in which they were very moderate; for the Engliſh generouſly declar'd They would not ſet ſo high a Price upon a Knight or a Gentleman, but he might ſtill be able to live after his Rank, and to follow the Wars according to his Quality. The Loſs on the Engliſh Side was very inconſiderable, for we find not the Name of any Perſon of Quality: But thoſe who were moſt remarkable for their Valour were the Earls of Warwick, Suffolk, Salisbury, Oxford and Stafford, the Lords Cobham, Spenſer, Barkley, Baſſet, Sir John Chandois, and others, who behav'd themſelves with incomparable Bravery. But the Lord James Audley gain'd the greateſt Honour both for his Valour and Bounty, who having vow'd to be foremoſt in the Battel, perform'd his Promiſe to Admiration, and ſeal'd it with numerous Wounds; for which the Prince having rewarded him with a Gift of five hundred Pounds Fee-ſimple, he immediately gave it to his four faithful Eſquires who with him had ſuſtain'd the Brunt of the Day. The Prince demanding of him Whether he accepted his Gift, he anſwer'd That theſe Men had deſerv'd it as well as himſelf, and had more need of it; at which Anſwer the Prince was ſo ſenſibly pleas'd, that he gave him five hundred Pounds more in the ſame Kind, as the juſt Reward of ſo much Merit and Generoſity.

The Generoſity of the Lord Audley.

Ibid. By this famous Victory the Prince of Wales gain'd a double Conqueſt, One by his invincible Sword in the Field, and the Other by his unparallel'd Courteſie to his vanquiſh'd Enemies. For the Night after the Battel he order'd a noble Supper to be provided for the French King, and the Priſoners of the higheſt Quality; King John and his Son, with the Princes of the Blood being placed at one Table, while the reſt of the Lords and Knights ſate at others. The Prince in the mean Time waited at the King's Table, and when deſir'd to ſit down, he with all the real Marks of Humility reply'd, That he was not worthy to ſit down with ſo great a Monarch. And finding him ſtill dejected and afflicted, he endeavour'd to raiſe his Spirits by the moſt civil and ingaging Expreſſions, telling him among other Things, That his Majeſty being one of the braveſt of Chriſtian Kings had no Cauſe to afflict himſelf; for tho' his Arms had not been favour'd by the ſole Diſpoſer of all Victory, yet his Gallantry muſt be acknowledg'd, and his Royal Dignity ſhould be preſerv'd inviolable. As to himſelf he declard That the Realm of France ſhould always find him grateful to her which had produc'd ſo many of his Progenitors; and towards his Majeſty, if he would permit him to glory in that Title, he would ever ſhew himſelf a moſt humble and reſpectful Kinſman. This extraordinary Submiſſion in a conquering young Prince, about twenty five Years of Age, quite melted the captive King into a Flood of Tears; and when the French Lords ſaw the Prince ſo humble amidſt the higheſt Charms of Proſperity, and heard his generous Language deliver'd with ſuch an unaffected obliging Air, they declared among themſelves That he had ſpoken nobly and gallantly, and that he would prove a moſt accompliſh'd Prince. At length King John, recovering himſelf a little, forc'd a civil Smile, and with an affectionate Countenance ſaid,

The Greatneſs of the Black Prince.

He is admir'd by his Enemies.

That since it was his Fortune to be overcome, he had this uncommon Alleviation, That as he had not behav'd himself unworthily in the Battel, so he was fallen into the Hands of the most valiant and courteous Prince alive. The next Day the Prince causing his Chaplains and the Priests of the Army to celebrate Divine Service, he turn'd off all the Glory from himself, and most devoutly gave it to the great God of Victories; which being done, in the Sight and Hearing of the Prisoners, he heartily thank'd his Soldiers with Expressions full of Sincerity and Generosity. Then settling all Things, he march'd with his Prisoners and Trophies to Bourdeaux, the Capital City of his Dominions. How the News of this Victory was entertain'd in all Parts of the English Nation, is not hard to conjecture, but especially by King Edward, who gave speedy Orders to the two Arch-Bishops, that eight Days together should be spent in giving God the Honour and Glory of this wonderful Success.

A. D. 1357. Reg. 31.

The Prince having winter'd at Bourdeaux, and procur'd a sufficient Navy, in April set Sail for England, arriv'd at Plimouth, and by easie Journies came to London; where King John Royally adorn'd made a publick Entry, with the utmost Magnificence and Attendance, being mounted on a stately white Courser, as a Mark of Soveraignty, with the admir'd Prince riding by his Side upon a little black Nag, as one industriously avoiding all Suspicions of a Triumph. They were publickly receiv'd by the Lord Mayor and all the Companies in their richest Habits, their Houses and Streets being adorn'd with their most valuable Plate and Tapestry, as well as a noble Appearance of all Sorts of Armour and Weapons; and the Concourse of People were so numerous to behold so uncommon a Spectacle, that the Cavalcade held from three of the Clock in the Morning till high Noon; about which Time the Prince got to Westminster-Hall, where he solemnly presented to the King his Father, then sitting in great Majesty on his Royal Throne, the Person of King John his Prisoner. Yet King Edward could not long retain the severe Grandeur of a Conqueror; for when the Royal Captive approach'd his Throne, with such a manly Submission as became his present Fortune, he was sensibly touch'd with the Thoughts of the Instability of human Affairs, by the Sight of so great a Prince in so low a Condition; so that hastily rising, he met and caress'd him with as much Honour and Respect, as if he was only come to give him the Favour of a Visit. And the King had so true a Regard to Generosity as well as Valour, that being now acquainted with his Son's humble Deportment after the Battel of Poictiers, he declar'd, That he was more satisfy'd with that, than with the Victory it self. Nor did this great King make use of this solemn Entry as a Matter of his own Triumph, but rather of a devout Procession; for by his Order, the same Day the Clergy of London went forth in their proper Vestments, and singing Anthems to meet the Prince; and after that, for two Days together, publick Prayers and Thanksgivings were celebrated through the Cities of London and Westminster. King Edward, having treated his Prisoners after a great and magnificent Manner, order'd King John and his Son to be honourably lodg'd and entertain'd in the Savoy, being then a famous Palace belonging to the Duke of Lancaster; the rest were fix'd in other convenient Places. David King of the Scots was still kept Prisoner in the Castle of Odiam; but not long after, when he had endur'd about eleven Years Imprisonment, at the incessant Suit of Queen Joan his Wife, Sister to King Edward, he was releas'd, upon paying a Ransom of a hundred thousand Marks Sterling, and upon Condition of demolishing certain Forts and Castles.

In the following Year, King Edward, to display his Grandeur, issu'd out an extraordinary Proclamation That all Foreign Knights and Gentlemen from any Part of the World, desiring to come to the Feast of St. George, to be solemnly held at Windsor on the twenty third of April, should have his Letters of safe Conduct for the Space of three Weeks, there to partake of those Martial Honours and Prizes, which should attend the Exercises of his publick Justings and Tour-

Tournaments. Theſe were celebrated with the higheſt Magnificence and Splendor, and attended by the Duke of Brabant, and great Numbers of Lords, Knights and brave Men out of Germany, France, Flanders, Scotland, and other Nations. In the ſame Year dy'd the famous Iſabella, Mother to King Edward, in the ſixty third Year of her Age, after about twenty eight Years Confinement at the Caſtle of Riſings near London, as having been highly culpable in relation both to her Husband and the Nation. Her Marriage with King Edward II. as it prov'd fatal to her Husband, ſo it was unfortunate to her Country the Kingdom of France; ſince from her the preſent King of England deriv'd his Title, and brought infinite Miſeries upon that Nation, which at this Time were greater than ever happen'd ſince the Time of the Romans. For Charles the Dauphine, Duke of Normandy, who had eſcap'd from the Battel of Poictiers, took the Government upon him during his Father's Impriſonment; but by the dangerous Practices of Charles King of Navarre, and evil Diſpoſition of the Pariſians towards the Delivery of their Soveraign, he was grievouſly incumber'd, and ſurrounded with innumerable Miſchiefs, not being able as yet to work out his Father's Liberty. Moreover the Engliſh under the Conduct of Sir Robert Knowles, Sir James Pype, and Thomalin Foulk, committed terrible Devaſtations, and gain'd great Treaſure, Booty and Ranſoms, in Bretaign and Normandy, under the Pretence of ſerving thoſe of Navarre. In ſhort all the Kingdom of France was over-run with diſſolute Soldiers of ſeveral Nations, who having no General, waſted all at their Pleaſure, and by unheard of Inſolencies diſcover'd all the Miſeries of Anarchy and Confuſion.

Great Miſeries in France.

Froiſart. Mezeray. &c.

Two Cardinals in the Engliſh Court endeavour'd to put an End to theſe Troubles by accommodating the Matter between the two Kings; but could not with two Years Labour draw any Thing to ſuch a Head, as the French for their King's Liberty would perform; which put King Edward upon new Reſolutions againſt France. Therefore looking upon himſelf as deluded by the French, he with a vaſt Fleet of eleven hundred Sail paſs'd over from Sandwich, in Order to a new Invaſion. Being arriv'd at Calais, he ſet forwards from thence with an Army of a hundred thouſand Men divided into three great Bodies or Battalions; the firſt under the valiant Henry Duke of Lancaſter, the ſecond under the brave Prince of Wales, and the third led by himſelf. They march'd through Artois to the City of Rheims the Metropolis of Champaign, where the Kings of France were uſually crown'd and anointed; but miſſing of this Place, they ſoon took the Cities of Sens and Nevers without Reſiſtance. The Terror of theſe Armies ſoon put the Duke of Burgundy upon a Compoſition; and for a Sum of two hundred thouſand Florens of Gold obtain'd that all Burgundy ſhould be ſpar'd from Plunder and Devaſtations. The King kept his Chriſtmaſs near Rheims, where he was inform'd that the French had landed many Men upon the Coaſts of Suſſex, who had committed great Barbarities, but had in a ſhort Time retir'd. Upon this News he remov'd from thence and advanc'd towards the Walls of Paris; where he honour'd four hundred Eſquires and Gentlemen with the Order of Knighthood. Charles the Dauphine, Regent of France, was then in the City with a powerful Army, but could not by any Means be drawn to hazard a Battel, as dreading the Examples of his Grandfather and Father. Ample Conditions were in a humble Manner offer'd to King Edward, but as yet he was inflexible and deaf to any other, than ſuch as he himſelf like a Conqueror propos'd. Finding new Difficulties in the Siege of Paris, he retir'd into Bretaign to refreſh his Army; but upon his Return, ſeeing the Fortifications increas'd, he turn'd his Anger into the very Bowels of France, waſting and ravaging as far as Chartres and Orleans, and ſtill continu'd inexorable as to the French Propoſals. Yet in a ſhort Time an Accident from Heav'n chang'd his Mind, which was a prodigious Storm of Thunder, Hail and Rain, which kill'd ſix thouſand of his Horſes, and near a thouſand of his Men; and this ſo aſtoniſh'd the King and his Men, that looking upon it as a Mark of the Divine Diſpleaſure, he immediately proſtrated himſelf upon the Ground, and made a ſolemn Vow to Almighty God, that he would give a final Peace to France upon honourable Conditions. This, and the Duke of Lancaſter's Perſuaſions, ſo mollify'd him, that finally by the Mediation of the Pope's Legate, a Peace was concluded at Bretaign near Chartres, upon the eighth Day of May. Thus was the Kingdom of France deliver'd from its terrible Scourge by the Hands of Providence, when it was in a languiſhing, and almoſt expiring Condition.

A Peace concluded.

The Articles of it.

The Subſtance of the Articles of Agreement was this: That the King of England ſhould retain the whole Dukedom of Gaſcony, with the bordering Countries of Xaintoign, Poictou, Peregort, Limoſin, Quercie, Anyoleſm, Rovergne, &c. with all the Cities, Caſtles and Appendages, without any Dependency upon the King of France: That he ſhould likewiſe retain the County of Ponthieu, the Towns, Counties and Lordſhips of Calais, Guiſnes, Monſtruel, Hanves, Wale, Oye, St. Valary, Merk and Sangate: And that he ſhould receive from King John for a Ranſom, a Sum of Mony amounting to five hundred thouſand Pounds, the fifth Part to be paid down, and the reſt in two Years Time. For all this, the King of England ſhould renounce all his Right and Title to the Crown of France, the Dukedom of Normandy, the Counties of Tourain, Anjou, Maine, the Sovereignty and Homage of the Dukedom of Bretaign, and the Earldom of Flanders; and that he ſhould at his own Expences ſet King John at Liberty in Calais, within three Weeks Time. For the Performance of Covenants, Hoſtages were given of many of the greateſt Men in France, who were Sureties for the Ranſom: The Scots were not to be aſſiſted by the French King, nor the Flemmings by the Engliſh; and the King of Navarre and his Brother were comprehended in the Articles. The Treaty being ſolemnly ratify'd by both Kings, and Hoſtages given, King Edward honourably conducted King John to Calais, where he made a moſt magnificent Entertainment for him, being waited at the Table by King Edward's four Sons, and the chief Nobility of England. Here was King John ſet at full Liberty, after he had been a Priſoner above four Years; and both Kings departed in the moſt obliging Manner, with all the Demonſtrations of hearty Love and Affection.

VII. The Wars being ended between the two chief Crowns in Europe, and England being in a profound Peace, King Edward was pleas'd to reſtore by his Letters Patents to the Priors-Aliens all their Houſes, Lands and Eſtates, which were taken from them twenty three Years before for the Maintenance of the French Wars: A rare Example of a juſt King; it being ſeldom known that Princes give up what they have once got into their Poſſeſſion. In the ſame Year a ſecond Peſtilence happen'd in England, which ſwept away many of the Nobility and Biſhops, and among the reſt Henry Duke of Lancaſter, a Perſon of extraordinary Worth in all Reſpects, who fell much lamented by all Men, eſpecially the poorer Sort, by whom he was call'd the Good Duke. He founded the Collegiate Church of Leiceſter, and alſo a noble Hoſpital there for a hundred Poor People, which laſt ſtill continues. Shortly after his Death the Prince of Wales, now call'd the Black Prince, being in the one and thirtieth Year of his Age, with the Conſent of the King his Father, marry'd the beautiful Lady Joane, Counteſs Dowager of Kent, Widow of the late Earl Thomas Holland. In the following Year, not long after at a Royal Tournament held in Smithfield for five Days together, he was created Duke or rather Prince of Aquitain or Gaſcony, and was ſolemnly inveſted with that Dukedom by his Father, who now chang'd the Title of it into a Principality. In the ſame Year, in a Parliament was paſs'd that remarkable Statute which ordains, That all Pleadings and Judgments in the Courts of Weſtminſter, ſhould be for the future in Engliſh; gliſh, whereas before they were uſually in the French Language. In the ſame Parliament the King declar'd himſelf arriv'd to the fiftieth Year of his Age, deſigning to keep it as a Jubile, and to ſhew Acts of Grace and Mercy to his People; and therefore granted his General and Special Pardon to all, without Fine or paying any Fees for the Seal; and he ſet at Liberty all Debtors to the Crown, and Priſoners for Criminal Matters. He alſo confirm'd Magna Charta, which during this Reign had been confirm'd above ten ſeveral Times. In this Parliament alſo, he declar'd his Second Son Lionel, Duke of Clarence; his Third Sond, John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaſter; and his Fourth Son Edmund, Earl of Cambridge. So the King having paſs'd ſeveral Statutes, and fix'd the Staple of Wool at Calais, he ſpent the reſt of the Year in publick Pleaſures and Diverſions with his chief Nobility and French Hoſtages; taking a Progreſs with them through many Parts of England, and uſually expending for his own Part a hundred Marks, and ſometimes a hundred Pounds a Day.

New Promotions.

Froiſart. Knighton. Stow.

In the Beginning of the following Year, Prince Edward having waited upon the King his Father, took ſhipping with his beloved Princeſs and all his Retinue, and arriv'd at his Government of Gaſcony; where he kept a noble Court for the Space of three Years, and govern'd the Country with great Love and Clemency. In the mean Time King Edward's Court was honour'd with the Preſence of three Kings at the ſame Time, two of whom had formerly been Priſoners; David King of Scotland, who by the late Death of Edward Baliol, now obtain'd an indiſputable Title to that Kingdom; John King of France, who came to tranſact the Remains of his Ranſom, and the Delivery of his Hoſtages; and Peter King of Cyprus, who came over to deſire Aſſiſtance againſt the common Enemies of Chriſtendom. But none was ſo acceptable as King John, to meet whom King Edward ſent many of his Nobility to Dover, from whence he was conducted to Canterbury, where he offer'd a rich Jewel at the Shrine of Thomas Becket. From thence he went to the Palace of Eltham, where he was moſt obligingly receiv'd by the King and Queen, and entertain'd with all Sorts of Diverſions; and ſome Time after he was receiv'd by the Lord Mayor and Aldermen of London in the greateſt State, by whom he was magnificently treated. But Sir Henry Picard, a Merchant Vintner and formerly Lord Mayor, exceeded all Men in a wonderful Entertainment he made at his own Houſe for no leſs than four Kings at once, of England, France, Scotland and Cyprus, beſides the King's Sons and moſt of the Nobility of England: A Thing never done by any private Subject of the Nation. King John had his chief Reſidence at the Savoy, then a magnificent Palace belonging to the Duke of Lancaſter; but not long after, in the Beginning of the Spring, he was taken dangerouſly ill of a languiſhing Diſtemper, which put an End to his Life, on the eighth Day of April, to the great Grief of King Edward, his Queen, and the French Princes and Nobility. The King made him a noble Funeral at his own Expence, and caus'd his Body to be tranſported into France, where it was interr'd on the ſeventh of May at St. Denis. He was noted for this excellent Saying of his, That if Faith and Truth ſhould be baniſh'd from the reſt of the World, yet they ought to be found in the Mouths of Kings.

A. D. 1366. Reg. 40.

VIII. We have now brought this mighty Monarch to the fortieth Year of his Reign, which had it been his laſt, we had left him the moſt glorious and triumphant Prince in the World, to whom Fortune had always ſhown her Smiles, and ſcarce ever was retrograde. But now theſe laſt ten Years repreſent us with little Turnings of the Scale, ſome Declenſions from that wonderful Height of Glory, and with ſome Spots and Blemiſhes which Age and Frailty brought upon him. Yet ſtill he wanted not Vigour and Reſolution to perform many great Things, and particularly to reduce the exorbitant Pretences of the Pope in this Nation, who more than once poſitively demanded that infamous Tribute from England and Ireland that was firſt granted by King John. This being now again demanded, King Edward in a full Parliament order'd it to be debated by the Prelates, Lords and Commons ſeperately; and after a full Deliberation they declar'd, 'That neither John, nor any other King, could bring 'himſelf or his Kingdom to any ſuch Subjection, without their Aſſent, as ap- 'pear'd from the plaineſt Evidences; and if it were done, it was void, as being 'againſt their Conſent and his Coronation Oath: Therefore they finally re- 'ſolv'd, That if the Pope ſhould by Proceſs, or any other Way attempt to con- 'ſtrain the King or his Subjects to agree with any Claims in that Reſpect, they 'would reſiſt him to the utmoſt of their Power. Thus by the Care of the King, and the Stout Oppoſition of the Parliament, this haughty Demand of the Biſhop of Rome was quaſh'd for ever; for we do not find that it was ever reviv'd afterwards.

The Pope's Pretenſions quaſh'd Rot. Parl.

Still the mighty Prince of Wales remain'd in his Government of Gaſcony, with a ſplendid Court and a noble Attendance, and without Imployment, 'till he was humbly ſolicited by Peter King of Caſtile to aſſiſt him, who for his Cruelties and Tyrannical Actions, had been driven out of his Kingdom by his natural Brother Henry; all which the Prince, by the particular Conſent of his Father, chearfully undertook, upon Promiſe of large Remunerations. The Cauſe was much better than the Perſon: For this Peter, Son to Alphonſo II. King of Caſtile, had prov'd intolerable to his Subjects, oppreſſing and deſtroying his Nobility to inrich himſelf, divorcing and then murdering his Wife, Siſter to the preſent Queen of France, by the Inſtigation of his Concubine Maria de Padilla, whom he afterwards marry'd. Peter to abandon his Kingdom. The brave Black Prince, thirſting after Glory, and deſirous to ſuccour the Diſtreſſed, paſs'd over the Pyrenæan Mountains into Spain with a compleat Army of thirty thouſand Men, having in his Company, beſides moſt of the prime Commanders of the Engliſh, the Perſons of two Kings, Peter King of Caſtile, and the King of Majorca, and John Duke of Lancaſter, who ſome Time after Peter's Death was himſelf King of Caſtile and Leon. On the other Side the new King Henry for the Defence of his acquired Kingdom had gather'd together great Numbers, as well French as Caſtilians, and others both Chriſtians and Saracens, not fewer than a hundred thouſand Men. Upon the Borders of Caſtile near Najara a general Battel was fought between theſe two unequal Armies; where the Heroical Prince of Wales, now Black indeed with the amazing Terror he ſtruck into his Enemies, obtained a compleat Victory, with the Death of many thouſands on the other Side; and Bertram de Glequin, the French General, with many others were taken Priſoners. As ſoon as the Battel was over, King Peter, tranſported with the mighty Valour of the Prince, kneel'd down to give him Thanks with the Marks of Adoration; but the other running to embrace him would by no Means permit it: However bowing very low, he gave him Thanks, That by his Valour and Aſſiſtance he had now regain'd his Crown: To which the Prince with admirable Modeſty reply'd, Sir, return your Thanks to God Almighty, and give him all the Glory; for by Him alone, and not by Me, you have obtain'd the Victory. The Fame of this Action however flew through all Parts of Europe, and the Germans, Flemmings and Engliſh in eſpecial Manner acknowledg'd the Prince of Wales to be the Glory of Honour and Knighthood, and that ſuch a Prince was worthy to govern the World, ſince he had atchiev'd three ſuch wonderful Enterprizes; Firſt at Creſſy, where by him the whole Power of France was broken, two Kings ſlain, and a third put to flight; next at Poictiers, where he again overcame the whole Power of France, and took its King Priſoner; and now in Spain, where at one ſingle Blow he decided the Fate of a Kingdom; as tho' he had the Power to make and unmake Kings and Princes: For he never left Peter, 'till he had replac'd him upon his Throne at Burgos.

The Black Prince conſents

He obtains a glorious Victory at Najara.

His great Fame.

Ibid. But notwithſtanding all this Glory, the Prince prov'd a great Sufferer in a ſhort Time, from the monſtrous Falſhood and Ingratitude of King Peter; for tho' he had ſhown himſelf the moſt generous Man in the World to this wicked Prince, he was forc'd to return to Bourdeaux without Mony to pay his Army, which occaſion'd extraordinary Miſchiefs to himſelf, and to the Engliſh Dominions beyond Sea; as if God himſelf had been diſpleas'd for his ſuccouring ſuch a Tyrant. Therefore the Prince, who declar'd Honour ſhould be his Reward, to pay off his Soldiers who had been deluded by Peter, coin'd his own Plate for Mony; and when that prov'd inſufficient, he laid upon his Subjects of Gaſcony and the neighbouring Provinces a new Tax, which provok'd them to a dangerous Revolt. However God's Vengeance found out Peter; for not long after his Baſtard Brother Henry return'd with new Forces, and by the Aſſiſtance of Glequin and the French, he not only expell'd him from his Throne, but alſo murder'd him with his own Hands. Thus ended this great Expedition of the Black Prince, which almoſt put a Period to the Health and Happineſs of his Life; for in this Journey he contracted an incurable Diſpoſition, which ſome impute to an inveterate Poiſon, that produc'd dangerous Symptoms both upon his Body and Mind 'till the Day of his Death. We may here likewiſe in a manner conclude all the Happineſs and good Succeſs of King Edward's Reign, during the reſt of which we ſcarce meet with any Thing but the untimely Death of his Sons, and his moſt beloved Queen, the Diſcontents and Factions of his Nobility and Subjects, with the Revolt and Loſs of moſt of what he had gain'd by his Conqueſts in France.

Peter proves ungrateful.

The Black Prince declines.

Now

A. D. 1368. Reg. 42.

Now began the Peace between England and France to diſſolve it ſelf by ſeveral Steps and Degrees. For while King Edward quietly enjoy'd himſelf in the noble Virtues and Actions of his Sons and Subjects, Charles King of France ſirnam'd The Wiſe, warn'd by the numerous Calamities his Dominions had ſuſtain'd from the Engliſh in open War, and moſt earneſtly deſiring to recover the Honour of his Nation, betook himſelf to other Arts and Methods; never venturing his own Perſon, but executing all his Deſigns by Deputies, in which the Service of Bertram de Glequin, afterwards Conſtable of France, was of extraordinary Benefit. Nor did he neglect in Time to find out proper Colours to paint over his Colluſions and Contrivances for ſaving his Honour; inſomuch that when it came to a publick Scrutiny, the Loſs was plainly upon King Edward's Side, and the Cauſe of the Breach at leaſt render'd doubtful. His Practices were notwithſtanding palpable, and it muſt be acknowledg'd that King Edward, relying too much upon the Rules of Honour and Magnanimity, did not reap the juſt Effects of ſuch mighty Victories; nor of a Peace which was ſo ſolemnly ratify'd, that in the World's Opinion it could not on one Side be infring'd, without a manifeſt Invaſion of all Obligations Divine and Human. The Prince of Wales by Letters advertis'd his Father not to truſt to any ſpecious Overtures of Amity and Alliance made by the French, becauſe he found that they had entertain'd ſecret Practices in every Place againſt him. But the Prince was then judg'd to ſpeak out of a reſtleſs Delight after War, and therefore prevail'd not; tho' the Effects ſoon diſcover'd that his Words were unqueſtionably true.

The French King improves.

A. D. 1369. Reg. 43.

For now King Charles, having by ſpeedy Payments and other Methods recover'd all the French Hoſtages out of England, us'd all Means to abuſe King Edward's Credulity, 'till he had advanc'd as far as Diſſimulation could carry him. He courted the good old King with obliging Letters and Preſents, while his Plots were ripening abroad, and the County of Ponthieu, King Edward's undoubted Inheritance was ſurpriz'd before he heard of it. And whereas the Prince of Wales in Gaſcony demanded a certain Tax upon Chimnies, the Earls of Armignac and Cominges, and other Lords ſubject to the Prince, hating the Engliſh Empire, repair'd to the French Court at Paris, there to purſue an Appeal from this Oppreſſion made by the Prince, who was not ſo happy as to follow the Advice of Sir Robert Knolls and other wiſe Counſellors who diſſuaded this Impoſition. Theſe Lords pretended that he was to anſwer before King Charles as his ſuperior Lord, from whom he held by Homage and Fealty; and tho' King Edward and his Heirs were abſolutely freed by the laſt Treaty from all Manner of Service for his Dominions in France, King Charles at length proceeded to ſummon the Prince of Wales to Paris, to anſwer his Subjects Accuſations. His Anſwer was like himſelf, That he would come attended with ſixty thouſand Men. The King of England complain'd of the Breach of Peace to the Pope and the Emperor, who made a Journey into France to reconcile the two Kings; before whom the Engliſh Ambaſſadors alledg'd, That the French were the firſt Infringers of the ſolemn Treaty by ſeizing of Ponthieu and ſeveral Parts of Gaſcony, without firſt demanding Reſtitution for any Injury committed, and inſiſted upon many other unfair Practices. The French on the other Side alledg'd That King Edward had not made that publick Renunciation to the Crown of France as the Treaty oblig'd him, nor did he withdraw his Troops out of France ſo ſoon as he ought; therefore the Breach was on the Engliſh Side, becauſe the Soldiers were theirs. Thus both Sides had their plauſible Pretences, but neither ſubmitted to an Agreement.

The French King's Deſigns.

His Pretenſions

Upon this King Edward call'd a Parliament, declar'd the Breach, deſir'd Supplies, and obtain'd them; and further by their Advice he reaſſum'd his Claim to the Crown of France, and alter'd his Seals accordingly. John Duke of Lancaſter and Humphry Bohun Earl of Hereford were ſent over with a powerful Army to Calais to invade France on that Side; while the Prince of Wales was endeaendeavouring to recover the revolted Towns on the other. But not much was effected, and the Duke after he had pierc'd as far as Roan return'd home. After whom Thomas Beauchamp Earl of Wartwick was ſent over with freſh Supplies, but he dy'd in his Expedition; leaving behind him the Character of One who had ſcarce his Equal for Loyalty and Courage. In England was nothing but Grief and Mourning for the Death of the excellent Queen Philippa, who had been Wife to King Edward for forty four Years, and had born him twelve Children. A little before her Death, the King being by, ſhe in a ſolemn Speech acknowledg'd the great Happineſs, Peace and Proſperity in which they had liv'd for ſo many Years, and concluded with making him three Requeſts: Firſt, That he would be pleas'd to pay all her Debts; Secondly, That he would make good all her Charities and Donations to Colleges, Churches and Religious Houſes; and Laſtly, That he would give Orders that whenever he dy'd his Body might be bury'd by hers at Weſtminſter. Theſe being granted with the moſt tender Expreſſions, having recommended her ſelf, him and her Children to God's Mercy, ſhe quietly departed, to the exceeding Grief of all her Subjects, who highly lov'd her as a true Friend to the Engliſh, liberal to her Servants and charitable to the Poor. Among her many Acts of Piety, ſhe founded Queen's-College in Oxford.

The Death of Queen Philip. pa.

Her Character.

Froiſart. Du Cheſne. Still the Wars were carry'd on in France, where Sir Robert Knolls, a Man renowned for Courage and Conduct, was made Commander of an Army, with which he terrify'd the Country as far as the Loyre, harraſs'd Vermandois, Champaign, la Brie, and the Iſle of France, and burnt all round Paris; yet nothing could move the French King to ſend any Forces againſt them out of that City. But this Army having ſeveral Lords and great Men in it, who diſdaining to be commanded by him whom they accounted their Inferior, great Factions were rais'd, and the Expedition came to no great Effect. About the ſame Time the Duke of Lancaſter and the Earl of Cambridge were ſent with Forces into Gaſcony to aſſiſt their Brother the Prince of Wales; who about this Time, hearing of the treacherous Revolt and Surrender of Limoges, he reſolved to execute a ſevere Revenge upon the Place, and all ſuch as were concern'd in the Betraying of it. After a Month's Siege he took the City by Storm, at which Time more than three thouſand Men, Women and Children of the Inhabitants were put to the Sword; yet at length the great Bravery of three French Officers ſo affected his generous Breaſt, that he ſhew'd Mercy to the reſt, tho' he wholly burnt and deſtroy'd the Place. This was the laſt Martial Act of this mighty Prince, with whom the good Fortune of England, as if it had been inherent to his Perſon, flouriſh'd in his Health, languiſh'd in his Sickneſs, and expir'd in his Death. He was now carry'd about in a Horſe Litter; and being adviſ'd by his Phyſicians to return into England for his Health, he follow'd their Directions, and with his Princeſs, his Son Richard and others, he came for England, taking his final Leave of Gaſcony, which he left to the Management of his Brother John Duke of Lancaſter.

Sir Robert Knolls Acts in France.

The laſt Action of the Black Prince.

He returns into England.

Froiſart. Walſing. The French in the mean Time won many Towns and Forts in Gaſcony, daily raiſing new Hopes after ſo long and continu'd Misfortunes. The unhappy Loſs of that expert Commander Sir John Chandois was a mighty Advantage to them, whoſe whole Care reſted upon their famous Glequin, a Man ſo skilful in good and evil Fortune, and who had ſo temper'd his Courage and Diſcretion, that he alone could bid his unfortunate Country riſe once more and flouriſh. The Prince of Wales ſtill declining in Health, upon his firſt Appearance before his Father, ſurrender'd the Dukedom of Gaſcony to be diſpos'd according to his Pleaſure: And while King Edward was at Clarendon, there repair'd to him the factious King of Navarre, whoſe Buſineſs was to make an Offer of an Alliance againſt the French; but tho' his Propoſals were acceptable, yet his Cautions ſeem'd ſo defective, that after a ſolemn Entertainment, he return'd without any Concluſion. Not long after the Duke of Lancaſter and his Brother the Earl of Cam- bridge return'd out of Gascony, with their Ladies Constance and Isabella, both Daughters to Peter late King of Spain, whom they marry'd; the Duke thereupon ſtiling himſelf King, and his Wife Queen of Caſtile and Leon. Nor was the Engliſh Name only increas'd in titular Honours, but alſo by real Actions; for about this Time, the Flemmings, who had provok'd the Nation, were defeated by the Earl of Hereford, in a ſharp Sea-Fight, about twenty five of their Ships were taken, and all the Men ſlain.

The Flemmings defeated at Sea.

A. D. 1372. Reg. 46. The Pleaſure of this Victory was ſoon after ſower'd with a terrible Loſs at Sea: For the French having beſieg'd the ſtrong City of Rochell with the Aſſiſtance of Henry King of Caſtile by Sea, for the Relief of the Engliſh, the Earl of Pembroke was ſent with forty Ships, Men, Victuals, Ammunition and Mony to the Value of twenty thouſand Marks for the Uſe of the War; but being ſuddenly attack'd by the Spaniſh Armado, conſiſting of many large Ships under the Command of Admiral Buccanigra and others, the Engliſh after a long and bloody Conflict were utterly routed, the Earl himſelf taken Priſoner, and almoſt all the reſt ſlain or taken. Rochell held out notwithſtanding; to the Relief of which while King Edward in Perſon ſet Sail with an extraordinary Power, a violent Wind drove him bak into England, to his great Diſappointment, and the uſeleſs Conſumption of ninety thouſand Pounds Sterling. Yet ſtill he did not give over his Care for that ſtrong Place, which the Engliſh with no ſmall Courage made good againſt the Enemy. This Place perſiſting in all Loyalty, John Duke of Bretaign, who had marry'd the Lady Mary Daughter to King Edward, a great Lover of the Engliſh, reſolv'd to venture his Fortune in their Cauſe; and coming over to England, he had Aid granted him, with which he warr'd againſt the French with various Succeſs. Likewiſe the brave Duke of Lancaſter, with a powerful Army from Calais, march'd and ravag'd through the Body of the whole Kingdom of France, 'till he arriv'd at Bourdeaux, and that without any conſiderable Oppoſition: So that tho' this Expedition ſeem'd very glorious for the Engliſh, yet it was of more Fame than real Advantage to their Affairs; for they loſt many Men, and almoſt all their Horſes in that long March, partly through the Diſeaſes incident to Camps, but chiefly for Want of Forage and Proviſions. Not long after the Duke drew out into the Field, and a Day was appointed between him and the Duke of Anjou, the French King's Brother, to have decided the Nations Conteſt in a ſet Battel, before the City of Thoulouſe in Languedoc; but by an untimely and pernicious Sort of a Truce, to which King Edward conſented upon the Account of his Son's Sickneſs, the hopeful Victory not only ſlipt away from the Engliſh, but likewiſe all Advantages of acting any Thing elſe in due Seaſon. The French boaſted themſelves as of a Conqueſt, tho' what they gain'd was no more than the common Effects of Policy. Glequin in the mean Time made the beſt uſe of all Occaſions, and did much Damage to the Engliſh Party in Guienne and Bretaign; but in Bretaign Sir Robert Knolls ſo bravely acquitted himſelf in the Behalf of King Edward's Son-in-Law the Duke, that he only ſeem'd a fit Match for Glequin, as the other alſo had ſtopp'd the Current of his Fortunes.

The Duke of Lancaſter's Acts in France.

A Truce.

A. D. 1374. Reg. 48. The next Year the Duke of Lancaſter return'd into England, after whoſe Departure almoſt all Gaſcony revolted, and fell to the French, who by the Advantage of King Edward's Age, the Black Prince's Sickneſs, and the Succeſs of their Policy, more than their Valour, were grown brave again. A Treaty of Peace was negotiated at Bruges, but all was Colour and Pretence; for at the ſame Time the French made ſecret Preparations for new Attempts. The chief Commiſſioner for the Engliſh in that Treaty was the Duke of Lancaſter, and for the French the Duke of Anjou; and their Meeting produc'd nothing but a ſhort Truce to breed more Evils to the Engliſh. Notwithſtanding, much outward Jollity and Magnificence appear'd in England; for this Summer a certain Gentlewoman of no great Quality, call'd Alice Peirce, by her Beauty and other Artifices ſo much prevail'd upon the aged King, as to be his Miſtreſs; and he having lately lately given her the affected Title of Lady of the Sun, ſhe glorioufly attir'd rod ſingly in a Triumphant Chariot from the Tower of London through Cheapſide, accompany'd with many Lords, Knights and Ladies, every Lady leading a Lord or a Knight by his Horſe's Bridle, 'till they came into Smithfield, where began a ſolemn Juſting or Tournament between many of the young Engliſh Noblemen. The Cavalcade of Alice Peirce.

Froiſart. Walſing. Rot. Parl. Among the Parties that ſuffer'd by the laſt hurtful Truce the Duke of Bretaign was chief. For he had obtain'd a great Aſſiſtance from his Father-in-Law King Edward, and was now with the Earls of Cambridge, March, Warwick and Stafford, and many other Gentlemen and Soldiers return'd into Bretaign, making themſelves a hopeful Proſpect for their main Enterprize, which was to eſtabliſh the Duke, and by the Conveniency of this Country's Situation to annoy the common Enemy, and the better to recover the Engliſh Dominions in Gaſcony. But this Truce wrought more for Glequin's Advantage than he could do with his Arms; for the Duke of Bretaign had before driven him out of his Territories. But this Management was not now to be wonder'd at: For the Prince of Wales was in a dangerous Condition; Plots were ſet on Foot at home; the Duke of Lancaſter had an Eye to the Succeſſion; Domeſtick Affairs grew diſturb'd; the King's Age was abus'd and miſs-led by Alice Peirce, and his Treaſure exhauſted by others; all which were ſufficiently known to the French who diligently made uſe of their Weakneſſes. For the Cure of theſe a Parliament was call'd to Weſtminſter, where the King's Wants were laid open, and a Supply deſir'd; but the whole Body of the Aſſembly, weary with bearing theſe continual Burdens, inſtead of Contributions, exhibited great Complaints, charging the King's Officers with fraudulent Practices, and petition'd that the Duke of Lancaſter, the Lord Chamberlain Latimer, Dame Alice Peirce, and Sir Richard Sturry, might be remov'd from the Court. All this was done with ſuch Heat and Vehemence, that the King, rather than not be ſupply'd, gave way to them, and remov'd all thoſe Perſons from his Preſence. The Prince was thought to favour this Proceeding; for there ſeem'd no good Correſpondence between him and his Brother the Duke of Lancaſter, who now manag'd all under his aged Father, and whoſe Ambition might be dangerous to his young Son Richard, whom he was like to leave to his Mercy. The King in this Parliament, being the Fiftieth Year of his Reign, to gratifie his Subjects, granted another general Pardon, as another Jubilee; which was ſolemniz'd with great Magnificence. But this Jubilee was ſoon turn'd into a general Sorrow throughout the Nation by the Death of that Miracle of Mankind the incomparable Prince of Wales; a Prince the greateſt for Magnanimity, Valour and Bravery, and the nobleſt for Humanity, Courteſie and Wiſdom, that ever grac'd the Engliſh Name and Nation. With him dy'd the Hopes of all Engliſh Men, who receiv'd the News of his Death with unexpreſſible Affliction, and Sorrow was ſhown even among his Enemies; and the French King himſelf in Memory of his Worth ſolemniz'd his Obſequies in a moſt noble manner at Paris, in the Preſence of the greateſt Part of his Prelates and Peers. He dy'd in the forty ſixth Year of his Age, upon the eighth Day of June, in the Memory of which his Anniverſary Obit was afterwards appointed to be held at Windſor upon that Day for ever; and the whole Body of the Parliament thought themſelves honour'd in attending his Herſe to Canterbury, where he was interr'd with the higheſt Solemnity imaginable. His Loſs was ſo ſenſible an Affliction to his Father, the trueſt Judge of his Merits, that he ſeem'd not to live after him, nor could he continue much above a Year in this World.

The Death of the Black Prince.

Walſing. &c. The Cauſe of this Domeſtick Mourning daily encreas'd with the Effects of his Loſs, which in a ſhort Time too much diſcover'd themſelves. was condemn'd by the King to perpetual Impriſonment at Nottingham, tho' within two Years after, he with much Difficulty regain'd his Liberty. In the mean Time John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaſter, got the Government of the Kingdom to be intruſted into his Hands by his Father. But Richard, the eldeſt Son of the late Prince of Wales, for preventing all Conteſts about the Succeſſion to the Crown of England, was by his Grand-father firſt made Earl of Cheſter, and not long after Prince of Wales. And for a full Aſſurance and Security, King Edward caus'd all the Nobility of the Realm to take an Oath to accept and defend Prince Richard, as lawful Heir and King of England, after his Deceaſe; nor durſt his Uncles, tho' famous Warriors, contradict their Father's Act. Finally the good old King, to comfort himſelf in Honouring the living Image of his nobleſt Child, to give the Mind of his Grand-child a Sight of future Majeſty, and to make his Uncles acquainted with the Reſpect due to his Perſon, he caus'd him to ſit above all his Children in an open ſolemn Feaſt.

About this Time the famous Doctor John Wicliff, a Man of an acute Wit, profound Learning, and great Judgment, publickly maintain'd ſeveral material Points and Propoſitions in the Univerſity of Oxford againſt the Church of Rome; particularly againſt the Pope's Supremacy, the Infalibility of the Church, and Tranſubſtantiation. The Pope being inform'd of theſe, and foreſeeing how much his Authority might be call'd in Queſtion, condemn'd twenty three of his Propoſitions as Heretical; whereupon the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury and Biſhop of London, having attack'd the Body of the ſaid Wicliff, in the Preſence of his great Favourers the Duke of Lancaſter and the Lord Peircy, declar'd the Judgment of the Pope concerning his Doctrines, which had then taken deep root in the Univerſity, Court and Country; ſo that for a while all ſeem'd to be quiet. But upon ſome ſecret Incouragements he was not long ſilent. His Followers were in the Phraſe of theſe dark Days call'd Lolards, implying a Sort of Weeds; tho' in reality they endeavour'd to extirpate all pernicious Weeds, which Time, Sloath and Fraud had introduc'd into the Church. The Duke of Lancaſter, as ſome think out of private Reſentments againſt Courtney Biſhop of London, was ſo far ingag'd in his Protection, that he and the Lord Peircy with great Difficulty eſcap'd the Fury of the Londoners, who would unqueſtionably have cut them in Pieces in Revenge of ſome diſgraceful Words utter'd by the Duke againſt their Biſhop. He notwithſtanding diſſuaded them from all Violence, and kept them from forcing his Palace of the Savoy; but ſtill in a moſt opprobrious manner they defac'd his Armories in the open Market; a Diſhonour not to be indur'd by one of the Royal Blood. By this Outrage the People let him ſee what he and the Lord Peircy were to have expected, if they could have ſeiz'd them, before they had gotten to Kenington to Prince Richard, who there remain'd with his Mother. The Duke for this was highly inrag'd, and would not deſiſt from proſecuting his Revenge againſt the Londoners, 'till he had procur'd the Lord Mayor and Aldermen to be turn'd out of their Places, and others put in their Rooms.

Which cauſes a great Diſturbance in London.

One of the laſt publick Acts of the old King was the triumphant Celebration of St. George's Feaſt at Windſor, where he himſelf had founded the Order of the Garter; and at this Solemnity he beſtow'd upon his Grand-child Prince Richard the Dignity of Knighthood, the only Thing in all the Patrimony of Honour that could not deſcend to him. Not long after, weaken'd with innumerable Toils and Age, he was forc'd to relinquiſh the World, as the World did him, before his Breath left him. For firſt his Concubine packing up what ſhe could get, even to the Rings of his Fingers, abandon'd him. Then his other Attendants, by her Example, ſeizing upon what they could find, fled away; and even his Counſellors forſook him in his laſt Agony, when he moſt needed their Advice, leaving his Chamber in a manner empty; which a poor Prieſt of the Houſe obſerving, approach'd to the King's Bed-ſide, and finding him ſtill breathing, call'd upon him to remember his Saviour, and ask Mercy for for his Sins, which none before would do, but every one flatter'd him with the Hopes of Life. This had made him negligent of thoſe pious Cogitations fit for a dying Man; but being now excited by the Voice of this Prieſt, he ſhew'd all the Signs of Contrition, and with his laſt Breath expreſs'd the Name of Jeſus. Thus dy'd this mighty King at his Manor of Sheen now Richmond, on the twenty firſt Day of June, and ſixty fifth Year of his Age, after a long, and for the moſt part glorious Reign of fifty Years, four Months and twenty ſeven Days. He left the World to the infinite Grief of his Subjects, and he was magnificently interr'd in the South-ſide of the Royal Chappel in Weſtminſter Abby, by his beloved Conſort Philippa, where his Tomb is ſtill to be ſeen, and near it a prodigious Sword which the King is ſaid to have us'd in his Conqueſt of France. His Death.

To ſay ſomething of the Perſon of this admirable King, he was ſomewhat tall of Stature, ſtrong and well proportion'd; of ſuch a graceful and noble Aſpect, that in his old Age it commanded a general Veneration, and it was reckon'd a good Omen to behold his Face, tho' only in a Dream. No Man was more mild and gentle, where there was Submiſſion; nor more ſtern and inexorable, where there was Oppoſition. In common Converſation he was very humble and familiar, both to Subjects and Strangers, but with great Gravity and Diſcretion; and nothing mean or trivial could enter into his Thoughts, but all was great and magnificent. He admirably well knew his Buſineſs, and perform'd it; therefore he was better reſpected, and better ſerv'd than any of his Predeceſſors. He was a Father to Orphans and diſtreſſed Perſons; generous in conferring Favours upon Men of true Merit; modeſt and humble in Proſperity, and never dejected in Adverſity. He ſhew'd many noble Inſtances of Piety and Charity, and in all his mighty Victories, he ever took care to give all the Glory to God. Yet his Valour and Bravery was beyond Expreſſion, and if we conſider the greateſt Part of this Reign, nothing can be imagin'd more glorious and triumphant, his Fame reaching to remote and barbarous Nations, all Foreigners envying the Happineſs of his Subjects. Some Failures indeed happen'd in the latter End of his Reign; but it was when he had in a manner out-liv'd himſelf, as well as the beſt Wife, and beſt Son in the World. Tho' he was a Prince that highly valu'd his Prerogative, yet none of his Predeceſſors paſs'd more or better Statutes for the Benefit and Liberty of his Subjects, or was more ſtrict in puniſhing his Judges and Officers for Oppreſſion, Bribery or Corruption. And as no King had more frequent and greater Taxes from his People, ſo they were ſatisfy'd they were laid out for the Honour and Defence of the Nation; and theſe were as willingly given, as they were worthily expended, 'till towards the latter End of his Reign, when he was too much in the Poſſeſſion of others. In ſhort, Walſingham tells us, That God had never rais'd up a King in England, ſo valiant, generous and fortunate as himſelf. For Monuments of his Charity and Munificence he founded Eaſtminſter an Abby near the Tower of London, a Nunnery at Debtford, Kings-Hall in Cambridge ſince part of Trinity Colledge, an Hoſpital for the Poor at Calais, and St. Stephen's Chappel at Weſtminſter nobly endow'd; and alſo augmented the Chappel at Windſor with the Proviſions for Churchmen, and twenty four poor Knights. His other Buildings were great and numerous, as the Caſtle of Windſor, which he re-edify'd and enlarg'd, the Caſtle of Queenborrow, the Fortifications at Calais and many other Places. His Perſon and Character.

Thus we are arriv'd at the End of this great and mighty King's Reign, which began a new Scene of Miſeries and Calamities. We find how he came to the Throne and how he left it; in both which we have Conſiderations of great Importance. His mounting over his Father's Head into the Throne, tho' it might not be his Crime, yet it went not without a Puniſhment, and that in a high Degree. For tho' he left behind him three Sons of extraordinary Figure and Ability, yet he had not one to ſit on his Seat, but left it unguarded to a Child Child of eleven Years of Age, expos'd to the Ambition of Uncles who over-power'd him; to a factious and diſcontented Nation at home, and to broken and diſtracted Inheritances abroad; Himſelf having ſeen all his great Acquiſitions, gain'd with ſuch vaſt Treaſure and Bloodſhed, quite torn from him, and nothing remaining but the ſingle Town of Calais. The fatal Diviſions of his Poſterity were ſo pernicious to the whole Kingdom, as well as to themſelves, that if the Dead know any Thing of the Actions of the Living, he needed no other Torment than the diſmal Viſion of thoſe murder'd Princes of his Blood, whoſe Ghoſts may be ſaid to have juſtled each other where-ever they met.

SECT. IV.

The Reign of King RICHARD the Second.

Containing 22 Years, 2 Months, and 8 Days.

A. D. 1377. Reg. 1.

I. KING Edward the Third was immediately ſucceeded by his Grand-ſon the Prince of Wales, Richard of Bourdeaux, then but in the Eleventh Year of his Age; not only by Hereditary Right, but alſo the univerſal Wiſhes and Deſires of the People, who had an extraordinary Love and Reſpect for him, for the ſake of his incomparable Father Prince Edward, whoſe Fame and Memory was infinitely dear to the Nation: And upon this ancient Stock of Merit he longer maintain'd himſelf in the Peoples Affections, than by any worthy Actions of his own. Shortly after King Edward's Deceaſe, this young Prince made a publick and ſplendid Entry into the City of London, attended by his Uncle the Duke of Lancaſter; which happily produc'd a Reconciliation between that Duke and the Citizens of London not long after. Then upon Thurſday the ſixteenth of July the Ceremony of his Coronation was perform'd in the Abby-Church in Weſtminſter with the utmoſt Pomp and Magnificence; and the Oath which he took before the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury and the reſt of the Lords, was ſomewhat larger than what we find taken by former Kings, conſiſting of theſe Articles: 'Firſt that he would permit the 'Church to enjoy all her Liberties; That he would reverence her Miniſters, 'and maintain the true Faith; That he would reſtrain Violence, and all Op-'preſſion, in all Sorts of Men; That he would cauſe good Laws to be every 'where obſerv'd, eſpecially thoſe of St. Edward, King and Confeſſor; and 'would alſo cauſe all evil Laws or Cuſtoms to be abrogated: Laſtly, That he 'would be no Reſpecter of Perſons, but would give right Judgment between 'Man and Man, and would chiefly obſerve Mercy in all his Decrees or Judg-'ments, as God ſhould ſhew Mercy to him. Which Form of the Coronation Oath, with ſome ſmall Alterations, has been adminiſter'd to all ſucceeding Kings and Queens ever ſince that Time. Then the Arch-Biſhop leading the King to the four Sides of the Scaffolds, ſhow'd him to the People, and according to the ancient Cuſtom ask'd them, If they would be ſubject to this Prince as their lawful Ruler, and be obedient to his Commands? In this Coronation John of Gaunt, King of Leon and Caſtile and Duke of Lancaſter, made the nobleſt Figure of any other; and claim'd the Right of being Steward of England, to carry the King's principal Sword, and to be his Carver that Day. And here we may obſerve that Sir John Dimmock, in Right of the Manor of Scrivelſby in Lincolnſhire, was firſt admitted to ſerve as Champion to defend the King's Title againſt all Oppoſers; but how long before this Cuſtom of a Champion had been in uſe, we do not find. Then the King created his Froiſart. Walſing. The Kingdom being ingag'd in a War with France at the Death of the late King, the French took Advantage of the unſetled Times, and before the Coronation landed at Rye with a conſiderable Fleet, and burnt that Town; whereupon immediately after the Solemnity, the Earls of Cambridge and Buckingham were ſent to Dover, and the Earls of Salisbury and Southampton with conſiderable Forces to defend thoſe Parts. It ſeems there was no Fleet then ready to take the Seas, for on the twenty firſt of Auguſt following, the French with a great Number of Gallies landed in the Iſle of Wight, burnt ſeveral Towns there, and indeed took the whole Iſle, except the Caſtle of Caresbrook; which being bravely defended by Sir Hugh Tyrrell the Governor, they were repuls'd with conſiderable Loſs. But he being unable to ſecure the reſt of the Country, the Inhabitants of the Iſle were oblig'd to pay a thouſand Marks to the French, to ſave the reſt of it from Plunder and Burning. After which they landed in other Places, and burnt the Towns of Haſtings, Portſmouth, Dartmouth and Plimouth, all along that Coaſt, yet with various Succeſs; for at Winchelſey they found the Place valiantly defended by the Abbot of Battle, and the neighbouring Gentry; but in Suſſex the Prior of Lewes meeting them with ſome new-rais'd Men of the Country Militia, the French not only routed them, but kill'd about a hundred of the Engliſh, and carry'd the Prior and two Knights Priſoners into France, but not without a conſiderable Loſs on their Side: So unſafe was England at this Time, when it had neither a Fleet to defend it by Sea, nor regular Troops to oppoſe the Enemy by Land. Nor were the Civil Affairs at this Time much better manag'd; for the King being unfit to govern himſelf, his Uncles, the Duke of Lancaſter and Earl of Cambridge, with divers other Noblemen, were appointed his Protectors and Governors; who tho' at firſt they took ſome Care of his Education, yet by degrees they gave him his own Will, and ſuffer'd thoſe about his Perſon, who by looſe Principles and ill Examples corrupted his good Nature, and giving him falſe Ideas of Glory, made him think it conſiſted in a riotous Way of Living, and in conferring extravagant Gifts and Honours upon Friends and Favourites. By which Means the Court became too much a School of Licentiouſneſs; but as yet the King's Vices were not thought dangerous to the publick Peace, being interpreted as the Sallies or Over-boylings of Youth, which would be remedy'd by Age and Experience. The French gain Advantages in England. King Richard's bad Education.

Walſing. The Weakneſſes of the preſent Government ſoon began to be diſcover'd by an outragious Accident this Year, ariſing firſt from a Spaniſh Nobleman, call'd the Earl of Denia, who having been taken Priſoner in the late War in Spain by Robert Haule and John Shakel two valiant Eſquires, found ſo much Favour as to have his Liberty, upon leaving his eldeſt Son for a Pledge, and upon Promiſe of paying his Ranſom as ſoon as he return'd home. This being neglected, and his Son remaining a Priſoner 'till his Father's Death, without being redeem'd; the Duke of Lancaſter, deſirous of having this young Earl in his own Hands, in Order to a Deſign he had upon Spain, procur'd the King to command theſe Gentlemen to deliver up their Priſoner to the Duke; which they looking upon as an arbitrary and unjuſt Proceeding, refus'd, and convey'd him out of the Way; for which they were committed cloſe Priſoners to the Tower for Contempt. But finding Means to eſcape from thence, and to take Sanctuary in Weſtminſter Abby, the Duke in a Rage ſent Sir Alan Buxall Conſtable of the Tower, with fifty armed Men, to take theſe Gentlemen out of the Sanctuary by Force; and coming upon them in the Time of Divine Service, they ſeiz'd Shakel and carry'd him back to the Tower. But as for Haule, he made ſo brave a Defence with a ſhort Fauchion, that they could not take him; 'till at length length traverſing his Ground about the Choir, they got ſo much Advantage; that one of them broke his Skull, while another ran him through with a Sword; and at the ſame Time murder'd a Servant of his that ſtood by him, as alſo a Monk who interceded for his Life. This horrid Action was ſo highly reſented by the Clergy, that the Arch-Biſhop and five other Biſhops ſolemnly excommunicated all that were concern'd in it; yet ſtill the Duke's Power was ſo great, that we don't find any Temporal Puniſhment inflicted on the Actors of theſe publick Murders, which ſhews with what great Partiality Juſtice was adminiſter'd during the King's Minority.

John Philpot's Acts.

While the publick Affairs were in a declining Condition, and all Enemies had the Liberty of the Engliſh Seas to range in, the worthy John Philpot, an Alderman of London, ſet out a conſiderable Fleet at his own private Charge; and going in Perſon, was in a ſhort Time rewarded by a Prize of fifteen Spaniſh Veſſels richly laden, which abundantly repair'd all his Expences. And not long after being by the Envy of ſome call'd to an Account before the King's Council for his Preſumption, he made ſo noble a Defence, that he was diſmiſs'd with Applauſe, and without further Trouble. But the Earls of Salisbury and Arundel had not ſo good Fortune with the Fleet they ſhortly after convey'd to Normandy, to aſſiſt the King of Navarre, who was then in War with the French King his Brother-in-Law. For a great Part of their Fleet falling in with a ſtronger Party of Spaniards, many Engliſh Gentlemen and others loſt their Lives, or were taken Priſoners; yet the Earls themſelves arriv'd ſafe in the Harbour of Cherburgh, which together with the Town and Caſtle adjoining, was deliver'd to them by Way of Mortgage by the King of Navarre; and it afterwards prov'd very prejudicial to the French, in that Part of Normandy. The Earl of Northumberland's Acts a-gainſt the Scots

About the ſame Time the Scots breaking in upon that Part of Scotland under the Engliſh Dominion, burnt the Town of Roxburgh; but the Earl of Northumberland in Revenge enter'd Scotland with ten thouſand Men, and for three Days made a Ravage principally in the Lands of the Earl of Marche, who had burnt the Place. Yet not long after, the Scots took the Caſtle of Berwick by Surprize, and kill'd Sir Robert Boynton the Governor; but the Earl of Northumberland gathering new Forces, in nine Days Time retook it by Storm, and put all the Scots to the Sword, except one that diſcover'd the Contrivance and the Scots Deſigns: And thus by the Valour of the Earl, and his Son the Lord Percy, this important Place was recover'd with more Honour and Difficulty than it was ſurpriz'd.

Advantages gain'd in France.

Nor was the Spirit of the Engliſh, which now began to re-kindle, unactive in other Places; for Sir Robert Rous had ſeveral Ways moleſted the French, and taken Oliver, Brother to the renowned Glequin, Priſoner; ſo Sir John de Harleſtone, Governor of Cherburgh after him, ſlew and took many Frenchmen in an Ingagement. Theſe were but the forerunning Drops of greater approaching Showers: For Sir Hugh Calverly and Sir Thomas Percy, made Admirals of the narrow Seas, took many rich Prizes, and perform'd many other worthy Actions, bringing home the acceptable News of the great Diſlike that the Inhabitants of Bretaign had conceiv'd againſt the French King and his ſevere Government in thoſe Parts. In the ſame Year, the Lord John Montfort, whom the French had expell'd, being invited home by his Barons, return'd into his Dukedom of Bretaign, accompany'd with the valiant Knights Calverly and Percy, where he with his Friends and Followers were receiv'd with extraordinary Honour. But not long after, Sir John of Arundell, Brother to the Earl of Arundell, being ſent into Bretaign to aſſiſt the Duke, was with ſeveral others drown'd in the Sea. Our Author imputes it as the juſt Effect of God's Vengeance againſt the ſaid Sir John and his Family, for their numerous Vices and Outrages, practis'd by him and them before they left England, for which they were loaden with the bitter Imprecations of the People. Theſe Employments, with freſh Deſigns on foot, found need of pecuniary Supplies; whereupon, in a Parliament Walſing. &c.

Parliament held at London, it was agreed, That for a Supply of the King's Neceſſities, the common People ſhould be ſpared, and the Burden wholly laid upon the richer Sort. The Rates of the Tax were theſe; Arch-Biſhops, Dukes, Earls and Biſhops at ten Marks each, Miter'd Abbots at as much, beſides forty Pence for every Monk under their Subjection. In ſhort, ſays Walſingham, there was no Religious Perſon, Man or Woman, Juſticiary, Sheriff, Knight, Eſquire, Parſon, Vicar or Chauntry Prieſt free from this Tax, rated according to the Value of their annual Revenues. About the ſame Time John Shakel, who had been committed to the Tower for not delivering up his Hoſtage the young Earl of Denia, was now by a Reward from the King willing to comply, and put him into the King's Hands. Which being done, the Diſcovery of the Priſoner ſtruck all Men with Admiration: For tho' the young Earl might have been treated according to his Quality, had he diſcover'd himſelf, yet he faithfully kept his Word, and appear'd in no other Habit than that of a meer Servant to his Keeper, under which unſuſpected Diſguiſe he had lain conceal'd in the Tower, from the Time of the Diſpute about him: A noble Example of true Honour, which cannot be paſs'd by without Injury to his Virtue.

A generous Act

Froiſart. Walſing. After ſufficient Supplies granted, in the following Year, the King's Uncle the Earl of Buckingham, with Calverly, Percy, Knolls, Windſor, and other valiant Knights, with competent Forces, were ſent to aſſiſt the Duke of Bretaign. But becauſe the French Gallies infeſted the narrow Seas, they landed at Calais, and from thence they march'd through the Body of France, ravaging the Countries and burning the Towns, without any great Reſiſtance from the French, 'till they all ſafely arriv'd in the Province of Bretaign. About theſe Times were many Civil Conteſts in the Kingdom of France: For the Duke of Burgundy, younger Brother to King Charles lately deceas'd, being made Guardian of the Perſon and Dominions of his Nephew Charles then in Minority, had his elder Brother the Duke of Anjou for his mortal Enemy. And their bloody Conteſts happen'd fortunately for the Engliſh Succours in the Dukedom of Bretaign, out of which as Duke John had been expell'd for adhering to his Father-in-Law the late King Edward, ſo the Engliſh did their utmoſt to ſupport him in his Cauſe. In theſe Extremities the French were reliev'd by their ancient Diverſion: For the Scots entring about that Time with Fire and Sword into Cumberland and Weſtmorland, drove away much Cattle, ſlew the Inhabitants, rifled the Booths and Houſes of Perith in the Time of a great Fair, killed and took many Men, and diſpers'd the reſt. The Earl of Northumberland preparing for a bloody Revenge, not without Wonder was commanded to deſiſt by Letters from the King, or rather ſome evil Counſellors about him. But how coldly ſoever the publick Affairs were purſu'd, the Want of Mony for Supplies was ſtill alledg'd and pretended. And therefore in a Parliament held at Northampton great Supplies were propos'd, and that the Clergy ſhould pay a Third Part of the Tax, as having in Poſſeſſion one Third of the Nation's Revenues. But at length it was finally agreed that every Perſon in the Kingdom, of all Conditions, Males and Females, of the Age of fifteen Years, except Beggers, ſhould pay twelve Pence a Head; and the richer People in every Town were to contribute to the Aſſiſtance of thoſe that were leſs able.

New Advantages in France.

A ſevere Tax laid.

Walſing. Knighton. &c. This extraordinary Poll-Tax was in a ſhort Time made uſe of as a principal Occaſion for a very dangerous Inſurrection, throughout many Parts of the Nation. For ſome of the King's Officers had complain'd that the Mony was not duly collected, therefore one John Ley and three of his Aſſociates obtain'd a Commiſſion to inſpect and review the late Levy, agreeing to pay the King a conſiderable Sum for the Advantage of it. On which Pretence they committed horrible Oppreſſions, Exactions and Inſolencies in many Parts, eſpecially in Kent, Eſſex, Norfolk and the adjacent Counties; with which the common People, being highly incens'd, join'd with the Villains or Bondmen, firſt begun a Mutiny, and afterwards broke out into open Rebellion. For ſome of the Tax-Gatherers had been ſo inſolent as to turn up the Coats of certain young Girls, to ſee if they were of full Age to pay; which ſo provok'd one call'd from his Trade Wat Tyler, of Debtford in Kent, whoſe Daughter had been thus us'd, that he not only beat out the Collector's Brains with his Hammer, but to avoid Puniſhment, drew together the Rabble, and ſoon incens'd them into a moſt deſperate Rebellion. Then great Multitudes being gather'd together, they broke open the Jail at Maidſtone, where one John Ball, a factious Prieſt then a Priſoner, having gain'd his Liberty, march'd along with them, and growing vaſtly numerous, he at Black-Heath made a ſeditious Diſcourſe to them, taking for his Subject this known vulgar Proverb, 'When Adam delv'd, and Eve ſpan, who was then a Gentleman? From whence he inferr'd, according to the uſual Topicks of moſt Rebellions, that the Inequality of Mankind was contrary to the Will of God, who if he had pleas'd to have created Slaves or Bondmen, would have appointed who ſhould have been Servants, and who Lords and Maſters. This dangerous Doctrine was highly applauded by the Vulgar, who thus animated by their Multitudes, and holding Correſpondence with others like themſelves in Eſſex and other Counties, took up Arms, and ſtopping all Paſſengers they forc'd them to ſwear Fidelity to King Richard and the Commons, and never to own any King whoſe Name was John, which they did in Hatred to the Duke of Lancaſter. In a ſhort Time the Eſſex and Kentiſh Men being join'd at Black-Heath, made up a Body of near a hundred thouſand Men, chiefly conſiſting of Villains, Bond-Tenants, Country Clowns, Debtors, and Criminals, all headed by Wat Tyler. Their Pretences were Liberty, and a Reformation of evil Laws and Cuſtoms; in Order to which they cut off the Heads of all the Lawyers they could find, alledging, That the People could never enjoy true Liberty, while they were ſuffer'd to live in the Nation.

The King amaz'd at this extraordinary Meeting, ſent to know the Occaſion of it; and his Meſſengers were told, That they met to ſpeak with the King about certain Matters, and that he muſt come to them, and hear what they had to deſire. Some about the King perſuaded him to go immediately, but the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, and the Lord Treaſurer Hales, earneſtly diſſuaded him from it, urging him to think of ſuppreſſing, rather than treating with ſuch an unruly Multitude. Upon Notice of which they threaten'd to cut off the Heads of theſe Counſellors; and forthwith marching into Southwark, they pull'd down Houſes, and broke the King's Priſons, and ſet all the Priſoners at Liberty, who join'd with them. The Bridge-Gate was at firſt ſhut againſt them, but by Threatnings and the Aſſiſtance of ſome of the ſame Temper in the City, the Gates were open'd, and they had free Paſſage into the City, where they declar'd That they came only to ſearch for Traitors to the Kingdom, and at that Time paid for what they call'd for, which gave them a Reputation among the common Sort, and increas'd their Numbers. The next Day, being the thirteenth of June, they march'd through the City to the Savoy, then the Duke of Lancaſter's Palace, which they burnt and beat down, deſtroying all the rich Furniture, throwing his Gold and Jewels into the Thames, as likewiſe all his Plate, firſt breaking it into ſmall Pieces. Here they by Proclamation made it Capital for any Man to retain the leaſt Thing for his own Uſe, to ſhew the People they were not ſway'd by Avarice; and when one of their Companions was diſcover'd to thruſt a Piece of Plate into his Boſom, they immediately threw him into the Fire, declaring, That they did not come like Thieves, to inrich themſelves by Plunder. From the Savoy they came back to the Temple, the Abode of the Lawyers, and without harkning to Intreaties burnt their Lodgings, Books, Papers, and all the Records that were there kept. From thence they rang'd to Clerkenwell, where they deſtroy'd all the Goods in the Hoſpital of St. John, and ſet Fire to that magnificent Building. After which they divided themſelves into three Bodies, one of which being headed by another Captain, call'd Jack Straw, went to Heybury Mannor, belonging longing to the Maſter of St. John's Hoſpital, where they were buſied in deſtroying and plundering all the Goods belonging to it, and demoliſhing a noble Houſe that ſtood there. A ſecond Body of them, who were moſt of Eſſex, and the neighbouring Parts, lodg'd themſelves upon Mile-End Green; and a third about St. Catharine's, and Tower-Hill.

Froiſart. Walſing. &c. The next Day the King went with ſeveral Noblemen to thoſe at Mile-End, who were about ſixty thouſand, where he told them He was their King, demanding, What they would have. Their Anſwer was, They deſir'd he would make them, their Heirs and Lands free for ever, ſo that they might not be call'd or reputed Bond-men. The King granted their Deſire, on Condition they would return home, and leave two or three of each Pariſh to ſtay for their Charters of Freedom, ſeal'd with the Great-Seal; which being diſpatch'd with the utmoſt Expedition, and all their Pardons ſign'd, moſt of the Eſſex Men return'd home to their own Habitations. Yet all this did not ſatisfie the inſolent Wat Tyler, who had plac'd himſelf and his Kentiſh Rabble about Tower-Hill; where the Terror of his rude Multitude was ſo great, that the Gates of the Tower were open'd to them without Reſiſtance, from whence they hurry'd away the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, the Lord Treaſurer Hales and ſome others, and impiouſly cut off their Heads upon Tower-Hill. After which they rang'd into the City, and cut off the Heads of many Engliſhmen, to whom they had any Averſion; and among the reſt they diſpatch'd a famous Merchant nam'd Richard Lyons, whoſe Head they ſet upon a Lance: And their Hatred to the Flemmings was ſo implacable, that they drew thirteen of them out of the Church of the Auguſtin Friars, and ſeventeen more out of other Churches, and cut off their Heads in the Streets with infernal Shouts and hideous Outcries.

The King Treats with them.

They commit new Outrages.

Ibid. In the following Day, proceeding in the ſame outragious manner, the King ſent to let them know that their Companions at Mile-End, upon receiving Charters of Freedom were return'd home in Peace, offering them the like Charters, if they would accept of them. To which Wat Tyler reply'd, He would embrace Peace, if he lik'd the Conditions; deſigning to have delay'd the King and Council, ſo that in that Night he might deſtroy both King and Nobility, and plunder and burn the City, as it appear'd afterwards. Three Charters being ſent to him without ſatisfying him, the King at laſt ſent a Knight to him, who told him that he ſhould come and treat with him about the Articles to be inſerted in their Charter; and when the Meſſenger deſir'd him to make haſte, he bad him Tell the King his Maſter he would come when he ſaw his own Time, and ſo follow'd on very ſlowly on Horſeback for the greater State. Upon his approaching the King in the Streets, the ſame Knight being ſent again to receive Propoſals from him, he was highly offended becauſe he came to him mounted, and told him, It became him to alight from his Horſe in his Preſence, and drew out his Dagger to ſtrike him: Upon which the King coming up, caus'd his Meſſenger to alight. Here Tyler's Demands were ſo bold and exorbitant, that the King, tho' never more ready to comply, began to demur; which caus'd the other to behave himſelf with an Inſolence not to be endur'd by any Soveraign. Whereupon the valiant John Philpot, fir'd with Indignation, told his Majeſty, That if he would command the Lord Mayor to Arreſt the Traitor, he would loſe his Life if it did not ſucceed: To which the King conſented, and gave ſuch a Command to William Walworth, then Lord Mayor, who waiting an Opportunity, and obſerving Tyler to play with his Dagger as if he deſign'd ſome fatal Stroke, and then to lay one of his Hands upon the King's Bridle, he inſtantly executed his Arreſt, by giving him a Blow on the Head with his Dagger, which being ſeconded by Philpot's Sword in his Body, he fell down dead at the King's Horſe's Feet, with more Honour than he deſerv'd. The Multitude ſeeing this, began furiouſly to cry out, Our Captain is murder'd, let's revenge his Death! But the King with a Courage and Ingenuity beyond his Years, clapp'd Spurs to his Horſe, and riding to the Head of them, cry'd aloud, Never grieve for the Death of a Traitor, I will be your Captain and Leader, follow me into the Fields, and you ſhall have all your Deſires. Upon which Words, in amaze they follow'd him towards St. George's Fields, 'till Sir Robert Knolls with a Thouſand armed Men rais'd by the Mayor, came upon them out of the City, which ſo terrify'd this Headleſs Multitude, that they flung down their Arms and begg'd for Mercy; which the King granted freely, but proclaim'd that no Citizen ſhould have any Correſpondence with them, nor ſuffer them to come within the Liberties. When ſome about the King ask'd leave to ſerve the Rebels as they had ſerv'd others, and to cut off a Hundred or two of their Heads, he mercifully forbad it, leſt the Innocent might ſuffer with the Guilty, for many had been drawn in by Fear, and ſuch fair Pretences as they thought good and loyal; ſo that he ſent them the like Charters he had granted to thoſe of Eſſex, and other Counties.

Inſurrections in other Counties.

This Spirit of Inſurrection and Rebellion was not confin'd to London, but furiouſly ſpread it ſelf through ſeveral Parts of the Nation. In Suffolk about fifty Thouſand aroſe under the Conduct of John Straw a wicked Prieſt, who beſides many other Barbarities cut off the Head of Sir John Cavendiſh, Lord Chief Juſtice of England, and ſet it upon the Pillory at St. Edmund's Bury. In Norfolk vaſt Numbers of the ſame ſort of People aroſe under the Conduct of John Littiſter, a Dier of Norwich, who compell'd the Lord Scales, Sir William Morley, Sir Stephen Hales, and other Men of Quality to remain with them, and for their own Security to comply with their Actions. Great Numbers alſo appear'd about St. Albans, under the Command of a common Chandler, who committed unheard of Outrages and Cruelties; and others again roſe in ſeveral Parts of Eſſex. Henry Spencer Biſhop of Norwich prov'd very ſerviceable in ſuppreſſing the Rebels of Norfolk, and the Earl of Buckingham and Lord Piercy did the ſame in Eſſex, but in both Places with conſiderable Bloodſhed. However in a ſhort Time all Inſurrections were quell'd, and the Multitudes diſpers'd; and the King appointed Sir Robert Treſilian his Chief Juſtice, and ſome others to try and puniſh the Ring-leaders of this dangerous Rebellion. Many were executed at ſeveral Places, of whom John Straw and John Ball the Prieſt had been moſt notorious; and by the Confeſſions of theſe two it appear'd what deſperate Deſigns had been laid towards the Ruin and Subverſion of the Nation. Particularly, That when they aſſembled at Black-Heath, and ſent to the King to come to them, they deſign'd to have ſlain all the Knights, Eſquires and Gentlemen that came with him, and to have carry'd the King with them from Place to Place, that the Mob might with greater Aſſurance come in to their Aſſiſtance when they ſhould ſee him, as it were the Promoter of their Inſurrections: That when their Numbers were ſufficient in all Counties, they were to have kill'd ſuch Lords, Knights and others as were moſt able to reſiſt them, eſpecially the Hoſpitallers: At laſt they were to have kill'd the King, and all the Biſhops, Monks, and Rectors of Churches poſſeſs'd of any Lands and real Eſtates, only ſparing the Mendicant Friars, who were ſufficient to perform Divine Service throughout the Nation: After all, when there had been none more powerful and knowing than themſelves, they would make ſuch Laws as they pleas'd, by which the People were to be govern'd; and they intended to have created new Kings, as Wat Tyler in Kent, and one in each County. In Conſideration therefore of this great Eſcape, and the Worth of particular Perſons, the King Knighted William Walworth Lord Mayor, John Philpot, Nicholas Brembre, and Robert Laund Aldermen; and gave to the firſt a hundred Pounds per Annum Land, and to the other three forty Pounds per An. to them and their Heirs for ever: And, as ſome write, the Dagger was now added to the Arms of the City of London. And leſt the miſchievous Multitude ſhould to the King's Diſhonour and common Hurt of the Church and Kingdom, enjoy any Benefit by their intolerable Outrages, the King by the Advice of his Council ſent revocatory Letters into all Parts, by which he declar'd, 'That no Man ſhould

'ters, during the late Inſurrections: All which was likewiſe declar'd and ratify'd in a Parliament held at Weſtminſter not long after.

Ibid. In the ſame Year of theſe Tumults and Inſurrections, the Engliſh Valour began again to diſplay it ſelf in diſtant Countries, chiefly to gratifie the private Ends of John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaſter, who claim'd the Crown of Caſtile and Leon in Spain, in right of Conſtance his Wife. For John King of Portugal had a defenſive War againſt John then Poſſeſſor of the Crown of Caſtile, who alſo challeng'd the Crown of Portugal, in right of Beatrix his Wife, the only Daughter of Ferdinand King of Portugal, which this other John, a natural Son of Ferdinand's, had by Faction uſurp'd. To the Aſſiſtance of the King of Portugal were ſent the King's Uncle, Edmund Earl of Cambridge, with many Knights, and others experienc'd in Arms. Theſe arriving in Portugal, moſt valiantly defended that Country for about two Years, and were the principal Cauſe of giving the Spaniards a ſignal Overthrow, in which they loſt ten thouſand Men in Battel. But at length the two Kings by a publick Agreement, bore the Charges of conveying home the Engliſh in Common, that their Countries might be freed from a Power of which they were both equally jealous. In this Expedition Edward, Son to the King's Uncle the Earl of Cambridge, marry'd the Daughter of John King of Portugal; but afterwards, the Earl not thinking it fit to leave his Son behind him as ſuſpecting the Faith of the Portugueſe, nor the other to venture his Daughter with the Earl, they ever remain'd disjoin'd in Perſons, however united in Ceremony. In the mean Time the Duke of Lancaſter, the Occaſion of the Expedition, at breaking out of the Inſurrections was upon the Borders of Scotland, about ſetling a two Years Truce with the Scots, which he concluded with what Expedition he could before the Scots had full Intelligence of the Troubles in England. The Scots, tho' they were ſorry that this Truce had hinder'd them from great Advantages in England, underſtanding that ſome Engliſh Peers had form'd Deſigns againſt the Duke, freely offer'd him twenty thouſand Men to defend his Honour; but he loyally refuſing the Offer, they gave him liberty to go and come into their Nation at his Liberty, with all the Marks of Civility and Hoſpitality.

II. King Richard being now in the ſixteenth Year of his Age, and the Nation in quiet, he marry'd the Lady Anne, Daughter to the Emperor Charles the Fourth, and Siſter to Wenceſlaus the preſent Emperor and King of Bohemia. This Princeſs arriving at Dover, was receiv'd with great Solemnity by a ſplendid Concourſe of Nobility, and was marry'd to the King on the fourteenth Day of January; and the Nuptials being celebrated with extraordinary Magnificence, ſhe was ſolemnly crown'd Queen by William Courtney, lately made Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury. She was a Princeſs of great Virtue and Goodneſs, which was all the King had with her; for inſtead of a great Portion in Mony which he was then offer'd with the Duke of Milan's Daughter, he gave the Emperor ten thouſand Marks for his Alliance, which never prov'd of any Advantage to him. Not long after, a Parliament met at Weſtminſter, where many uſeful Things were enacted concerning the Exceſs of Apparel, the Tranſportation of Corn, and other Matters: But to what Purpoſe, ſays Walſingham, are Acts of Parliament, when after they are paſs'd, they take no Effect? For, adds he, the King and his private Council did uſually change or aboliſh all Things which had been eſtabliſh'd by the whole Nobility and Commons of England. Nevertheleſs it was then provided, that ſuch as had done any Thing in their own Defence againſt the Rebels, without the Ordinary Forms of Law, ſhould ſuſtain no Damage, but be as much indemnify'd as if they had enjoy'd their particular Pardons; and that all Releaſes, Feoffments, and other Acts done during theſe Hurling Times, as they were call'd, by way of Conſtraint or Neceſſity, ſhould be utterly void. ment Sir Richard Scroop was made Chancellor of the Realm, and Sir Hugh Segrave Treasurer: But it was not long after before this worthy Chancellor, denying to pass such exorbitant Grants under the Great-Seal, as the King in his youthful Humour had imprudently given to some greedy Courtiers, fell into the King's undeserved Displeasure. He alledg'd several Reasons for his Denial; as that the King was greatly in Debt, and therefore such Bounties ought rather to be imploy'd in discharging some of the Creditors; That these Courtiers, knowing that he was so much involv'd, were not true Friends to his Majesty, regarding their private Gains before his Profit, or the publick Wants; That the same Courtiers had formerly receiv'd such Gifts from his Majesty, as were answerable to their Services; and that himself, if he should seal these Grants made in the King's Minority, would receive no Thanks when he should come to riper Years. After all these Allegations, he was order'd more than once to send the Seal to the King; and going in Person he surrender'd it with these Words, That he would always be loyal and faithful to his Majesty, but would never bear any Office under him as long as he liv'd. By this Act the King highly disgusted the great Men [illegible]ers of the Kingdom; and gave the first Occasion of Dislike to his Gover[illegible]t, or rather to his chief Ministers, who then manag'd all Affairs, and continually prevail'd upon the King's Youth, and Easiness of his Temper.

About these Times, Henry Spenser, the Martial Bishop of Norwich, being drawn on by Pope Urban to preach up the Crusado, and to serve as General against Clement, whom several Cardinals and Prelates had also elected Pope, obtain'd a Fifteenth from the Parliament for that purpose; and having gather'd a considerable Force, he pass'd over into Flanders to support the Cause of Urban against the Anti-Pope Clement. Most of the Nobility were great Opposers of this Expedition, yet still the Bishop for a while proceeded with great Success, took Gravelin, Burburgh, Newport, Dunkirk, and several other Places, and gain'd also a Victory at Sea against thirty thousand of Clement's Assistants; yet at length he was forc'd to return before he expected, being destitute of those further Succours promis'd him from England. And what prov'd harder to him, the King, upon Pretence that he had not exactly obey'd his Orders and Commands, for a while seiz'd upon all his Temporalties. In the mean Time the King himself with his young Queen spent all the Summer in Jollity and youthful Recreations, going on Progress to the great Abbies about the Kingdom, with an excessive Retinue of Bohemians; and lying at the Abby of St. Edmund's Bury no less than ten Days, it prov'd a heavy Burden, being both of the[illegible] presented there, as well as at all the other Monasteries they visited, with large Gifts, which the Queen pour'd forth upon her Bohemian Countrymen. And as this was an Indication of excessive Easiness and Prodigality in the King, so it extreamly diminish'd the Esteem his Subjects hitherto had of him.

In the Beginning of the following Year, the Duke of Lancaster return'd from his Embassie in France, where he could only procure a Truce of half a Year's Continuance. At his Return, he and his Brother the Earl of Buckingham, advanc'd with a very great Force towards Scotland, to revenge the Breach of a Truce; but staid so long upon the Borders, 'till all Provisions being consum'd, the Inhabitants receiv'd more Injury from the English Army than by the Invasion of the Scots. Yet afterwards he enter'd Scotland, but by means of his Delays, the Scots had sufficient Time to secure their Goods and Persons; so that meeting with nothing but Hunger and Cold, after the Loss of many Men and Horses, the Duke return'd with Dishonour. Soon after his Return he was encounter'd with a more dangerous Enemy; a Carmelite Friar, had at a Parliament held at Salisbury, made a Discovery in Writing to the King, of a Design that the Duke had to destroy his Majesty, and usurp the Crown: But the King advising about it only with some of his Chaplains, and the Duke coming in suddenly upon them, they counſell'd the King to ſhow the Duke his Accuſation in Writing; upon the Sight of which, he boldly deny'd all, and ſo ſeemingly well clear'd himſelf, that the Friar was committed Priſoner to the Cuſtody of the Lord John Holland, and the Evening before the appointed Time of Hearing the Cauſe, he was found murder'd after a moſt barbarous and unheard of Manner. The next Morning the Friar's Body was dragg'd about the Streets, as a Traitor at a Horſe's Tail, to remove all Suſpicion of the Murther; and the Earl of Buckingham furiouſly ruſh'd into the King's Chamber, declaring with a terrible Oath, That he would kill any Perſon living who durſt lay Treaſon to his Brother's Charge, not excepting the King himſelf. But what tended much to the Duke's Innocency, was, that the Lord Zouch was likewiſe accus'd of the ſame Treaſon by the ſame Friar; and being ſick was forc'd to be brought thither in a Litter, and examin'd before the Lords, where he ſolemnly deny'd the whole Accuſation upon Oath, and that he ever heard or thought of ſuch a Deſign: Upon which he was acquitted, and permitted to return home; and afterwards became an utter Enemy to all Carmelite Friars. Not long after this Eſcape, the Duke's Enemies, who highly wiſh'd for his Death, ſo repreſented him to the King, that it was agreed he ſhould be ſuddenly arreſted, and brought before chief Juſtice Treſilian, who had boldly undertaken to give Sentence againſt him, tho' the Law gave him the Privilege of his Peers. But the Duke being forewarn'd of theſe Contrivances, haſten'd to his Caſtle at Pomfret, and there ſtood upon his Guard; upon which the Princeſs Joan the King's Mother, dreading the fatal Effects of ſuch a Rupture, took infinite Pains by Riding, notwithſtanding her Years and Corpulency, between the King and the Duke, to pacifie and reconcile them; and at length brought them to ſuch Terms, that all Appearance of Diſpleaſure on one Side, and Diſtruſt on the other, was for that Time remov'd.

He is clear'd.

After new Suſpicions he is reconcil'd to the King.

Ibid. This Storm being over, the Duke went again into France in mighty State, to treat about a Peace; and tho' he ſtaid a conſiderable Time with many Noblemen in his Company, yet he only obtain'd three Months Truce, after the Expence of fifty thouſand Marks. During his Abſence, a great Favourite of his call'd John of Northampton, alias Comberton, once Mayor of London, was ſummon'd before the King and Nobility, and try'd for ſome late ſeditious Practices in London, and formally convicted. Sentence being ready to be given againſt him in the King's Preſence, he alledg'd That Judgment ought not to paſs upon him in the Abſence of his Lord the Duke of Lancaſter, which at the ſame Time render'd him ſuſpected; but the Judge told the Criminal, That he muſt acquit himſelf by Duel, or elſe by the Laws of the Land muſt be drawn, hang'd and quarter'd; to which making no Anſwer, he was condemn'd to perpetual Impriſonment, ſent to Tintagel Caſtle in Cornwall, and had his Goods ſeiz'd for the King's Uſe. Shortly after, a new Parliament being call'd, News was brought of the Surprize of the Caſtle of Berwick by the Scots, being ſold by the Deputy-Governor to the Earl of Northumberland; for which the Earl, tho' abſent, was accus'd; and, by the Procurement of the Duke of Lancaſter his Enemy, found guilty of Treaſon without his Appearance. But Circumſtances being conſider'd, the King pardon'd him, but much againſt the Duke's Inclinations; which was alſo the Occaſion of a freſh Conteſt between theſe two great Men. As ſoon as the Earl was pardon'd and reſtor'd, he himſelf rais'd a conſiderable Army, and march'd to the Siege of that Caſtle in the Depth of Winter; but finding he could not then take it by Force, he recover'd it the ſame Way it was loſt, obtaining it by the Sum of two thouſand Marks paid to the Garriſon; and by that dear-bought Experience learnt to take greater Care of that conſiderable Fortreſs.

from thence with a vaſt Fleet, and had tranſported a numerous Army into Scotland, to join with the Scots, and enter England that Way. Upon which the King immediately prepar'd an Army to march into Scotland, and ſent the Duke of Lancaſter with a conſiderable Force to ſecure the Borders. In the Beginning of July the King went in Perſon to Leiceſter, and his beloved Queen with him; where he was attended by the Flower of the Engliſh Militia, as Earls, Barons, Knights and others, to a prodigious Number, who made noble Preparations for them, which extreamly pleas'd the King. But upon his Arrival at York, that Satisfaction was much abated by an unfortunate Accident near that City: For a Quarrel ariſing between the Lord John Holland the King's Half-Brother, and the eldeſt Son of the Earl of Stafford; the former kill'd the latter upon the Road, as he was going to the Queen, whoſe menial Servant he was. At which the King was ſo highly incens'd at the Loſs of one bred up with himſelf, that he commanded his Brother to be ſeiz'd, and his Goods to be confiſcated; but this young Lord, finding the Tide run ſo high againſt him, avoided the Storm by taking Sanctuary at Beverly. The Princeſs Joan, Mother both to the King and this Nobleman, hearing this ill News, immediately ſent Meſſengers to the King to intercede for her Son, and obtain his Pardon; but the King was ſo inrag'd, that he abſolutely deny'd her Requeſt; with which ſhe was ſo ſenſibly afflicted, that it caſt her into a Fit of Sickneſs, which in four or five Days prov'd her Death. Her Body being embalm'd was preſerv'd 'till the King's Return from Scotland, when it was ſolemnly interr'd in the Church of the Friars Minors at Stanford; after which the King's Fury againſt his Brother gradually diminiſh'd.

A bad Accident near York

King Richard enters Scotland

About the Beginning of Auguſt the King enter'd Scotland with his mighty Army, but to little Effect; for either he could not find the Scots, or could not follow them into their Woods, Bogs and Faſtneſſes, whither they and their Cattle were retired. So finding the Country vacant, he burnt the City of Edinburgh, and ſeveral other Places, and deſtroy'd many Woods and Groves. But when the Duke of Lancaſter urg'd him to imitate his noble Grand-father King Edward, in carrying his Arms beyond the Friths, and in totally reducing that Kingdom, the King was ſo far from complying, that ſuſpecting the Duke gave him this Advice only to ruin him and his Army with long Marches and Famine, he return'd him very ſharp and opprobrious Language upon that Subject; and tho' the Duke's Anſwers were temper'd with great Duty and Modeſty, yet they had ſo little Effect, that the Lords found it very difficult to reconcile the King and him. The Seaſon being far advanc'd, King Richard return'd into England, and in full Time; for during theſe Tranſactions in Scotland, the Scotch and French Forces ſlipping paſt the Engliſh, enter'd the Weſt-Marches, burnt Penrith, plunder'd the Country, took many Priſoners, and indanger'd Carliſle. But hearing of the Return of the Engliſh Army, they retir'd into their own Country; but carry'd more out of England, than King Richard with his dreadful Army could do out of Scotland, tho' he had the Plunder of the Capital City of the Kingdom: Upon ſuch unequal Terms muſt a Richer Nation make War upon a Poorer as warlike as themſelves. All this Time the French King was providing a mighty Fleet and Army at Sluis in Flanders to invade England, but was hinder'd in the Attempt by the Flemmings, who tir'd with the Heavineſs of the French Yoke, had taken up Arms and ſurpriz'd the ſtrong Town of Dam; which tho' it was recover'd in no long Time, yet by this Diverſion the French King was forc'd to defer his intended Invaſion 'till the next Year.

A Parliament.

In the mean Time the King held a Parliament at Weſtminſter, in which was granted large Supplies towards an Expedition to be made by the Duke of Lancaſter into Spain, under the Title of King of Caſtile and Leon. port his Dignity; and alſo Thomas Earl of Buckingham, the King's other Uncle, was created Duke of Gloceſter, with the like Gift or Settlement to ſupport his Dignity. At the ſame Time Michael de la Pole was made Earl of Suffolk, with a ſuitable Penſion, which occaſion'd ſome Diſcontent, tho' his Family had well deſerv'd of the Crown in the laſt Reign. But what rais'd the greateſt Envy was the Advance of Robert de Vere Earl of Oxford, who, without any Thing to recommend him but a beautiful Body, was now by an unuſual Title created Marqueſs of Dublin, and had a Grant of all the Revenues of Ireland, except ſome Royalties reſerv'd to the Crown, upon paying the annual Sum of five thouſand Marks. The King's extraordinary Fondneſs to this handſom Favourite, was the Occaſion of great Scandal, both to One and the Other. To conclude this Year, the famous John Wickliff, after he had made great Numbers of Proſelytes, dy'd of a Palſie, to the great Joy of the Monkiſh Writers of thoſe Times; who boldly aſcrib'd his Death to the Judgement of God, and that as a Puniſhment for his Heretical Sermons, the Uſe of his Tongue was taken from him. He was bury'd at his own Pariſh-Church at Lutterworth in Leiceſterſhire, where his Bones reſted in Peace, 'till forty one Years after, by a Decree of the Council of Conſtance, they were dug up and burnt as thoſe of a Heretick.

Dr. Wickliff's Death.

Knighton. Walſing. The Time was now come when King Richard ſhould ſee himſelf deliver'd from thoſe Fears and Jealouſies which the Greatneſs of his Uncle the Duke of Lancaſter had rais'd in his Mind. And upon Eaſter Day the Duke, as King of Caſtile, with the Princeſs Conſtance his Wife, came to take Leave of the King, who beſtow'd on him a Crown of Gold, and the Queen gave another to the Dutcheſs his Wife; and at the ſame Time the King commanded all about him to ſtile and honour him as a King. On the ninth of July he ſet Sail for Spain, with a ſelect Army of near twenty thouſand Men, in which ſeveral brave Noblemen were chief Officers; and took with him his Wife, eldeſt Daughter and Heireſs to the late Peter King of Caſtile, and his two Daughters. And this Titular King now obtain'd ſo much Favour from Pope Urban, that out of the Hatred he bore to Henry the preſent Poſſeſſor of Caſtile, who deny'd his Authority, he granted the like Indulgence or Remiſſion of Sins to all ſuch as ſhould aſſiſt him in his Expedition, as had been granted to the Biſhop of Norwich, when he made War in Flanders. But this Indulgence, tho' ſolemnly publiſh'd at the Cathedral of St. Paul's, did the Duke little Service; for the frequent Diſpenſations and Abuſes of theſe Indulgences, had render'd them ſo contemptible, that few would contribute any Thing to this pretended Cruſado. However the Duke proceeded with Fame and Succeſs for a long Time; and firſt landing in Bretaign, reliev'd Breſt beſieg'd by the Duke of that Country, tho' with the Loſs of ſome Men of Quality. Then landing at the Groyne, he proceeded with great Terror and Valour, took Compoſtella and Villeclope, with ſeveral other Places, ſubdu'd the greateſt Part of Gallicia, and marry'd his eldeſt Daughter Philippa to John King of Portugal. Yet after all this, before the End of the next Year, the Engliſh Army was ſo waſted by the Diſeaſes of that Country, that not being able to act any thing more of Note, the Duke was oblig'd to enter into a Treaty with John King of Caſtile the Son of Henry the Baſtard, and to quit all his Right to that Kingdom, upon certain Conditions and Articles. So that this Expedition into Spain, tho' it much diſplay'd the Valour of the Engliſh Nation, yet it prov'd much more to the Honour than the Advantage of England, which was extreamly weaken'd, by being depriv'd of ſo many brave Soldiers, when the Nation had ſo much need of them againſt the common Enemy the French.

His Acts and Succeſs.

Walſing. Mezeray. Froſart. For at this Time the French threaten'd a more terrible Invaſion than ever was known before; but the King fearing that Calais might be firſt in Danger, immediately ſent for its Security Henry Lord Piercy, Son to the Earl of Northumberland, and By-nam'd Hotſpur, a young Gentleman, whom our Author ſays was the Pattern of all Virtue and Martial Bravery. But in a ſhort Time, after he had in ſome Degree anſwer'd this Character in France, he return'd home to defend his Native Country, which was this Summer under frequent Alarms and great Conſternation from the formidable Preparations of the French King, who had gather'd a vaſt Navy and a prodigious Army at Sluis for that Deſign. And the better to ſecure the Soldiers at their firſt Landing, the French had fram'd a wonderful Wooden Wall, three Miles in Compaſs, no leſs than twenty Foot high, with a great Number of Turrets, with which they were to have ſuddenly inclos'd their Camp. But it fortunately happen'd, that the Lord Beauchamp, Commander in Calais, took three of their Ships laden with Part of this extraordinary Incloſure, which the King caus'd to be ſet round Winchelſea to ſecure that Town; and alſo took another Ship full of great Guns, and other Inſtruments of War. Tho' this was a great Diſcouragement, yet the French King, having moſt of his Nobility with him, reſolv'd to purſue his Enterprize; but Providence, which had ſav'd France in the laſt Reign, ſeem'd to have ſav'd England in this: For the Wind kept contrary from the Middle of Auguſt to the Middle of November; and at length chopping about, ſo far flatter'd the French, that they ſet out the Fleet to Sea; but being ſeven or eight Leagues from the Shore, it not only turn'd about to its former Quarter, but drove them back with ſuch a violent Fury upon the Coaſt of Flanders, that it deſtroy'd ſeveral of their Ships. Upon which Accident the King of France reſolv'd to defer the Expedition 'till the next Spring; but before that Time, England being put into a better Poſture of Defence, the Deſign became ineffectual. All agree that the Kingdom had never a greater Eſcape and Deliverance, as well for the Want of its beſt Soldiers, as for many other Reaſons; and we are aſſur'd That the World never ſaw a greater and more glorious Fleet together; for it conſiſted of near thirteen hundred Sail of Veſſels of all Sorts: And as for Land Forces, beſides fifteen Dukes, twenty ſix Earls, and two hundred Barons, there were a hundred thouſand Soldiers. At this great Diſappointment, the French Nobility were highly diſguſted, but much more the common People, by reaſon of ſo vaſt a Sum of Mony being rais'd for nothing; for the preſent Charge was found to ſurpaſs the Ranſom of King John in the laſt Reign.

The French make vaſt Preparations againſt England.

but to no Effect.

This Deliverance was ſo much the more ſignal, becauſe in the Time of the greateſt Danger, violent Diſcontents and Murmurings aroſe among the Commons as well as Nobility againſt the King's Favourites; particularly De la Pole Earl of Suffolk, who had been made Lord-Chancellor of England; and Robert de Vere, who was now advanc'd to the unheard of Honour of Duke of Ireland, with a Grant of the Profits and Government of the whole Kingdom, only reſerving to the King the Superior Dominion. Theſe Diſcontents appearing in a Parliament held at Weſtminſter, and the Commons being ready to impeach the Chancellor of ſeveral Crimes, the King retir'd after he had once appear'd, and trifled away his Time at Eltham, during a great Part of the Seſſion. Whereupon the Nobility and Commons by joint Conſent, diſpatch'd a Meſſage to him, declaring That the Chancellor and Treaſurer ought to be remov'd from their Offices, becauſe they were not for the Advantage of himſelf and Kingdom. At which the King being highly offended, commanded them to mention no ſuch Matter, but immediately proceed to the Buſineſs for which they were ſummon'd; declaring, That he would not for their Sakes, or at their Inſtance, remove the meaneſt Scullion Boy in his Kitchen. But what yet more inrag'd them againſt the Chancellor was, That he, in the Name of the King, had deſir'd of the Commons extraordinary Supplies for the Neceſſities of the King's Houſhold, as well as the publick Wars; therefore by joint Aſſent the Lords and Commons return'd this Anſwer to the King, That they neither could nor would proceed in any Buſineſs of Parliament, or diſpatch the leaſt Article, 'till the King came in Perſon amongſt them, and remov'd the Chancellor from his Office. Upon which the King appointed them that they ſhould order forty

Knights

Knights of the moſt ſubſtantial and wiſeſt of the Commons to come to him, and declare the Opinions of the reſt; but a ſtrong Rumour ariſing that theſe Knights would be in danger of their Lives, the Project was altogether ineffectual. After this the whole Parliament by common Conſent deputed the King's Uncle the Duke of Gloceſter, and Thomas de Arundel Biſhop of Ely, to go to the King at Eltham, and deliver to him the Senſe of the whole Aſſembly; which they did in a ſet formal Speech, in which they declar'd to his Majeſty, That they had it eſtabliſh'd by ancient Conſtitution, That the King ought to call a Parliament once every Year, upon many Accounts; That if the King through his ungovernable Will did eſtrange and withdraw himſelf from his Parliament for the Space of forty Days, the Members were at liberty to return to their own Habitations without further Proceedings. Upon this the King imprudently anſwer'd, That now he perceiv'd that his People and the Commons intended to make Inſurrections againſt him; and in ſuch a Caſe nothing ſeem'd more proper than to call in his Coſin the King of France, to receive Advice and Aſſiſtance from him, and even to ſubmit himſelf to him, rather than truckle to his own Subjects. To which theſe Lords return'd a long and ſevere Anſwer, and particularly declar'd to him, That they had an ancient Conſtitution, not very long ſince put in Execution, That if the King, through evil Council, Obſtinacy, Contempt of his Subjects, or by any other irregular Courſes, ſhould alienate himſelf from his People, and refuſe to govern by the Laws and Statutes of the Realm; and ſhould precipitate himſelf into wild Deſigns, and abandon himſelf to his arbitrary Will; that from that Time it ſhould be lawful for his People, by their full and free Conſent, to depoſe that King from his Throne, and ſet upon it another of the Royal Family.

They ſend a bold Meſſage to the King.

Walſing. Knighton.

Theſe and the like Speeches had ſuch an Effect upon the King, that within three Days he came to the Parliament, where De la Pole was impeach'd of ſeveral high Crimes and Miſdemeanors by the Commons, which are too long to be here ſpecify'd; and which were ſo fully prov'd, that the Earl having nothing to reply, the King bluſhing and ſhaking his Head, ſaid, Alas, alas, Michael, ſee what thou haſt done? And when his Majeſty deſir'd a Supply, the Commons anſwer'd, That he did not need any Taxes of his Subjects, while he might ſo eaſily furniſh himſelf from him who was his juſt Debtor: Yet upon the King's yielding to have him turn'd out of all Offices, they granted him a Supply and a Tax upon ſeveral Commodities. They alſo granted that the new Duke of Ireland ſhould have the thirty thouſand Marks, which was to be receiv'd of the Heirs of Charles of Blois, provided he would go into Ireland before Eaſter, and uſe the Mony towards the Recovery of thoſe Dominions the King had given him in that Iſland; ſo paſſionately did the Parliament deſire his Abſence, that they would rather want ſo much Treaſure, than indure him in England to influence the King. At the ſame Time Arundel Biſhop of Ely was made Lord Chancellor, Gilbert Biſhop of Hereford made Treaſurer, and John de Waltham Keeper of the Privy-Seal. Furthermore, the Parliament obſerving, that by the great Corruption of the King's Officers, the publick Revenue was vainly conſum'd, the King inſufferably defrauded, the common People by continual Burthens miſerably impoveriſh'd, the Rents and Profits of the great Men much impair'd, and by all this that the King's Officers became unmeaſurably rich; they therefore choſe eleven Lords, and gave them Leave and Power to inſpect, treat and determine all Affairs, Cauſes and Complaints ariſing from Matters of this Nature ſince the Death of King Edward the Third, 'till this preſent Time. Then the Parliament broke up, and the King made this Proteſtation, That for any Thing that was done in that Parliament, he deſign'd it not to the Prejudice of himſelf or his Crown. The Reaſon of this Proteſtation ſoon appear'd to the whole Nation, for the King was ſo diſſatisfy'd at the Treatment of his Favourites, that he afterwards revok'd and abrogated all the Proceedings of this Parliament. He was ſo far from parting with the Earl of Suffolk and the Duke of Ireland, that he receiv'd them into much greater Favour and Confidence than ever; and at Chriſtmaſs following, admitted the former to ſit down with him at his Table, not in the uſual Habit of a Peer, but in the Robes of a Prince. And our Authors agree, That theſe Favourites had ſo tranſcending an Influence, that during the Seſſions of this Parliament, they with the King's own Conſent had form'd a Deſign of inviting the Duke of Gloceſter and other leading Men to a Supper at the Houſe of a certain Citizen of London, where they were all to have been murder'd; by whoſe Death they not only hop'd to be reveng'd on their Enemies, but alſo to ſet the King free from all future Reſtraints: But this Conſpiracy was defeated by means of the timely Notice that was given to the Duke of Gloceſter, who prevented the reſt from accepting the Invitation. This was firſt effected by the Induſtry and Courage of Sir Richard Exton, the Mayor of London; who being ask'd by the King to give his Conſent, or at leaſt Connivance to this Action, declar'd, He would never imbrue his Hands in innocent Blood. So that the Perſons againſt whom this Deſign was form'd, by this means became more popular and beloved, while their Enemies grew more and more odious to the Body of the People.

A. D. 1387. Reg. 10/11. Theſe Favourites, and ſome others, not long after hearing that Richard Earl of Arundel, and Thomas Earl of Nottingham Marſhal of England had ingag'd with a great Fleet of French, Flemmings and Spaniards, and had taken above a hundred Ships with nineteen thouſand Tun of Wine, beſides the Admiral of Flanders and other Men of Note, they openly degraded the Victory, and ſaid, That the Vanquiſh'd were only Merchants, whoſe Amity would have been more advantagious to the Nation than all that they had gain'd. Yet ſtill the Earls proceeding in their Expedition, ſail'd to the Coaſt of Bretaign, and landed near Breſt, where they not only reliev'd the Place, but attacking two Forts lately built for the Defence of the Court, they took and garriſon'd the one, and burnt and deſtroy'd the other; and then return'd home with the great Applauſe of all Men except the Duke of Ireland, Earl of Suffolk, and ſome Courtiers, who not being inclin'd to Martial Actions themſelves, envy'd the worthy Exploits of others. Yet theſe had ſo much Influence over the King, that tho' the Earl of Nottingham was Lord Marſhal, and had been brought up with him, he was ſo far from congratulating or thanking him, that he receiv'd him with the greateſt Coldneſs, and ſcarce took any Notice of him. After this Earl, the brave Lord Piercy, Henry Hotſpur, was ſent to Sea; who tho' he was poorly provided of Men, and not much countenanc'd at Court, which envy'd the great Reputation he gain'd at the Recovery of Berwick, yet he undertook the Employment; and having guarded the Seas the reſt of the Year, and behaved himſelf gallantly againſt the French, he return'd in Safety, much to the Diſappointment of his Enemies at Court. By ſuch Means and Practices as theſe, King Richard, from being highly reſpected and belov'd, came to be generally hated and deſpis'd by the Nobility and People; for theſe Favourites had ſo corrupted his natural Temper by Luxury and Effeminacy, that not only Military Affairs, but the Princely Exerciſes of Hawking and Hunting were thought too rough and tireſome for their tender Bodies.

The Kingdom endanger'd by Favourites.

As to the Duke of Ireland, he became ſo inſolent, that preſuming on his Power with the King, he openly divorc'd his Wife Philippa, tho' Grand-Daughter to King Edward the Third, and a Lady of no ſmall Beauty and irreproachable Virtue; and in her ſtead preferr'd to his Bed one Lancerona, a Bohemian of the meaneſt Extract who waited upon the Queen. Tho' the King took no Notice of this Affront offer'd to his Coſin-German, yet her Uncle the Duke of Gloceſter highly reſented it, and only waited for an Opportunity of Revenge; which the other perceiving, he reſolv'd to ſtrike firſt. And now the Time being come for the Duke of Ireland to depart, to amuſe the People the King went down with him into Wales, pretending to see him take Shipping there; but the true Reason was, that being remote fom the Nobility, they might the more securely consult how to circumvent and destroy the Duke of Gloceſter, with the Earls of Arundel, Warwick, Derby and Nottingham, and others of the contrary Party. Here the Earl of Suffolk and chief Justice Treſilian join'd with the utmoſt Zeal; and having form'd their Design and agreed upon the Execution, the King came to Nottingham, bringing the Duke of Ireland and the reſt of the Cabal along with him; to which Place they ſummon'd divers Citizens of London, the Sheriffs of every County, and all the Judges of England. They adviſ'd with the Sheriffs about what Forces they could raiſe for the King's Service againſt the Lords, and commanded them, That they ſhould not ſuffer any to be return'd as Members for the next Parliament, but ſuch as the King and his Council ſhould nominate. To which the Sheriffs reply'd, That the Commons generally favour'd the ſaid Lords, ſo that it was not in their Power to raiſe an Army in that Caſe; and as for Parliament Men, they could not hinder the People from keeping to their ancient Cuſtom of free Elections. But the Anſwers of the Judges were more agreeable to the Court than thoſe of the Sheriffs; and the better to colour theſe Proceedings with a Form of Law, ſeveral Queſtions were propounded to the Judges, touching the late Proviſions, or Act of Parliament, giving the eleven Lords Power to inſpect and puniſh Miſcarriages in the King's Miniſters. But the main Queſtion was, Whether by the Law of the Land the King might not diſanul the Decrees of the laſt Parliament: They jointly anſwer'd He might, becauſe he was above the Law; confeſſing alſo, That they themſelves had in that Parliament given their Judgment that Things were according to Law, which now they acknowledg'd to be contrary to it. But when they were order'd to ſign their Opinions in Writing, Sir Robert Belknap, chief Juſtice of the Common-Pleas, ſtood out againſt the reſt; but being highly threaten'd by the Duke of Ireland and Earl of Suffolk, he at laſt conſented, and having put his Seal to it, he broke forth into theſe Words: Now I want nothing but a Hurdle and a Halter to bring me to the Death I deſerve: If I had refus'd it, I had ſuffer'd by your Hands; and now I have gratify'd the King and you, I deſerve to die for betraying the Nobility of the Kingdom. The King having the Lawyers of his Side, endeavour'd to raiſe Forces in ſeveral Parts of the Land, but with no great Effect; and after a long Progreſs, he return'd to London, where he was receiv'd with great Pomp and Splendor, and where his Friends were moſt numerous.

The Judges join with them.

Ibid. The Duke of Gloceſter and the Lords of his Party finding the Deſigns of the Courtiers againſt them, firſt endeavour'd to vindicate, and then to defend themſelves againſt their Artifices. And the Duke offer'd to purge himſelf by Oath before the Biſhop of London, That he had no Deſign againſt the King's Perſon or Dignity; with which the Biſhop acquainted the King, and was like to have obtain'd Credit, 'till the Earl of Suffolk violently incens'd his Majeſty againſt the Duke. For which the Biſhop took the liberty to tell him openly, That it became him to be wholly ſilent, ſince he ſtood condemn'd in Parliament, and liv'd only by the King's Grace and Favour. But finding the King ſo much at the Earl's Diſpoſal as to command him out of his Preſence, he inform'd the Duke how much the King was influenc'd by his wicked Counſellors, and adviſ'd him to obviate the Deſtruction prepar'd for him. Whereupon the Duke immediately ſent for the Earls of Arundel, Warwick and Derby, Eldeſt Son to the Duke of Lancaſter, who all reſolv'd to raiſe an Army and ſtand upon their Guard, and ſo treat with the King concerning the publick Affairs, and that immoderate Favour ſhown to them who were Traitors both to him and the Publick. But the King endeavour'd to have ſurpriz'd them ſingly, before they had join'd their Forces; but failing in the Deſign, the Confederate Lords march'd towards London to Haringay-Park near Highgate, where at their Ren-

Rendezvous they muſter'd above forty thouſand Men. This broke all the King's Meaſures, and prevented a Voyage he had deſign'd for France; where, as Walſingham aſſures us, he was to have deliver'd up Calais and other important Places to the French King, which by the fatal Counſel of his Flatterers he was to have ſold to that Prince, on Condition he would aſſiſt him to ſubdue his rebellious Nobility. The King was now in great Confuſion, and held ſeveral Conſultations with his Favourites; and being one Time willing to divert himſelf by the rambling Diſcouſe of a crack'd-brain Knight call'd Sir Hugh de Lyon, kept by the Charity of the Courtiers, he jocularly ask'd him, What he ſhould do with the Lords at Haringay-Park? To which Sir Hugh anſwer'd very gravely, Let us march out, Sir, and kill every Man of them; and then, by God's Eyes, you'll have bravely deſtroy'd the moſt faithful Subjects in your Kingdom.

This was thought by ſome to contain a dangerous Truth, but was not duely follow'd; however the moſt peaceable Men procur'd that the Lords ſhould repair ſafely to Weſtminſter, and there be heard. Upon their near Approach, they were advertis'd by the Biſhop of Ely and others who had ſworn and ingag'd for their ſafe Conduct, that at the Muſe near Charing-Croſs, a thouſand armed Men under Sir Thomas Trivet and Sir Nicholas Brambre, lay in Ambuſh to intercept them. The King clear'd himſelf upon Oath from this Deſign; and being ſeated in his Royal Robes in Weſtminſter-Hall, with many of his Prelates and Peers about him, the Lords preſented themſelves before him upon their Knees; and being demanded of the Biſhop of Ely the Lord Chancellor, Why they were aſſembled in warlike manner contrary to the Laws, their joint Anſwer was, That they were aſſembled for the Good of the King and Kingdom, and to root out ſuch Traitors as were Enemies to both; naming the Duke of Ireland, the Arch-Biſhop of York, the Earl of Suffolk, chief Juſtice Treſilian, and Sir Nicholas Brambre, whom they averr'd to be no leſs, and thereupon flung down their Gloves, in Token that they were ready to prove them ſo by Combate. The King, knowing that they were out of the Way, told theſe Lords, That at the next Parliament, all Parties ſhould receive according to their Deſerts; and then with a loftier Air he demanded of them, How they durſt preſume to levy Forces againſt their Soveraign? Could they think to terrifie him by their Preſumption? Had not he Soldiers ſufficient to have deſtroy'd them like Cattle? Therefore in that Reſpect he eſteem'd of them no more than the meaneſt Scullion in his Kitchin. After theſe and other high Words, he took up the Duke his Uncle from the Ground, and bad all the reſt riſe; and after ſome more kind Diſcourſe, and drinking with the King, they took their Leaves. Two Days after, to appeaſe the Lords and ſatisfie the People, he caus'd a Proclamation to be publiſh'd in London, ſeemingly in Excuſe and Vindication of the the Duke of Gloceſter and his Aſſociates; but more to amuſe them, and to preſerve his beloved Favourites from the Storm that threaten'd 'em.

and are ſeemingly reconcil'd.

But notwithſtanding all the King's Promiſes, the Lords knowing his fleeting and variable Temper, and the vaſt Influence of his Favourites, thought it ſafeſt not to ſeparate themſelves, but with a vigilant Eye to obſerve their Motions; which prov'd much to their Advantage: For the Duke of Ireland and others, not daring to hazard the Juſtice of a Parliament, with the King's Privity, had rais'd conſiderable Forces in Wales and Cheſhire. To prevent this, Henry Earl of Derby and others march'd with a great Part of their Army, and met the Duke near Burford in Oxfordſhire, who at the firſt Charge cowardly fled away, and left a brave Commander call'd Molineaux to be ſlain in the Field, and an eaſie Victory to the Earl of Derby. The Duke fled into Holland, where meeting with cold Entertainment, he went to Utrecht, and after two or three Years wandering as a Traitor, he dy'd at Lovain in Brabant. Amongſt his Baggage was taken a conſiderable Sum of Gold, and, what was of greater Moment, the King's Letters, ordering him to come to London, and promiſing him to live and die with him againſt all Oppoſers. This Defeat confounded the whole Cabal of the Favourites; the Earl of Suffolk in Diſguiſe fled to Calais, where his own Brother, being Governor of the Caſtle, not only refus'd to harbour him, but ſeiz'd and deliver'd him into the Hands of the Lord Beauchamp, who commanded the Town, who return'd him back Priſoner to the King in England, where he was ſet at large. The King betook himſelf to the Tower of London, and there made Proviſion for his Winter-Quarters: And what added to his preſent Confuſion, about the ſame Time an Envoy from the French King was taken with Letters, in which he ſent a ſafe Conduct to King Richard, the Duke of Ireland, and ſome others, to come to Boloign; where he would be ready to receive them according to his Royal Dignity and Character; and then he was likewiſe to take Poſſeſſion of Calais, and other ſtrong Places, for which Walſingham ſays he had already made King Richard Part of Payment.

The King retires to the Tower of London.

Ibid. The Confederate Lords finding that ſuch conſiderable Territories were in danger of being loſt abroad, as well as freſh Extravagancies acted at home, in the Beginning of the Year march'd from Oxford to London with an Army of forty thouſand Men; at whoſe Arrival the Mayor and Aldermen deliver'd up the Keys of the City, while the Citizens furniſh'd them with all neceſſary Proviſions. Then cauſing all ſuſpicious Places to be ſearch'd, the Lords took up their Head Quarters in the Suburbs, proteſting that they would not depart without a perſonal Conference with the King, which at length he granted, when he ſaw he could no longer withſtand it. Having firſt permitted the Duke of Gloceſter and the other Lords to ſearch the Tower, where he then lodg'd, they waited upon him there; and after ſome few cold Compliments, they laid before him the Confederation againſt their Lives at Nottingham; his late Letters to the Duke of Ireland, contrary to his Royal Word and Agreement made at Weſtminſter, together with his diſhonourable Treaty for delivering up Calais to the French, and other Matters. The King heard them with a formal Patience and a dejected Countenance, and with Tears running down his Cheeks; which warm Drops, and the Conſideration of the King's Youth and eaſie Nature, mollify'd the Lords and caus'd them to relent. But to end all Conteſts, it was at laſt poſitively agreed That he ſhould meet them the next Day at Weſtminſter, there to treat of the weighty and neceſſary Affairs of the Realm. Yet as ſoon as they were gone, ſome falſe Friends ſuggeſted to him That his Going would be neither ſafe for his Perſon, nor conſonant to his Dignity; whereupon the King chang'd his Mind, and began to retract his Promiſe; which Mutability ſo inrag'd the Lords, then fluſh'd with Succeſs and Power, that they ſent him this peremptory Meſſage, That if he thus trifled with them, and would not come according to Appointment, they would take other Meaſures, and proceed to the Election of another Prince. This ſo terrify'd the King, that he did not only meet them, but alſo conſented to the perpetual Baniſhment of theſe Favourites, namely, the Arch-Biſhop of York, the Biſhop of Durham, the Biſhop of Chicheſter, the King's Confeſſor, the Lords Zouch and Beaumont, and ſeveral Knights; together with certain Ladies, who were not only uſeleſs and chargeable to the Court, but likewiſe ſcandalous and infamous in their Converſations; ſuch were the Lady Mohun, the Lady de Molyns, and the Lady Poynings. Several others were at the ſame Time taken into cloſe Cuſtody, as Sir Simon Burley, Sir Thomas Trivet, Sir Nicholas Brambre, Sir William Elenham, Sir John Beauchamp, and ſeveral of the Clergy. As for the Judges, Fulthorp, Belknap, Holt, Burgh, Cury and Lacton, they were arreſted as they ſate upon the Bench; but Treſilian at preſent made his Eſcape, tho' he was not long after diſcover'd and ſent to the Tower.

Walſing. Knighton. &c. The Parliament began at Candlemaſs, in which the confederate Lords juſtify'd their former Proceedings, and had twenty thouſand Pounds given them out of a Tax upon Leather and Wool, in Conſideration of their Labour and Expences,

A Parliament meet call'd the Unmerciful Parliament.

Expences, for the Honour, Profit and Safety of the King and Kingdom. After which they proceeded to draw up many Articles of Impeachment againſt the Arch-Biſhop of York, the Duke of Ireland, the Earl of Suffolk, and chief Juſtice Treſilian; in which they were accus'd of High-Treaſon, as well as other Crimes too numerous to mention here. Treſilian, lying in Diſguiſe at a Houſe near the Parliament to diſcover daily Paſſages, was betray'd by one of his Servants; and after much ignominious Uſage, was drawn through the City and hang'd at Tyburn. Sir Nicholas Brambre's Turn was next, who being Companion to Treſilian in his Actions, exactly follow'd him in his Fortunes. Then Sir John Salisbury, and Sir James Berners, two young Knights, Sir John Beauchamp Steward of the King's Houſhold, and John Blake Eſquire, were likewiſe ſacrific'd to the publick Revenge. But the Death of Sir Simon Burly, the King's Chamberlain, was thought leſs juſtifiable than all the reſt, who only met with the Favour of being beheaded. The Biſhop of Chicheſter was likewiſe condemn'd, and all the Judges, for ſigning the dangerous Paper at Nottingham; but at length they found ſo much Mercy as to be baniſh'd into Ireland, where they had ſome Allowance for their Subſiſtance. The Duke of Ireland, the Arch-Biſhop of York, the Earl of Suffolk and others had their Eſtates confiſcated to the King's Uſe by Act of Parliament. After which an Act of Indemnity was paſs'd for the Pardon of all other Perſons concern'd on either Side, during the late Inſurrections: And it was likewiſe declar'd by the Parliament, That conſidering the tender Age of the King, and the Innocency of his Royal Perſon, nothing ſhould be accounted any Fault or Diſhoneſty in his Perſon in any manner, nor ſhould turn to his perſonal Prejudice by any Contrivance or Interpretation whatſoever. Laſt of all the Parliament petition'd the King, that for nouriſhing of greater Love, Peace and Tranquility in his Kingdom, he would be pleas'd to renew his Coronation Oath, and that the Prelates might renew their Fealty, and the Lords Temporal their Homage, notwithſtanding it had been done formerly. To all which the King aſſented, and perform'd it with the utmoſt Pomp and Ceremony in the Abby Church at Weſtminſter, after publick Maſs and Sermon, and with the ſolemn Execrations of the Arch-Biſhop againſt all Infringers whatſoever. On the next Day, being the fourth of June, the Parliament ended; which, ſays Knighton, was call'd the Unmerciful Parliament; ſince by the rigid and ſevere Proceedings againſt the Favourites, they ſo far alienated the King's Affections from his Uncle the Duke of Gloceſter, and the reſt of the Lords of his Party, that he never forgave them as long as he liv'd.

The King renews his Coronation Oath.

During theſe inteſtine Struggles in the Nation, the Scots found Opportunity to invade the Northern Parts of England under the Conduct of Sir William Douglaſs a brave young Knight, a Parallel and Rival in the Honour of Arms to the famous Henry Hotſpur Lord Piercy, whom Hotſpur fighting Hand to Hand, ſlew in Battel. But the Earl of Dunbar coming up with a great Number of Scots, took Hotſpur and his Brother Priſoners, and kill'd many of the Engliſh, but not without great Loſs to his own Men. About the ſame Time the Earl of Arundel again put out to Sea, and burnt, ſunk or took fourſcore French Ships, and likewiſe ſeiz'd and plunder'd the Iſles of Rea and Oleron, together with ſome other ſmaller Iſlands in thoſe Parts. This occaſion'd a Meeting between the Engliſh and French Envoys at Calais the next Year about concluding a Peace: And tho', becauſe the French inſiſted upon having the Scots and Spaniards included, the Concluſion was deferr'd; yet ſhortly after it was reſolv'd upon for three Years, and the Scots alſo included. A. D. 1289. Reg. 12/13.

III. The Affairs of England were for a Time in a quiet and peaceable Poſture; when in the thirteenth Year of his Reign, by the Advice of ſome of his Courtiers, ſummoning a full Council, he demanded of them How old they took him to be? They anſwer'd him Somewhat above twenty one Years. At which he Walſing. Knyghton he reply'd, Then I am of full Age, and capable to manage my own Inheritance; and certainly I ought not to be in a worſe Condition than any of my Subjects; for every common Heir at that Age enjoys his Eſtate, and takes it into his own Hands. The Lords keeping a profound Silence, the King thus proceeded, 'Tis well known, That for many Years I have liv'd under your Tuition, and We thank you for the Pains you have taken; but having attain'd to a full Age, We are reſolv'd to continue no longer in Ward, but to take the Government of the Realm into Our own Hands, and to appoint and remove ſuch Officers and Miniſters as We think fit. Accordingly he forthwith commanded the Arch-Biſhop of York, then Lord-Chancellor, to reſign the Seal; which being done, the King took it and retir'd, but ſoon after return'd and gave it to William of Wickham, Biſhop of Wincheſter. He likewiſe turn'd out the Biſhop of Hereford from the Office of Treaſurer, and put another of leſs Quality in his Room; and chang'd ſeveral chief Miniſters of State, partly to ſhew his Authority, and partly to manifeſt his Diſpleaſure; particularly he remov'd his Uncle the Duke of Gloceſter, the Earl of Warwick and others from his Privy-Council, and admitted others more agreeable to his Diſpoſition. And indeed the King, tho' he was of Age, yet ſtill ſhew'd himſelf a Minor in the Art of Governing; making ſo unhappy a Choice of new Miniſters and Favourites, as in a ſhort Time brought the Kingdom into great Confuſion. Shortly after this Change, ſome Detractors had ſo prevail'd upon the King, as to make him believe that the Duke of Gloceſter was forming ſome Deſign againſt him; but upon Examination, the Falſhood and Malice of it ſoon appear'd; and the King bluſh'd at his own Credulity againſt ſo near and eminent a Relation: And tho' divers of the Inventers of theſe Reports were preſent when the Duke would have queſtion'd them, yet the King charg'd him, as he lov'd him, not to ſtir any further in the Matter.

The King declares himſelf of Age.

He takes the Government upon himſelf.

His unhappy Management.

While the King was under the Apprehenſions of one Rival, another more formidable arriv'd in England, which was the Duke of Lancaſter from his Spaniſh Expedition, who had marry'd his Daughter Philippa to the King of Portugal, and had made a Peace with the King of Caſtile, for which he receiv'd an immenſe Sum for the firſt Payment, and for the Second, the King of Caſtile ſent him forty ſeven Mules laden with Gold. This great Warrior was graciouſly receiv'd, and he happily reconcil'd the King and ſome of the Nobility: But whether the King found the Keeping of Gaſcony an unprofitable Burthen, or the Abſence of this Uncle worth the purchaſing at any Rate, in the following Year in a Parliament he inveſted him with that famous Dukedom, by delivering him the Cap of State and Ducal Rod. The Duke went over ſhortly after to take Poſſeſſion of his new Government; and his valiant Son Henry of Bullingbroke Earl of Derby, unwilling to ſpend his Time in Idleneſs, and eager after Glory and Fame, ſail'd to the Wars in Pruſſia, where in ſeveral Actions againſt the Lithuanians, he gain'd extraordinary Honour; which being afterwards compar'd with King Richard's Softneſs, made a Way for him into the Hearts and Affections of the Engliſh Nation. However the King employ'd his Time in the Appearances of War and in feign'd Combates; of which a ſhort Account may give the Reader ſome Idea of the Romantick Humour of this Age. The King appointed Royal Juſts and Tournaments to be perform'd in Smithfield, and to begin on Sunday after Michaelmaſs Day; which was proclaim'd in all the Courts of Chriſtendom by certain Heralds ſent for that Purpoſe. Upon which Notice great Numbers of Noblemen and Knights from France, Germany and the Low-Countries came over to London; particularly William Earl of Oſtrevant, and Valerian Earl of St. Paul, who had marry'd the King's Siſter. The Solemnity began from the Tower of London with a noble Cavalcade of ſixty Ladies richly adorn'd, who riding upon fine Palfreys, led every one their Knight by a Chain of Silver by her Side, garniſh'd with white Harts and golden Crowns, having their Courſers led before by as many Eſquires of Honour; and in this pompous pompous Manner they paſs'd through Cheap-ſide to Smithfield. The Juſts continu'd for many Days, in which the King himſelf perform'd his part, and the Nights concluded with Muſick, Dancings and ſofter Entertainments; and during this Time the King and Queen lodg'd at the Biſhop's Palace by St. Paul's Church, and kept a moſt magnificent Houſe for all Strangers and others.

The Pope now underſtood that the Engliſh State began again to be ſenſible of the Romiſh Incroachments; and as in a former Parliament they had paſs'd an Act to prevent all Collations of Biſhopricks and Dignities by the Pope, with Baniſhment to all ſuch as accepted the Collations, and Death to all that brought any Excommunications from Rome to hinder the Execution of the Act; ſo in the preſent Parliament another ſevere Act was made againſt all ſuch as ſhould go to the Pope to procure any ſuch Proviſions. A Proclamation was alſo publiſh'd at London, That all benefic'd Perſons then in the Court of Rome, ſhould return by a prefix'd Day, or loſe their Livings. The Pope himſelf, alarm'd with ſo great a Thunder-clap, ſent with all ſpeed into England to perſuade this eaſie King, that ſuch Statutes as were made in Prejudice of thoſe who follow'd the Court of Rome, and ſuch other Clauſes as tended to the Damage of that See, ſhould be aboliſh'd. To which the King anſwer'd That the Pope's Nuncio muſt wait 'till the next Parliament; at which Parliament the King, as alſo the Duke of Lancaſter who was by that Time return'd, ſeem'd to have ſome Reſpect to his Holineſs, whoſe Nuncio was there preſent; but the Commons would by no means give their Conſents, That ſuch Rome-Rangers, as they were call'd, ſhould without due Puniſhment purſue their uſual Courſes any longer than 'till the next Parliament. At the ſame Time, to furniſh the Duke of Lancaſter into France, to treat of a Peace, and to promote the King's intended Invaſion of Scotland, large Supplies were given both by the Clergy and Laity. Hereupon Henry Hotſpur, who had long ſince ranſom'd himſelf, was recall'd from his Charge at Calais, and made Commander of the Marches againſt Scotland; and was ſucceeded by the Earl of Nottingham in the Government of Calais. The Duke of Lancaſter's chargeable Employment in France produc'd no other Fruits than one Year's ſhort Truce.

A new Parliament.

However this gave King Richard leiſure to live according to his Inclination, which was to keep the greateſt and nobleſt Court of any King in Europe; and his Subjects led by his Example, abandoning all Thoughts of Frugality, gave themſelves over to Luxury. Great was the Exceſs of Diet, the Pomp and Grandeur of his Court, in Apparel inimitable, in Number of Servants exceeding all Belief; ten thouſand Men fed daily on his Bread, the Queen had three hundred Women belonging to her Service, and three hundred was the Number that belong'd to the Kitchin. In his private Family he knew not how to deny any Thing, and the Eaſineſs of obtaining Favours debas'd the Value of them; his Expences were innumerable, ſo that his ordinary Revenues not ſufficing, he was forc'd to uſe extraordinary Means. His immoderate Affection to his Servants, his Uncles Power, and the Peoples Hatred, being not ſufficient to undo him, his own immenſe Prodigality in Time effected it, without which he could not eaſily have been ruin'd. Being under Neceſſities, and perhaps willing to try whether he might rely upon a greater Sum, he deſir'd to borrow of the City of London a thouſand Pound, an inconſiderable Sum for ſuch a King and ſo rich a City; yet he was not only refus'd, but when an Italian Merchant freely offer'd to lend the Mony, he was for his Officiouſneſs barbarouſly beaten and almoſt ſlain. This, and a Tumult rais'd not long after by a Baker, ſo inrag'd the King that he committed the Mayor cloſe Priſoner, ſeiz'd the Liberties of the City into his own Hands, annull'd all their Privileges, and commanded that for the future no Mayor ſhould be elected, but he would appoint one that ſhould be call'd Keeper of the City; and more than this, he remov'd the Terms and Courts of Judicature to the City of York. But the Duke of Gloceſter and others were not wanting to intercede with the King on Behalf of the Londoners, ners, of whom the principal were brought before him to Windſor, and ſubmitted themſelves and Fortunes to his Mercy; with whom he ſeem'd ſo well ſatisfy'd that three Days after he came to London, where he was met with the moſt imaginable Pomp and Magnificence. And to make their Peace, they preſented the King with a Crown of Gold of great Value, and another of the ſame Metal to the Queen, together with many other noble Gifts; by which means they got their Privileges to be reſtor'd, and confirm'd to them, with the Election of a Mayor, and all Things as formerly. But after all their chargeable Preſents, and their Submiſſions, the King forc'd them to pay ten thouſand Pound by way of Fine, or elſe they muſt have ventur'd the Effects of his new Diſpleaſure; which ſevere Uſage loſt him the Affections of the Citizens ever after. It was the following Year before the King remov'd his Courts of Judicature from the City of York to London. In this Year a Parliament was held at Wincheſter, in which were granted to the King a Tenth by the Clergy, and a Fifteenth by the Laity for the Expences of the Dukes of Lancaſter and Gloceſter, who were then going over into France to treat about a Peace. But their expenſive Journey prov'd of no great Effect, and a final Peace could not be then concluded, by reaſon that the King of France had been ſeiz'd with an unaccountable ſort of Frenzy.

But is reſtor'd with great Expence.

A. D. 1393. Reg. 16/17.

Walſing. Froiſart. The following Year was remarkable for the Death of ſeveral illuſtrious Perſons, particularly Queen Anne, who to the King's great Grief deceas'd at his Manor of Sheen. Her Death was ſuch a ſenſible Affliction to him, that he not only ever after hated the Place, but alſo defac'd it by pulling down the Pinnacles, and demoliſhing the Apartment where ſhe dy'd. She had the Character of a beautiful, charitable and good humour'd Lady, but too much given to her Pleaſures, of which ſhe is ſaid to have repented on her Death-Bed: We are told that ſhe firſt taught the Engliſh Ladies the modeſt Cuſtom of riding on Side-Saddles, whereas before they rode aſtride like Men. About this Time dy'd the Dutcheſs of Lancaſter, the Counteſs of Derby, and not long after the Dutcheſs of York; as if Fortune had conſpir'd to make almoſt all the Princes of the Blood accompany the King in his Widowerſhip. Theſe Afflictions did not alter the King's Reſolution of paſſing over perſonally into Ireland; nor did they divert the Duke of Lancaſter from going to his Dukedom of Gaſcony. In Ireland the wilder ſort had much broken in upon the Engliſh Eſtabliſhments, and done great Damage to the good Subjects of England; ſo that tho' in the Reign of King Edward the Third, Ireland annually yielded thirty thouſand Pounds into the King's Exchequer, now it was ſo out of Order, that it coſt the King thirty thouſand Marks a Year for its Defence. To reduce the Rebellious he himſelf led a brave Army againſt 'em, attended by the Duke of Gloceſter, with the Earls of Marche, Nottingham and Rutland. The Terror of his Preparations, and the ſhining Preſence of a King, which of all Things was moſt grateful to the Iriſh, had ſuch good Effects, that many of their chief Men were compell'd to ſubmit.

The King goes into Ireland.

Walſing. &c. To ſupply the King's Wants occaſion'd by this Iriſh Expedition, the King's Uncle the Duke of York, as Cuſtos or Warden of England, call'd a Parliament at London, where the Duke of Gloceſter alſo repair'd to declare the King's Occaſions, and had liberal Supplies granted. But before the King could perform much more in Ireland, the Biſhops and Clergy were ſo alarm'd with the bold and numerous Accuſations which the Wickliffites or Lollards had made againſt their Body, that they ſent the Arch-Biſhop of York and the Biſhop of London to the King, begging of him to haſten his Return, to defend and ſuccour the true Faith, and Holy Church, that were both in danger of being ruin'd by the Hereticks, who were contriving how to take away the Poſſeſſions of the Church, and overthrow all Canonical Sanctions. The King greatly ſurpriz'd at the News, leaving the Earl of Marche his Lieutenant in Ireland, haſten'd into England, where he ſafely arriv'd in the Beginning of May. Upon his Arrival he ſeverely reprimanded ſome of the Nobility and Gentry, who were the chief Favourers of theſe Lollards, cauſing Sir Richard Story publickly to abjure their Principles, openly declaring, That if he ever found him to relapſe, he ſhould ſuffer Death without Mercy. And now the King, in Memory of his former great Favourite the Duke of Ireland, who dy'd at Lovain in great Miſery, order'd his Body to be embalm'd and brought into England. His Love aroſe to that Fondneſs, that he commanded his Cypreſs Coffin to be open'd, that he might view and handle the Body of his Friend, and openly expreſs his Affection. The Body was carry'd to the Priory of Colne in Eſſex, where a magnificent Funeral was made for it; the King in Perſon, the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, and the Counteſs Dowager of Oxford, Mother to the Deceas'd, being the chief Mourners; and ſeveral Biſhops and Abbots attended, but very few of the Nobility would appear, as having not yet digeſted their Reſentments againſt him.

The King's Fondneſs to the Duke of Ireland.

A. D. 1396. Reg. 19/20.

All this Time the Duke of Lancaſter continu'd in Gaſcony, where he endeavour'd to gain the Peoples Affections by his extraordinary Munificence; but when his Hopes were at the higheſt, he receiv'd a Command from King Richard to return, in order to go with him into France to finiſh a Treaty then on Foot; all which he readily obey'd. The King being then at Langly in Hartfordſhire, the Duke was there entertain'd with more Honour, as it was believ'd, than real Affection. Having leave to depart for a Time, he repair'd to the City of Lincoln, where he had a Palace, and there marry'd the Lady Catharine Swinford, Widow to Sir Thomas Swinford, his old Miſtreſs, by whom he had four Children during the Life of his Dutcheſs. But this Match highly diſcontented the Duke of Gloceſter and others, who judg'd it a great Diſhonour to the Royal Family. However the Duke, in the next Parliament procur'd an Act to Legitimate all the Children he had by this Lady, and ſirnam'd them Beaufort; and one of them was by the King's Favour created Earl of Somerſet.

The Duke of Lancaſter repairs to Lincoln.

All things being prepar'd, the King accompany'd by his two Uncles of Lancaſter and Gloceſter, at a moſt magnificent and expenſive Enterview between him and Charles King of France, between Calais and Ardres, eſpous'd the Princeſs Iſabel, Daughter to that King. The young Lady was then no more than ſeven or eight Years of Age, but King Richard receiv'd her with many Compliments and great Solemnity, and a Truce was thereupon concluded for thirty Years. Her Perſon was committed to the Dutcheſs of Lancaſter and Gloceſter, and other great Ladies, who conducted her to Calais; from whence, after a ſhort Stay, the King and all the glorious Company came over into England, where the young Queen was crown'd with great Solemnity at Weſtminſter by the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury. The King loſt his rich Tents, and a great Part of his Equipage at Sea; and our Author tells us, That this Journey and Enterview, beſides innumerable Preſents made, coſt the King three hundred thouſand Marks, which was more than all the Portion he receiv'd with his Queen. And the Duke of Gloceſter was neither ſatisfy'd with the Truce or the Match, and took the liberty to ſay, That it had been more proper to recover by Arms what the King's Father and Grand-father had loſt in France, than to enter into new Alliances with that Crown, which had always better Succeſs in Treaties than Wars with England.

IV. In the twentieth Year of this Reign all Things ſeem'd to be in a peaceable and quiet Condition in England; and the King found a Parliament that was ready to comply with his Deſires, and grant whatever he demanded. Yet all this did not ſatisfie the King's Occaſions; for upon certain Rumours ſpread abroad, That he either was now, or elſe very ſhortly to be choſen Emperor, he thereupon began to take greater State upon him, and a higher way of Living than ever before: To maintain which he fleec'd his Subjects, and borrow'd large Sums of Mony; ſo that there was no Prelate, Man of Quality, or Citizen of any Eſtate in the Kingdom, but were oblig'd to lend the King Mony, tho' much againſt their Wills; which was one of the main Things that turn'd the Trading Part of the Nation againſt him. When he had thus far compaſs'd his Deſigns, he reſolv'd to proceed, and remove ſuch as either had or might oppoſe him. And ſeeing his Uncle the Duke of Gloceſter ſtood moſt in his Way, he deſign'd to begin with him, and deſtroy him firſt, not by Law, but by ſecret Contrivances. What mov'd the King to act ſo ungenerouſly, is variouſly reported: Froiſart and Polydore Virgil with Probability relate, That the Duke carrying himſelf with too great Pride and Moroſeneſs towards the King, he ſometimes complain'd to his two Uncles, the Dukes of Lancaſter and York of their Brother's haughty and diſobliging Carriage towards him. They, to excuſe him and pacifie the King, alledg'd, That tho' their Brother was more hot and vehement than became him, yet they durſt aſſure his Majeſty that his Heart was dutiful and loyal; and that this Vehemency proceeded from a zealous Regard he had to the Honour and Revenues of his Majeſty; with which the King ſeem'd ſatisfy'd at preſent. But however, theſe Dukes not knowing how much they might be involv'd in that Diſpleaſure which they perceiv'd he retain'd againſt their Brother, thought fit to retire from Court; and by that means gave the Duke of Gloceſter's Enemies the greater Opportunities to incenſe the King againſt him. At length many Deſigns were laid to the Duke's Charge, and many Things whiſper'd againſt him, who had given but too much occaſion for diſadvantagious Reports; ſo that the King being under great Apprehenſions, reſolv'd to ſecure him by a Stratagem, which he thus effected. The Duke being at his Manor of Pleſhy in Eſſex, the King from a Hunting Seat came in a Summer's Evening to give him a Viſit, where he was receiv'd with all due Reſpect by him and his Dutcheſs. After a ſhort Refreſhment, he commanded the Duke to order ſome of his Horſes to be Sadled, to bear him Company that Night to London upon an extraordinary Council; upon which the Duke with only five or ſix Attendants, immediately mounted and accompany'd him towards London, while the other entertain'd him with the moſt familiar and obliging Diſcourſe. Coming near Stratford, where an Ambuſh was laid to apprehend him, the King ſuddenly clapp'd Spurs to his fleet Horſe, and left the Duke to be unexpectedly ſeiz'd by the Earl of Nottingham, and a great Number of Horſemen; who hurry'd the unfortunate Prince to a Veſſel prepar'd for him on the Thames, and carry'd him over to Calais, where he was kept cloſe Priſoner, and never return'd after.

The King's Deſigns againſt the Duke of Gloceſter.

The Duke of Gloceſter ſeiz'd and carry'd to Calais.

Walſing. &c. The King being now reſolv'd to finiſh his intended Projects, proceeded after the like manner with the reſt of the Duke's Party; and to that End he ſent for the Earls of Warwick and Arundel to Court, where he treated them with gracious Words and Promiſes, but in their Return arreſted them for Treaſon and ſent them to the Tower, as he did not long after the Lord Cobham and Sir John Cheney, with ſeveral others of the ſame Faction. The Nation being much alarm'd at theſe uncommon Proceedings, the King by a Declaration ſet forth, That the Lords lately apprehended were not thus treated for former Offences, but for certain new Treaſons, which ſhould be prov'd in due Time; tho', as Walſingham ſays, the Event declar'd the contrary. After this he call'd a grand Council of Peers at Nottingham, in which ſeveral Lords were accus'd, and left to anſwer in the next Parliament to meet at Weſtminſter in the middle of September: In the Election of which Parliament our Hiſtorians tell us, That the King by certain indirect Practices, and Management of the Sheriffs of the Counties, whom he had made for his Purpoſe, caus'd them to return ſuch Members of Parliament, as he had before nominated: Which is the firſt Example of any King's making uſe of an arbitrary Power in this Kind, and which prov'd one grand Step to his Ruin. In this Parliament the King had a great Guard of Cheſhire Men to ſecure his Perſon; and the Lords attended alſo also with no small Numbers about him. The Bishop of Exeter, then Lord Chancellor, open'd the Session with an Oration upon a Text of Scripture, and declar'd the Royal Power to be the only real Power, and that those who endeavour'd to destroy or diminish it, deserv'd the severest Punishments. Then Sir John Bushy, a Creature of the King's, being by him nominated Speaker, the Parliament proceeded to reverse all the Proceedings in that of the eleventh Year of this Reign; and first of all that Commission which had impower'd eleven Lords to inspect the publick Revenues of the Nation, declaring it obtain'd traiterously, by Constraint, and against the Royal Crown and Dignity. Next they annull'd all the Pardons granted to the Duke of Gloceſter, the Earls of Arundel and Warwick and others, as being obtain'd by Constraint, and against the King's Will; not considering, says our Author, that the recalling such Pardons struck at the King's Safety; for since Mercy is the Strength of the Royal Throne, whoever takes that away destroys its main Foundation. In Sum this Parliament revers'd every Thing of moment enacted nine Years before by that which was call'd the Unmerciful Parliament; such uncertain Things have these general Assemblies been, when manag'd either by Court Intrigues, or popular Factions.

Many of the Nobility condemn'd by it.

The Consequences of these Proceedings were first the Impeachment and Condemnation of Thomas Arundel Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, chiefly for being traiterously concern'd in the above-nam'd Commission for inspecting the publick Revenues; for which he was banish'd the Kingdom, and had all his Temporalties confiscated. Next the Earls of Arundel and Warwick were impeach'd and condemn'd of High-Treason that had pass'd nine and ten Years before, and for which they had been pardon'd. The former was beheaded on Tower-Hill, where his Behaviour was extraordinary; and seeing his Son-in-Law the Earl of Nottingham, and his Nephew the Earl of Kent present with all the Marks of Satisfaction, he calmly told them, That it became them at least to have been absent from such a Sight; but the Time would shortly come, when as many should admire at their Misfortune, as they now did at his. Froisart says that the King was present at the Execution, and Walsingham affirms, that he was often hunted with an Apparition or Imagination of his Ghost; for he no sooner clos'd his Eyes to Sleep, but he fancy'd Arundel stood by him. The Earl of Warwick pleading guilty, obtain'd a more merciful Sentence, being condemn'd to a perpetual Imprisonment in the Isle of Man. But the Duke of Gloceſter, being too popular and formidable to be brought to a publick Trial, was not long before by the King's Order secretly smother'd by Pillows and Feather-Beds at Calais, where it was reported he dy'd of an Apoplexy; after which he was attainted of High-Treason, and had all his Lands and Possessions confiscated to the King's Use. This was the unfortunate End of a Man majestick, valiant and brave, but of a restless and turbulent Temper, which being blown up by his Greatness, brought him into many unjustifiable Actions, which at length produc'd his Ruin. After this the King to strengthen his Party, and to kindle new Lights in the Room of such as he had extinguish'd, made his Cosin Henry Earl of Derby, Duke of Hereford, the Earl of Rutland Duke of Albemarl, the Earl of Kent Duke of Surrey, the Earl of Huntington Duke of Exeter, the Earl of Nottingham Duke of Norfolk, the Earl of Somerset Marquess of Dorset, the Lord Spenser Earl of Gloceſter, the Lord Neville Earl of Westmorland, William Scrope Earl of Wiltshire, and Thomas Piercy Earl of Worceſter. Among these, to maintain their Dignities, the King made a Distribution of the greater Part of the Lands of the Duke of Gloceſter, and the Earls of Arundel and Warwick, hoping to have bound them by a double Obligation of Duty and Affection; not considering that such purchas'd Friends are seldom well satisfy'd, or true in Time of Need.

New Advancements.

A. D. 1398. Reg. 21, 22. This Parliament was so highly serviceable to the Court Designs, that contrary to the usual Methods of these Times, it was only prorogu'd, and summon'd to meet at Shrewsbury, as a Place more proper than Westminster. Here the the bold Aſſertions and Opinions that the Judges had made at Nottingham, in the eleventh Year of his Reign, for which they ſuffer'd, were now confirm'd to be good in Law; and the whole Proceedings of the Parliament held in the ſame Year, at once declar'd to be null and void, as being done contrary to the Will and Liberty of the King, and the Dignity of his Crown. The Judges alſo at this Time gave their Opinion, That when the King had propos'd Articles to be handled in Parliament, it was Treaſon to propoſe others 'till they were diſpatch'd. Under a Pretence of Diſpatch of Affairs the King by an unpreſidented Action obtain'd that the Authority of this Parliament ſhould be delegated to a ſelect Number of Lords and Commons appointed by himſelf; by which Act the whole Power of the Kingdom was now devolv'd upon the King, twelve Peers, and ſix Commoners. Then he granted a general Pardon to all except fifty Perſons, whom he would not have nam'd, but reſerv'd them for a Curb to his Nobility, to keep them ſtill in Danger of being nam'd one of the fifty, if they diſpleas'd him. Laſtly, to add the greater Strength and Reverence to the Acts and Proceedings of this Parliament, the King ſhortly after procur'd the Pope's Bull, containing great Execrations upon all that ſhould preſume to break or oppoſe them, which was ſolemnly publiſh'd at St. Paul's Croſs, and other Places throughout England. Furthermore to gratifie the Cheſhire Men, who had chiefly aſſiſted him and his late Favourites, he honour'd that County with the Name and Dignity of a Principality, and added to the reſt of his own Titles that of Prince of Cheſter, and to his Coat of Arms the ſuppos'd Bearing of Edward the Confeſſor.

Many dangerous Proceedings.

Ibid. For the preſent all Things ſeem'd to concur with the King's Deſigns; the Heads of the Party that ſo long oppos'd him were cut off, and the Nobility either terrify'd or brib'd by Honours or Eſtates; the Commons were unable to expreſs their Reſentments otherwiſe than in Sighs and Murmurs, and the King's great Officers of State, and his very Parliaments were now modell'd according to his Pleaſure; ſo that no King ſince the Conqueſt had been more abſolute than he was at preſent. Yet notwithſtanding all his Power and Grandeur, in a ſhort Time by ſmall Accidents and unlikely Inſtruments, he was more plunged and embroiled than ever, and without Reſiſtance reduc'd to a ſhort and ſpeedy Overthrow. The Occaſions of this great Revolution proceeded firſt from a Quarrel that aroſe between the Dukes of Hereford and Norfolk, the former accuſing the latter of certain Words ſpoken to him againſt the King's Perſon and Government. The Subſtance of the Words was, That King Richard had no Regard to the Peers of the Land, but as much as he could endeavour'd to deſtroy them by baniſhing ſome and putting others to Death: That he never troubled his Thoughts with conſidering how his Dominions were diminiſh'd by his Careleſsneſs; and that all Things ran to Ruin, both in the Time of Peace and War. The Duke of Norfolk being accus'd, deny'd that he ever ſpoke ſuch Words, and challenging his Adverſary, Coventry was appointed by the King for the Place of Combate. Where both appearing in great Pomp, and the King being preſent with a mighty Train, as the two Combatants ſtood ready to ingage, the King, under the Pretence of preventing deadly Feuds between two ſuch Families, or rather to be freed from an Enemy tho' with the Loſs of a Friend, baniſh'd the Duke of Norfolk for ever, and the Duke of Hereford for ten Years, and then for ſix. The former dy'd in a ſhort Time miſerable and unlamented at Venice; and 'tis obſervable that Sentence was pronounc'd againſt him on the ſame Day Twelve-Month that the Duke of Gloceſter had been murder'd by his Order at Calais; ſo juſt is the Divine Vengeance at ſome Times, not only in puniſhing Villanies, but in cauſing the Puniſhment to be attended with ſuch Circumſtances as may render it more conſpicuous to the World.

The ill State of the Nation.

thering throughout the Nation, and then re-flouriſhing contrary to Expectation. Theſe were look'd upon as very ominous in thoſe Times, and the firſt Conſequence of them, as it was thought, was the Death of the great Duke of Lancaſter, who deceas'd about Candlemaſs, a Prince active and couragious, and who had made a noble Figure in the World. He had the Character of a Man prudent and wary in his Actions, an Approver of ſafe Councils on good Reaſons, rather than fortunate Exploits with Hazards; one that was neither too negligent or ambitious of Glory, and therefore deported himſelf towards the King his Nephew with a Reſpect decent enough for a moderate Prince, but not ſo much as the inſatiable Deſire of Arbitrary Power, join'd with the depraved Manners of the Court, might require. His brave Son, Henry Duke of Hereford, unjuſtly baniſh'd, ought to have inherited not only his Title, but alſo his vaſt Eſtate; but the King, being jealous of ſo great a Power in a near Relation he had ſo highly exaſperated, took care to prevent it by ſeizing all his Poſſeſſions, and pronouncing his Baniſhment perpetual. This was done by a Meeting at Weſtminſter of thoſe few Lords and Commons, who had the Authority of a Parliament conferr'd upon them. And theſe proceeded to a more ſevere and unjuſt Action againſt one Henry Benet Clerk, who for regularly procuring Letters Patents from the King in favour of the exil'd Duke, was adjudg'd as a Traitor to be hang'd, drawn and quarter'd: Only by being the King's Chaplain, he found Favour to eſcape with Life, and ſo ſuffer'd perpetual Baniſhment.

The Death of the Duke of Lancaſter.

His Character.

His Son Henry diſinherited by the King.

By theſe and the like arbitrary Acts, the Laws and Liberties of England, were reduc'd to a dangerous and languiſhing Condition; for the King having diſpatch'd the Duke of Gloceſter, and the reſt of the Noblemen who oppos'd him, and being now freed from his Uncle the Duke of Lancaſter by Death, and his Son by Baniſhment, had the Liberty to act at Pleaſure. His only remaining Uncle the Duke of York, being an eaſie and quiet Prince, more addicted to Pleaſures than Buſineſs, and much govern'd by his Son the Duke of Albemarl, was ſo far from oppoſing, that he ſeem'd rather to countenance the King's late Actions, by voting with the preſent ſtanding Committee of Parliament. So that the King now looking upon himſelf as Hors-du-page, and free from all Control, abandon'd himſelf to ſoft Eaſe and the deſtructive Charms of Pleaſure; by whoſe fatal Example many of the Nobility deliver'd themſelves up to Sloth and Luxury, which introduc'd Cowardice and Effeminacy, and deſtroy'd both Manhood and Reputation. The publick Affairs both at home and abroad were in a Condition anſwerable to ſuch Managers, who had been long byaſs'd more by private Reſpects than publick Advantages; which caus'd the Nation to decline both in Honour and Riches; ſo that all Things being out of Order, the Commonwealth ſeem'd haſtning into inevitable Ruin. The Northern Counties, through frequent Devaſtations and unfaithful Truces, were impoveriſh'd by the Scots, who had gain'd ſeveral important Poſts, and depopulated thoſe Parts with their continual Inroads. On the Seas the Merchants Ships were frequently ſurpriz'd by the French; and the King's Hereditary Dominions in France reduc'd to a narrow Compaſs, and many ſtrong Places loſt by Negligence or ſold by Treachery. The Profits and Revenues of the Crown, and even of the whole Kingdom, were farm'd out to certain Favourites, who unmercifully rack'd and oppreſs'd the King's Subjects. Great Sums of Mony were by new invented Methods, rather extorted than borrow'd from all Sorts of People, of which no Advantage accru'd to the Kingdom; only the King's private Pleaſures were extravagantly maintain'd, and unworthy Favourites advanc'd. To add to all, Seventeen whole Counties, which ten Years before had join'd with the Duke of Gloceſter, notwithſtanding the general Pardon, were now held guilty of High-Treaſon: For which they were forc'd to compound for a large Sum of Mony, to take new Oaths of Allegiance, and the richeſt among them to ſign and ſeal to a Blank, in which the appointed Officers might inſert what Sum they they pleas'd; which was ſufficient to ruin whole Counties, as well as Families. In ſum, the unfortunate King was not only ſurrounded, but in a manner beſieg'd by ignorant Miniſters and ſordid Flatterers, who kept him from all Relief of good Counſel, and render'd him ſo univerſally hated, that great Numbers deſign'd to rebel at the firſt Opportunity; being reſolv'd rather to run the Hazard of a ſhort and ſpeedy Ruin, than languiſh under the Torment of a tedious Slavery. The King generally hated.

Walſing. Ann. Hib. In the midſt of theſe uneaſie and unſetled Times the King imprudently reſolv'd upon an Expedition into Ireland, to revenge the Death of his Lieutenant the Earl of Marche, the neareſt Heir to the Crown, who had been ſlain in an Ingagement with the wild Iriſh: In Order to which, he rais'd a numerous Army, but not without a vaſt Charge, and grievous Oppreſſion of his Subjects, not only in levying Mony by illegal Methods, but taking up Carriages, Victuals and other Neceſſaries without paying for them; which raſh and unadvis'd Practices render'd himſelf and his Government ſtill more and more uneaſie to the Nation. About Whitſontide he took Shipping for Ireland, accompany'd with the Dukes of Albemarl and Exeter, the Sons of the Dukes of Gloceſter and Lancaſter, and divers other Noblemen; but his Forces moſtly conſiſted of Cheſhire Men, on whom he chiefly confided. He alſo carry'd over with him his chief Relicks, with his Plate and Jewels of the Crown that were in his Treaſure; as if he had deſign'd to have taken a final Leave both of his Kingdom and Dignity in England. At his going off, he committed a new Error in Politicks, which was his proclaiming the Earl of Northumberland and his Friends Traitors, and ordering their Eſtates to be ſeiz'd, only for not attending him in this Expedition, when their Preſence was requir'd in the North againſt the Scots; which caus'd the Earl in a ſhort Time to be one of the Firſt that revolted from him. In the mean Time the King landed at Waterford, and immediately after his Arrival, march'd from Dublin againſt the Iriſh of Ulſter, and got many little Victories in ſeveral Ingagements he had with them; in all which, the King is ſaid to have behav'd himſelf with great Courage and Reſolution. And theſe petty Iriſh Princes were ſo terrify'd with the Force of his Arms, that they ſent Envoys to him to petition for Pardon, and to ſue for Peace, which at length they obtain'd, tho' with ſome Difficulty. He makes an Expedition into Ireland, Walſing. &c. But theſe inconſiderable Triumphs coſt King Richard no leſs than his Kingdom: For while he was thus ingag'd and abſent from his diſcontented Nation, Henry the new Duke of Lancaſter being invited over by many of the Nobility and Gentry, and likewiſe excited by the exil'd Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, reſolv'd to try his Fortunes in the Kingdom of England. Wherefore after he had diſpatch'd ſome of his choice Friends over to make the beſt Preparations for his Arrival, he addreſs'd himſelf to the French King with a Compliment, that he deſign'd a Viſit to his Kinſman the Duke of Bretaign, therefore deſir'd his Letters of ſafe Conduct; which being granted, he there privately levy'd a few Soldiers, and hiring three Ships of the Duke of Bretaign, he put to Sea with them for England, accompany'd with the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, and his Nephew, the Lord Cobham, Sir Thomas Erpington and Sir Thomas Ramſtone Knights, with ſome other Gentlemen, his whole Retinue not conſiſting of above eighty Perſons: So that it is hard to judge which was more wonderful, that he durſt attempt, or that he ſhould ſucceed with ſo ſmall a Number. However the Duke was too wiſe and cautious to puſh Things beyond all Poſſibility of a Retreat; and therefore did not immediately land, but lay cruiſing up and down, ſometimes appearing on one Coaſt and ſometimes on another, that he might the better diſcover the Inclinations of the People towards him, and what Forces were ready to receive or reſiſt him. But at laſt being ſatisfy'd with what he obſerv'd, he landed without Oppoſition about the Beginning of July at Ravenſpurre in Yorkſhire, with no more than twenty Lances, tho' he might have had a greater Force from the Duke of Bretaign; ſo much did he confide in the Juſtice which occaſions his Fall. Henry the baniſh'd Duke of Lancaſter invited into England. He lands with a few Men in Yorkſhire.

ſtice of his Cauſe, and the Favour of the People. Yet he did not then make any Pretenſions to the Crown, but only gave out that he came to regain the Dukedom of Lancaſter, and the reſt of his lawful Inheritance, which all the Nation knew was wrongfully detain'd from him, and ſo hop'd that they were the more ready to pity and favour him in a Cauſe wherein he had receiv'd ſuch palpable Injury from the King.

Many Lords join with him. His Arrival being known, the Lords Willoughby, Roſs, Darby and Beaumont immediately repair'd to him, and ſhortly after the Earls of Northumberland and Weſtmorland, with great Numbers of the Gentry and common People. Upon which, the King's Lieutenant and Uncle the Duke of York, ſummon'd the Biſhop of Cheſter, the Lord Chancellor Scrope, the Earl of Wiltſhire Lord Treaſurer, Sir John Buſhy, Sir Henry Green, Sir William Bagot, and Sir John Ruſſel, chief Counſellors and Confidents to King Richard, to adviſe how to act in this dangerous Exigency. Among whom it was ignorantly or treacherouſly concluded to abandon the City of London, and appoint the general Rendezvous to be at St. Albans. But when the common People were call'd out of ſeveral Counties to that Place, they openly declar'd, That they would not act any Thing to the Prejudice of the Duke, who they knew was unjuſtly baniſh'd his Country, and illegally kept from his Inheritance. This was like a Thunder-clap to the Earl of Wiltſhire and the other Favourites, who were conſcious that the Peoples Hatred was greater againſt them, than the King's Perſon, becauſe they had farm'd the Publick Revenues, and us'd intollerable Extortions; therefore, ſuddenly leaving the Duke of York, they fled to Briſtol; which gave ſo great a Diſcouragement to him, that not daring to venture an improbable Reſiſtance, he gave over the Cauſe, and laid down his Arms. Upon which the reſt of the Nobility either openly declar'd for the Duke, or held ſecret Correſpondence with him, reſolving to ſwim down with his mighty Stream, rather than pretend to ſtem an impetuous Torrent that bore away all before it. For nothing could increaſe faſter than the Duke's Forces in his March; inſomuch that they were ſoon grown to ſixty thouſand ſtrong, with which he reſolv'd to puſh on his good Fortune, and haſten to London. There he found a Reception ſuitable to the uſual Joy that diſcontented and turbulent People ſhew in Alterations; he was receiv'd in Triumph without Victory, and with all the Teſtimonies of Zeal and Affection, which flattering Crouds could pay their lawful Soveraign. Pageants and rich Preſents entertain'd him, with all the Acclamations and extravagant Praiſes that could be invented, and as many opprobrious Reflections caſt on the Conduct of King Richard. From London he haſten'd to Briſtol, to purſue the fugitive Favourites; and finding the Caſtle fortify'd againſt him, he ſo briskly attack'd it, that in four Days Time he forc'd it to ſurrender upon Diſcretion. And taking therein the Earl of Wiltſhire, Sir John Buſhy, and Sir Henry Green, he the next Day ſacrific'd them to the importunate Rage of the incenſed People, by cutting off all their Heads without Mercy.

His Forces vaſtly increaſe.

He marches to London.

and from thence to Briſtol.

During theſe Succeſſes, there was no News of King Richard; who either was hinder'd by contrary Winds, or acted according to the Humour of ſome weak Spirits, who contemn remote Dangers, but are aſtoniſh'd at their near Approach. However at length, ſecuring the Sons of the Dukes of Lancaſter and Gloceſter, he reſolv'd for England; but the Duke of Albemarl perſuaded him to ſtay 'till his Prepartions were ready, which fatal Council, as it was his ill Deſtiny to follow, ſo it prov'd his Ruin: Yet he immediately ſent over the Earl of Salisbury to raiſe an Army in Wales and Cheſhire againſt his Return, which he ſtrictly promis'd ſhould be within ſix Days at furtheſt. The Earl was very ſucceſsful in his Levies, and ſoon got together no leſs than forty thouſand Men; but the King much failing in his Time of Appearance to head them, they in great Diſcontent return'd home. At length, in eighteen Days time, the King, attended by the Dukes of Albemarl, Exeter and Surrey, the Biſhops of London,

He returns into England.

Ile, Exeter and Carliſle, and ſome others of the Nobility, landed at Milford-haven with a conſiderable Number of his Cheſhire Army, and march'd to Carmarthen, where he ſtaid to conſult how to proceed; but when he underſtood that the Earl of Salisbury's Forces were diſbanded, that moſt of his ſtrong Places as well as Flint had declar'd for the Duke of Lancaſter, that moſt of the Nobility and Gentry had eſpous'd his Cauſe, and that his principal Favourites had loſt their Heads, he was ſo far from retaining the Magnanimity of a King, that he himſelf ceas'd to be a Man, and abandon'd himſelf to Deſpair; being perplex'd and confounded with Uncertainties, and deſtitute both of Reſolution and good Counſel in ſuch amazing Difficulties. For while ſome advis'd him to march directly forwards, as being ſure of many who out of Duty, or Affection, or for Pay, would follow his Standard; others perſuaded him to return into Ireland, and go over to his Father-in-Law of France, and ſtay 'till the Storm was over, and 'till a more convenient and favourable Seaſon. But the King rejecting both Counſels, took a middle Courſe, and reſolv'd to ſtay in Wales, and expect the Event of this Defection; while the Soldiers he had brought over with him, endeavour'd to incourage him to Battel, vowing to live and die with him. But this could not raiſe his drooping Spirits, for in the Night he ſtole away from his Forces, and with ſome of his Nobility went Incognito croſs the Country to the Caſtle of Conway; where the Lord Thomas Percy, Steward of his Houſhold, openly in the Hall before all the King's Servants, broke his white Staff of Office, and repair'd to the Duke of Lancaſter; and moſt of the Royal Retinue by his Example diſpers'd and ſhifted every one for himſelf. Such uncertain Attendants are the common ſort of Courtiers, who like Flies, upon the firſt Storm, leave the Body that has nouriſh'd them.

Being under great Perplexities.

He abandons his Army.

Walſing. Chron. Lanc.

The poor unfortunate King being thus abandon'd, had no Hopes left but in a Parly; in Order to which, the ejected Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, and the Earl of Northumberland repair'd to him to Conway Caſtle. The Sum of the King's Propoſals was, That if he and eight Perſons, whom he would name, might have an honourable Allowance, and the Aſſurance of a quiet private Life, he would reſign his Crown. To which the Earl of Northumberland gave his Oath; which ſo ſatisfy'd the King, that he immediately departed in their Company to the Caſtle of Flint, where he put himſelf into the Duke of Lancaſter's Hands, and rod with him that Night to the Caſtle of Cheſter. This is Walſingham's Account; but others ſay that Northumberland deluded the King with more plauſible Propoſals than the fore-mention'd, and by a ſort of Stratagem got him into his Poſſeſſion and convey'd him to the Duke of Lancaſter at Flint Caſtle; where the King having din'd, the Duke appear'd before him, to whom the King ſaid, Coſin of Lancaſter, you are welcome. The other anſwer'd, I am come ſooner than you appointed me, becauſe the Fame of your People is, that for theſe twenty one Years you have govern'd ill and rigorouſly, for which they are highly diſſatisfy'd; but if Heav'n pleaſes, I will help to govern them better for the future. To which the King return'd no other Anſwer but, Fair Couſin, ſince it pleaſes you, it pleaſes Us alſo. Soon after the Duke, with the miſerable King in his Poſſeſſion, and a great Part of his Army, march'd directly towards London, where he was receiv'd with infinite Acclamations, and the other with as many Reproaches. Before he enter'd the City, the Recorder, with many Knights and Eſquires, met him, and deſir'd in behalf of the Commons of London, that he would cut off the Head of King Richard, and of all that were taken with him: But the Duke would by no means harken to ſuch a Piece of Villany, but told them, That ſuch an Act would prove an everlaſting Reproach to him and his Adherents; but he would carry him along with them to the Tower of London, and then leave him to the Judgment of the Parliament. And here it is obſervable that the King having ſurrender'd himſelf the twentieth of Auguſt, but ſeven and forty Days after the Duke's Arrival in England, the Duke might well aſſume the noted Motto of Julius

He falls into the Hands of the Duke of Lancaſter, who carries him to London.

The Duke's great Succeſs.

Ceſter, for conſidering his Marches from Beaumaris in the North up to London, and from thence to Briſtol, and through all Wales to Cheſter, a Perſon can ſcarce travel over ſo much Ground in the ſpace that he conquer'd it. And ſo in[illegible] and Rooms in the King's [illegible] and Treaſure which were [illegible] with [illegible] Horſes [illegible] now ſtill [illegible] Houſe.

A Parliament call'd in King Richard's Name.

The Tower Rolls.

The King being [illegible] the Tower, the Duke of Lancaſter [illegible] for he had already at [illegible] caus'd [illegible] iſſu'd out in King Richard's Name for the [illegible] Parliament to be held at Weſtminſter on the laſt Day of September; [illegible] mean Time he conſulted with his Friends how to compleat thoſe Deſigns, which beyond his Hopes had been ſucceſsfully Provided. In this Matter the Duke of York was now become his Chief Director, and after divers Debates he propounded it as very expedient, That King Richard ſhould both voluntarily reſign the Crown, and likewiſe be ſolemnly Depos'd by all the Eſtates of the Realm; for otherwiſe his Reſignation would be imputed only to his Fear, and his Deprivation only to their Force, of which the one is always apt to move Pity, and the other to excite Envy. But if both concurr'd, and his Deſires agreed with his own Deſerts, as being willing to relinquiſh what he was adjudged worthy to forfeit, then it would appear that he neither was expell'd his Kingdom by meer Conſtraint, nor left it without a juſt Cauſe. This Advice was generally approv'd, and accordingly purſu'd; and a ſolemn Reſignation was render'd to the King on Michaelmaſs-Day, which he firſt read with his own Mouth, and then ſign'd it with his own Hand. The Form was very full and expreſſive, and in it was declar'd, That his Reſignation was purely, voluntarily, ſimply and abſolutely; and more than that, That he judg'd himſelf to have been inſufficient and unfit for the Rule and Government of his Kingdoms, and by his notorious Demerits had deſerv'd to be Depos'd. After this he declar'd his Deſire that the Duke of Lancaſter might ſucceed him in his Kingdoms, and in Token of his Will and Intention, he openly pull'd off his Signet Ring, and put it upon the Duke's Finger. The next Day at the meeting of the Parliament, the Arch-Biſhop of [illegible] and the Biſhop of Hereford publickly declar'd the King's Ceſſion and Reſignation, with the Inſcription of the King's Hand, and the Delivery of his Signet; all which was unanimouſly approv'd and admitted by the whole Body.

He formally reſigns the Crown.

But all this was not thought ſufficient; therefore to remove all Doubts and Scruples, thirty three Articles of his Crimes and Failings were drawn up and openly read in the Parliament; of all which, it was ſaid that he had confeſs'd himſelf guilty. Theſe Articles were very long and aggravating, and may be ſeen at length in Doctor Brady's and Mr. Tyrrell's Hiſtories, where they take up above eight Pages in Folio. In the Beginning of them was plac'd his Abuſe of the publick Treaſure, and diſhonourable Waſte of the Crown Lands, by which he became intolerably grievous to his Subjects. The particular and unhappy Cauſes of the Dukes of Glocester and Lancaſter, of the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury and the Earl of Arundel, fill'd up ſeveral Articles. In the reſt he was charg'd with Diſſimulation, Falſhood, Loſs of Honour in the World, Rapines, Extortions, Denial of Juſtice, Raſures and Embezelling of Records, diſhonourable Shifts, wicked Actions of State, Cruelty, Covetouſneſs, Subordinations, Laſciviouſneſs, Treaſon to the Rights of the Crown, Perjuries; and in ſhort with all ſorts of unkingly Vices, and with abſolute Tyranny it ſelf. And indeed there was nothing ſo improbable that could then be objected, but would have gone for current and undeniable with Affections ſo throughly prepar'd. Theſe Articles being read, all the Eſtates of the Realm unanimouſly conſented ex abundanti to proceed to the Depoſition of King Richard, for the greater Security and Tranquility of the People: And accordingly they appointed certain Commiſſioners, the Biſhop of St. Aſaph, the Abbot of Glaſtonbury, the Earl of Glocester, the Lord Berkly, Sir Thomas Erpyngham, Sir Thomas Grey, and and William Thirnyng Juſtice, to pronounce a ſolemn Sentence of Depoſition againſt King Richard from all Royal Dignity, Majeſty and Honour, in the Name of all the Eſtates of England. Which being done, they conſtituted certain Perſons to be their Procurators or Agents to go to King Richard and reſign the Homage and Fealty that he had been made to him, and give him Notice of what was done to his Depoſition, and [illegible].

He is ſolemnly depos'd.

Ibid. Upon which Royal Throne being now reputed vacant, Henry Duke of Lancaſter ſtood forth in the Place and Habit ſo as he might be ſeen by the People; and having firſt ſolemnly invocated the Name of Chriſt, in a ſhort Form of Words laid Claim to the vacant Crown of England, as being truly and lineally deſcended from King Henry the Third. Upon which Claim, and his ſhewing King Richard's Signet, all the Eſtates unanimouſly conſented that the ſaid Henry ſhould reign over them; and both the Arch-Biſhops of the Kingdom ſolemnly plac'd him in the Royal Throne, with the general Acclamations and Applauſes of the People. Then to compleat the Solemnity, the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury made a ſhort Sermon or Diſcourſe upon the Words of Samuel, A Man ſhould reign over the People; from whence he took an Occaſion to deſcribe the Happineſs of that Kingdom which was govern'd by a Man, and the Infelicity of that govern'd by a Child, whether in Age or Diſcretion; and whereas they had dangerouſly felt the Evils of the latter under King Richard, ſo they hop'd abundantly to enjoy the Bleſſings of the former from King Henry. After which the new Monarch aroſe from his Throne, and with an affable Countenance and a gracious Smile declar'd, That none would think that he intended by Way of Conqueſt to diſinherit any Man, certain evil Members only excepted. On the ſame Day he made a ſplendid Entertainment for the Nobility and Gentry, who were there in great Numbers. As for King Richard then in the Tower, when all Homage and Fealty was reſign'd to him by William Thirnyng in the Name of the reſt, he only anſwer'd, That he look'd not after ſuch Things, but after all he hop'd That his Couſin would be his good Lord and Friend. Thus was King Richard depos'd upon Tueſday the Thirtieth Day of September, after a diſhonourable and unfortunate Reign of twenty two Years, two Months and eight Days, being then in the Strength and Vigour of his Age, and not above thirty three Years old.

Here ended the Reign, tho' not the Life of King Richard the Second; a Prince who as to his Perſon was the moſt amiable and handſom that ever reign'd ſince the Conqueſt, agreeable to the Son of ſo beautiful a Father and Mother; and he might have prov'd an excellent Prince had his Education been anſwerable to his natural Diſpoſition. For there appear'd in him many good Inclinations, which might have grown to perfect Virtues, if they had not been blaſted by corrupt Flatterers in his Youth. Theſe taught him Luxury, Viciouſneſs and the Deſire of Power, ſo that in a ſhort Time, by his being ſtill govern'd by them, he loſt all the Eſteem and Affection the Nation had once for him; and this occaſion'd great Hardſhips, and very unjuſtifiable Uſage from his Subjects to him, beſides the Ruin of his moſt beloved Friends. He acted as one of a revengeful Spirit, and was guilty of many Breaches of Faith; for which he more than once receiv'd his Puniſhment from the Hands of thoſe who had not the moſt Right to inflict it. As to his Temper, he was rather profuſe than liberal in his Gifts and Expences, keeping greater State and Hoſpitality than any of his Predeceſſors; and tho' we find no publick Act of Charity done by him, yet his rebuilding of Weſtminſter-Hall in that noble manner it now ſtands, ſufficiently ſhews that he lov'd to appear great and magnificent in whatſoever he undertook: But his Grandeur was one great Step to his Ruin. His Reign in general, in ſeveral Reſpects reſembled that of King Edward the Second, his Great-grand-father; for both adher'd to the Advices of Favourites, and both equally neglected the Councils of the ancient Nobility:

The Reign of King HENRY the Fourth.

Containing 13 Years, 5 Months, and 21 Days.

I. KING Richard II. being thus formally depriv'd and depos'd, was in his Life-Time ſucceeded by Henry Duke of Lancaſter, from his Birth-Place in Lincolnſhire ſirnam'd Bullingbrook, a Perſon of great Note and Renown, and now about thirty three Years of Age; every Way qualify'd for his high Office, only he wanted an unqueſtionable Title: For beſides King Richard himſelf, who proceeded from Edward the Eldeſt Son of Edward III. the Earl of Marche was then living, who deſcended from Lionel his Third Son, while his own Deſcent was from his Fourth Son John. However being ſo well ſupported on all Sides, he immediately call'd a Parliament in his own Name, who met in ſix Days Time, and conſiſted of the ſame Members that King Richard had ſummon'd not long before. In this Parliament, which met on the ſixth Day of October, King Henry being ſeated on his Royal Throne in Weſtminſter-Hall before the full Aſſembly, and a numerous Concourſe of others, Arundel Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, in a formal Oration firſt declar'd the Cauſe of their Summons, and that King Richard's former Summons was of no Force or Effect, by reaſon of the Acceptation of the Renunciation made by him, before King Henry had iſſu'd out his Writs for this Parliament.

The Arch Bishop's Speech.

Parliament. Then he proceeded to shew That this honourable Kingdom of England, and the most abounding with Riches, had been long govern'd by Children, and the Counsels of young Persons, so that it was reduc'd to a State of Desolation highly to be lamented, had not the Goodness of Almighty God sent a knowing and discreet Man for the Government of the Nation, who by the Assistance of Heav'n would be rul'd and advis'd by the Sages and Ancients of his Kingdom, for the mutual Succour and Comfort of himself and his whole People. Adding further, That Men ought especially to consider how this honourable Kingdom could so long subsist under such miserable Waste and Destruction, which if it had been under good and regular Government, and wise and sufficient Counsel, it would have been the most considerable in the World for Riches and other Advantages. Then having declar'd how ready the present King Henry was to be advis'd by the wisest of the Nation, he again insisted upon the Excellencies of the English Empire, That no Kingdom in the World could support it self without the Assistance of others, so honourably, gloriously and compleatly as this: And then shew'd, That in the Government of every Kingdom three Things were especially required, Justice, Observation of Laws, and Liberty for all to live according to their Ranks and Degrees; and that it was the King's Will, by the Help of God, to make good these three Particulars. He further declar'd, That it was also his Majesty's special Will, That the Holy Church should enjoy all her Liberties and Franchises; that all the good Statutes enacted in the Time of his noble Progenitors should be firmly observ'd, and that all the Nobility, Commons, and all others, should enjoy all their Liberties and Franchises, according to the Grants made by his foresaid Progenitors. And that no Man ought to censure any Thing done this Parliament, for the King was resolv'd in his Faith and Conscience to do equal Justice to all Parties, according to the Will, Assistance and Grace of God afforded to him.

After this, and the Dispatch of some formal Matters, the Parliament by Consent was prorogu'd 'till the Day after the King's Coronation, which was appointed on the thirteenth of October, on the same Day Twelve-Month that he had been banish'd by King Richard. His Coronation was extraordinary solemn and magnificent, and he was anointed with a peculiar Oyl which a Religious Man had given to Henry the first Duke of Lancaster, with a certain Prophecy, That all Kings anointed with That should be Champions of the Church. This Oyl coming into the Hands of King Richard, as he was looking among his Jewels, then going into Ireland, he was desirous to be anointed with it, but the Arch-Bishop prevented him by assuring him, That it was not lawful to be anointed more than once. Upon his Return into Wales, the Arch-Bishop got it into his own Possession, and reserv'd it to the Coronation of King Henry, who was the first King of the Realm that was anointed with it. Immediately after his Coronation this wise Prince us'd all Precautions to establish and perpetuate his Power and Authority; and particularly provided for the Indemnities of all such as join'd with him before King Richard was depos'd, and caus'd all the Acts made by the Parliament of the 21st of the late Reign to be revok'd and annull'd for ever. By which his Uncle the Duke of Gloucester, the Earl of Arundel and several others were freed from the Infamy of that Corruption in Blood which follows executed Traitors. At the same Time the Statutes made in the eleventh Year of Richard the Second were reviv'd and confirm'd to be kept according to their full Intent and Purport, as being for the Good and common Profit of the Kingdom. And whereas the Articles of those Times exhibited against Treasonable Practices, usually extended so far as to give the Prince too unlimited a Power over his Peers and People, this King therefore reduc'd the Case of Treasons to a more certain Head, utterly abolishing all such Cases as were establish'd in the late Reign. The Substance of the Statute upon that Occasion is, 'Whereas in a Parliament helden by the late King Richard,

'divers Penalties of Treaſon were ordain'd in ſuch a Manner, that no Man 'could know how to behave himſelf, to act, or to ſpeak, for fear of ſuch Pe-'nalties; it is enacted by the King, Lords and Commons, That for the future 'no Treaſon ſhall be adjudg'd otherwiſe than it was ordain'd by the Statute in 'the Reign of his noble Grand-Father King Edward the Third of glorious 'Memory. By which the Net was broken, the perilous Eſtate of Subjects re-liev'd, the People gratify'd, and the King ſecur'd in their Affections. But for a farther Security, in this Parliament, after he had made the Earl of Northumberland Conſtable of England, the Earl of Weſtmorland Lord Marſhal, Sir John Serle Chancellor, John Newbury Treaſurer, and Sir Richard Clifford Lord Privy-Seal, he created his eldeſt Son Henry, then about thirteen Years of Age, Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall and Earl of Cheſter, and ſhortly after Duke of Gaſcony; and the Crown by Parliament was entail'd upon him and the Heirs of his Body, to the Excluſion of all others that could claim any Right of Soveraignty in the Nation.

The Crown entail'd upon Henry's Heirs.

Rot. Parl. &c. After ſome exemplary Puniſhments of ſome of the late King's evil Counſellors, in the latter End of this Parliament, the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury charg'd all preſent, upon their Allegiance, That what was then ſpoken or propounded ſhould be kept ſecret from all Mankind; and then it was demanded, for the Security of the King, and all the Eſtates of the Nation, what ſhould be done with the depoſed King Richard. To which Queſtion all the Lords Spiritual and Temporal unanimouſly anſwer'd to this Effect, That he ought to be put under ſafe and ſecure Guard, in a Place where there was no Concourſe of People, and be kept by ſure and ſufficient Perſons, after the moſt ſecret Manner, without any one who had been formerly Servant to him. Only Thomas Merks, Biſhop of Carliſle, a Perſon of great Learning and Spirit, diſſented from the common Opinion; and, according to Sir John Hayward, in a long and remarkable Speech bravely ſtood up for the Power and Authority of the Kings of England, and by ſeveral Arguments drawn from the Conſtitution of the Nation, from Hiſtory and Scripture, evinc'd That neither King Richard could be legally depos'd by his Subjects, nor the Duke of Lancaſter legally ſucceed him, tho' he had been depriv'd never ſo juſtly: And further diſplay'd the innumerable Miſchiefs that uſually attended and followed ſuch unjuſtifiable Proceedings. But his Arguments were then look'd upon as only the Opinion of a ſingle Man, and he was ſo far from being incourag'd, that he was order'd to be arreſted by the Marſhal, and committed to Priſon in the Abby of St. Albans; tho' afterwards without further Cenſure he was ſet at Liberty. During this Seſſion of Parliament, the Arch-Biſhop had convok'd a Synod in St. Paul's Church, to whom the King ſent the Earls of Northumberland and Weſtmorland, who declar'd to the Clergy, That they were not ſent to them to require any Mony from them, but to acquaint them with his Majeſty's Reſolution to confirm all their Privileges and Immunities, and to join with them, as they ſhould deſire him, in the Puniſhment of all Hereticks and Oppugners of the eſtabliſh'd Religion; for all which he only crav'd their Supplications to God for the Safety of him and his Poſterity, and the Proſperity of the Kingdom; which all there preſent ſolemnly and religiouſly promis'd.

Walſing. Pol. Virg. All theſe Proviſions King Henry made at home for his Honour and Security; and being ſenſible that his Actions might be ſeverely cenſur'd in Foreign Parts, he ſent wiſe Ambaſſadors to Rome, France, Spain and Germany, to give Reaſons for his extraordinary Proceedings. To Rome, he ſent the Biſhop of Hereford, Sir John Cheney, Knight, and John Cheney, Eſquire; to France, the Biſhop of Durham, the Lord Thomas Percy and William Heron; to Spain, the Biſhop of St. Aſaph and Sir William Par; and to Germany, the Biſhop of Bangor and others: All whom were arm'd with full Inſtructions for the Juſtification of their new advanc'd Soveraign. In France they found the greateſt Difficulty in giving Satisfaction, becauſe the French King's Daughter by this Revolution loſt the Benefit of her Marriage with King Richard; therefore this News was taken very heinouſly, and a War was immediately threaten'd, or at leaſt deſign'd, but King Charles relapſing into his old Diſeaſe of Frenzy, and King Richard dying not long after, all Thoughts of that kind expired. But the Inhabitants of Gaſcony were not ſo eaſily appeas'd, but ſtood vigorouſly for their Countryman King Richard; and thoſe of Bourdeaux openly declar'd That ſince the World began, there was never a more cruel, unreaſonable and impious Fact; that the good Prince was betray'd by faithleſs Men, and all Law violated. Yet ſtill the French were deceiv'd in their Hopes of converting theſe popular Heats to their Advantage; for partly by the Wiſdom of the chief Magiſtrates, and partly by the Peoples comparing the Severity of the French Government with the Lenity of the Engliſh, they were kept firm. Much Labour and many fair Promiſes were us'd by Lewis Duke of Bourbon to draw the Gaſcoignes to revolt; but his Deſigns were ſoon defeated by the Arrival of Thomas Piercy Earl of Worceſter with competent Numbers of Men, ſent thither to withſtand the French Practices, and reſtore the Peoples Affections.

The French are dissatisfy'd.

A. D. 1400. Reg. 1.

A great Conſpiracy againſt King Henry.

King Henry was ſcarce eſtabliſh'd in his new gain'd Soveraignty, before a private Body of Enemies were forming his Deſtruction under the very Protection of his own Wings. The depos'd Richard was ſtill alive, and tho' great Numbers in the Kingdom approv'd of his Downfall, yet many others did not; for ſome mov'd by Nearneſs of Blood and Friendſhip, ſome by Conſcience and Honour, others tranſported with Envy and Diſappointments, and not a few with the Remembrance of former Benefits, or the Hopes of future Advantages upon a Change, much deſir'd to ſet Richard upon the Engliſh Throne again. The Manner of this Conſpiracy is variouſly related by Authors; but it is commonly agreed that the chief Parties concern'd were ſuch as had their Lives ſpared in the laſt Parliament, but had been ſtripp'd of a conſiderable Part of their Honours; as John Holland Earl of Huntington, Thomas Holland Earl of Kent, and Edward Earl of Rutland; the two firſt Half-Brothers to King Richard, and the laſt his Coſin-German, all three in the late Reign having been Dukes, of Exeter, Surry and Albermarl. Beſides theſe were John Montague Earl of Salisbury, Thomas Lord Spencer, late Earl of Gloceſter, the Biſhop of Carliſle, Sir Bernard Brokas, Sir John Shelley, and John Magdalen, a Chaplain to King Richard, and much reſembling him in Perſon. But one of the principal Inſtigators in this Deſign was the Abbot of Weſtminſter, an entire Friend to King Richard, and one who had taken a particular Prejudice againſt King Henry, becauſe formerly when he was Earl of Darby he publickly deliver'd a dangerous Truth, That the King of England had too little, and the Clergy too much. The above-nam'd Perſons and ſome others being aſſembled in a Private and convenient Place, the Earl of Huntington in a Speech declar'd That King Henry by violently invading, and fraudulently mounting the Throne of his ſole Soveraign, was both a Tyrant and Uſurper, and ſuch a One as it was lawful for any Man, by any Means to deſtroy, without Reſpect to his good or evil Qualifications; ſince it was lawful for no Man under his Pretences to aſſume Soveraign Power. Therefore the Examples of the beſt Common-wealths did not only permit ſuch an Action, but alſo honour'd the Actors with Statues and Titles, and rewarded them with the Wealth and Riches of the ſuppreſſed Tyrant. And becauſe Policy was as neceſſary as Force, it was propos'd and approv'd that ſolemn Juſts and Tournaments ſhould be held at Oxford in Chriſtmaſs Holy-Days between the Earl of Huntington and twenty more on his Part, and the Earl of Salisbury and as many more on his, to which King Henry ſhould be invited; and when he was intent upon the Spectacle, he ſhould be ſuddenly ſurpriz'd by ſuch a Number as at that Time might be aſſembled without Suſpicion. Upon this they all took a ſolemn Oath of Secrecy; and an Indenture Sextipartite was likewiſe made between the Lords, wherein wherein they mutually bound themselves to each other, to do their utmost for the Ruin of the present, and the Delivery of the former King. They likewise concluded what Forces should be rais'd, where and by whom they should be order'd and plac'd, as likewise to whose Truft the Execution of this Exploit should be committed.

Walsing. Hall. &c. In Purſuance of this Deſign, the Earl of Huntington acquainted King Henry with the deſign'd Tournament between him and the Earl of Salisbury, and begg'd of him to honour them with his Preſence, and that he would be pleas'd to be their Judge in caſe any Difference ſhould ariſe; to which he graciouſly promis'd to conſent. In the mean Time every Conſpirator provided himſelf with what Number of Men he could procure, under the Pretence of Magnificency; and at the Time appointed enter'd the City of Oxford, where the King and Court was expected the next Day. The Earl of Rutland was only wanting, who having ſent his Men before, went to viſit his Father the old Duke of York, who liv'd in a Country Houſe upon that Road; where being at Dinner, the Duke accidentally eſpy'd a Label of the Indenture hanging out of his Son's Boſom; and juſtly ſuppoſing it ſomething extraordinary, he forc'd it from him. Viewing the Contents, the ſix Seals, and his Son's Name, he was ſo incens'd, that riſing immediately from the Table, he gave order for his Horſe to be made ready; reproaching his Son for that having been falſe to King Richard, and now prov'd a Traitor to King Henry; That he was very ſagacious in finding out Inventions to ruin his Father, who in the laſt Parliament had been bound with him Body for Body; therefore ſince he had ſo little Value for his Father's Head, he would have as little for his: Upon which he immediately took Horſe for Windſor. The Earl finding that his Father was not to be withdrawn from his Reſolution, that all was diſcover'd, and his Life in the greateſt Danger, with the utmoſt Expedition rod to Windſor another Way; and being arriv'd before his Father, upon Pretence of an extraordinary Accident, he procur'd the Caſtle Gates to be lock'd up. Then taking the Keyes with him, he threw himſelf at the King's Feet, and crav'd his Mercy. The King in a great Surprize demanded his Offence; which when he fully heard, he promis'd him his Pardon, provided his whole Relation prov'd exactly true. Shortly after the Duke of York being admitted into the Caſtle, without further Ceremony, put the Conſpirators Contract into the King's Hands; who finding by that all Rutland's Account to be true, deferr'd his Journey to Oxford, reſolving at Windſor to expect the Conſpirators new Reſolutions. He alſo ſent expreſs Meſſengers to the Lord High-Conſtable the Earl of Northumberland, and to the Lord Marſhal the Earl of Weſtmorland, and likewiſe to all his other Friends, that they might all haſten to the Court, with what Forces they could immediately raiſe.

The Diſcovery of it.

Ibid. In the mean Time the Conſpirators, being got to Oxford, ſoon concluded from the Abſence of the Earl of Rutland, and the Non-appearance of the King, that all their Plot was diſcover'd. They had now no Hopes of Mercy, as having been formerly condemn'd and pardon'd, therefore in this deſperate Juncture they endeavour'd to effect that by open Force which they could not do by Treachery; and for their own Safeties they cloath'd Magdalen with Royal Robes, who much reſembling King Richard, eaſily deceiv'd the Multitude. To render the Thing plauſible, they reported, that being aſſiſted by his Keepers, he had eſcap'd out of Priſon; by which means they ſoon gather'd together forty thouſand Men, the leaſt Part of whom came out of good Will, the moſt inconſiderable out of Hopes, and moſt unuſeful out of Fear; conſequently all of them variable and unconſtant. However they reſolv'd to ſeize upon the King at Windſor; but he hearing of their coming, had with ſome few Horſe withdrawn himſelf to London, to which City they intended to purſue him, and take him unprovided, which probably was their beſt Courſe; but Fear put a Period to their Deſign, when Wiſdom was more dangerous than raſh Attempts.

The Conſpirators raiſe an Army.

The King prepares against them.

The King upon his Arrival at London fortify'd himself, the City furnish'd him with Soldiers, and he provided himself a sufficient Guard; and hearing of the others Coming, he march'd out to meet them with twenty thousand Men, the diffident of his own small Number, nor terrify'd with his Enemies Multitudes. They, on the other side, apprehending the King's Valour and their Men's Instability, shunn'd the Encounter, and retir'd towards Reading, where King Richard's Queen lay, causing her to believe that her Husband was at Pomfret with a hundred thousand fighting Men, and that Henry Duke of Lancaster, with his Children and Friends, had shut himself up in the Tower, not daring to come out; and the better to colour this Report, they threw down King Henry's Arms, and took his Badges from such of the Queen's Servants as wore them, as if Richard had been still in his Throne. They made no further use of Magdalen's Pageant, but chang'd their Reports of Richard's Deliverance and Power as often as they chang'd their Stations; as it is usual for such as are just sinking, to lay hold of any false Rumour.

The Conspirators leaving Reading, march'd towards Cicester; where the Earls of Kent and Salisbury took up their Lodgings in a small Village, and the Earls of Huntington and Gloucester theirs in another, leaving their Army in the Field. The Townsmen thereabouts, being inform'd that Affairs were quite otherwise than they had reported them, about Midnight surrounded the House where the two former were lodg'd, who withstood their Fury for many Hours. Huntington, who was advis'd of this Misfortune, could not possibly succour them, for all his Men out of a sudden Fear had fled; for a certain Priest, to divert the Assault, had set Fire to some Houses in the Village, which occasion'd these Men to fly, as fearing that King Henry was come in Person, and had fir'd the Village. The Townsmen on the contrary, being by this doubly inrag'd, resolv'd to extinguish the Flames with nothing but the Blood of their Opposers, and fought with greater Fury than ever. So that unfortunate Kent and Salisbury, abandon'd by their Friends, and taken by their Enemies, after many desperate Wounds, had their Heads strucken off, and sent to London: Twenty nine of their Company, Barons as well as Gentlemen, were taken Prisoners, and sent to Oxford, where King Henry resided, and there had publick Justice pass'd upon them. The Earl of Gloucester thinking to escape, was taken Prisoner in Wales, and beheaded at Bristol; and Magdalen, flying into Scotland, was taken and sent to London, where he dy'd the Death of a common Traytor. The Earl of Huntington often endeavour'd to get into France, but was always driven back by contrary Winds; and wandering unknown, he was taken by chance, and brought to the late Duke of Gloucester's House, where his Head was strucken off; the Divine Vengeance meeting him in the Territories of a Person of whose former Murder he had been too much guilty. The Abbot of Westminster, now finding the miserable Effects of his Counsel, fled from his Monastery; but being seiz'd by an Apoplexy, escap'd common Execution: The like happen'd to the Bishop of Carlisle, who suddenly dy'd of a violent Feaver; tho' some say he was first condemn'd, and had his Punishment generously remitted by the King. Infinite was the Number of others that dy'd; the High-Ways were fill'd with the Heads and Quarters of miserable Wretches; among whom many Innocent Persons suffer'd, who under Pretence of Rebellion, or out of former Resentments, were put to Death. Insomuch that King Henry, tho' of a moderate and generous Disposition, was look'd upon in this Matter as too mercileſs and revengeful; for so much Blood, both of the Nobility and others, at one Time, and for one Offence, was never shed in any preceding Reign since the Conquest. And it is further observable, that the principal of those who now so dishonourably lost their own Lives, were nearly concern'd in that of the Duke of Gloucester's.

They are defeated.

The chief of them punish'd.

The unfortunate King Richard was still a Stranger to all these Transactions, and was reserv'd for the last Scene of this dismal Tragedy. His approaching Death had had now all the Appearances of Neceſſity, for which Reaſon he was remov'd from the Tower of London to a Caſtle in Kent, and from thence to Pontfract in Yorkſhire, that the Cauſe of his Death might be unknown. That his Death was unnatural and unjuſt, is more than probable; but the Manner of it is very uncertain, and differently related. Some write that when he underſtood the Defeats and Deaths of his chief Friends, he became ſo diſconſolate, that he pin'd away and ſtarv'd himſelf; others, that for fifteen Days he was kept from Suſtenance, and with the Addition of Cold ſtarv'd to Death; and others ſay he had Feaſts ſet before him, but deny'd to touch any Thing, as if deſign'd to imitate the Fable of Tantalus, and aggravate his Torments. The Account that Hollinſhed gives from a Writer, who ſeems to have had great Knowledge of King Richard's Actions, appears more probable, tho' it is too uncertain to be abſolutely rely'd on. He relates that ſome uneaſie Words falling from King Henry, gave a Hint to one Sir Pierce Exton, to undertake the Death of King Richard; who with eight other Aſſaſſinates haſten'd to Pontfract, as if he fear'd to be depriv'd of the Honour of the Action. Upon his Arrival, the Preface to the intended Cruelty was the Omiſſion of the Ceremony of Taſting that was uſually paid Richard at his Table; who upon demanding the Reaſon, was anſwer'd, That Sir Pierce Exton had brought ſuch Orders from King Henry: At which Richard was ſo tranſported, as to ſtrike the Taſter, and to curſe the King by the Name of Harry of Lancaſter. Immediately after, Sir Pierce with his bloody Followers enter'd, and ſhut cloſe the Door; which being perceiv'd by the unfortunate King, he gueſs'd at their fatal Intentions, and with a Reſolution becoming his Heroick Father, ſnatch'd a Halbert from the foremoſt, and bravely ſlew four of the Aſſailants; And with no leſs Courage fought with the reſt, 'till Exton got upon a Chair behind him, and with a Pole-Axe ſtruck him down; where the poor miſerable King ended all his Calamities, upon the fourteenth Day of February, near five Months after he had loſt his Crown. This was the fatal End of King Richard II. which afterwards open'd a larger Fountain of Blood than ever was known in the Nation. His Body was embalm'd and cover'd with Lead all but the Face, and brought to St. Paul's Church, where out of Policy it was for three Days expos'd to publick View, and then obſcurely interr'd at Langley in Hertfordſhire, tho' afterwards it had a more publick Funeral in Weſtminſter Abby. It is obſervable that in the three greateſt Exigencies of this Prince's Life, he appear'd above himſelf; the firſt in the Rebellion of Wat Tyler, the ſecond in the Reſignation of his Crown, and the laſt in the Loſs of his Life: The firſt he perform'd with a skilful Ardour beyond his Age, the ſecond with a ſteady Calmneſs above the ordinary Temper of Man, and the laſt with an Heroick Courage equal to the Braveſt.

Walſing. Boſtius, &c.

II. King Henry, tho' now more ſafe in his Throne than before, thought it convenient to divert the Eyes and Humours of the People from the Remembrance of the late Tragedy; and this he did by an Expedition into Scotland, occaſion'd by the unreaſonable Demands of the King of that Country, who would have no Peace, unleſs King Henry deliver'd up the Lord Dunbar Earl of Marche, contrary to his Royal Promiſe and Protection. The valiant Henry, chuſing rather to make Scotland the Seat of the War, than to expect King Robert's Arrival in England, march'd with a well order'd Army into the Bowels of the Country, where he burnt Towns, Villages and Caſtles, ſparing nothing but Religious Houſes and Churches. Then advancing to the City of Edinburgh, he burnt a great Part of that and the Town of Leith, and beſieg'd the ſtrong Caſtle of Edinburgh, which was defended by Prince David the Governor, with the Earl of Douglaſs, and many other brave Men. During the Siege, the Duke of Albany, Governor of the Realm, ſent a Herald to King Henry, aſſuring him upon his Honour, That if he would tarry his Coming, within within six Days he would give him Battel, and raise the Siege, or else would leave the Place. The King of England was so pleas'd with the Message, that he generously rewarded the Herald with a Chain of Gold and other Gifts, promising him upon the Word of a King, Not to depart thence during the appointed Time of the Governor. But since many six Days, without any Appearance of the Governor, upon the Account of Colds and Rains, as well as Scarcity and Want of Provision, King Henry broke up the Siege, and left Scotland without any Battel or Skirmish offer'd. During his Stay in Scotland, he shewed before their ordinary Respect to the Religious Houses, and treated the Governors of such Places with great Courtesie and Humility, being gratefully mindful of the obliging and generous Entertainment the Duke of Lancaster his Brother had found among the Monasteries, when he fled into Scotland for Refuge, in the Time of the Rebellion in England.

His Kindness to Ecclesiasticks.

While the Affairs of England seem'd in a calm and peaceable Condition, Providence thrust a Thorn in King Henry's Side at a Time and Place he little expected, for the Welsh, who had paid Obedience to so many Kings of England, contrary to all Mens Expectations, broke out into open Acts of Hostility, under the Conduct of a certain Gentleman of that Nation nam'd Owen Glendour, Lord of Glendour in Merionethshire. This Man was descended from the youngest Son of Baron Bromfield, and his Inclinations were not common; while he was young he repair'd to London, with Intention to study the Law; but soon weary of that, he betook himself to the Service of King Richard, and was one of his Houshold Servants. Being as soon tir'd with that sort of Life as the former, he retir'd to some Possessions of his own in Wales; which bordering upon the Lands of Reynald Grey Lord Ruthin, after a violent Dispute, Burning of Villages and Houses, and Killing of Servants, he met with that Lord, and in a Fight took him Prisoner. Glendour daily encreasing in Power, the Welsh, who were displeas'd at King Richard's Deprivation, were inrag'd at his Death, soon took up Arms, and chose him for their Commander, who immediately committed Devastations in several Parts. Upon Intelligence of this, King Henry march'd with an Army into Wales, wasting, destroying, and taking such Revenge as Time and Opportunity would permit. In the mean Time Glendour, whom Pride and Indiscretion had saved for the further Ruin of his Country, retir'd into the unaccessable Fastnesses of Snowdon, where for this Campaign he secur'd himself from the Storm, and shortly after the King return'd with such Spoils as the Country afforded. The last Action of this Year was peaceable and pompous; for Manuel Emperor of Constantinople came in Person into England to beg Assistance against the growing Power of the Turks; and upon St. Thomas's Day he was met at Black-Heath by King Henry, magnificently feasted at London, richly presented, and treated according to the height of his Quality.

In a Parliament held the next Year, by reason of the increasing Numbers of those called Lolards, the Punishment enacted for them was Burning. And in the same Year, the Articles of Peace being first agreed between the two Nations the English and French, notwithstanding the latter deny'd a Match with the young Prince of Wales, the Lady Isabel who had been crown'd Queen of England, as Spouse of the late King, was now sent back into France after a royal and solemn manner; but being now but twelve Years of Age, and the Marriage not consummated, no Dowry was allow'd her in England. When she was restor'd to her Friends, the Lord Henry Piercy, before the Ambassadors of both Nations, who met between Calais and Boulogn, openly declar'd, That the King of England his Master had sent her to be deliver'd to her Father, free from all Bonds of Marriage, or other Obligations; and that he would take it upon his Soul that she was sound and untouch'd, as she was when deliver'd to King Richard, and if any said to the contrary, he was ready to prove it by single Combat. But the Earl of St. Paul declaring, That he believ'd liev'd it to be true, the Lord Piercy took her by the Hand, and deliver'd her to the Earl; and then the Commiſſioners of France gave certain Letters of Releaſe and Acquittance. She was afterwards marry'd to Charles Duke of Orleans. In the mean Time King Henry was much in Danger of his Life, even in his Bed-Chamber; for a deſperate Engine was diſcover'd in his Bed, with three long and ſharp Iron Pikes, all with their Points upwards; but the King very happily perceiv'd it before he laid himſelf down, and ſo eſcap'd the Miſchief and Danger, tho' he could never diſcover the Actor.

Walſing. Pomel. &c.

All this Time Owen Glendour, ſwell'd with his Succeſs againſt the Lord Ruthen, became more and more inſolent, and after ſome Time enter'd with his Forces into Herefordſhire. In this County Edmund Mortimer Earl of Marche liv'd in a private Condition; ſo that by keeping at Diſtance from the Court, without Splendor, he might avoid thoſe Dangers which in the preſent Conjuncture threaten'd him, as next lawful Heir to King Richard. Glendour practiſing his accuſtom'd Cruelties, awaken'd the County, which under the Conduct of the Earl of Marche endeavour'd to bridle his Inſults. So that in a ſhort Time a ſharp Battel was fought; in which Glendour had two Advantages, the Number of his Men, and his own Conduct; by which means he became Victor, Obedience and good Order having won him the Laurel. On the other Side the Herefordſhire Men, fewer in Number, led on by Neceſſity, diſtracted and uncertain, kept the Field 'till Night, rather by an obſtinate Reſolution than any Reaſon or Order. At length they yielded, but fled not, there being none to purſue them; for Glendour ſatisfy'd with the Advantage, finding himſelf in an Enemy's Country, the Night dark, and many of his Men ſlain, forbore all Purſuit of his Foes. Two thouſand Herefordſhire Men were left dead in the Field, and the Earl himſelf was taken Priſoner, and without Reſpect to his Perſon, kept in the Bottom of a Tower; nor did King Henry, tho' much importun'd, endeavour for his Liberty, for he concluded his Impriſonment to be one of the moſt fortunate Events that could happen to him.

But ſtill King Henry could enjoy no true Peace nor Satisfaction, for about this Time ſeveral Conſpiracies were diſcover'd in Embrio, all which were ſupported by Calumnies and Forgery; for by the firſt Henry's Actions were traduc'd in Libels, and by the ſecond Richard was reported to be ſtill alive, to raiſe a new Head of Separation. Henry, thus wounded in his Honour, and endanger'd in his Perſon, reſolv'd to ſpare none upon whom the Crime or Concealment was found. The firſt that felt the Hand of his Juſtice was a Prieſt of Ware, with whom was found a Liſt of Names which he collected, ſuppoſing them ſuch as out of Gratitude and Conſcience would hazard all for King Richard; which Vanity of his created great Trouble to many, 'till it appear'd that he wrong'd them, and that they were Perſons utterly ignorant of the Man or the Matter; upon which he was drawn and hang'd. Walter Baldock Prior of Laund met with the like Fate, who confeſs'd he had conceal'd the Treaſon of others, tho' he had not acted himſelf. A Friar Minor alſo being taken, with ſome others of his Order, was ask'd What he would do if King Richard was alive and preſent; he confidently reply'd, He would fight for him to the laſt Minute of his Life againſt all Oppoſers; for which he was drawn and hang'd in his Friar's Weeds. Nor did this hard Fortune fall only upon the Clergy, for Sir Roger Clarendon, natural Son to the famous Black Prince, together with an Eſquire and Servant of his, finiſh'd their Affections to King Richard by ſuffering a ſhameful Death. Not long after eight Friar Minorites were taken, convicted, hang'd and beheaded for the ſame Cauſe; and this occaſion'd the King to be a ſevere Maſter towards their whole Order. It was vulgarly reported, that a little before this Diſcovery, the Devil appear'd in the Habit of a Minorite at Danbury Church, to the incredible Aſtoniſhment of the Pariſhioners; all which was ſucceeded by a prodigious Tempeſt of Thunder and Lightning, which had wonderful Effects upon the Fabrick of the Church.

Several Conſpiracies againſt King Henry.

Many ſuffer.

But

But however the Branches were lopp'd off, the Roots of all theſe Practices lay deeper and out of Sight; for the Piercys, the Earls of Northumberland and Worceſter, and Henry Hotſpur, becauſe they thought perhaps that they had done unjuſtly in ſetting up King Henry, began now to form thoſe bloody Deſigns, which were afterwards proſecuted. But King Henry not yet knowing their Intentions, in September led an Army into Wales, to take Revenge upon his rebellious Subjects, where he was in danger of periſhing by the ſudden Storms and Rains, which were more terrible than ever had been remember'd; ſo that after he made ſome Devaſtations in the Country, he return'd. The common Fame was that Glendour by his infernal Arts had rais'd theſe hideous Tempeſts; which Opinion added no ſmall Strength to the Welſh Faction.

The King unſucceſsful againſt Wales.

The King's Fortune was much happier in the North, where his Lieutenant had two noted Victories againſt the Scots, the one at Nisbet, and the other at Halidown-Hill, near a Village call'd Woller: And tho' the firſt was but ſmall, yet the other deſerves the Name of a compleat Victory. The Scots marching with ten thouſand Men under the Conduct of the brave Earl of Douglaſs, had made great Ravages as far as Newcaſtle, but in their Return were couragiouſly encounter'd by the Earl of Northumberland and his valiant Son Hotſpur with the Earl of Dunbar, and entirely defeated. This Victory is in a great Meaſure attributed to the Gallantry and Valour of Hotſpur's ſtrong Archers; againſt whoſe piercing Arrows neither the Scottiſh Shields, nor their beſt Armour could protect them. Earl Douglaſs the General, after much Bravery, and ſealing his Valour with five Wounds and the Loſs of an Eye, was taken Priſoner, with Murdack Stuart Earl of Fife, George Earl of Angus, the Earls of Murrey and Orkney, the Lords Montgomery, Erskin and Grahme, and about fourſcore Knights, beſides Eſquires and Gentlemen. The Lords Gourdon and Swynton, with ſeveral other Men of Honour and Note fell upon the Place; and above five hundred in their Flight were drown'd in the River Tweed. This Victory was obtain'd upon Holy-Rood Day in the Time of Harveſt. In the ſame Year Edmund of Langley, Duke of York, and fifth Son of King Edward III. departed this Life, and was bury'd at Langley with his Brothers; leaving an untainted Honour, and unblemiſh'd Reputation behind him. Not long after, in the following Year, King Henry marry'd a Second Wife, Jane of Navarre, Widow of John de Mountfort Duke of Bretaign, by whom ſhe had both Sons and Daughters, but not any by the King. He met, and marry'd her at Winchester, and then crown'd her Queen at Weſtminſter; but he was not truſted with the Cuſtody of any of her three Sons, John, Richard and Arthur, who remain'd in France.

III. King Henry now daily increas'd in Power and Grandeur; yet in a ſhort Time, he and the Nation were involv'd in greater Troubles and Calamities than had been felt before. For the great Earl of Northumberland, with his uneaſie Brother the Earl of Worceſter, and his gallant Son Hotſpur, who had been formerly great Friends and Aſſiſtants to King Henry, now began to envy his Wealth and Felicity; but were particularly diſpleas'd at the King's demanding of them ſuch Scotch Priſoners as had been taken at Nesbit and Halydown: For of all the Priſoners taken at thoſe Places, only the Earl of Fife had been delivered to the King, tho' he had ſeveral Times with Threatnings requir'd the Remainder. The Piercys, accounting them as their own proper Priſoners, were highly offended, and by the Advice of the Earl of Worceſter, whoſe Deſign was to imbroil the publick Affairs, they repair'd to the King at Windſor, purpoſely to found him. Here they boldly requir'd of him, That either by Ranſom or other Means he would ſet at Liberty their Couſin Edmund Mortimer Earl of Marche, whom Owen Glendour had kept in a loathſom Priſon, only becauſe he had been true and faithful to him. The King, after Conſideration, made Anſwer, That the Earl of Marche was not made Priſo- ner for his Cauſe or Service, but willingly ſuffer'd himſelf to be taken, becauſe he would not oppoſe the Attempts of Glendour and his Accomplices, therefore he would neither ranſom nor relieve him. This Anſwer ſo kindled the fiery Spirit of Hotſpur, that he cry'd out The Heir of the Realm was robb'd of his Right, and the Robber would not allow him part of his own for his Redemption; and in a Fury the Piercys departed the King's Preſence, reſolving to ſet up the Earl of Marche, whoſe Deliverance they not only procur'd, but alſo enter'd into a Confederacy with Owen Glendour. Here ſome Writers have made a ſtrange Obſervation upon the Earl of Marche, that on the Night he was born, all the Horſes in his Father's Stable were found up to the Belly in Blood: A dreadful Prodigy, which afterwards ſeem'd verify'd by more dreadful Events, when upon the Conteſt of Mortimer's Title, by which the Houſe of York claim'd the Crown, the War-Horſes might be ſaid rather to ſwim than to ſtand in Blood. Here alſo Walſingham tells us of ſtrange Apparitions that were ſeen this Year between Bedford and Biggleſwade, where ſeveral Monſters of divers Colours in the Shapes of armed Men were often ſeen to iſſue out of the Woods, and to encounter each other after a terrible and unheard of Manner.

They confederate with Glendour againſt the King.

Ibid. The firſt who appear'd in Arms was the valiant Hotſpur, who under Pretence of the Scotch War, made head about Cheſter and the Marches of Wales. To him repair'd the Earl of Worceſter, leaving the young Prince of Wales, and that Prince's Houſhold, over both which the King had plac'd him. And now the Torch of War was lighted up, and began to blaze; for tho' the chief Mover the Earl of Northumberland had not join'd them, as he deſign'd, yet their Numbers increas'd exceedingly, with which they propos'd to enter Shrewsbury, and to make that Place the Seat of the War. Here they iſſu'd out Letters and Manifeſto's declaring their Reaſons for thus appearing in the Field, as Firſt, 'That the publick Mony had not been employ'd in the real Defence of the Na-'tion, but unduly waſted. Secondly, That by Reaſon of malicious Informati-'ons to the King, they could not with Safety approach him, to declare their 'Innocence, unleſs the Prelates and Peers of the Realm firſt interceded for 'em. 'Thirdly, They took up Arms only to ſecure their own Perſons, and ſee the 'Kingdom better govern'd. Theſe were their outward Pretenſions, but their real Deſigns and Reſolutions were not only to depoſe King Henry, and advance the Title of the Earl of Marche, but likewiſe to ſhare the whole Kingdom between three Perſons, the Earl of Marche, the Earl of Northumberland, and Owen Glendour. Concerning which Partition an Indenture Tripartite was ſign'd and ſeal'd by them, by vertue of which all South-England was to remain to Mortimer, North-England beyond Trent to Piercy, and Wales beyond Severne to Glendour. Beſides this, the Earl of Douglaſs their Priſoner, as a Perſon highly ſerviceable, by common Conſent for his Share was allow'd to be free from Ranſom, and to have the Town of Berwick aſſign'd him. Some Writers tell us that this was done out of a fooliſh Credulity given to a vain Prophecy of Merlin's, by which many thought That King Henry was the Mouldwarp curs'd by God's own Mouth, and that Mortimer, Piercy and Glendour, were the Dragon, the Lion and the Wolf, that ſhould divide the Realm between them. Then to ſtrengthen their Power, it was again reported, That King Richard was alive, and in the Caſtle of Cheſter.

Their Reaſons alledg'd.

Their Deſigns.

Walſing. Hall. Pol. Virg. &c. On the other Side King Henry, attack'd with ſuch unexpected Dangers, defended his Cauſe by Letters, and threw all the Guilt upon his Accuſers, declaring That he was extreamly ſurpriz'd, ſince the Earl of Northumberland and his Son had the greateſt Part of the publick Mony deliver'd to them, for the Defence of the Borders againſt Scotland, why they ſhould make that the Ground of their pretended Grievances. And to remove all Pretence of Fear from the Conſpirators, he ſent to the three Piercys a ſafe Conduct under his Royal Seal, by which they might come and return without Moleſtation; but, as our

The King's Vindication.

Author words it, unbridled Raſhneſs deſpiſing the Royal Clemency, puſh'd them on to the Height of Rebellion. In the mean Time the King arm'd with the utmoſt Expedition againſt his Enemies, and being attended by the Earl of Dunbar and the young Prince of Wales, advanc'd with a conſiderable Force within Sight of Shrewsbury, when the furious Hotſpur ſtood ready to attack the Town; who no ſooner diſcover'd the Royal Standard, but he abandon'd that Enterprize to draw up his Army in Battalia, which conſiſted of fourteen thouſand ſtrong and hardy Men, eager to try their Fortunes againſt a well-temper'd and experienc'd Adverſary. Peace had notwithſtanding enſu'd, by the exceeding Tenderneſs of the King; but the malignant Earl of Worceſter, by miſrepreſenting and falſifying the King's Proffers, did precipitate his Nephew into a ſudden Engagement.

He prepares againſt them.

He fights them near Shrewſbury.

Never was Battel fought on both Sides with more martial Rage and Bravery; in which the two mighty Champions, Hotſpur and Douglaſs, inſtead of ſpending their Strength upon the Multitude, reſolv'd to encounter the King in Perſon, as in whoſe Death they knew ten thouſand would fall. Accordingly they ruſh'd forwards with a Fury ſcarce to be equal'd; but the prudent Earl of Dunbar diſcovering their Deſign, drew the King from the Ground he had choſen, and probably ſav'd his Life; for the Royal Standard was overthrown, the Earl of Stafford, Sir Walter Blount, and ten new Knights were deſtroy'd by the Force of theſe ſudden Thunder-bolts. Douglaſs kill'd three ſeveral Perſons in the King's Coat-Armour; ſo that many of his Soldiers believing they had loſt their General, quitted the Field. But the King, whoſe Valour was equal to his Danger, by his undaunted Courage reſtor'd the Battel, and with his devouring Sword perform'd Wonders, killing no leſs than ſix and thirty with his own Hand. The noble Prince of Wales, then but fifteen Years of Age, and firſt enter'd into the School of War, now gave ſignal Inſtances of his preſent Courage, and no leſs happy Omens of his future Glory; and being ſo wounded in the Face that ſeveral Noblemen offer'd to carry him out of the Battel and Danger, he diſdain'd to retire, and fought bravely to the laſt. After three Hours dreadful Conflict, the Fall of the great Hotſpur put an End to this Tragick Scene, who riding in Defiance of Death and all Difficulties, was ſlain by an unknown Hand, drawing a Ruin after him ſuitable to his Spirit and Bravery: For there fell with him moſt of the Eſquires and Gentlemen of Cheſhire, in Number two Hundred, and above five thouſand common Soldiers. The reſt fled; but the King generouſly declining to make further Execution of his miſguided Subjects, ſuffer'd them to ſhift for themſelves without Purſuit. This Victory was gain'd with the Loſs of ſixteen hundred Men upon the twenty firſt Day of July, in Memory of which the King founded a College on the Place, and call'd it Battelfield. The valiant Douglaſs, together with the Earl of Worceſter, the Baron of Kinderton, and Sir Richard Vernon were taken Priſoners; the firſt, who once unhors'd the King, and no Subject to him, was for his Courage ſet at Liberty without Ranſom; but the other three were all beheaded two Days after the Battel. The Body of Hotſpur, tho' once permitted to be bury'd, was afterwards quarter'd, and ſent to ſeveral Parts of the Kingdom; and this was the Fate of one of the braveſt Warriors of the Age, who 'till this Time had ever been fortunate, victorious and triumphant.

The King prevails.

Shortly after, the Earl of Northumberland, pretending to come with Forces to the King's Aſſiſtance, was diverted by the Earl of Weſtmorland, and Sir Robert Waterton, who had rais'd a conſiderable Power. Northumberland judging neither of them his Friends, ſuddenly turn'd about to his Caſtle of Warkworth; ſince nothing could ſecure him from the victorious Army of a martial King. Of this he was ſenſible, manifeſtly feeling the irrecoverable Maims of his Houſe in the Loſs of his Brother and beloved Son, and therefore form'd his Methods accordingly. The King therefore, as prudent as fortunate, having ſetled Affairs in the Marches about Shrewsbury, advanc'd to the City of York, there to provide againſt future Exigencies. Here he commanded the Earl of Northumberland berland to repair thither in Perſon, which he accordingly obey'd on the Eleventh of Auguſt, arriving with a ſmall Train in the Nature of a humble Petitioner. He could not in Reaſon hope for the uſual familiar Favour of the King, nor did he obtain it, for it was judg'd ſufficient to have his Life pardon'd, tho' his Eſtate and Liberty was abridg'd, the King only allowing him neceſſary Maintenance. Having ſetled the Northern Counties, the King reſolv'd to return towards North Wales, to chaſtiſe the Preſumptions of ſome of the Inhabitants; but wanting Mony at preſent, the Arch-Biſhop and Clergy afterwards conſented to ſupply him with a Tenth. Towards the Relief of theſe his Neceſſities, the valiant Exploits of William de Wilford an Eſquire, who was then cruſing upon the narrow Seas, brought ſome Aſſiſtance; for he took forty lawful Prizes, loaden with Iron, Oil, Soap and Rochelle Wines, to the Quantity of a thouſand Tun, upon the Coaſts of Bretaign, and in his Return ſet forty Sail on Fire. And to make the Bretaigns know that he was not only formidable at Sea, he landed at Penarch, burnt Towns and Houſes for ſeveral Miles into the Country; and afterwards did the ſame to the Town of St. Matthew's, which he laid in Aſhes, and waſted all the neighbouring Country. The French not to ſeem ſlow in the like Ravages, landed at the Iſle of Wight, but were compell'd with Loſs to retire to their Ships, with far leſs Succeſs than the Bretaigns under the Command of the Lord of Caſtell had not long before, who landing at Plimouth, took and burnt that Place.

Walſing. &c. The King having humbled the great Earl of Northumberland, now thought it Policy to take him into Favour, and reſtore him to his Eſtate, but not without ſecret Reſpect to his own Security. This Reſtitution was made to the Earl in a Parliament held at London about the middle of January, where the King obtain'd an unuſual Tax or Subſidy, of which no Record or Writing was ſuffer'd to remain, that it might not be drawn into Precedent. The King had ſoon Occaſion to beſtow ſome of this Mony; for a Troop of plain Weſt-Country Men preſented themſelves to him, with three French Lords, and twenty Knights of Note, whom they had taken Priſoners at Dartmouth, for which they receiv'd a munificent Reward. By theſe the King underſtood, That the Lord of Caſtell of Bretaign, who had formerly burnt Plimouth, expecting to do the like at Dartmouth, landed with his Forces, where theſe and the like People fiercely ingag'd him; and the Women, like Amazons, by hurling of Stones, and the like Artillery, did much facilitate their Husbands and Relations Victory. The Lord of Caſtell himſelf, and many others were ſlain; and more might have been ſav'd, but the Ignorance of Language equally confounded the Cries of Indignation and Pity. The French alſo made a Deſcent upon the Iſle of Wight, and the Duke of Orleans ſent a particular Challenge to King Henry; but neither of them to any great Effect. All this Summer Owen Glendour, and the Welſh burnt and ravag'd the Marches, kill'd and took many Priſoners; and partly by Force and partly by Fraud, gain'd ſeveral Caſtles, demoliſhing ſome, and fortifying others. To add to theſe Troubles, the Flemmings and Bretaigns took certain Engliſh Merchant Ships, and either ſlew or hung up the Sailors.

Several ſmall Actions with the French.

In this Year dy'd the famous William of Wickham Biſhop of Wincheſter, who left behind him many noble Monuments of his Zeal to Religion, and Love to the Church; particularly he founded New-College in Oxford, and another at Wincheſter. We are told by Truſſell that this Prelate was intruſted with a ſtrange and important Secret in relation to John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaſter, Father to this King Henry; particularly that his Mother Philippa ſhould in Confeſſion upon her Death-Bed acknowledge to him, That John was a ſuppoſititious Child, and that he ought to uſe all Methods to prevent him or his Progeny from aſcending the Throne of England: And that upon the Biſhop's diſcovering this Secret to him, he ever after bore him a Mortal Hatred. This is a Matter of Fact of no great Authority, the Truth of which would be worth a Hiſtorian's Knowledge.

William of Wickham's Death.

IV. King Henry's Reign was all this Time like a craggy Mountain, from which there is no Deſcent but by a thouſand crooked Ways, full of rocky Stones and jetting Cliffs. The firſt Difficulties eſcap'd, others are met with of more Danger and Anxiety; in ſuch Paths he walk'd all the Time of his Reign, one Danger was a Step to another, and the Event always doubtful; for his Subjects former Deſire being almoſt extinguiſh'd, his Friends failing, and his Enemies encreaſing, he had no other Support in ſo painful a Deſcent but his own Vigilance and Conduct; Helps, which tho' they might cauſe him to keep on his Way, yet they were not ſufficient to preſerve him from great Wearineſs. King Richard had been ſeveral Times ſaid to be alive after his Death; more particularly this Year, by means of the Letters of Serlo, who had been one of the Gentlemen of his Chamber. This Man, after his Maſter's Fall, withdrew himſelf into France, where being aſſur'd that Richard was ſtill alive in Scotland, he went into that Country to know the Truth. After he had ſpoken with the Impoſtor, whom he knew to be ſuch, he however embrac'd the Occaſion, and out of Hatred to King Henry, the caus'd a Seal to be made like that of King Richard's, and wrote ſeveral Letters to his Friends in England, ſign'd with the ſame; inſomuch that he diſtracted the Minds of many, who really concluded Richard to be ſtill alive. The old Counteſs of Oxford, Mother to the Duke of Ireland, did not only publiſh the Certainty of it, but likewiſe caus'd many Stags made of Gold and Silver, the former Badges of Richard, to be given to her Dependants, that they might wear them on their Cloaths, as ſoon as Richard enter'd England. But her indiſcreet Management in this Affair, and her open ſending her Secretary to the Inhabitants of Eſſex, was the Cauſe of the Diſcovery; for which ſhe ended her Days in a cloſe Priſon, with the Confiſcation of her Goods, and the Secretary ſuffer'd upon a Gallows. Serlo finding his Plots abortive, and being unable to return to France for want of Mony, came to Barwick, hoping that Sir William Clifford, a Friend of King Richard's, would have furniſh'd him. But Sir William having incurr'd the King's higheſt Diſpleaſure, by detaining Barwick againſt his Will, found means to purchaſe his Pardon by delivering up Serlo to the King at Pontfract. Shortly after Serlo was executed at London, who likewiſe confeſs'd, that he was one of the Perſons that murder'd the Duke of Gloceſter at Calais; and tho' he dy'd very penitent, yet he dy'd unpity'd by all who eſteem'd the Memory of that popular Duke. Into this Smoak did all this Deſign vaniſh; as likewiſe did another not long after, which was promoted in a Parliament held at Coventry, call'd the Lack-Learning Parliament, either from the Ignorance of the Members, or their Hatred to Learned Men: In which, to ſupply the King's Wants, a Bill was exhibited againſt the Temporalties of the Clergy; but by the Courage of the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, who declar'd, That it was the inriching of themſelves, not of the King, that they reſpected in their ſacrilegious Attempts, and by the particular Care of the King, who vow'd To leave the Church in no worſe State than he found it, the Motion ended in nothing but the infamous Memory of the Projectors.

A. D. 1405. Reg. 6/7. The Coals of the former Northern Rebellion were not ſo fully extinguiſh'd, but by removing the Aſhes that cover'd them, new Sparks began to appear; for Envy and ſome Accidents had ſo infected the Eyes of ſome of the Nobility, that they could not bear the Sight of King Henry's Grandeur. Among whom Thomas Mowbray, Earl-Marſhal was principal, who drew Richard Scrope Arch-Biſhop of York into a Conſpiracy, as likewiſe the old Earl of Northumberland, the Lord Bardolf, the Citizens of York, with great Numbers of common People to aſſiſt in their Cauſe, which was gloſs'd with the ſpecious Pretence of redreſſing publick Abuſes, ariſing from the King's Miſmanagement. The Earl of Weſtmorland hearing of this Attempt, in which the Earl-Marſhal and the Arch-Biſhop were Leaders of a numerous Multitude, gather'd a conſiderable derable Force to encounter them; but perceiving himſelf too feeble, he betook himſelf to Fraud and Stratagem, and by pretending to approve of their Quarrel, found means to get them both into his Poſſeſſion, and made a very acceptable Preſent of them to the King at York; where both the Arch-Biſhop and Earl-Marſhal were publickly beheaded, notwithſtanding the Earl of Weſtmorland had before promis'd them their Lives. The Pope afterwards excommunicated all ſuch as were concern'd in the Arch-Biſhop's Death. Theſe were dangerous Times for the King, who not ſatisfy'd with the Blood of theſe two great Men, vigorouſly purſu'd the Earl of Northumberland and the Lord Bardolf with an invincible Army of thirty ſeven thouſand Men; but they unable to reſiſt ſo mighty a Power, took Barwick for their Refuge. The King with his uſual Expedition march'd to that Place, but before his Arrival, they in great Fear fled into Scotland, where they were entertain'd by the Lord Flemming. The Town of Barwick, in hopes of Succours from Scotland, ſtood out; upon which the King planted a Battering Piece againſt a Tower in the Wall, which as it ſoon threw down the Tower, ſo it deſtroy'd all the Defendants Courages, who immediately yielded upon hard and deſperate Terms; for they were partly hang'd, and partly impriſon'd. Barwick being thus recover'd, the King took Alnwick, and all other Caſtles belonging to the Earl; and expecting the like good Fortune in Wales, he croſs'd over thither, where it prov'd otherwiſe, not by the Manhood of the Welſh, but by the ſudden Floods of Waters, which deſtroy'd his Carriages, and above fifty Wains loaden with Treaſure: Therefore he return'd to Worceſter. Owen Glendour, the chief of the Welſh, fearing a Revenge for former Actions, had before confederated with the French, who in a hundred and forty Ships arriv'd at Milford Haven to his Aſſiſtance, but with the Loſs of moſt of their Horſes in the Paſſage, for want of Water. The Lord Barkley, and Henry de Par burnt fifteen of their Ships in the Harbour, and ſoon after they laid Siege to the Town of Carmarthen, which, upon Permiſſion of marching out with Bag and Baggage, was ſurrender'd.

The King raiſes a great Army.

His Actions

Walſing. &c. The King being again in Want of Mony, after much Reluctancy and Delay, the Parliament furniſh'd him, overcome more with Wearineſs and Importunity, than any good Inclination. Some of this Mony was employ'd in ſecret Practices with the Scots, that the Earl of Northumberland and the Lord Bardolf might be delivered into his Hands, in Exchange for ſome Priſoners of that Nation. Upon notice of which, they two fled into Wales; and the Scots miſſing their Purpoſe, ſlew the Lord Flemming for diſcovering their Intentions to their diſtreſſed Gueſts, as by the Laws of Honour and Hoſpitality he was oblig'd; which fill'd Scotland with new Civil Diſcords. To avoid the Dangers of which, and for the Improvement of his Education, Robert King of Scotland ſent his Son and Heir by Sea into France, who being at Sea, with the Biſhop of Orkney, ſome Mariners of Norfolk ſurpriz'd him, and preſented him to King Henry, who detain'd him Priſoner in the Tower of London. But afterwards he gave him ſuch a noble Education, as to all Princely Qualifications, that the Scots and the young Prince had reaſon to conclude, that King Henry's Care turn'd all to the Advantage of them and their King. In the mean Time the French proſecuting their Affairs in Wales, ſent thither thirty eight Ships full of Soldiers, of which Number the Engliſh took eight, and not long after fifteen Sail loaden with Wax and Wine. This Fortune, tho' good, was far inferior to the great Service which Henry Pay, with certain Ships of the Cinque-Ports, and about fifteen others, perform'd againſt a numerous Fleet of a hundred and twenty Sail, loaden with Iron, Salt, Oil, and Rochelle Wines. About the ſame Time a Felon was executed for ſetting up Bills in ſeveral Parts of London, containing News of King Richard's being ſtill alive. In the ſame Year a dreadful Peſtilence deſtroy'd Multitudes of People throughout the Kingdom, eſpecially in London, where within a ſhort Space there dy'd no leſs than thirty thouſand. But the moſt memorable Death was that of the old renowned Captain Sir Robert Knolls;

Knolles; a Man born of mean Parents, but by his Valour and Abilities rais'd to the Height of Glory under King Edward III. after which he became highly celebrated for many Works of Charity and Magnificence; among which the famous Stone Bridge at Rocheſter in Kent was one.

A. D. 1408. Reg. 9/10. In the mean Space, the Wars of Wales were manag'd by young Prince Henry, who took the Caſtle of Aberiſtwith; but Owen Glendour ſhortly after retook it by Policy, and put into it a Garriſon of his own. Thus Glendour proſper'd for a ſhort Time; but the unfortunate Earl of Northumberland and the Lord Bardolf, leaving Wales, and raiſing new Forces in the North to aſſert their Rights, were encounter'd by the Sheriff of Yorkſhire, who after a ſharp Conflict ſlew the Earl in the Field, and ſo wounded the Lord Bardolf that he dy'd ſhortly after. This Succeſs did not hinder the King from purſuing his Journey that Way; but arriving at York, he there fined many, and put others to Death, anſwerable to the Nature of their Crimes. The Biſhop of Bangor and Abbot of Ailes, who were taken Priſoners, met with different Fates according to the Diverſity of their Habits; the Abbot being taken in Armour was hang'd, the Biſhop being taken in his own Cloathes was pardon'd. The Heads of the two Peers were cut off, fix'd upon Spears, and erected on London Bridge: And this was the miſerable End of Father, Son and Brother, and almoſt the Period of one of the moſt valiant and illuſtrious Families in the Kingdom; all which was owing to a meer Caprice of Honour, which engaged 'em in a Quarrel with a mighty Monarch, from whom they thought their extraordinary Merit ought to have met with no Repulſe: A Preſumption that has and will deceive many. For Princes will not acknowledge their Being from another, nor that their Subjects are their Benefactors; the very Thought of which is not eaſily pardon'd. Here all King Henry's adverſe Fortune had a Period; and in this Calm he likewiſe quieted all Domeſtick Suſpicions and Jealouſies, having in the reſt of his ſhort Reign only ſome ſmall foreign Armies, not ſo much to weary him, as to keep him in Breath and Exerciſe.

A. D. 1409. Reg. 10/11. V. The Peace of Chriſtendom having been long violently diſturb'd by a famous Schiſm, rais'd by the Ambition of two oppoſite Popes, of whom one was choſen at Rome, the other at Avignon, by contrary Factions of the Cardinals; a general Council was ſummon'd to be held at Piſa in Italy, to which Place King Henry ſent his Ambaſſadors, and the Clergy elected Robert Alun Chancellor of Oxford and Biſhop of Salisbury, to ſignifie, That unleſs both Popes would decline the Pontificate, neither of them for the future ſhould be acknowledg'd as Pope. The King in his Letter to Pope Gregory charg'd him with Perjury, and That this Papal Emulation had been the Cauſe of the Deaths of more than two hundred and thirty Thouſand Chriſtians ſlain in Wars. There aſſembled a great Number of Cardinals, Arch-Biſhops, Biſhops and other mitred Prelates, who elected a new Pope, Alexander V. a Man train'd up in Oxford, where he took his Degree in Theology; rejecting the other two, who had long and violently contended for the Place. In the mean Time, Owen Glendour, after infinite Miſchiefs committed, ended his miſerable Life, in the tenth Year of this Reign; who being abandon'd, and driven to all Extremities, finiſh'd his Days with Hunger and Famine; at whoſe Exit all the Welſh Broils were at an End. After this King Henry call'd a Parliament to find out Means for more Mony, to the Charge and Management of which he ordain'd Sir Henry Scrope, creating him Lord Treaſurer, and Thomas Beaufort the King's Half-Brother Lord Chancellor. In this Parliament was reviv'd the former Sacrilegious Attempt of alienating the Temporals of the Clergy, in which it was alledg'd, That what the Biſhops, Abbots, Priors, &c. had ſpent leudly and waſtefully, would be ſufficient to maintain a hundred and fifty Earls, fifteen hundred Knights, ſix thouſand two hundred Eſquires, and a hundred Hoſpitals tals more than were already founded. But the King upon mature Conſideration, deteſting their diſtemper'd Zeal, deny'd their Petitions, and in Perſon commanded them, upon Pain of his Indignation, not to preſume to concern themſelves with Affairs of that Nature. In this Year, the Duke of Burgundy's uncommon Proviſions he had made to reduce the Town of Calais to the French Dominions, and ſtor'd up at St. Omers, were conſum'd to Aſhes by a caſual Fire, which gave great Eaſe to the Caliſians.

Enguer. &c. About theſe Times the great and dangerous Factions between the Dukes of Burgundy and Orleans in France broke out; and the Cauſe was for a Murder committed upon Lewis, Brother to the French King, and Father to the Duke of Orleans, as he came late from the Queen's Lodgings, who was then in Child-Bed. The Duke of Burgundy juſtify'd the Fact, alledging that Lewis had us'd means with the Pope to depoſe the preſent King, upon Pretence that he was as unfit to govern as the laſt King Childerick, againſt whom Pope Zachary had pronounc'd Sentence. This prepar'd the Way for that terrible Scourge with which Heav'n thought fit to chaſtiſe the Pride and Sins of the Kingdom of France. Each Party endeavour'd to ſtrengthen themſelves by Foreign as well as Domeſtick Friends: The Duke of Burgundy had the King and Dauphine on his Side; and the other had the Kings of Navarre and Arragon, the Dukes of Berry and Bretaign, with many of the chief Nobility. The Duke of Burgundy, who with the King and Government kept in Paris, fearing the Power of his Adverſaries, offer'd to the King of England a Daughter of France in Marriage with his Son, and many Advantages, if he would join in the Defence of the King, and ſend over competent Forces. To which King Henry is ſaid to have anſwer'd, Our Advice is, that you ſhould by no Means hazard a Battel with one who ſeems to proſecute a juſt Revenge for the Death of his Father; but by all reaſonable Means endeavour to aſſwage the Fury of the exaſperated young Man. If that be unſucceſsful, ſtand upon your Guard, and retire to the beſt Place of Safety, with ſuch Forces as may beſt ſerve for your Defence. After all this Precaution, if he will not be appeas'd, you may ingage him with the ſafer Conſcience, and in ſuch a Caſe, we will not fail to aſſiſt you, according to your Requeſt. For the preſent he ſent over the Earls of Arundel and Kyme, and many Men at Arms, with a numerous Body of Engliſh Archers, who arriv'd ſafe at Paris, where they every Way anſwer'd the ancient Glory of their Nation.

'That the King of England ſhould aſſiſt the ſaid Lords againſt the Duke of 'Burgundy, for the Murder committed upon the late Duke of Orleans. Se- 'condly, That he ſhould give this Aſſiſtance, 'till all the Loſſes were repair'd, 'which they and their Friends had ſuſtain'd upon this Occaſion. Thirdly, 'That he ſhould help to ſettle the Quiet of the Realm, &c. Theſe Offers being balanc'd with the Articles upon which the Duke of Burgundy had obtain'd Succours, outweigh'd them ſo far, that about the Middle of Auguſt, before all thoſe that had been ſent with the Earl of Arundel to the contrary Part were return'd into England, Forces were order'd for the Duke of Orleans, to the Wonder of all Men, who underſtood not the Secret; ſo that Thomas Duke of Clarence, Edward Duke of York, the Earl of Dorſet, with many other great Men, and a competent Army, were ſent over to aſſiſt the Duke of Orleans, while the Earl of Angoleſme continu'd a Hoſtage in England for the Payment of a hundred ninety thouſand Crowns, and Performance of Articles. The Engliſh landed in Normandy; but whether the Confederates mov'd with the Dangers to which their Nation would be precipitated, or for ſome other Cauſes, the Duke of Orleans, contrary to Agreement, declin'd coming at the appointed Time and Place; which gave Occaſion to the Engliſh to burn, pillage and take much Riches in many Parts of the Country, to ſatisfie themſelves 'till the Duke of Orleans ſhould ſee them paid. Yet at length the Dukes of Clarence and Orleans came to a Treaty; after which the Engliſh march'd into Gaſcony to take up their Winter-Quarters, and the Duke of Orleans return'd into his own Country. During theſe Tranſactions, the Lord of Heyle Marſhal of France, with many other Lords, and an Army of eighty Thouſand Men, laid Siege to a certain ſtrong Place in Gaſcony; which the valiant Sir John Blount, with three hundred Men, not only defended, but alſo drove the Enemy from the Siege, took twelve of the chief Men Priſoners, and a hundred and twenty other Gentlemen.

The King joins with him.

But to no great Effect.

King Henry liv'd not to ſee the Courſe and Fortune of theſe Wars; but began now to turn his Thoughts to Matters of a contrary Nature: For having reduc'd his Kingdom to a calm Condition, and having no more Occaſion to be bloody or deteſted, his Actions were grown to that Degree of Temperance, as there remain'd nothing more to be deſir'd in him. Juſtice was adminiſter'd without Diſtinction, he ſhew'd himſelf affable, liberal and pious, ſo that his Subjects now as much lov'd him as they formerly fear'd him; and having ſet his Thoughts chiefly upon God, he reſolv'd to ſpend the Remainder of his Life wholly in his Service. His greateſt ſecular Concern was that for his eldeſt Son Henry, now about twenty Four Years of Age, whoſe Behaviour and Carriage had rais'd both the Hopes and Fears of the whole Kingdom. This wondrous Prince had formerly been a Student in Queen's College in Oxford, under the Tuition of his Uncle Henry Beaufort, Chancellor of that Univerſity; from whence he was remov'd to Court, and committed to the Government of the Earl of Worceſter. But coming afterwards to his own Diſpoſal, whether being by Nature couragious, and yet not well temper'd by Time and Experience; or whether incited by dangerous Companions, or embolden'd by his own Greatneſs, he ran into many Courſes unworthy of a Prince, ſo that it was much doubted how he would prove when he came to the Throne. It is reported that he lay in wait for the Receivers of his Father's Revenues, and in the Perſon of a Robber ſet upon them and rifled them. Afterwards, when one of his Aſſociates was arraign'd for Felony before the Lord Chief Juſtice, he went boldly to the King's Bench Bar and offer'd to free the Priſoner by Force; but being withſtood by the Judge, he ſtepp'd up to him, and ſtruck him over the Face. At which the Judge without Heſitation told him, That this Affront was not to himſelf, but to the King his Father, in whoſe Place he ſat; wherefore to make him ſenſible of his Crime, he immediately commanded him to Priſon. It was ſurprizing to ſee how calm the Prince was in his own Cauſe, who had been ſo violent for his Companion; for he quietly obey'd the Judge's Sentence, and ſuffer'd himſelf to be led to Priſon. This Paſſage was not a little pleaſing to the King, to find he had a Judge of ſuch Courage, and a Son of ſuch Submiſſion; but yet for theſe and other ſuch Actions he remov'd him from being Preſident of the Council, and plac'd in his Room his ſecond Brother Thomas Duke of Clarence. This made the Prince ſo ſenſible of his Father's Diſpleaſure, that he us'd all Means to recover his Opinion, and by Ways as ſtrange as thoſe by which he loſt it: For attiring himſelf in a Habit peculiar and uncommon to the higheſt Degree, he came to the Court at Weſtminſter; where the King in the Preſence of three or four Privy-Counſellors demanded of him the Cauſe of his ſtrange Dreſs and Appearance. He anſwer'd, That being not only his Subject, but his Son, and a Son ſo tenderly lov'd by him, he deſerv'd a thouſand Deaths, if he ſhould act, or but imagine the leaſt Offence againſt his Sacred Majeſty; and therefore he had prepar'd himſelf to be made a Sacrifice: And therewithal reaching his Dagger to his Father, he added, That I deſire to live no longer than I may be thought to be what I am, and ever ſhall be, your faithful and obedient Vaſſal. With this and the like Anſwer the King was ſo mov'd, that he fell upon his Son's Neck, and imbracing him with a Flood of Tears confeſs'd That his Ears had been too open to receive Reports of him, and ſolemnly promis'd, That nothing for the future ſhould cauſe any Diſaffection towards him.

He is reconcil'd to his Father.

Walſing. Hak. &c. The King liv'd not long to enjoy the happy Fruits of this Reconciliation; for in Chriſtmaſs he began to feel his laſt Sickneſs at Eltham; but recovering a little, he repair'd to London about Candlemaſs, there to hold a Parliament, the End of which he never ſaw. Here he took upon him the Cruſado, and began to make Proviſion for his Journey to Jeruſalem; but being at his Prayers before St. Edward's Shrine, he was ſuddenly taken with an Apoplexy, and thereupon remov'd to the Abbot of Weſtminſter's Houſe; where recovering his Senſes, and finding himſelf in a ſtrange Place, he demanded where he was? Being told that he was in the Abbot's Houſe, in a Chamber call'd Jeruſalem, he cry'd out, Lord have Mercy upon me, for this is the Jeruſalem where a Soothſayer told me I muſt die. Here the vulgar Chronicles tell us a very peculiar Story; That the King, while he lay dangerouſly ſick, order'd his Crown to be ſet on a Pillow at his Bed's Head; and when ſuddenly his Pains ſeiz'd him ſo vehemently that all concluded him dead, the Prince coming in, took away the Crown. The Father unexpectedly reviving ſoon miſs'd his Crown; and calling for his Son, demanded What he meant to deprive him of that, to which he had yet no Right? The Prince boldly reply'd, Since I and all others believ'd you to be dead, I took it as my own Right, but now return it with Joy. To which the King with a deep Sigh made Anſwer, What Right I had to it God only knows. Be it as it will, reply'd the Prince, you gain'd it by the Sword, and by the Sword I will maintain it. The King hearing his Reſolution, enter'd into Diſcourſe concerning ſome Diſcord he fear'd might ariſe between him and his Brother the Duke of Clarence: To which the Prince thus declar'd, If my Brothers will be true Subjects, I will honour them as Brothers; but if otherwiſe, I will do Juſtice upon them as ſoon as the Meaneſt in my Kingdom. The King rejoycing at this unexpected Anſwer, both prudently and piouſly charg'd him before God To adminiſter the Law indifferently, to eaſe the Oppreſſed, to beware of Flatterers, not to defer Juſtice, nor yet to be ſparing of Mercy; to puniſh the Oppreſſors of the People, by which he ſhould obtain the Favour of God, and Love of his Subjects, who while they had Wealth would continue obedient, but if made Poor by Oppreſſions, would become rebellious. With theſe and the like Admonitions he expired upon the Twentieth Day of March, in the Forty Seventh Year of his Age, after an active, politick and victorious Reign of thirteen Years, five Months, and twenty one Days. all funeral Pomp was convey'd to Canterbury, and there ſolemnly interr'd, in the Preſence of his Son, and many of the Nobility.

This was the End of Henry the Fourth, who had all the Qualifications of a great and mighty Prince, and one who by his Vigour and Management ſurmounted infinite Difficulties; all ariſing from the Want of a juſt Title to the Crown, which drove him to wade through Seas of Blood, and to bring vaſt Miſchiefs upon the Engliſh Subjects. As to his Perſon, he was of a moderate Stature, well proportion'd and compacted, of a great Strength and Agility of Body, skilful in Arms, and of a quick Diſpatch; equally ſhewing himſelf both earneſt and adviſ'd in all his Actions. He was very ready in Imagination, forwards in Attempt, couragious in Execution, and generally fortunate in the Event. There was no great Place of Imployment or Charge which he would rather affect for Glory, than refuſe for Peril or Pains; and in Service he uſually prov'd himſelf not only a skilful Commander by giving Directions, but alſo an admirable Soldier in uſing his Weapon, ſometimes venturing his Perſon further than Policy would allow. His Expences were liberal and honourable, yet not exceeding the Meaſure of his Receipts; he was very courteous and familiar towards all Men, by which he procur'd more Love among the Meaner than the Greater. In all the Changes of his State, he was almoſt one and the ſame Man; in Adverſity never dejected, in Proſperity never ſecure; ſtill retaining his Majeſty in one, and his Mildneſs in the other: Nor did the Continuance of his Reign bring him to any proud Behaviour; but in his latter Years he appear'd ſo mild and gentle, that it almoſt wore out all Hatred born him for the Death of King Richard. He would not eaſily be drawn into any Cauſe, but was firm and conſtant in a good one; yet was more eaſie to be either corrupted or abus'd by flattering Speeches, than terrify'd by any Threats. His great Error was his mighty Thirſt after human Glory, which made him too little examine the juſt and religious Means of attaining it; for which the Vengeance of Heav'n ſeems to have met his Poſterity in the third Generation.

His Character.

There were ſeveral Acts of Piety and Charity done in this Reign, beſides thoſe by the famous William of Wickam before-mention'd; in naming of which, we ought not to paſs by the excellent Sir Richard Whittington Mayor of London, who erected a College in that City, with Lodgings and weekly Allowances for divers poor People. He erected that Gate of London call'd Newgate, which before was a loathſom Priſon; and built more than half of St. Bartholomew's Hoſpital in Smithfield, and the beautiful Library in the Gray-Friars now call'd Chriſt's Hoſpital. He alſo built a great Part of the Eaſt End of Guild-Hall, and a Chappel adjoining to it, with a Library of Stone, for the Cuſtody of the Records of the City; and in his laſt Will he ſhew'd the higheſt Marks of Compaſſion and Chriſtianity. Among the noted Men in this Reign, we muſt not forget the two famous Poets Geoffry Chaucer and John Gower, the two great Reformers of our Engliſh Tongue; of whom the firſt dy'd in the fourth of this Reign, and was bury'd in Weſtminſter Abby, and the other in the ninth, and was bury'd in St. Mary Overys in Southwark.

The Reign of King HENRY the Fifth.

Containing 9 Years, 4 Months, and 11 Days.

Walſing. Livius. Fabian. &c.

I. HENRY the Fourth, ſirnam'd Bullingbrook, was immediately ſucceeded by his eldeſt Son Henry of Monmouth, in the twenty ſixth Year of his Age, and Prime of his Youth. Tho' ſome of his former Actions had rais'd the Fears of many, yet now the high Eſteem which the Nation had of his Perſon, produc'd ſuch an intire Confidence in him, that both Lords and Commons upon the twenty fourth of March, offer'd to ſwear Allegiance to him before he was crown'd, or had taken the cuſtomary Oath to govern according to Law. He generouſly thank'd them for their good Affections, and exhorted them in their ſeveral Stations to uſe all their Power for the Good of the Publick; declaring, That he began his Reign with the Pardon of all that had offended him, and with ſuch a real Deſign of promoting his Peoples Happineſs, that he would be crown'd on no other Condition than to employ his Authority for that End; praying to God, That if he foreſaw he would not prove a juſt and good Governor, he would pleaſe to take him immediately out of the World, rather than ſeat him on the Throne for a publick Calamity to his Country. On the Ninth Day of April the Solemnities of his Coronation were perform'd by Thomas Arundel Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury; which proving a Day of extraordinary Storms, rais'd divers ſuperſtitious Obſervations. He nobly began his Reign with a Command of himſelf, and renounc'd with Diſdain the Companions of his former Riots, who had flatter'd themſelves with the Hopes of the higheſt Places of Honour and Preferment: He forbad them under ſevere Penalties to approach his Perſon, or within ten Miles of his Court; and all the Favour they receiv'd was only to be diſmiſs'd with ſome liberal Gifts from his Royal Bounty. He next proceeded to make an Alteration among the Judges, and other Officers of the Crown, removing thoſe who were known or ſuſpected to be guilty of corrupt Practices, and advancing others, whoſe Integrity and Abilities render'd them fit for the higheſt Imployments. And that the People might have free and impartial Juſtice, after the Example of his Father, it was his Cuſtom every Day, for an Hour or more after Dinner to lean on a Cuſhion and receive Petitions from his Subjects; where he patiently heard their Complaints, and redreſs'd them. He alſo by Proclamation endeavour'd to provide againſt Corruption of Manners, and Abuſes in Government; in which he commanded the Clergy to be faithful in their ſacred Charge, and by their Lives as well as Sermons to afford Leſſons of Piety to the People: And likewiſe he enjoin'd the Laity to ſerve God and obey their Soveraign, forbidding upon his higheſt Diſpleaſure all Acts of Adultery, wilful Perjuries, and prophane Swearing. And for a further Teſtimony of his generous and compaſſionate Diſpoſition, he remov'd the Body of King Richard, too meanly interr'd at Langley, in great State to Weſtminſter Abby, and there laid him enſhrin'd by Queen Anne his firſt Wife, as he himſelf had deſir'd and appointed, founding a weekly Memorial, and an annual Diſtribution of Mony to the Poor. And ſo nearly did his Death affect this innocent King, that he ſent to his Holineſs at Rome to be abſolv'd from the Guilt of his Father's Act; and willingly perform'd what Penance was enjoin'd him. After which, he in Perſon attended the Obſequies of his Father, which were celebrated with great Solemnity at the City of Canterbury.

Henry V. ſucceeds his Father.

He is crown'd King.

His noble Beginnings.

He removes King Richard's Body to Weſtminſter Abby.

After the Detection of a Conſpiracy made by one Whitlock and ſome others, a Parliament met in May, in which, the Commons petitioning the King for the redreſſing of Grievances, or for the Eſtabliſhment of good Orders, many wiſe Laws were enacted to make the Nation rich, flouriſhing and proſperous. And thus King Henry was eaſie and ſecure in the Beginning of his Reign, only two intervening Diſaſters diminiſh'd the publick Joy and Satisfaction; a great Plague which deſtroy'd Numbers of the People, and a violent Fire in Norwich, which laid in Aſhes moſt of that large City. Yet among the Calamities of theſe Times we might reckon the Sufferings of Sir John Oldcaſtle Lord Cobham, ſince it was a ſtrange Example of Injuſtice and Cruelty, that a Nobleman, endear'd to the King by his excellent Qualities, ſhould by the Hatred of the Clergy be implacably purſu'd to Ruin. This Knight, call'd Lord Cobham, was in a publick Synod accus'd by the Clergy of Hereſie, in maintaining ſeveral of Wickliff's Opinions, and propagating them in the Dioceſes of London, Rocheſter and Hereford; againſt whom alſo ſome ſelect Inquiſitors at Oxford preſented his Name, with a great Number of Concluſions, which they had collected as Heretical. The King incens'd by the Arch-Biſhop's Suggeſtions againſt the Reformers call'd Lollards, was further made to believe that they had ſet up Bills in divers Places, threatning, That a hundred thouſand Perſons were ready for Arms againſt all that oppos'd their Reformation, and among theſe the Lord Cobham his Knight was reputed the Chief. The King heard the Arch-Biſhop's Complaint, and being at Kennington, promis'd to confer with the Lord Cobham himſelf, which accordingly he did, urging him to ſubmit to the Cenſure of the Church, and be obedient to the Arch-Biſhop. But Cobham humbly told his Majeſty, That he ow'd his Subjection only to himſelf, whom God had plac'd as his ſole Vice-gerent to govern his People of England: But as to the Pope of Rome, he ow'd him no Service, nor would he pay him any; ſince he was convinc'd in his Conſcience, that he was the great Anti-Chriſt, the Son of Perdition, and the open Adverſary of God. This Anſwer receiv'd, was ſo deliver'd to the Arch-Biſhop, with Power to cite, examine and puniſh, as their own Canons in ſuch Caſes had decreed.

Walſing. Bale.

Proceedings againſt Sir John Oldcaſtle.

The Arch-Biſhop having ſo far obtain'd his Deſign, by the Advice of ſeveral iſſu'd out a Citation to him to appear at his Court at a certain Time, which was delivered to him by one John Butler, a Gentleman of the Privy Chamber, becauſe the Summoner durſt not do it himſelf; and the Arch-Biſhop, that nothing might be wanting, caus'd his Citation to be ſet upon the Gates of the Cathedral Church of Rocheſter, which were immediately pull'd down, as others again likewiſe, to the great Diſpleaſure of the Clergy, and the greater, becauſe the Actors could not be known. The Lord Cobham, knowing his Enemies Malice and his own Danger, refus'd to appear; whereupon he was excommunicated for Contumacy, and further Proceſſes were iſſu'd out againſt him. In the mean Time he wrote a Form of his Faith, and preſented it himſelf to the King, who being prepoſſeſs'd, refus'd to receive it, but ſuffer'd him to be cited even in his own Preſence; when Cobham for his Purgation offer'd a hundred Knights and Eſquires, which would not be accepted; after which, according to his Degree and Law of Arms, he requir'd a ſingle Combat with either Chriſtian or Pagan as to the Truth of his Faith, the King and Council only excepted. This likewiſe was not permitted, ſo that he was oblig'd to appear before the Arch-Biſhop and his Suffragans; where after divers Examinations, he anſwer'd with ſuch Vivacity of Spirit and Courage, that the whole Convocation was amaz'd, and at a loſs how to reply. Notwithſtanding which he was ſolemnly condemn'd for a Heretick, and committed to the Tower of London; and in the ſame Synod the Arch-Biſhop enacted that Heretical Decree, 'That the Holy Scriptures ſhould not be tranſlated into the Engliſh Tongue. And it is remarkable that not long after, the ſame Arch-Biſhop was ſeiz'd with a ſtrange Diſtemper in his Tongue, which ſo exceſſively ſwell'd it, that it quite depriv'd

depriv'd him of his Speech, and ſhortly after put an end to his Life. As to Cobham himſelf, he ſoon made an Eſcape from the Tower into Wales, which gave an Occaſion to his Enemies to raiſe new Jealouſies; and they confidently aſſur'd the King that he and his Adherents had a Deſign upon his Life, and that in St. Giles's Fields near Holbourn twenty thouſand were to meet in Order to deſtroy the Monaſteries of Weſtminſter, St. Albans, all the Religious Houſes of London, and the Cathedral of St. Paul's. The King therefore in Perſon, after Midnight enter'd theſe Fields with a great Army, where, as their Enemies relate, he apprehended eighty of that Faction, who declar'd They came to ſeek the Lord Cobham. But their Friends alledge, That in thoſe Days of Perſecution, ſuch Aſſemblies had been often made to hear the Goſpel preach'd to them, which otherwiſe they could not enjoy: So that in this Place, then overgrown with Buſhes, and unfit for Armies, thoſe few were aſſembled to hear John Beverly, a pious Divine, without any Thoughts of Treaſon, having for their Commanders no greater Men than Sir Roger Acton, Beverly, and Morly, a Knight, a Miniſter, and a Maltman. But we leave theſe Apologies to others; only the Lord Cobham could not be found, tho' the King had promis'd a thouſand Marks to any Man that ſhould take him, and alſo great Privileges to any Town or City in England where he was diſcover'd: By which it may be gueſs'd, ſays Walſingham, that near the whole Kingdom then embrac'd his Opinions; thirty ſeven of that Aſſembly were condemn'd, of whom ſeven were conſum'd with Fire; Acton, Beverly and Morly were likewiſe executed as Traitors.

He flies into Wales.

Walſing. Hall. Duch.

Upon Arch-Biſhop Arundel's Death, Henry Chicheley, a great Champion againſt the Lollards, was by the King's Conſent and the Monks of Canterbury elected their Arch-Biſhop, which the politick Elect neither accepted nor refus'd, but left it to the Will and Pleaſure of the Pope; who at firſt was diſpleas'd that they had proceeded ſo far without his Directions, yet was ſoon pacify'd by Chicheley's Submiſſion, and ſome particular Gratifications. This Man, tho 'not ſo conſpicuous for his Birth as Arundel, yet was as ſtrong for the Clergy, and more in favour with his King, as the Sequel prov'd. His firſt Eſſays of both were ſufficiently ſhown in a Parliament held at Leiceſter, where the former Deſign againſt the Church-Lands was reviv'd, and a Bill exhibited accordingly; in which it was demonſtrated, That the Temporalties upon which the Religious and other Spiritual Perſons liv'd ſo luxurioufly and waſtefully, amounted to three hundred and twenty two thouſand Marks yearly; and that beſides the ſaid Sum, divers Religious Houſes poſſeſs'd as many Temporalties as would maintain fifteen thouſand Prieſts and Clerks, allowing to each Man ſeven Marks a Year. This Bill, ſays Hall, caus'd the fat Abbots to ſweat, the proud Priors to frown, the poor Friars to curſe, the fooliſh Nuns to weep, and all her Merchants to fear that Babel would ſink: And here indeed the exceſſive Power began to diminiſh, when by the Authority of this Parliament, a hundred and ten Priories Alian were ſuppreſs'd, and all their Poſſeſſions given to the King and his Heirs for ever. Therefore to avert the impending Storm it was politickly concluded by Chicheley and others, That the moſt effectual Courſe was to find the young King ſome other Employment for the Vigour of his Courage, which might otherwiſe prove dangerous to them. Accordingly they judg'd it neceſſary to turn his Thoughts to War and Glory, and to ſolicit his Ambition, by reminding him of the Title he had to the Crown of France, deſcended to him by the mighty Edward the Third. Therefore in a formal premeditated Speech before the King in Parliament the politick Arch-Biſhop with all his Rhetorick ſet forth his Majeſty's unqueſtionable Title to the Realm of France from the moſt Illuſtrious of all his Predeceſſors Edward the Third, who bravely attempted to conquer by Arms, what he could not obtain by a juſt Treaty. That his Majeſty had the ſame Title to demand that Crown, and the ſame Reaſons to denounce War upon a Refuſal. He added, That as he was ſenſible that the French would oppoſe their imaginary Salick Law againſt that Claim, ſo he knew knew that they would contradict themſelves in aſſigning the Original of that Law; and if it were granted that ſuch a Law was in Being, yet France was not concern'd in it. For it was in vain for them to pretend that it was made by Pharamond the Founder of their Monarchy, when no mention was made of it 'till above four hundred Years after his Death: And this was when Charles the Great returning from the Conqueſt of Saxony, part of his Army paſs'd the Sala, and ſetled between that River and the Elle, and from the Name of the former were call'd Salick-Gauls: Which new Colony deteſting the vicious Manners of the German Women, by a Law prohibited that Sex from inheriting Lands in their ſmall Dominions. But what was this to the French Nation? How could they prove that by this Law their Crown could not deſcend to any Daughter of their Kings, unleſs they could prove their Country to be ſituated between thoſe two German Rivers. And if all were true which they report of their boaſted Law, how could they uſe it as an Argument againſt the Right of the Engliſh Kings, when they never made it any Bar in the Succeſſion of their own. For it manifeſtly appear'd, That the Title of the great Pepin, the Claim of Hugh Capet, the Poſſeſſion of Lewis the Saint, and of all the French Kings to that Day, were deriv'd from Female Heirs; ſo that the Name of the Salick-Law was but a ſhifting Illuſion to debar the Engliſh Kings from their Claim to the French Crown. But granting that ſuch a Law had always been obſerv'd, yet it was contrary to the Laws of God, and the Cuſtoms of all Nations; ſo that the French alone violated the Statutes of Heav'n, and ſlighted the Laws of Mankind, that they might devolve their Crown on whom they pleas'd. But if his Majeſty would extend his righteous Arms into the Bowels of France, no true Engliſhman but was ready to devote his Life and Fortune to the glorious Service of ſo great a King. And in full Perſuaſion of the Juſtice and Succeſs of the War, the Clergy, beſides their extraordinary Prayers to Heav'n, had given ſuch Sums of Mony to maintain it, as had never been granted to any of his Predeceſſors.

This Speech, which elevated the Thoughts of the whole Aſſembly, was ſtrenuouſly debated and examin'd by the Earl of Weſtmorland, Governor of the Marches of Scotland, and the Duke of Exeter Uncle to King Henry. The former thought it moſt ſafe, firſt to check the Scots, as the neareſt and moſt certain Enemies; but the latter judg'd it better Policy to begin with France, the Root and Support of the other, eſpecially ſince it was now diſtracted by the grand Factions of Burgundy and Orleans. The Arguments of the latter ſoon prevail'd with the King and his Brothers, who being young, and fir'd with the Proſpect of new Glories, became impatient to ſignalize their Courage againſt the old Enemies of their Country: And the ſame gallant Spirit being diffus'd through the Minds of the reſt of the Nobility, they all declar'd for a War againſt France; which being thus reſolv'd, the Parliament was prorogu'd to Weſtminſter. There the King's Generoſity was ſhown to Henry Piercy, Son to the famous and valiant Hotſpur, who was now reſtor'd to the Earldom of Northumberland, and to all the Lands and Dignities which his Grand-father and Father had forfeited to the Crown.

The King and Nobility join with the Motion.

An Embaſſie ſent to France.

The War againſt France being determin'd, an honourable Embaſſie was diſpatch'd to that Kingdom, which firſt demanded the Crown of France to be reſign'd to King Henry; but ſoon after deſcended only to require thoſe Provinces which his Predeceſſors had poſſeſs'd in that Kingdom, together with the French King's Daughter, the Princeſs Catharine, to be marry'd to King Henry, with a Portion of two Millions of Crowns, two of which were to equal an Engliſh Noble. Theſe Demands were thought too high and extravagant, and were rejected, and others offer'd by the French, but to no Effect. Whereupon a ſecond Embaſſie was ſent over in the Beginning of the following Year, which inſiſting upon the ſame Demands, was at laſt diſhonourably treated. Walſing. Harding. II. How dangerous it is for Princes to Jeſt upon each other ſoon appear'd in the great Preparations King Henry made to invade France; who finding that the French Court only amus'd him with little Artifices, vain Offers and Promiſes, reſolv'd to vindicate his Cauſe by an open War. He had then about eight hundred thouſand Crowns in his Treaſury: He furniſh'd out a ſtrong Fleet, and beſides his own Ships, he hir'd of the Holanders and Zealanders many Tranſport Veſſels. He rais'd Troops, provided Engines of Battery of vaſt Bulk and Force, and appointed the Rendezvous of his Fleet and Army to be at Southampton upon the twenty fourth Day of June following. The People chearfully contributed the neceſſary Aids of Men and Mony, and the Nobility according to Cuſtom brought their Proportion of Soldiers into the Field; and all Mens Mouths and Hearts were fill'd with the Diſcourſe of Conquering France. The French dreading theſe Preparations, ſolicited the Scots to make Inroads into England; but Sir Robert Umfrevil, a valiant Knight of the Garter, with only four hundred Men, ingag'd the Scots Army conſiſting of near two thouſand, and defeated them: Then with three hundred and ſixty Priſoners and great Spoil he return'd triumphantly to Rokesborough Caſtle, of which he was Governor. Urſins. Monſtrel. &c. The French King finding his Deſigns ineffectual, reſolv'd upon an Embaſſie into England to endeavour for an Accommodation. The chief of the Ambaſſadors was the Arch-Biſhop of Bourges, who with the reſt was ſolemnly introduc'd to King Henry at Wincheſter, who in great State was ſitting in his Chamber in Robes of Cloth of Gold, and negligently leaning on a Cuſhion. His three Brothers, the Dukes of Clarence, Bedford and Gloceſter, his Uncle the Duke of York, with many other Noblemen, ſtood on his right Hand; and ſeveral Biſhops on his Left. The Ambaſſadors paid their Reſpects to him on the Knee, and made an Offer of ſeveral Territories in France, together with the French King's Daughter the Princeſs Katharine, and a Dowry of eight hundred thouſand Crowns in Gold, if King Henry would immediately disband his Army, and conclude a Peace. Theſe Propoſals occaſion'd ſeveral Conferences, but the King and his Friends inſiſted upon higher Demands; which being refus'd, War was immediately denounc'd to proſecute the King's juſt Rights to the Crown of France. When the Ambaſſadors heard this, they forgot the Reſpect due to crown'd Heads, and in Contempt broke out into an indecent Laughter; and the Arch-Biſhop of Bourges with the higheſt Indignation told the King, That he was ſo far from having a Right to the Crown of France, that he had none to that of England, which belong'd to King Richard's Heirs. Therefore what could move him to ſhow that Contempt to the moſt Chriſtian King, the moſt noble, excellent and potent of all Monarchs? Could he imagine that he offer'd his beautiful Daughter, with ſo large a Part of his Dominions, out of Fear of his Arms? No, he condeſcended to theſe Terms out of his great Love to Peace, and Pity of the Calamities which the People of both Nations muſt ſuffer in a laſting War. After this they demanded a ſafe Conduct out of his Dominions, and that he would ſend his Anſwer by Writing under his Hand and Seal. The juſt and moderate King bore all this Storm of Words with great Temper; and tho' a provoking Indignity was offer'd him, he would not violate the Laws of Nations by injuring the Perſons of Ambaſſadors. He granted them all that they laſt demanded, and ſatisfy'd himſelf with letting them know That they might go when they pleas'd, and that he would ſoon follow them into France, not as into their Country, but his own rightful Inheritance, An Embaſſie from France. The Ambaſſadors reflect on King Henry. His Anſwer to them.

ritance, which he would recover by the Aſſiſtance of Heav'n, and the Power of his Sword.

King Henry having diſmiſs'd the French Ambaſſadors, proceeded in his Journey to Southampton, where he deſign'd to embark his Army; but before his Arrival, by the Advice of his Council, he caus'd Copies to be drawn of the Treaties which had been made between his Father Henry IV. and the Court of France, concerning the Reſtitution of Gaſcony to the Crown of England; which Treaties were now by the French openly violated and neglected. Theſe Copies being firſt ſeal'd by a publick Notary, were ſent to a General Council then ſitting at Conſtance, under the Emperor Sigiſmund and other Princes of Europe, that all Chriſtendom might know what Injury was done to him by the faithleſs Dealings of the French, and that contrary to his Inclinations he was conſtrain'd to take up Arms in Vindication of his juſt Rights. Being arriv'd at Southampton, he ſent Antelope his Purſivant at Arms with another Letter to the French King, written in Latin, with renew'd Proteſtations That it was not Avarice or Ambition that mov'd him to War, but a juſt Deſign to recover his Rights; therefore he once more requir'd him to reſtore thoſe Provinces which had been ſo often demanded by his Ambaſſadors. That it was only the Fear of God, and Love of Peace, that made him ſo moderate in his Demands; for which Reaſon he was now ready to relinquiſh fifty thouſand of the Crowns offer'd in Marriage with the Princeſs, if with her he would deliver up what his Predeceſſors had anciently poſſeſs'd in France. That his Deſire was to enjoy a peaceful Life with that excellent Princeſs, in whom he ſhould be happy, but he could not do any Thing to the Prejudice of his Rights and Honour. The French King in his Anſwer declar'd That the Demands of the King of England were unjuſt, and that it was ſtrangely prepoſterous for one to make Love to a Princeſs when cover'd with the Blood of her Father's Subjects. But ſince he was reſolv'd to be his Enemy, and in a Hoſtile Manner to enter his Dominions, he ſhould find him prepar'd to make ſuch Oppoſition as ſhould eaſily repel him.

The French King's Anſwer.

A great Conſpiracy againſt King Henry.

King Henry being ready to embark on the laſt Day of July, a Diſcovery was made of a dangerous Conſpiracy form'd againſt him in the Army, which might have put an inglorious End to all his Deſigns: For the French embracing this Opportunity of working upon the diſſatisfy'd Spirits of ſome of the Engliſh Nobility, manag'd a private Intrigue with Richard Earl of Cambridge Brother to the Duke of York, Henry Scroop Lord Treaſurer, and Sir Thomas Grey a Privy-Counſellor, animating them to conſpire againſt the Crown and Life of their Prince. To carry on which Deſign, a vaſt Sum, no leſs than a Million of Gold, was remitted to them; which made the French Ambaſſadors ſo confident, that when they return'd, they freely declar'd That the King of England would either alter his Purpoſe of invading France, or rather loſe his Life in the Conſpiracy. The Deſign of theſe Men was to raiſe an Army, and carrying Edmund Earl of Marche with them into Wales, to perſuade him to aſſume the Government, as true Heir to the Crown, in Defiance of Henry of Lancaſter as an Uſurper. Yet ſtill they were to make uſe of King Richard's Name, and Sir Thomas Grey was to procure One out of Scotland, who nearly reſembled him, in order to induce young Piercy to join them with a competent Force.

Livius. Walſing. Stow.

This grand Deſign being diſcover'd by the Conſpirators to the Earl of Marche, with the greateſt Threats and ſtricteſt Obligations, the Earl foreſeeing the diſmal Conſequences to the Nation, generouſly reveal'd it to the King himſelf, who was extreamly ſtartled at the Ingratitude of thoſe Men he had ſo ſignally favour'd. Having ſoon ſecur'd their Perſons, he in a publick Aſſembly of his Nobility and Officers, with the juſt Reſentments due from injur'd Majeſty, told them, That ſince they had conſpir'd to murder him, the Head and Father of the People, it was not to be doubted, but that they alſo had marked out all thoſe brave Men for Slaughter, to their Country's Ruin, and their own own perpetual Infamy: Therefore ſince they had been guilty of ſuch an execrable Crime, they ſhould without Mercy receive the juſt Demerits of their Villany. Whereupon the Criminals were led out to Execution, which was perform'd in the Sight of the whole Army. The Earl of Cambridge had wrot a ſubmiſſive and pathetical Letter to the King to obtain his Pardon, but could gain no greater Favour than to be beheaded with Sir Thomas Grey, while the Lord Scroop was put to the moſt infamous Puniſhment of Hanging, Drawing and Quartering. After the Execution the King again expreſs'd his Reſentments before his Nobility and Officers, and further declar'd, That if they would be faithful to him in this juſt War, he would not only be a Partner with them in all Hazards, but alſo foremoſt in the Danger. All were mov'd with his generous Declaration, and expreſs'd their Loyalty in joyful Acclamations and Vows for his Safety and Succeſs, proteſting, That while they were able to draw a Sword, they would defend him againſt the ſecret Plots, or open Force of his Enemies. The King rejoic'd to hear the Expreſſions of ſuch a general Affection, and hop'd that all Diſcontents were extinguiſh'd in the Blood of the executed Traitors: But as the Scenes of Futurity are beyond the Proſpect of all Human Wiſdom, he did not ſee that this Conſpiracy was but a Spark of that Flame which afterwards broke forth to conſume his Houſe and Family.

The Conſpirators all ſuffer.

Walſing. Harding. &c. The King being attended by his two Brothers the Dukes of Clarence and Gloceſter, his Uncles the Duke of York and Earl of Dorſet, with the Earls of Kent, Cornwall and Huntington, and a great Body of Nobility and Gentry, ſet Sail upon Wedneſday the ſeventh of Auguſt, with a Fleet of fifteen hundred Veſſels, and an Army conſiſting of ſix thouſand Men at Arms, and twenty four thouſand Archers, beſides Gunners, Engineers, Artificers and Pioneers. On the fifteenth of the ſame Month the King arriv'd at the Mouth of the River Seyne in France within three Miles of Harfleur, where he landed his Men; and falling devoutly upon his Knees, deſir'd God's Aſſiſtance to recover his Right, making Proclamation upon Pain of Death, that Churches ſhould be ſpar'd from all Violence, that Church-Men, Women and Children ſhould not be hurt, abus'd or injur'd. Then conferring the Honour of Knighthood upon many of his Followers, he aſſign'd his Standards to Men of greateſt Strength and Courage; which done he aſcended the Hill near adjoining, and from thence took a View of the Town of Harfleur, reſolving to make that the firſt Eſſay of his Fortunes in France. The Town being ſtrong and commodiouſly ſeated between two Hills, the King took Poſſeſſion of that next the Sea, at the Foot of which he caus'd a deep Ditch to be made, and fill'd it with Water; and raiſing the Rampier to a great Thickneſs, he erected many Sconces of Earth upon it like little Caſtles, ſet thick together, between which were narrow Spaces for the Soldiers to ſally out as Occaſion requir'd. The Intrenchment thus finiſh'd from the Rock to the Sea, and the Horſes, Ammunition and Proviſions all brought on Shore, the King with the greateſt Part of his Army march'd up the Hill; his Brother Clarence was ſent with ſome Regiments to lodge upon the other Hill, which by reaſon of the Nature of the Ground and Way prov'd to be a nine Miles March. This being gain'd, the King commanded his Ships to caſt Anchor as near the Town as with Safety they could, by which the Place became beſieg'd both by Sea and Land; then he mounted his Artillery, began his Mines, brought his Works cloſe to the Ditch, prepar'd Faſcines to fill it, and ſoon won the Lower Town.

Ibid. Within the Town Monſieur Gracourt was Governor, who accompany'd with ſome Noblemen, and a hundred Knights and Eſquires, and a conſiderable Force, ſally'd out of the Caſtle upon that Quarter where the Earls of Huntington and Cornwall lay, by whom, with Loſs on either Side, they were repuls'd, the Gates fir'd, ſome Breaches made, and Fire-Works ſhot into the Streets, to the great Annoyance of the Beſieged. But nothing diſcourag'd them more than the Mines made under the Walls; againſt which, tho' they often counter-min'd, and bravely fought Hand to Hand with the Beſiegers, yet they ſoon found that it would be of little Advantage to them, the Walls being likely to fall, and ſuch Breaches made in them, that they perceiv'd King Henry was reſolv'd to carry the Town by Storm. Whereupon Gracourt the Governor, foreſeeing the imminent Danger, deſir'd a Parley, and promis'd to ſurrender the Town, if not reliev'd by a certain fix'd Day. While the King lay before the Town, he ſent a Letter of Defiance to the Dauphine of France, in which he challeng'd him to a ſingle Combat, that the Lives of ſo many Men might be ſpar'd, and their Conteſt honourably decided by themſelves; on Condition that if the Dauphine fell in the Encounter, the Crown of France and its Dependencies ſhould be deliver'd to King Henry after the preſent French King's Death. In the mean Time the Beſieg'd being reduc'd to great Neceſſities, ſollicited their King for Relief, which was often promis'd, but to ſo little Effect, that at length upon the twenty ſecond Day of September, Gracourt the Governor reſolv'd to ſubmit; and accordingly with twenty four ſelect Captains and Burgers he came out of the Town to King Henry, who then ſate in his Pavilion under a Cloath of State, his brave Nobles about him, and the Earl of Kime upon his right Hand, bearing his Casket with an Imperial Crown upon it, beſet with Jewels of ineſtimable Price. The Governor and the reſt proſtrating themſelves at the King's Feet, deliver'd to him the Keys of the Town, according to the Covenants made between them, which was a Ceſſation of Arms for five Days, and then if no Relief came, to ſurrender the Town to him, and to deliver into his Hand thirty of their chief Men to ſtand for Life or Death at his own Pleaſure; the reſt were to depart without Armour, Weapons, or any of their Goods: And thus was this important Town ſurrender'd, after five Weeks Siege.

After five Weeks Siege the Town ſurrenders.

On the following Day one of the King's Brothers made his Entrance in great Pomp, and tender'd to the Inhabitants an Oath of Fidelity to King Henry, and ſent ſuch as refus'd into England. He gave Liberty to all the Eccleſiaſticks, and to the Ladies to go out in their beſt Habits, ſtrictly forbidding all immodeſt and licentious Behaviour to them; after which they were by the Engliſh furniſh'd with Bread and Wine for their Journey to Roan. The Garriſon and Officers were made Priſoners of War, and the Town was abandon'd to be plunder'd by the Soldiers, who inrich'd themſelves with the Spoils of a Place grown opulent by Piracy; but in exact Obſervance of the King's Command, they forbore offering the leaſt Violence to the Chaſtity of Women. King Henry's Entrance into the Town was not with Triumphal Ornaments like Cæſar's into Rome, but in the moſt humble Manner walking barefoot through the Streets to the Church of St. Martin, where he ſolemnly gave Thanks to the Giver of all Victory for the Proſperity of his Arms. The Officers and Gentlemen, and all of any Quality, were receiv'd by him with great Civility, and entertain'd ſuitably to their Rank. Deſigning to fortifie and garriſon the Place, he clear'd it of Women and Children, of aged poor and diſeas'd People, whom he ſuffer'd not only to carry with them what they could, but gave to every one five Sols for a preſent Subſiſtance. He took care likewiſe to people the Place with new Inhabitants in room of thoſe remov'd, and to that end iſſu'd out a Proclamation throughout England, that all Perſons who would come over and ſettle in Harfleur, ſhould have Houſes ſecur'd to them and their Heirs: Upon which Invitation great Numbers of Engliſh Men tranſplanted themſelves and Families thither. At laſt he conſtituted his Uncle Beaufort Earl of Dorſet Governor of the Town, with whom he join'd Sir John Falſtolf; and having repair'd the Fortifications, he plac'd a Garriſon in it of about two thouſand ſelect Men. And now the Seaſon being far advanc'd, and the Army extreamly diminiſh'd by Slaughter and Diſtempers, it was reſolv'd to ſend the Remainder into Winter-Quarters at Calais and the neighbouring Villages. But for the Glory of the Engliſh Name, and that there might be no Appearance to reproach proach a victorious King, it was likewiſe reſolv'd not to go by Sea, but to march directly thro' the Enemy's Country.

Waſſing. Caxton. La Ferre. Urſins. &c.

The French Court, notwithſtanding it ſwarm'd with Factions, while under a weak and diſtemper'd King, the great Men ſought to make themſelves greater, and the common Enemy endangering all, King Charles, the Dauphine, his Brother of Ponthieu, the King of Sicily, the Dukes of Berry and Bretaign, with the whole Power of France aſſembled at Roan, and in Council concluded that the Engliſh ſhould be ingag'd before they got to Calais, and reſolv'd immediately to incommode King Henry as much as poſſible. This was attempted ſoon after his Removal from Harfleur; for beſides their continual Skirmiſhes upon his marching Army, they broke down the Bridges, cut down Trees, ſtopp'd the High-ways, ſtuck ſharp Stakes in the Fords and other Places, laid Ambuſcades, and convey'd all Victuals and Subſiſtance out of the Countries through which the Engliſh ſhould paſs. By which Methods they reaſonably concluded, that as a Deer caught in a Toil, King Henry and his whole Army would be enſnar'd, who now was arriv'd at Virron, with a Deſign to paſs the River Somme at Blanchtaque: But that being ſo well fortify'd againſt him, he chang'd his Purpoſe, march'd by Wormes, and incamp'd at Bailew, intending to have paſs'd the River at Port de Remy; but that being alſo ſecur'd, he paſs'd along the River Hargeſt, while the French Army march'd upon the other Bank, under the Conduct of Charles de Albert Conſtable of France. King Henry ſtill endeavouring to paſs the River Somme, reſolv'd to try it even at the Mouth, and paſſing by Amiens, Bowes and Corbie, he incamp'd in a Valley adjoining, where he commanded his Archers to provide Stakes ſharpen'd at both Ends, which afterwards prov'd of ſingular Uſe to him. Then hearing by his Spies that the River was fordable at Bethencourt, by the negligent Guard of them of St. Quintins, he paſs'd the Water, but not without the help of Bridges. The Soldiers both weary and faint, many of them ſick, and their Proviſions conſum'd twelve Days before, with invincible Patience now fed upon Nuts, Roots and Berries, and any thing that the Woods afforded them. They ſpent the Days in great Toil and long Marches, the Nights were cold and wet, and no good Lodgings to be found, and the French were always hovering about them, without Intermiſſion. According to the French Writers, theſe Circumſtances mov'd King Henry to offer the Reſtitution of Harfleur, and other Advantages, provided he might be allow'd a free Paſſage to Calais. But however he gain'd great Relief by the Juſtice and Piety he us'd in thoſe Parts: For tho' he was in the midſt of Enemies, and his Soldiers pinch'd with greateſt Wants, he commanded upon Pain of Death that none of his Army ſhould rob any Church; in which when one of his Men had offended, he firſt caus'd Reſtitution to be made, and then puniſh'd the Offender with Death. The Fame of this Act induc'd the common People, contrary to the ſtrict Commands of the French King, frequently to ſupply the fainting Engliſh with their own Proviſions. In this manner King Henry march'd through infinite Difficulties in ſeveral Places, 'till about the End of October he arriv'd in View of the French Army near Agincourt in the County of St. Paul; upon Notice of which, he commanded all his Horſemen to alight, and the whole Army kneeling down, with Eyes and Hands lifted up to Heaven, implor'd the Divine Aſſiſtance to make them victorious.

The French Army now lying between King Henry and the Town of Calais, the General D' Albert, in Conjunction with the Dukes of Orleans and Bourbon ſent three Heralds to the King of England with a Challenge to give him Battel, leaving it to him to aſſign the Time and Place. The King honourably entertain'd the Heralds, and ſent them back with rich Marks of his Liberality; but he employ'd two of his own to ſignifie to the French Generals, That they well knew that of late he had continu'd a conſtant March, and they might have fought him when they pleas'd; therefore if they deſir'd a general Battel, there was no need of appointing Time and Place, ſince they ſhould always find find him in the open Field: That his great Care was not to do any Thing unworthy of himself, and as he would not be the first Aggressor, so when once attack'd he would not decline fighting: That he was resolv'd to continue his March to Calais, and whoever sought to stop him should find Danger in the Attempt; therefore he advis'd them not to oppose his Passage, that those Fields might not be stain'd with Christian Blood. On the twentieth Day of October, the French Generals sent again to King Henry, to signifie That they would give him Battel on the Saturday following. He gave the Herald two hundred Crowns, and a rich Robe; and now being sure of Battel, he rod every Day in Armour, and us'd all the most ingaging Methods to rouze the Courages of his brave Soldiers, who were all resolv'd to stand their Ground, notwithstanding the vast Disproportion of the Armies. And David Gam, who attended the King with a Party of valiant Welshmen, having been sent to review the Strength of the Enemy, made this gallant Report to his Royal Master, May it please you, my Liege, there are enow to be kill'd, enow to be taken Prisoners, and enow to run away. Indeed the odds as to Numbers were exceeding great; for the English Army consisted of no more than nine or ten thousand Men, whereas the French, according to their own Writers, amounted to a hundred and forty, and as some say a hundred and fifty thousand Men; and also with this remarkable Difference, that the French were fresh and vigorous, and well supply'd with Provisions, and the English weary'd with long Marches, and half starv'd for want of Necessaries. These mighty Advantages made the French so presuming and confident of Victory, that they thought of nothing less than the Ruin of the whole English Army, and so to repair the Dishonour their Nation had suffer'd at Cressy and Poictiers. They now resolv'd, since they had inclos'd them, that none should escape the Sword, but the King and his chief Commanders, who should be reserv'd for the Ornaments of a Triumph. They divided the imaginary Spoil among themselves, dispos'd of the Prisoners, and propos'd to lead the Captive King into Paris; commanding all the neighbouring Cities and Towns to make publick Rejoicings as for a certain Victory, and in Scorn they sent one to King Henry with this insolent Demand, What he would give for his Ransom? His Answer was, That he hop'd within a few Hours to reduce the French to such a Condition, that they should have the sole Care of providing Ransoms. As the French were flush'd with the Assurance of Victory, it was no wonder that they scornfully rejected the Herald whom the prudent King Henry had sent with Offers to restore Harfleur, and to compensate all the Damages of the War, with other Concessions, if they would open to him a free and undisturb'd Passage into England. Yet still some of the wisest of the French Commanders were against coming to a Battel, and particularly the old Duke of Berry, who had himself been an Eye Witness of the English Valour at the famous Battel of Poictiers.

A Day agreed on for Battel.

The great Inequality of the Armies.

The Confidence of the French.

King Henry finding his fair Offers refus'd, with invincible Bravery resolv'd to commit his Cause to God, and the Valour of his Soldiers; and having the Night before the Battel call'd a Council of his Officers, he declar'd, That since the implacable Enemy would be satisfy'd with nothing but their Blood, there were now no Hopes of Safety but in the Protection of Heav'n, and their own Courages: That if they would rely upon those two, they had no Reason to fear an Army so far exceeding them in Strength and Number: Therefore confessing their Sins, and making Peace with the Almighty, they should prepare for the glorious Battel, not doubting but he would be their Deliverer. This important Night was carelessly spent by the French in Feastings, Triumphs and all the Insults of mercileſs Conquerors; but by the English in Watchings, valiant Resolves, and a manly Regard to their emergent Circumstances; having their Spirits all the Time enliven'd by the chearful Sounds of warlike Instruments. The important Morn approaching, the French took the Field, pressing forwards who should come soonest to a most easie and certain Victory, having their greatest Strength in Horse. Against the powerful Force of which, King Henry

Henry with great Art plac'd his Archers on each ſide his main Body nicely defended by ſharp Piles or Stakes, ſix or ſeven Foot long, and removeable at Pleaſure. But particularly he order'd two hundred Bow-Men of extraordinary Strength and Agility to lodge themſelves in a low Meadow, where a deep Ditch full of Water might ſecure them from the Horſe, and the Buſhes cover them from Sight. The Flanks of the Army were guarded by Woods on both ſides, in one of which the King ambuſh'd a ſtrong Body of Horſe, with Orders to attack the Enemy in the Rear when the Battel was join'd, which they ſucceſsfully perform'd. The Van was commanded by the Duke of York, which Station, as a Place of moſt Danger and Honour, he had deſir'd; and with him were join'd the Lords Beaumont, Willoughby and Stanhope. In the main Battel all in compleat ſhining Armour rod the King himſelf, his Shield quarter'd with the Royal Arms of England and France; on his Helmet for a Creſt he had a bright Crown of Gold, fram'd after the Imperial Faſhion; his Horſe, of a fierce Courage, had his Furniture and Capariſons richly embroider'd with the victorious Enſigns of the Engliſh Monarchy; and before his Majeſty in Gold and ſplendid Colours the Royal Standard was born, and many other Banners in warlike Order wav'd with the Wind. On the other ſide the French drew up in three Lines, the firſt led by the Conſtable of France, the Dukes of Orleans and Bourbon, and ſeveral other of the Nobility, who all ſtrove to come in for the Honour of the firſt Charge. The ſecond Line was commanded by the Duke of Berry, the Earls of Alenzon, Nevers, and many others. The third was commanded by the Duke of Brabant, the Earls of Marle, Fauquenberge, and Monſieur de Lorny. The Right Wing was led by Arthur Earl of Richemont, and the Left by Lewis de Bourbon. In ſhort moſt of the French, and among them thoſe of the higheſt Quality in the Nation were in this Army, except the King and the Dauphine.

His Management of his Forces.

His noble Appearance.

Ibid. The two Armies ſtood thus drawn up in Order 'till between nine and ten in the Morning, when the Heroick King Henry, riding along the Front of his Battalions, with the moſt enlivening Looks, Geſtures and Words animated the Courage of his Soldiers. He told them, That they were now entring into the moſt glorious Field of Honour, which by their Valours might prove more renown'd than thoſe of Creſſy and Poictiers. That as for his own Part, England ſhould never be charg'd with his Ranſom, nor any Frenchman triumph over him, but Death or Victory ſhould be his certain Fate, as he expected it would be theirs. He was ſenſible from the noble Fury ſparkling in their Eyes, that future Ages would ſtand amaz'd to find what the Lance, the Ax, the Sword and the Bow could perform in the Hands of ſuch valiant Soldiers. Tet tho' theſe were the brave Inſtruments to reap Honour, he rely'd upon Omnipotence for the Victory; and it was a remarkable Effect of Divine Providence that their Enemies offer'd them Battel on the very Day appointed in England for the People to implore a Bleſſing on their Arms; ſo that at the Time that they are fighting, the whole Body of the Engliſh Nation are lifting up their Eyes and Hands to Heav'n for their Succeſs and Safety. If they were victorious now, they would not only inrich themſelves with the Wealth of ſo many Nations gather'd together, but a Kingdom to which he had an undoubted Right would be conquer'd, and England from that Time would give Laws to France. The Soldiers inſpir'd with new Valour at the gallant Behaviour of their King, who appear'd to them like a Deity, anſwer'd him with triumphant Acclamations, and cry'd out to be led on immediately to Battel. The Dukes of York, Clarence and Gloceſter advis'd his Majeſty not to ſuffer this their firſt Ardor to cool; but he weighing the mighty Conſequence of the Battel, would not precipitate any Thing, but proceeded with a moſt admirable Conduct, as well as the nobleſt Courage. He was unwilling to quit the Advantage of his Ground, and ſtood expecting to give the French the firſt Charge; but when he found them not to move, and that the eager Impatience of his his Men was no longer to be reſtrain'd, he cry'd aloud, Since our Enemies have intercepted our Way to Calais, let us break through their Army, in the Name of the moſt glorious Trinity, and in the moſt propitious Hour of the whole Year. Then alighting from his Horſe, with a Reſolution to put himſelf in the ſame Danger with the meaneſt of his Army, he commanded his Standards to move forwards, and the Archers on the Right and Left to advance upon the Enemy.

The glorious Battel of AGINCOURT.

The Ranging of the Battel was committed to Sir Thomas Erpingham, an old experienc'd Knight; who with a Truncheon in his Hand led the Way, and gave the Signal by throwing it into the Air, at which the whole Army gave a Shout that ſeem'd to rend the Skies. But when they ſaw the French did not come out to meet 'em, they made a little Halt to take Breath, and with a ſecond Shout the Archers in the Van began the Battel, who being lightly clad, us'd their Bows with ſuch Strength and Agility, that their Yard-long Arrows, drawn up to the Head, pierc'd with irreſiſtible Force where-e'er they fell. At the ſame Time the two hundred brave Bow-men in Ambuſh perform'd Wonders, every Arrow of theirs being wing'd with inevitable Deſtruction. A thouſand ſelect French Horſe bravely advanc'd againſt the Archers in the Van, and with great Fury endeavour'd to break 'em, but were ſo terribly gall'd by them, that they madly ran on without Order, the hindmoſt Ranks preſſing thoſe before, and the Files being cloſely ſtraiten'd, they became a confus'd Heap of Men rather than orderly Troops; and the Horſes ſinking into the miry Ground, tormented likewiſe with Arrows, were grown furious, and would not be govern'd by their Riders. But the Archers perceiving the French advance with that Fierceneſs, retir'd within their ſharp pointed Piles, which cover'd them in the Front and both the Flanks. The Enemy in their Heat and Fury ſpurr'd their Horſes on theſe Piles ſet aſlope, with which being gall'd on their Breaſts, Sides and Shoulders, they flounc'd and plung'd, and either tumbled on the Spikes, or throwing their Riders, cruelly impal'd them. It was a dreadful Spectacle to ſee the Numbers of Men and Horſes thus gor'd, ſome ſtruck through their Bodies, ſome hanging by an Arm or a Thigh, groaning in Torture, and unable to help themſelves or their Companions. The clattering of the Armour of ſuch Numbers tumbling on Heaps, the Clang of ſo many thouſand Arrows falling upon Steel Helmets and Breaſt-Plates, and the Cries of wounded and dying Men, made a hideous Noiſe equal to the Horror of the Sight. The Engliſh continu'd to overwhelm the diſorder'd Enemy with a black Tempeſt of Arrows; and the French Troops being thus terribly ſhatter'd, fell back with ſuch Precipitation upon their main Body, that they broke all their Order. The Archers ſeeing their Ranks open'd, with great Bravery threw away their Bows, and with Sword and Battel-Ax ruſh'd into a cloſe Fight, or rather to a bloody Execution: For tho' the Frenchmen at Arms at firſt fought valiantly, and repuls'd them, yet being diſorder'd and broken, they could not ſuſtain a ſecond Charge, but were intirely routed, and the greateſt Part of 'em kill'd.

The great Valour of King Henry.

In the mean Time the mighty Henry at the Head of his main Battel advanc'd to charge the ſecond Line of the French, which yet ſtood firm; in which he acted not only the Part of a General, but alſo of a common Soldier, and his Exceſs of Courage made him hazard a Life on which alone depended the Safety of his whole Army. He fought bravely in the Front of all his Men, where his Perſon was expos'd to ſo much Danger, that eighteen French Gentlemen having combin'd to kill him, charg'd up ſo cloſe to him, that one of them with a Battel-Ax ſtruck him on the Creſt of his Helmet. But this bold Action was fatal to them, for they were all ſlain upon the Spot; and here the valiant David Gam, formerly mention'd, ſignaliz'd himſelf in defending his Prince with the Loſs of much Blood, and at laſt with the Life of himſelf and two of his Relations; of which Service the King was ſo ſenſible, that as they lay languiſhing in the Field, he gave them the Honour of Knighthood, as the only Acknowledgement ledgement he could make for their Bravery. Still the Fight continu'd with great Fury, in which the Duke of Gloceſter being ſtruck down with Battel-Axes, the King gallantly ſtood over his Brother's Body, defended him, and ſav'd his Life; where he receiv'd ſo great a Blow on his Head, that he fell on one Knee, while two Gentlemen, whoſe Armour was like the King's, were kill'd. The Engliſh, ſtill encourag'd by their glorious King, at length broke into the French Battalions, and diſorder'd them; for their Horſe which had been gall'd with Arrows were now ungovernable: And the Engliſh Horſe plac'd in Ambuſcade within the Wood, ruſh'd forth with a mighty Shout, and furiouſly attack'd their Rere. The valiant Duke of Alenſon ſeeing the Battel loſt, and diſdaining to ſurvive the fatal Day, preſs'd into the thickeſt of the Fight, and attack'd King Henry in Perſon, crying out that he was the Duke of Alenſon, and with a furious Blow of his Sword cleav'd off a great Part of the Crown, which was the Creſt of his Helmet. This ſo rous'd the Engliſh Lion, that with redoubled Force, he not only ſtruck Alenſon to the Ground, but with his own Hand ſlew two of his Followers. Thoſe who were about his Majeſty's Perſon ſoon ſurrounded the Duke, and with many Wounds diſpatch'd him, while the generous King in vain call'd out to them to ſave ſo gallant a Man: For the faithful Engliſh enrag'd with the Sight of their Prince's Danger, could not be perſuaded to ſpare a Life that had put his to the leaſt Hazard.

The French Forces broken.

Monſtrel. Waſſing. Livius. Paradin.

The French Troops in the Rere were yet in good Order, and if they had not wanted Courage might have renew'd the Fight; but when they ſaw the two firſt Lines of their Army entirely routed, they were diſheartned; and obſerving that the Engliſh Horſe wheel'd off to charge them in the Rere, they fled without Reſiſtance. The Engliſh Soldiers had now nothing to do but to kill and take Priſoners; and the French were ſo diſpirited, as tamely to offer their Throats to be cut, or their Hands to be chain'd. Some flying Troops of the Enemy had rally'd, and made a Stand at ſome Diſtance; which the King obſerving, and conſidering the Numbers of thoſe that fled were more than all his Army, he ſent a Command to them by a Herald to leave the Field, threatning That if they preſum'd to withſtand his victorious Arms, he would ſhow them no Mercy; which ſo daunted their Minds, that they immediately obey'd and withdrew; only ſix hundred Men at Arms making a ſhew of Reſiſtance were immediately cut in Pieces by the Fury of the Engliſh Soldiers. The victorious King thought he had clear'd the Field of all Enemies, when ſuddenly he was allarm'd with a Noiſe that the French had enter'd his Camp and plunder'd it: For ſome Troops of the French, who had fled firſt, underſtanding that the King's Camp was weakly guarded, ſoon broke into it, either aiming to retrieve the Diſhonour of their Defeat, or covetous of Booty; and having eaſily kill'd thoſe few that defended it, they robbed the Tents and Carriages, and carry'd off the King's Crown, glorying in the noble Spoil as if they had been victorious. It was now the Cloſe of the Evening, and the King was apprehenſive that the numerous Enemy, tho' broken and diſpers'd, might gather into a Body and ſurround him in the Dark. He knew that the Number of Priſoners exceeded that of his own Men, and that it was impoſſible at the ſame Time to fight and ſecure them from killing his Soldiers; which rational Apprehenſion, and the Noiſe of new Troops arriving forc'd him upon an Action ſo contrary to his merciful and generous Temper, that he could not reſolve upon it without the higheſt Regret: He commanded all the Priſoners to be kill'd, except a few of the greateſt Note; which Orders, tho' in Appearance bloody and barbarous, were render'd neceſſary by the Extremity of his Affairs. He then order'd his Soldiers to prepare for another Battel, who tho' weary'd with Fighting three Hours, and many of them wounded, readily obey'd; and with their former chearful Reſolution, march'd to beat them out of their Camp: But they having haſtily plunder'd it, had ſoon left it, and got out of the Reach of Purſuit. the Slaughter of the French Priſoners, was ſo generouſly reſented by the Duke of Burgundy, that he impriſon'd the chief Actors, and deſign'd to have put them to Death, had not his Son mediated for them, to whom they preſented King Henry's Sword, the Guards of which were of Gold, beſet with Jewels of great Value.

Thus by the mighty Valour of King Henry and the Engliſh a glorious and wonderful Victory was obtain'd; yet this great Prince was juſtly ſenſible of a ſuperior Cauſe, and that Evening at the Head of his Army he ſolemnly prais'd the Soveraign of the Univerſe for his Succeſs, directing the 115th Pſalm to be ſung; and at that Verſe, Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us, but to thy Name be the Glory, he commanded all his Army to proſtrate themſelves to the Ground as a Token of their Humility. After that in the Preſence of his Nobility and Officers, and five French Heralds, who were ſent for Leave to bury their Dead, he declar'd, That it was not his own, but an Almighty Hand which had gain'd ſo great a Victory; and that the diſmal Sight they had before their Eyes, was order'd by the Divine Juſtice to puniſh the Sins of France. Then he put the Queſtion in Form both to the French and Engliſh Heralds, Whether he or the King of France was to be acknowledg'd Victors? And having the Honour adjudg'd to him, he ask'd the Name of the next Caſtle, to which Anſwer was made Agincourt. Then, reply'd he, let this to all Poſterity be call'd THE BATTEL OF AGINCOURT. After which, the Night growing late, he march'd with his weary'd Soldiers out of the Field to Maſconcelles, where they had lodg'd the Night before. In this memorable Battel were kill'd on the French Side the General himſelf the Conſtable of France, the Admiral of France, the Dukes of Brabant, Bar and Alenſon, the Earls of Nevers, Marle, Vaudemont, Blammont, Rouſſy and Faukemberge, and many other Noblemen, of which we have a long Catalogue upon Record. In all were kill'd about ten thouſand Men, of whom ſeven or eight thouſand were Noble, and above a hundred of them Princes, who had Banners carry'd before them in the Field. The Account given by Elmham is this, That there were kill'd one Arch-Biſhop, three Dukes, ſix Earls, ninety two Barons, fifteen hundred Knights, and ſeven thouſand Eſquires and Gentlemen. Of the Priſoners ſixteen hundred were Men of Quality, among whom were the Dukes of Orleans and Bourbon, the Marſhal Bouciquault, and the Earls of Eu, Vendoſme and Richemont. All this was effected with a very inconſiderable Loſs on the Engliſh Side: For Walſingham only reckons the Duke of York Uncle to King Henry, the young Earl of Suffolk, four Knights, one Eſquire, and twenty eight common Soldiers; tho' others account the Number of the ſlain to be about four or five hundred.

Upon the Day after the Battel, the twenty ſixth of October, King Henry took his March towards Calais, and paſſing the bloody Field, he order'd Search for all the Engliſh, whom he caus'd to be interr'd according to their Quality; but he took the Bodies of his Uncle the Duke of York, and the Earl of Suffolk along with him, in order for a more honourable Interment in England. Then viewing his Army, in a Speech made to his Men, he applauded their Valour, of which he had ſeen ſuch admirable Effects in the ſtupendious Victory: Yet he admoniſh'd them To aſcribe all to the Favour of the Almighty, who had wrought a Miracle, in making a Handful of Men victorious over ſuch a numerous Army, to abate their Vanity and Preſumption. He further added, That he could not but adore the Divine Providence for its Care of the Lives of his Subjects, that ſo few had fallen in Battel. Yet he could not behold ſuch Streams of Blood, and Heaps of Carcaſſes, tho' of Enemies, without Horror; but the Sight of his own Fellow-Soldiers affected him with the tend'reſt Compaſſion; therefore he had perform'd the laſt Rites due to ſuch magnanimous Souls in burying their Bodies, that they might not be expos'd to Wolves and Vultures. In his March to Calais this generous Prince ſhew'd the moſt moſt obliging Behaviour to his Noble Priſoners, the Dukes of Orleans, Bourbon and the reſt; and entertaining them at Dinner, he with the greateſt Modeſty condol'd their Condition, and applauded their Valour, attributing nothing to himſelf, but to the Hand of Heav'n, which had deſign'd to puniſh the crying Sins of France; and after Dinner he preſented to every one of them a Robe of rich Damask; further teſtifying the ſame Inclinations to Peace now, as before he began the War. Afterwards, when the Duke of Orleans appear'd very melancholy and declin'd Eating, the King with the moſt ingaging Air ſaid, Courage, good Couſin, I have not conquer'd you, becauſe I am ſuperior in Merit, but becauſe God would puniſh the French People for their Sins; and if he is juſtly angry with them, it is not decent for you to be angry with Him, or to repine at his Proceedings. Shortly after the Duke of Burgundy, inrag'd at the Loſs of his two Brothers the Duke of Brabant and Count de Nevers, ſent a Herald with a Gauntlet of Defiance, threatning him with the utmoſt Revenge. The King calmly return'd the Gauntlet with this wiſe Anſwer, Go tell your Maſter, that he has no Reaſon to be my Enemy; that I am ſorry for the Death of his Brothers, which is not to be charg'd upon me or my Soldiers; and if he pleaſe to come to Boulogn, he ſhall be ſatisfy'd from the Priſoners I have, that the French alone are guilty of their Blood, and of them he is to require it. As this Battel was highly afflicting to all France, ſo it affected the Dauphine to ſuch a degree, that he dy'd ſhortly after.

Walſing. Hall. &c. On the ſixteenth Day of November the triumphant King left Calais, and embark'd for England; and after a violent Storm arriv'd ſafely at Dover, where he was receiv'd with loudeſt Acclamations of rejoycing People, that cover'd all the Shore. Arriving near Canterbury, the Arch-Biſhop, Abbot and Monks met him in their richeſt Habits; and as he approach'd London, the Mayor and Aldermen, and four hundred of the principal Citizens in their Gowns, attended his Coming on Black-Heath; and at St. Thomas of Watering the Clergy of the City waited on him in a ſolemn Proceſſion, with the Relicks of ſeventy Saints. As he paſs'd through the Streets, he ſaw both Sides of the Way hung with the richeſt Tapeſtry, wherein were repreſented the glorious Actions of the Engliſh Kings in War; he heard Pſalms and Hymns ſung in Joy for his Victory. Yet ſtill giving all the Glory to God, he declin'd his own Praiſes; and in all this Triumph would not permit his dinted Helmet, and bruis'd Armour to be carry'd before him as the Trophies of his daring Valour, but expreſly forbad it, as too vain an Affectation of Glory. At St. Paul's Cathedral he alighted from his Horſe, and made his Offerings with the utmoſt Devotion; and then proceeded to Weſtminſter, where his Palace was prepar'd for his Reception, and for the Lodging of the chief of the French Priſoners. In the Morning, the Mayor and Aldermen, with two hundred of the Citizens, attended his Majeſty with a Preſent of a Thouſand Pounds in Gold, in two Golden Baſons worth five hundred Pounds more, which were receiv'd with the moſt obliging Marks of Gratitude. Then that all his Subjects might join with him in Praiſing God for the Succeſs of his Arms, he appointed Days of Thankſgiving to be obſerv'd thro' all his Dominions: And that he might perform the laſt Rites to the Memory of the Duke of York and the Earl of Suffolk, he ſummon'd a great Number of Biſhops and Abbots to celebrate their Obſequies; the former being bury'd at Fotheringay in Northamptonſhire, and the latter at Ewhelme in Oxfordſhire. And this in the main concluded that great and memorable Year for England's Glory 1415.

with eight hundred Horſe, where he earneſtly ſollicited King Charles to an Accommodation; and finding in outward Appearance that he was ready to embrace the Motion, he took with him the Arch-Biſhop of Rheims as Ambaſſador from the French King, and travell'd in the ſame State to Calais. Here the Governor of the Town, the Earl of Warwick, with the Garriſon in Arms entertain'd him at King Henry's Charge, with ſo much Honour and Gallantry, that his Imperial Majeſty was charm'd with the Reception, and afterwards told the King, That no Chriſtian Prince had a Knight equal to him for Wiſdom, good Breeding and Courage; and that if all Courteſie were loſt, it might be found again in the Earl of Warwick. After two Days Continuance, thirty of King Henry's Ships arriv'd, in which the Emperor embark'd with a noble Retinue conſiſting of a thouſand Perſons, among whom were the Count Palatine of the Rhine, the Duke of Milan, and many Soveraign Princes both of Germany and Italy.

He comes into England.

On the twenty ninth Day of April he landed at Dover, where he found the Duke of Gloceſter, Conſtable of the Caſtle, with many Engliſh Nobility on the Shore; who boldly ſtepp'd into the Water with their drawn Swords, as the Emperor was ready to ſet his Foot on Land, declaring, That if he came as a Mediator for Peace, they would receive him with the Honours due to the Imperial Dignity; but if as Emperor to claim any Authority in England, which was a free Kingdom, they were ready to oppoſe his Landing. The Emperor aſſuring them, That his Thoughts were free from any ſuch Deſign, and that he came to eſtabliſh Peace between England and France, the Engliſh Nobility receiv'd and conducted him very honourably. At Canterbury he was met by the Arch-Biſhop, at Rocheſter by the Duke of Bedford, at Dartford by the Duke of Clarence, and at Black-Heath by the King himſelf, not only with that Reſpect which his Dignity and Merits challeng'd, but with an Affection due to a Perſon related to him by the Marriage of Barbara Daughter of the Earl of Zilie, the King's Couſin-German. His Entertainment was magnificent, and his Charges all born by King Henry, who the more to honour him inſtall'd him Knight of the Garter at Windſor, after the moſt ſolemn and pompous Manner; and the Emperor ſo eſteem'd this Honour, that he always wore the Collar when he ſat in any Aſſembly.

He is magnificently receiv'd by King Henry.

Shortly after the Emperor inſiſted upon the Buſineſs for which he came, and preſs'd for a Peace with France, in which he was calmly heard by the Engliſh King; but upon new Diſpleaſures for ſome Loſs of Men in the Territories of Roan, the Motion at that Time was quaſht, and could not ſucceed, Leſt the French ſhould ſuppoſe him diſcourag'd at a ſmall Loſs. Yet the Emperor, continuing his Interceſſion for Peace, had probably effected it by his powerful Perſuaſions, had not the Engliſh about that Time beſieg'd Harfleur both by Sea and Land. For not long before the Earl of Dorſet, Governor of that Place, having made an Inroad into the County of Caux, was attack'd by the Earl of Armagnac, now Conſtable of France, and ſo diſtreſs'd that he was forc'd to retire into an Orchard or Wood, with the Loſs of three hundred of his Men. After which, in his March towards Harfleur, he was intercepted by the ſame Earl, with ſuch Numbers, and ſuch Advantages by the Sea-ſide, that the Conſtable was ſo ſure of Victory that he ſent a Herald to the Earl of Dorſet to ſummon him to ſurrender himſelf and all his Men Priſoners. To which Dorſet heroically reply'd, That it was not the Cuſtom of the Engliſh to yield without Fighting, nor was he ſo cowardly as to ſurrender to an Enemy whom God might deliver into his Power. Upon which Armagnac march'd fiercely down the Hill to ſeize his Prey, but was ſo vigorouſly ply'd by the Archers with a perpetual Shower of Arrows, that his Troops were extreamly ſhatter'd before they could come to charge the Enemy. After which a cloſe Fight was long maintain'd at the Sword's Point, 'till the Engliſh by their incomparable Valour and Bravery prevail'd againſt the Inequality of Numbers, and defeated the Conſtable with the Loſs of twelve hundred of his Men, and the great Ha-ard of his own Perſon: Which Victory was the more conſiderable, ſince the Number of the Engliſh, according to Walſingham, was no more than fifteen hundred, and that of the French fifteen thouſand. To repair this Diſgrace, the Conſtable firſt hang'd up many of his Men, and after a Reinforcement he beſieg'd the Town of Harfleur by Land, while the Viſcount Narbon Vice-Admiral of France, with a Fleet of different ſort of Ships, enter'd the Mouth of the Sein, and did the ſame by Water. Harfleur beſieg'd by the French.

King Henry hearing of this News, immediately recall'd his Ambaſſadors, the Biſhop of Norwich and Sir Thomas Erpingham, then in Commiſſion for an Accommodation with France; and the Emperor well perceiving that the French took all Advantages, and that King Henry would not bear ſuch Uſage, ſaw it in vain to make any further Endeavours, therefore he reſolv'd to leave them to the ſad Effects of War, and enter into a League with the King of England, which was ſoon concluded to this Effect: 'That ſince his Imperial Majeſty, de- A League between the Emperor and King Henry.

'other in the Poſſeſſion of them. This League was concluded and ſign'd Auguſt the Fifteenth, and not long after confirm'd in Parliament.

In the mean Time the French, that had felt the heavy Hand of the Engliſh, and ſeen that King Henry had recall'd his Plenipotentiaries for Peace, reſolv'd to rig out their greateſt Naval Power, both to block up Harfleur, and annoy the Engliſh Nation. But becauſe the French King could not ſuddenly provide ſuch a Number of Ships as the Occaſion requir'd, he hired of the Republick of Genoa eight large Carracks, and other Veſſels from Spain and Flanders, which with his own Ships made up a Fleet of five hundred Sail. Theſe cruſing about the Engliſh Seas with many Inſults, King Henry deſign'd to have gone in Perſon againſt them, but the Emperor diſſuading him from the Attempt, the Charge of that Enterprize was committed to his Brother John Duke of Bedford, accompany'd with the Earls of Marche, Oxford, Huntington, Warwick, Arundel, Salisbury and Devonſhire, who having three or four hundred Ships, and twenty thouſand Men on Board, reſolv'd to fight the French Fleet. Shortly after a fierce and long Engagement happen'd, in which the Valour of the Duke of Bedford and his brave Adventurers ſo far prevail'd that the French Ships were moſt of them batter'd, ſunk and taken; and, according to Harding, their Loſs amounted to twenty thouſand Men. Immediately after, the Duke ſupply'd Harfleur with Ammunition, Victuals and other Neceſſaries, which the Garriſon extreamly wanted; which ſo diſcourag'd the Conſtable D' Armagnac, that he broke up the Siege, and return'd to Paris. This extraordinary Service was ſo admir'd by the Emperor, that he openly declar'd, That England was happy in having ſuch a King, but the King more happy in having ſuch Subjects; and ever after ſhew'd a particular Eſteem for the Duke of Bedford. The French defeated at Sea. Harfleur reliev'd.

His Reception was very honourable both from the Emperor and the King of England; with the former he perform'd his Homage, and with the latter renew'd the Truce for two Years longer; both which was ſo diſpleaſing to the French, that the Emperor was condemn'd by 'em for augmenting thoſe Miſeries in France which he pretended he came to relieve, by animating Burgundy againſt Orleans, and encouraging King Henry's Vanity in the Thoughts he had entertain'd of prevailing againſt a weak King. He deſpair'd of obtaining a Peace between England and France, and was extreamly diſſatisfy'd that he had waſted ſo much Time in an unſucceſsful Mediation; he deteſted the Inſincerity and mean Shifts of the French, and highly applauded the Plain-Dealing of the Engliſh. There had been ſo free and open a Correſpondence between him and the King of England, that one did not keep any Thing ſecret from the other; and the like mutual Affection and Confidence was ſcarce ever known between two Princes. After the moſt amicable Parting, the Emperor ſet Sail for Dort, to which Place he was attended by the Duke of Gloceſter, Sir John Tiptoft, and many other Engliſh Knights and Gentlemen, to whom he preſented a thouſand Crowns in Gold; and likewiſe ſent many rare and valuable Preſents to King Henry, as Pledges of his Love and Gratitude. From Dort his Imperial Majeſty purſuing his Journey, at length repair'd to the famous Council of Conſtance, which had now continu'd near three Years, and of which we ought to ſay ſomething, becauſe the Engliſh had ſo great a Concern in it.

The Council of Conſtance. The Churches throughout Chriſtendom had been diſturb'd for the Space of twenty nine Years, and now inſufferably afflicted thro' the Schiſmatical Ambitions maintain'd by three Papal Monarchs, mounted into St. Peter's Chair, each of them ſo violently graſping the Seat, that the Joints of it were torn aſunder, and the Triple Crown ſo batter'd by their fulminant Execrations, that it was render'd unfit for any of their Heads. The three Contenders were Benedict XIII. elected by the Spaniards; Gregory XII. ſet up by the French, and John XXIV. preferr'd by the Italians. To prevent the Miſchiefs ariſing from this furious Struggle, the Princes of Chriſtendom appointed a general Council to be held at Conſtance in Germany, which began in February 1414, and continu'd above the Space of three Years; to which were aſſembled the Emperor, the Pope, the Palſgrave of the Rhine, four Patriarchs, twenty ſeven Cardinals, forty ſeven Arch-Biſhops, a hundred and ſixty Biſhops, Princes, Barons and Gentlemen, with their Attendants, above thirty thouſand. To this Council King Henry ſent the Biſhops of London, Salisbury, Litchfield and Coventry, Bath and Wells, Norwich, Hereford and St. David's, with the Abbot of Weſtminſter and Prior of Worceſter, accompany'd alſo with the Earl of Warwick, to make the nobler Appearance; themſelves and Attendants amounting to eight hundred Horſe: So that it was doubtful whether their honourable Preſence more grac'd the Aſſembly, or their Learning and Judgment improv'd the whole Body of the Council. For two of theſe Biſhops were made Cardinals, and of the thirty ſelected to aſſiſt the Cardinals in their Election of a new Pope, the Biſhops of London, Litchfield, Bath and Wells were choſen, and the Biſhop of London was firſt nominated for Pope; but he himſelf nominated the Man that ſucceeded, which was Otho Colonna by the Name of Martin V. whoſe Coronation was with mighty Magnificence ſolemniz'd by the five Nations aſſembled, with this Honour given to the Engliſh, That the Prior of St. John's was the Supporter of the Triple Crown. Touching the Decrees of this Council, it is ſufficient to obſerve that Wickliff's Books were condemn'd as Heretical, that John Hus and Hierom of Prague, were both burnt, the Holy Maid Bridget canoniz'd for a Saint, and that England was made a Nation in Rank before Spain.

The Appearance of the Engliſh there.

Walſing. &c. Before this Council was diſſolv'd, King Henry had call'd a Parliament in London, in Order to proſecute his Title to the French Crown, where the Lord Chancellor, Biſhop of Wincheſter and Cardinal, in the King's Behalf made an eloquent Oration declaring the earneſt Deſire his Maſter had to make a Peace with the French, which their King continually oppos'd, and againſt the Law of Arms deny'd upon Ranſom to deliver the Priſoners taken at Agincourt, ſo that the Peace to be expected muſt be purchas'd by the Sword alone. To which the whole Body conſented, and granted the King a Subſidy and a Tenth, which was graciouſly accepted; but it was too ſhort for the mighty Charge of the deſign'd Expedition, therefore the King was oblig'd to pawn his Crown to his Uncle the Biſhop of Wincheſter for a large Sum of Mony, as he did certain Jewels to the Lord Mayor of London for ten thouſand Marks. Yet in this Parliament, after he had created the valiant Earl of Dorſet, Duke of Exeter, he order'd him a thouſand Pounds per Annum out of the Exchequer, and forty Pounds out of the Cuſtoms at Exeter; which liberal Example was ſo well approv'd by the Lords, that they rather thought it too little, and not proportionable to the Merits and Services of that noble Perſon.

A Parliament in England.

Walſing. Livius. &c. IV. The Emperor's Mediation between England and France being fruſtrated by the Eluſions of the French, King Henry diſdain'd to relinquiſh his Right ſo often demanded, therefore reaſſuming his Claim, he began this Year with great Preparations for War. And having got all Things in a Readineſs, with a puiſſant Army, he reſolv'd upon a ſecond Expedition into France, taking Advantage of the two preſent Factions in that Kingdom, that of Burgundy, and that of Orleans; in which the King of France join'd with the former, and the Dauphine with the latter. King Henry's Fleet conſiſted of fifteen hundred Sail, having on Board many Lords and Men at Arms, with twenty five thouſand five hundred and twenty ſeven Soldiers, beſides a thouſand Carpenters, Artificers and Labourers. But before his Departure, he appointed his Brother John Duke of Bedford to be Protector of England, during his Abſence; which done, upon the twenty eighth Day of July he took ſhipping, the Sails of his own Veſſel being of Purple Silk moſt richly embroider'd with Gold. On the firſt of Auguſt he landed in Normandy with ſuch Terror to the Inhabitants, that they fled from the Shores, and left the Country without Men or Cattle; inſomuch that twenty five thouſand of them retir'd to Bretaign, ſo formidable was the Approach of the Engliſh. No ſooner had King Henry ſet his Foot on Land, but he honour'd forty eight of his brave Followers with Knighthood; and then gave ſtrict Orders, upon Pain of Death, that the Perſons of Eccleſiaſticks, and of Women ſhould be inviolable, and likewiſe all others that ſubmitted themſelves to his Government.

King Henry's ſecond Expedition into France.

He lands in Normandy.

King

King Henry began with taking of a View of Harfleur, after which he laid Siege to Conqueſt, one of the ſtrongeſt Caſtles in Normandy, which he took on the Sixteenth of Auguſt, and gave both it and the whole Demeſns belonging to it to his Brother the Duke of Clarence: And to the Earl of Salisbury, the Commander of his ſecond Line he gave the Caſtle of Danvilliers, which at the ſame Time he won by his Arms; as alſo that of Lovers to the Earl-Marſhal; and theſe were the firſt that were inveſted with any Revenue in France. Next he march'd againſt Caen, one of the Capital Cities of the Province, which Place was ſtrongly fortify'd, well mann'd and victuall'd, ſo that nothing was wanting for a vigorous Defence. Yet the King ſat down before it, and his Batteries not working the deſign'd Effects, he attempted it by Mines, and ruin'd a great Part of the Wall; yet ſtill the Beſieg'd made a manful Defence, and bravely drove the Engliſh back from the Breach. Nevertheleſs Henry, ſeeing that they could not long ſubſiſt, unwilling to carry it by Storm, which muſt be to the Deſtruction of the Inhabitants, whom he ſought to make his loving Subjects, ſummon'd them by a Herald, and promis'd them Mercy; which they in hopes of Relief utterly deſpis'd. Upon which he proceeded to a Storm, which was ſucceeded by a great Slaughter, 'till the King ſtaid the Soldiers Fury, and caus'd the Citizens to diſarm themſelves, ſetting a ſtrong Guard, as well to keep his Men from pillaging, as the Inhabitants from Hoſtile Attempts: And they that diſobey'd, were either put to Death or Ranſom, which was freely diſtributed among his Captains and Soldiers; by which regular Action King Henry here gain'd the Eſtimation of a great Commander, and an upright Prince. The Report of his Clemency and Generoſity to thoſe he had conquer'd, ſpreading through the Country, the Governors of the neighbouring Towns ſent to him the Keys of their Gates. The King, to invite and incourage the People, made Proclamation, that they who voluntarily ſubmitted themſelves ſhould enjoy all Safety and Privileges under the Protection of his Government. King Henry proceeding in his Conqueſts, upon the firſt of December ſat down before the ſtrong Town and Caſtle of Falaiſe, and tho' it was the Depth of Winter, with invincible Patience he continu'd the Siege 'till the twentieth of December, when the Garriſon of the Town, being no longer able to hold out, deſir'd a Parly, and ſurrender'd upon Articles, too many to relate in this Place.

He takes ſeveral Places.

Caen taken by Storm.

Falaiſe ſurrenders.

While this valiant Prince had by a ſwift Conqueſt in four Months recover'd a great Part of thoſe Dominions which anciently belong'd to the Engliſh Kings in France, the Scots thinking his own Kingdom unprovided, and hoping to make Advantage of a diſcontented Party in the Nation, invaded England with a great Army, and waſted the Country with Fire and Sword. Theſe ſtill pretending that King Richard was alive, under the Conduct of the Duke of Albany and the Earl of Douglaſs, brought along with them a counterfeit King, and laid Siege both to Roxborough and Berwick, where all imaginable Methods were us'd for the taking of thoſe two Places. But before they could ſucceed in their extraordinary Attempts, the Protector John Duke of Bedford, and the new Duke of Exeter, had made ſufficient Proviſion againſt them, and with an Army march'd into the North, where joining with the Earls of Northumberland and Weſtmorland, their Forces amounted to a hundred thouſand Men, a great Part of them well form'd and regular: So that the Duke of Exeter ſaid he could draw out of them forty thouſand equal in Courage and Military Skill to any the King had. A remarkable Inſtance of the Strength of the Nation, which beſides the Forces employ'd in France, could on a ſudden raiſe ſuch an Army. To theſe join'd Henry Benet Arch-Biſhop of York, who was ſo decrepid with Age, that he was born in his Chair about the Field; and the Fame of his Arrival, and the Dread of the great Engliſh Generals ſo diſcourag'd the Scots, that they broke up their Sieges in great Diſorder, and left all their Tents, Ladders and Engines. This was ſucceeded for a conſiderable Time after with great Devaſtations made by the Engliſh in many Parts of Scotland.

The Scots invade England.

A vaſt Army provided againſt them.

They retire.

The

The King's Affairs thus eſtabliſh'd in the North, the Clergy were much eas'd by the Securing of the Lord Cobham, their great Diſturber in the South; who had lately made new Steps towards the Expoſing of their Errors, and oppoſing their exorbitant Power. But one main Complaint againſt him was, That he had defac'd the Pictures of the Saints in many Maſs Books; ſome of which were ſhown to the People at St. Paul's Croſs, where the Preacher inſinuated that the Offence was done to the Triumphant Saints in Heaven. A Parliament being then aſſembled by the Protector's Authority, for a Supply of Mony againſt France, it was there thought a Matter of that Importance, that a great Reward was offer'd for any that could take him. Not long after the Lord Poweſs took him in Wales, after a noble Reſiſtance and many Wounds; and brought him to Weſtminſter, where he appear'd before the Parliament. Having been before out-law'd upon Treaſon in the King's Bench, and excommunicated by the Arch-Biſhop for Hereſie, it was adjudg'd upon the Record and Proceſs, that he ſhould be carry'd to the Tower, and thence drawn thro' the City to the new Gallows in St. Giles's Fields, and there to be hang'd about the Middle, and burnt hanging in a Chain. All which was perform'd with the higheſt Execrations of the Prieſts, who adjur'd the People not to pray for a Man who was certainly going to Hell, becauſe he dy'd in obſtinate Rebellion againſt the Pope. Thus dy'd the great Lord Cobham; and as this was the firſt Noble Blood that was ſhed in England on the Account of Religion by Popiſh Malignity, ſo perhaps never any ſuffer'd a more cruel Martyrdom.

New Proceedings againſt Sir John Oldcaſtle.

He is burnt alive.

In the mean Time the unhappy Kingdom of France was more and more fill'd with the Noiſe and Miſeries of War, which King Henry proſecuted with ſuch unweary'd Vigour, that he beſieg'd and took Towns in the Depth of Winter, nor could all the Rigours of the Seaſon ſtop the Progreſs of his Conqueſts. To make the ſwifter Advances in ſubduing Normandy by beſieging many Towns and Caſtles at the ſame Time, he divided his Army into ſeveral Bodies. The valiant Duke of Clarence at the Head of one of them beſieg'd Chambroiſe, and the Caſtle of Beche-Lovyn; the Surrender of the firſt being concluded on March the ninth, and that of the latter on the fourth of May following. The Duke of Gloceſter led another Body of the Army into the County of Conſtantine, a large Neck of Land reaching into the Sea, over againſt Portland on the Engliſh Shore. The Town and Caſtle of Vire were agreed to be ſurrender'd February the twenty firſt; and the like Agreement was made about St. Lo, March the twelfth. On the ſixteenth of the ſame Month the Town and Caſtle of Carenton capituled; on the ſeventeenth Pontdown was deliver'd to him, and eight Days after St. Saviour le Viconte. The ſtrong Town of Cherburgh, which ſtood in the Sea, made a longer Defence than any of the reſt, but at length was forc'd to capitulate in the latter End of Auguſt. While theſe and ſeveral other Places were taken by the Engliſh, King Henry, after ſome new Offers of Accommodation, reſolv'd to beſiege Roan, the great and capital City of Normandy; a City ſtrongly fortify'd with extraordinary Walls, Towers, and a vaſt Ditch, and containing a very numerous Garriſon. The Citizens alſo preſuming upon the Strength of the Garriſon, and in their own Numbers, which were near three hundred thouſand, reſolv'd to defend the Place with the greateſt Vigour, and to endure all Extremities, rather than ſurrender, ſince to that one Place the Inhabitants of Normandy had brought all their Treaſure, accounting it their laſt Refuge and Retreat, and by a prudent Foreſight had been diligent to fortifie it in the Beginning of the War.

Greeat Conqueſts in Normandy.

The Strength and Greatneſs of Roan.

The King, after he had taken Pont de l'Arche, eight Miles diſtant from Roan, and accounted the Key of the River Sein, laid cloſe Siege to this important Place: But underſtanding the obſtinate Reſolution of the Beſieged, he would not laviſh the Lives of his Soldiers in continual Attacks, but determin'd to cut off all Proviſions and Relief, and reduce it by Famine. To this End his Army ſurrounded it by Land, and a Squadron of good Ships which he had from the King

Roan beſieg'd by King Henry.

King of Portugal, block'd up the Mouth of the Sein. Then to ſecure his Camp from all Aſſaults, he encompaſs'd it with a large Intrenchment pitch'd with ſharp Stakes, and defended by a high Rampart, Bulwarks and Turnpikes. Sir Robert Bapthorp was appointed to overſee this Work, which he perform'd with great Skill and Diligence, as he had before the Trenches between the Camp and the Town. The King himſelf lodg'd on the Eaſt of the City, the Duke of Clarence on the Weſt, and the Duke of Exeter on the North; between whom was quarter'd the Marſhal, join'd with the Earl of Ormond, and the Lords Harington and Talbot. Before the Port of St. Hillary, the Lords Roſs, Willoughby, Fitz-Hugh and Sir William Porter encamp'd their Forces. The Earls of Mortaign and Salisbury lodg'd near the Abby of St. Catharines; Sir John Gray about the Chappel Mount St. Michael's, and Sir Philip Leech upon a Hill adjoining. The River Sein was block'd up with three Iron Chains, one of them laid two Foot above the Water, another level to it, and the third two Foot below it, to hinder all Relief into the City by Boats; the Charge of which was committed to Thomas Baron of Carew, who very exactly perform'd it. On the other Side the River were encamp'd the Earls of Warren and Huntington, the Lords Nevill and Ferrers, and Sir Gilbert Umfreville, directly before the great Port de Pont; and for a general Communication of one Part of the Army with the other, a Bridge was made over the River Sein, ſufficient for Carriages as Occaſion ſhould require.

During this memorable Siege, many martial Exploits happen'd, but no general Aſſaults; and thus it continu'd from the Beginning of July 'till December, when the Beſieged began to be in great Diſtreſs for want of Proviſions; and to diſburthen themſelves, they thruſt out twenty thouſand Men, Women and Children who were unſerviceable for the Defence of the City, and expos'd them to the Mercy of the Engliſh. When King Henry ſaw this miſerable Multitude ſhut out of the Gates, tho' he reſolv'd to force them back to increaſe the Miſery of Famine, yet being unwilling to attack a Company of Wretches unarm'd and helpleſs, he gave Orders to power upon them a Shower of Arrows, ſhot from Bows ſlightly drawn, to affright rather than wound them. Fear drove the poor ſtarv'd Creatures to ſhelter themſelves in the Ditches of the Town; and while they remain'd there three Days in great Miſery, many of the Women were deliver'd: At laſt, the Cries and Groans of ſo many thouſands prevail'd upon the King's Compaſſion to ſend 'em Food, 'till the Pity of the Garriſon was mov'd to receive many of them again within the Walls. The Famine and Mortality ſoon grew to that Height, that fifty thouſand of both Sexes periſh'd; and in one Burying Place above two and thirty thouſand were thrown into the Ground. Perſons of the better Quality eat their own Horſes, and the poorer People fed on Dogs, Cats, Rats and Mice; ſo obſtinate were they in holding out to the laſt Extremity. Little Infants hung on the Breaſts of their ſtarv'd Mothers as they lay dead in the Streets; and the Rage of Famine forc'd the diſtracted Multitude to a thouſand Violences, and they wounded and kill'd one another to take away the vileſt Nouriſhment of Life. And ſo Tyrannical was the Force of Hunger over the moſt powerful Conſiderations, that young Virgins abandon'd their Modeſty, and proſtituted themſelves for a Piece of Bread. In this deplorable Condition, Relief was often promis'd, but inſtead of Supplies the Biſhop of Beauvois, accompany'd with the Cardinal of Urſius, ſent from the Pope, were diſpatch'd to King Henry to beg a Peace; and the better to effect it they brought the Princeſs Catharine's Picture, which gave King Henry great Satisfaction, inſomuch that ſome ſay he fell in Love with her at the Sight of it. But he demanding a Million of Crowns, with the Dukedoms of Normandy, Gaſcony, Anjou, and other Territories for her Portion, nothing material was concluded.

which ten thouſand ſelect Men, with their Commanders, iſſu'd out of the Town. The Vant-Guard, conſiſting of two thouſand, being paſt and engag'd with the Beſiegers, by Misfortune the Draw-bridge broke down with the over-weight of Men, and drown'd, kill'd and hurt many. This ſo ruin'd the Paſſage, that they cou'd not come to the Relief of their Companions ingag'd, but by another Gate at a conſiderable Diſtance; and before they came into their Aſſiſtance, their whole Body was broken for want of Support, and moſt of them kill'd and taken Priſoners. Upon which ſtrange Diſaſter the Soldiers within mutiny'd againſt De Boutellier their General, boldly complaining that he had contrived the breaking of the Bridge. In theſe Calamities, after ſeveral Remonſtrances on both Sides, King Charles returning towards Paris, ſent a Meſſage to the Beſieged, That they muſt take care of themſelves; which ſurprizing Anſwer ſtruck a fatal Damp upon their Hearts, and rais'd the Rage of the Multitude to that Degree, that they willingly agreed to a Treaty with King Henry: Which being propos'd to the King, three magnificent Tents were erected at Port St. Hilarie for the Reception of the Commiſſioners, which were four Eccleſiaſticks, four Knights and four Burgers of the Town: Thoſe for the King were the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury and the Earl of Warwick. The Demands of the Roannois were many and high, but the Anſwers receiv'd were ſhort and peremptory, That no Conditions wou'd be allow'd, but barely yielding to the King's Mercy. Which Anſwer being return'd in a publick Aſſembly, Rage and Deſpair prompted them to all Extravagancies that cou'd proceed from Fire, Sword and the Demoliſhment of the whole City. But the generous King pitying a wretched People ſo obſtinately bent on their own Ruin, reſolv'd to ſave them in ſpite of themſelves, and to have that noble City deliver'd to him, untouch'd by Fire. Remitting therefore the Rigour of his firſt Demands, he again ſent for the Commiſſioner by the Arch-Biſhop to treat upon milder Conditions, which was at laſt concluded in twenty three Articles. Of which one was That the Inhabitants ſhou'd pay the Sum of three hundred thouſand Crowns of Gold, two of which to make an Engliſh Noble. For which the Citizens of Roan ſhou'd enjoy all the Liberties and Privileges that had been granted by any of the Kings of England, and Dukes of Normandy before Philip de Valois. And thus Roan was ſubdu'd to the Crown of England, two hundred and fifteen Years after the Conqueſt of it by Philip King of France.

The Beſieg'd capitulate.

A. D. 1419. Reg. 6/7.

They Surrender upon hard Articles.

Monſtrel. Hall. &c. The Agreement was concluded on the nineteenth Day of January, when the half-famiſh'd Citizens in great Multitudes repair'd to the Engliſh Camp to buy Victuals, which ſo abounded with Proviſions, that a fat Sheep was ſold for Six Sols. On the following Day King Henry made a Triumphant Entrance into the City, accompany'd with four Dukes, ten Earls, eight Biſhops, ſixteen Barons, and a great Number of Knights, Eſquires and Men at Arms. At his Entring the Gates all the Bells of the City were rung, and the Abbots and Prieſts met him in a ſolemn Proceſſion, in which were carry'd forty two Croſſes, with the Relicks of the Saints. They march'd before him to Nôtre-dame the great Cathedral, where at the Porch he alighted, being receiv'd with the utmoſt Solemnity by the Biſhops and Canons; then entring the Church, he offer'd up his Thankſgivings at the High Altar, and order'd his Chaplains to ſing a Pſalm of Praiſe. He lodg'd in the Caſtle that Night, and continu'd in it the next Day, receiving Homage from the Citizens. In the Morning he gave Orders that Alain Blanchart, an Incendiary excepted in the Articles, ſhou'd be beheaded, but pardon'd the reſt that were left to his Mercy, impoſing only a Fine upon them. Then to ſettle his new Conqueſts, he eſtabliſh'd in this City his Exchequer, Coinage, and Chamber of Accounts of the Revenues of Normandy, and built a Tower behind the Caſtle, as an additional Strength to keep the City in Subjection. He fortify'd the Bridge, and began to build a Palace on the Sein; and publiſh'd new Orders to regulate the Buſineſs of Trade, reducing the Meaſures to a certain Standard. He kept his Court at Roan for ſome ſome ſpace, and wore the Ducal Robes as Duke of Normandy. On February the fifteenth he order'd Proclamation to be made, that all who wou'd come in and ſwear Allegiance to him ſhou'd be receiv'd into his Favour and Protection: And March the twelfth he gave Orders, that an exact Account ſhou'd be taken of the Names of all the Inhabitants, Men, Women and Children, within the Bailywicks of Roan, Conſtantin and Alenſon.

King Henry had now not only the Dukedom of Normandy ſubjected to him, but Picardy and the Iſle of France lay open to his Arms; inſomuch that tho' the French King and the Duke of Burgundy had ſtrongly garriſon'd the Frontiers to ſtop the Incurſions of the Engliſh Troops, yet they pierc'd as far as Ponthoiſe, Cleremont, Beauvais, Montdidier, Bretevil, Amiens, Abbeville and St. Valeric; and waſting all Places, enrich'd themſelves with great Booty. This mighty Progreſs firſt brought the Duke of Bretaign to an Alliance with King Henry, who finding France unable to protect him, agreed to a mutual Amity, and that no Acts of Hoſtility ſhou'd be committed by either of their Subjects, without a Declaration of War ſix Months before. In the mean Time the Dauphine, who in Oppoſition to the Duke of Burgundy had taken upon him the Adminiſtration of the Government in France, invited the King of England to a Treaty; but when the Ambaſſadors ſhou'd have met to appoint the Place and Manner, the French not only fail'd in coming at the fix'd Time, but ſhew'd ſuch Colluſion when they came, that all prov'd ineffectual. However the Duke of Burgundy became ſo apprehenſive of the Dauphine's growing Intereſt, that he once more deſir'd a Treaty with King Henry, that by the help of ſuch a potent Alley he might ſecure himſelf againſt the Deſigns which that Prince had to ruin him. It was therefore determin'd in the Council of the King of France, That it was expedient for the Safety of the Nation to ſettle an Alliance with the King of England, by giving him in Marriage the Princeſs, with ſome Provinces of the Kingdom. After an Embaſſy and a ſhort Truce, it was concluded that the two Kings ſhould have a ſolemn Interview at Melun, where the Queen and Princeſs ſhou'd be preſent. For that purpoſe a ſpacious Field was well entrench'd and ramparted with ſtrong Gates, and two ſtately Pavilions erected in it, the one for the two Kings to converſe and repoſe, and the other for their Agents to conſult in.

The Duke of Burgundy endeavours for a Treaty with King Henry.

King Charles, Queen Iſabel, the Princeſs Catharine, the Duke of Burgundy, and the Count St. Paul, firſt arriv'd, with a Train and Guard of a thouſand Horſe. On the other ſide King Henry with his Brothers the Dukes of Clarence, and Gloceſter, attended with a thouſand Horſe, obſerv'd the appointed Time and Place: And now the illuſtrious Company met with the utmoſt Pomp and Ceremony; King Henry ſaluted the Queen and Princeſs, and receiv'd Burgundy into his Arms; and the two Nations tho' mortal Enemies, demean'd themſelves with ſo much Civility, that no cauſe of Quarrel was offer'd on either ſide. Many Points were debated, and many Offers were made to King Henry, particularly, That all the Territories and Towns contain'd in the Treaty of Peace made at Bretaign with Edward III. and the whole Dukedom of Normandy, and all other Places now in his Poſſeſſion, ſhou'd be confirm'd to him and his Heirs. Many Days were ſpent without coming to a Concluſion, and many Conferences were held, from which the Princeſs had abſented her ſelf. The Queen had brought her to the firſt Interview, in hopes that the Charms of her Beauty, which were very extraordinary, might prevail more on a young Conqueror than all the ſubtle Arts of Stateſmen in a Treaty. Nor was ſhe wholly miſtaken; for his Heart, tho' arm'd with fierce Bravery and undaunted Courage, was not impenetrable to the ſofter Paſſions; and that Soul which never knew Fear, at the firſt Sight of ſo engaging a Lady was ſenſible of Love. The diſcerning Queen ſoon obſerv'd that her Daughter's Eyes were more powerful than all the Arms of France, and reſolv'd to make all poſſible Advantage of this violent Affection; flattering her ſelf that the King wou'd comply comply to any Conditions, provided his Marriage with the Princeſs were one of them. She thought therefore to practiſe upon him the uſual Arts of her Sex, and to inflame his Paſſion by the Abſence of his Miſtreſs; but her Deſign had a different Succeſs than ſhe expected, for he ſoon obſerving the Artifice, the Senſe of the Affront made him inflexible to any Condeſcenſion, ſo that he inſiſted more firmly on his firſt Propoſitions. And knowing that the chief Affairs of France were committed to the Duke of Burgundy, the Thought that it was he who obſtructed the Concluſion of the Peace and Marriage, fir'd him with the greateſt Indignation againſt him. When therefore the Duke remonſtrated the Exceſs of his Demands, the King in a great Paſſion ſaid, I'll not only have your Princeſs, but your King himſelf in my Power; and I will have what I demanded in Marriage with her, or force him from his Throne, and you out of his Kingdom. To whom the Duke more calmly reply'd, Before you can dethrone my King, and expel me the Kingdom, you may find cauſe to repent the Enterprize; and I doubt not, but we ſhall make you weary of the War.

King Henry incens'd.

Hollins. MS. This Convention at Melun ended June the thirtieth, at which Time it was agreed to meet again on the third of July following; and King Henry came, but the French diſappointed him. And in reality it was manifeſt by all their Proceedings, that they never deſign'd to conclude a Peace, but only aim'd to amuſe the Engliſh with vain Offers and Promiſes. They had promis'd that King Henry ſhou'd poſſeſs all his Conqueſts, and hold them without Dependance; and that all ſhou'd be confirm'd to him, which had been granted in the grand Treaty between Edward III. of England, and John King of France: But when the Articles came to be drawn into Form, and ingroſs'd, the French perplex'd all Things by ſtarting new Difficulties and Queſtions. The Duke of Burgundy, whoſe Heart was truly French, all the Time of the Convention had frequent Meetings with the Dauphine near Paris, and it was now ſtrenuouſly endeavour'd to reconcile the grand Parties of Burgundy and Armagnac; and accordingly Proclamation was made at Paris, that none ſhou'd raiſe any Conteſt on the account of ſuch Names of Diſtinction. King Henry therefore, perceiving the Artifices of the French, reſolv'd to break off the Treaty; and according to the firſt Agreement, he gave publick Notice of its Diſſolution; complaining of the unfair Proceedings of his Enemies, who had continually deceiv'd him, and only deſign'd under Colour of a Treaty to work Delays and hinder his Conqueſts. Shortly after he underſtood that the Dauphine and the Duke were reconcil'd, and enter'd into a firm Alliance, which much rais'd the Indignation of the Hero; and tho' in Apperance all the Forces of France were united againſt him, this was ſo far from diſcouraging him, that it rous'd his martial Ardor to oppoſe the growing Danger. And having taken care to regulate and reform the Corruption of Manner and Diſcipline in the Churches of England and Normandy, he reſolv'd to proceed with the utmoſt Vigour and Vigilance.

The Treaty breaks up.

The Duke of Burgundy proves falſe to King Henry.

Monſtrel. De Urſins. Holling. Ponthois was the next fortify'd Town which lay in the Courſe of King Henry's Conqueſts, the Poſſeſſion of which wou'd open his Way to Paris. To attempt which on the laſt Day of July he ſent three Thouſand Foot, which before Day Light, and undiſcover'd by the Centinels, ſet their ſcaling Ladders to the Walls, mounted up, and crying out St. George! ſome enter'd the Town, to the great Amazement of Monſier de L'Iſle Adam, Marſhal of France and Governor of the Place, who immediately fled out at another Gate next Paris, and was immediately follow'd by above ten thouſand of the Inhabitants. So that the Engliſh eaſily became Maſters of the Town, which was ſo conſiderable for its Riches, and ſuch an advantagious Poſt, that the King in a Letter ſaid, he accounted it the moſt important Place he had taken ſince the War. Yet his great Soul was ſo little elevated by this Succeſs, that he ſent this Meſſage to the King of France, That tho' he had taken ſo conſiderable a Place, which open'd a Way to the Conqueſt of his Capital City, yet he now offer'd him Peace upon the ſame Terms he had propos'd at the Treaty of Melun. All Paris was in a great Conſternation upon the Loſs of this Place, and the Terror was ſo general thro' all the adjacent Country, call'd the Iſle of France, that the Villages were univerſally deſerted. The King of France with his Queen and Daughter, the Duke of Burgundy, and many Noblemen, retired to Troyes in Champaign, leaving Paris under the Government of the Count St. Paul and De Lactre Chancellor of France, while the Duke of Clarence march'd to the Walls of that vaſt City, and lay before it two Days, his Troops ravaging all the adjacent Country. After which the Caſtle of Giſors, which held out three Weeks, was taken by Compoſition; the Earl of Huntington ſack'd Preaux, burnt Bretveil, Clermont and the Caſtle of Vendveil; and King Henry himſelf beſieg'd the Caſtles of Galliart and Rochguien, two of the ſtrongeſt Places in Normandy, which ſurrender'd upon Articles. Then returning to Mante, the King divided his Army into three Bodies, with one of which he order'd the Duke of Gloceſter, who had taken Ivry, to ſtorm the Caſtle of St. Germain en Lay, which was ſoon ſurrender'd to him; the other he ſent to attack the Caſtle of Montjoy, which the Engliſh by fierce Aſſaults forc'd to yield. At the Head of the Third, the King himſelf march'd to beſiege Meaulan, in the Iſle of France, ſituated on the Sein, not far diſtant from Paris, a Place naturally ſtrong, and ſurrounded by that great River. Yet by the new invented floating Towers, the Reſolutions of King Henry, and the invincible Patience of his Soldiers, the Town capitulated November the thirtieth. In the mean Time the Earls Marſhal and Huntington, Sir John Green, Cornwall, and Sir Phillip Leach were order'd into the Country of Main, where they bravely encounter'd a ſtrong Body of French ſent by the Dauphine, and defeated them with the Slaughter of five thouſand upon the Spot, and the Captivity of ſix hundred Priſoners, with the Marſhal de Rous, other Noblemen, and many Standards.

The French King flies from Paris.

Further Advantages gain'd by the Engliſh.

Thus the Glory of the Engliſh Arms, and the Miſeries of the Kingdom of France daily encreas'd, which now had her Bowels torn in Pieces by Foreign Power and Domeſtick Factions. For tho' the latter ſeem'd to have been allay'd, yet ſtill there was a ſecret and irreconcilable Hatred between the Dauphine and the Duke of Burgundy; and the former was ſo much prevail'd upon by the Councils of thoſe about him, that he believ'd the Miſeries of France cou'd not be ended but by the Duke's Death. In order to effect this treacherous Deſign, the Dauphine being at Montereau a Town in Brie, ſent for the Duke from Troyes under Pretence of concerting Meaſures with him about their further Alliance, and employing their united Powers againſt the common Enemy the Engliſh. The Duke at firſt made ſeveral Excuſes, having innumerable Suſpicions revolving in his Mind; but hurry'd on by his own Fate and former Guilt, he repair'd to Montereau with ſome Noblemen, five hundred Horſe, and two hundred Archers; at the Entrance of which Place the Dauphine had fix'd three ſeveral Barricadoes, and himſelf ſtood in Arms beyond the third to receive the Duke, with only ten Followers. The Duke approaching his Preſence, kneel'd down upon one Knee, and ſaluted him with all the Reſpect due to his Quality; but the other neglecting all Ceremonies, immediately charg'd him with Breach of Fidelity, and Nonperformance of many Promiſes, and after a few Words proceeded ſo far as to call him Traitor, and to give him the Lie. The Duke putting his Hand behind him to adjuſt his Sword that had been alter'd by his kneeling, Robert de Loire deſignedly cry'd out What are you drawing upon your Prince? At which, an old Servant of the murder'd Duke of Orleans, ſtruck him on the Face with a Battel-Ax, and cut off his Chin; and others with many Wounds put an end to his Life, before he cou'd draw his Sword in his own Defence. Thus fell the great Duke of Burgundy, who as he had twelve Years before caus'd the Duke of Orleans to be aſſaſſinated in the Streets of Paris, ſo by the Requital of the Divine Juſtice, his own Life was abandon'd to vile Treachery. And it is highly remarkable, that as he was exorbitant in his Luſts, both as to Ambition and Women, ſo one of his Miſtreſſes, Æmilius Mazræus.

The Dauphine Murders the Duke of Burgundy.

Madam

Madam Giac, was the principal Perſon that betray'd him to his Ruin. However this manifeſt Murder was juſtly reſented by a great Part of the Kingdom of France; but ſo far by Queen Iſabel, Mother to the Dauphine, that ſhe did not only excite Philip, now the new Duke of Burgundy, to revenge his Father's Death, but alſo tormented her weak Husband's Spirits in urging him to diſinherit the Dauphine, and give his Daughter Catharine in Marriage to King Henry, now in the Bowels of France. Revenge threaten'd.

Mezeray. Monſtrel. &c. As theſe expreſs'd ſuch paſſionate Reſentments of the Duke's Death, ſo his Son Philip with as much Heat and more Efficacy purſu'd the Vengeance of his Father's Blood, and ſwore He would never lay down his Arms, nor make Peace nor Truce, 'till he had extirpated all his Murderers. In order to effect his Purpoſe, he ſent the Biſhop of Arras with other Ambaſſadors to King Henry at Roan to mediate a Peace; and again ſent the ſame Biſhop with ſuch Propoſals to the King, that he thought fit to ſend the Biſhop of Rocheſter, the Earls of Warwick and Gaſcony to Arras, who were very acceptable to the young Duke: So that between Roan and Arras Emiſſaries continually paſs'd 'till a Truce was concluded; which, notwithſtanding all the Offers and Obſtructions of the Dauphine, was proclaim'd to continue from about the Feaſt of Epiphany 'till Mid-March enſuing between King Henry, King Charles, and Philip Duke of Burgundy. Affairs thus far ſucceeding with King Henry, King Henry wrote to the new Pope, ſolliciting his Holineſs's Conſent to admit him his moſt Chriſtian Son of France, and to give his Benediction, for the Confirmation of the Marriage and Amity, deſign'd between theſe two famous Princes. King Henry's Right to the Crown of France was alledg'd, and the Miſeries of that Kingdom diſplay'd; but the Dauphine's Intereſt was ſo great with the Pope, that he refus'd to confirm any thing to the Prejudice of his Title. A Treaty propos'd to King Henry.

However the Negotiation ſtill went forwards, and the Place agreed on for Confirmation of Articles was Troyes in Champaign, where King Charles and his Queen then reſided; and to which Place the Duke of Burgundy, the Earls of Warwick and Kyme, and the Lord Roſs and others, attended with five hundred Horſe, were ſent Ambaſſadors from King Henry. Theſe arriving at Troyes, were honourably receiv'd, and amicably reſolv'd on a final Peace; and there the Princeſs Catharine was attended as the Engliſh Queen, and particular Perſons left to guard her by King Henry's Command. His Ambaſſadors being return'd, and his Affections inflam'd, he himſelf attended by his Brothers the Dukes of Clarence and Gloceſter, the Duke of Exeter, the Earls of Warwick, Huntington and Salisbury, and many of the Nobility, with a Guard of ſixteen hundred Men, departed from Roan to Ponthois, to St. Denis, and ſo into Champaign, where he was met near Troyes by the Duke of Burgundy, and many other French Noblemen; and with the moſt magnificent Attendance conducted into the Town.
